Imprinted for Philemon Stephens & Christopher Meredith

TO THE HIGH AND MIGHTY MONARCH OVR DEARE AND DREAD SOVERAIGN LORD, IAMES, BY THE GOOD providence of God, King of Great BRITAINE, FRANCE, and IRELAND; the moſt worthy and moſt able Defender of the Faith, and moſt gracious Patron of the Church;

All Peace and Happineſſe.

Moſt gracious Soveraigne:

Cannot ſo over-love this iſſue of my own brain, as to hold it worthy of your Majeſties judicious eyes; much leſſe of the higheſt Patronage under Heaven: Yet now, my very duty hath bidden me look ſo high; and tels me it would be no leſſe then injurious, if I ſhould not lay down my work, where I owe my ſervice; and that I ſhould offend if I preſumed not; Beſides, whither ſhould the rivers run, but into the Sea? It is to your Majeſty (under the Higheſt) that we owe both theſe ſweet opportunities of good, and all the good fruits of theſe happy opportunities: If we ſhould not therefore freely offer to your Majeſty ſome præmetiall handfuls of that crop, whereof you may challenge the whole harveſt, how could we be but ſhameleſly unthankfull? I cannot praiſe my Preſent otherwiſe then by the truth of that heart frō which it proceedeth: Only this I may ſay; that ſeldome any man hath offered to your Royall hands a greater bundle of his own thoughts (ſome whereof, as it muſt needs fall out amongſt ſo many, have been confeſſed profitable) nor perhaps more variety of diſcourſe: for here ſhall your Majeſty finde Morality, like a good handmaid, waiting on Divinity; and Divinity, like ſome great Lady, every day in ſeverall dreſſes; Speculation interchanged with experience; Poſitive Theology with Polemicall; Textuall with diſcurſory; Popular with Scholaſticall.

I cannot diſſemble my joy to have done this little good: And if it be the comfort, and honour of your unworthy ſervant, that the God of heaven hath vouchſafed to uſe his hand in the leaſt ſervice of his Church; How can it be but your Crown and rejoycing, that the ſame God hath ſet apart your Majeſty, as a glorious inſtrument of ſuch an univerſall good to the whole Chriſtian VVorld? It was a mad conceit of that old Hereſiarch, which might juſtly take his name from madneſſe; That an huge Giant bears up the earth with his ſhoulder; which he changes every thirteeth yeare, for eaſe; and with the removall cauſes an Earthquake. If by the device he had meant onely an Embleme of Kings (as our ancient Mythologiſts under their Saint George, and Chriſtopher, have deſcribed the Chriſtian Souldier, and good Paſtor) he had not done amiſſe; for ſurely, the burthen of the whole world lies on the ſhoulders of Soveraign Authority; and it is no marvell if the Earth quake in the change. As Kings are to the VVorld, ſo are good Kings to the Church: None can be ſo blinde, or envious, as not to grant, that the whole Church of God upon earth, reſts her ſelfe principally (next to her ſtay above) upon your Majeſties Royall ſupportation; You may truly ſay with David, Ego ſuſtineo columnas ejus. VVhat wonder is it then, if our tongues and pens bleſſe you; if we be ambitious of all occaſions, that may teſtifie our cheerfull gratulations of this happineſſe to your Highneſſe, and ours in you? VVhich, our humble prayers unto him by whom Kings raigne, ſhall labour to continue, till both the Earth and Heavens be truly changed.

The unworthieſt of your Majeſties ſervants,

JOS. HALL.

MEDITATIONS
AND
DIVINE AND MORALL,
Serving for directions in Christian and Civill Practice.

III. Centuries.

By Jos. Hall.

Imprinted at London, 1647.

THE FIRST CENTVRIE OF MEDITATIONS AND VOVVES, Divine and Morall.

C IN Meditation, thoſe, which begin heavenly thoughts, and proſecute them not, are like thoſe which kindle a fire under green wood, and leave it, ſo ſoon as it but begins to flame; leeſing the hope of a good beginning, for want of ſeconding it with a ſutable proceeding: when I ſet my ſelf to meditate, I will not give over, till I come to an iſſue. It hath been ſaid by ſome, that the beginning is as much as the middeſt; yea, more then all: but I ſay, the ending is more then the beginning.

D There is nothing (but Man) that reſpecteth greatneſſe: Not God; not death; not judgement. Not God: he is no accepter of perſons. Not nature: we ſee the ſonnes of Princes born as naked as the pooreſt: and the poor child as fair, well-favoured, ſtrong, witty, as the heir of Nobles. Not diſeaſe, death, judgement: they ſicken alike, die alike, fare alike after death. There is nothing (beſides naturall men) of whom goodneſſe is not reſpected. I will honour greatneſſe in others: but for my ſelf, I will eſteem a dram of goodneſſe, worth a whole world of greatneſſe.

As there is a fooliſh wiſdome, ſo there is a wiſe ignorance; in not prying into Gods Arke; not enquiring into things not revealed. I would fain know all that I need, and all that I may: I leave Gods ſecrets to himſelf. It is happy for me, that God makes

As there is no vacuity in nature, no more is there ſpiritually. Every veſſell is full; if not of liquor, yet of aire: ſo is the heart of man; though (by nature) it is empty of grace, yet it is full of hypocriſie, and iniquity. Now, as it is filled with grace, ſo it is empty of his evill qualities; as in a veſſell, ſo much water as goes in, ſo much air goes out: but mans heart is a narrow-mouthed veſſell, and receives grace but by drops; and therefore takes a long time to empty and fill. Now, as there be differences in degrees, & one heart is neerer to fulneſſe then another: ſo the beſt veſſell is not quite full, while it is in the body; becauſe there are ſtill remainders of corruption. I will neither be content with that meaſure of grace I have, nor impatient of Gods delay, but every day I will endevour to have one drop added to the reſt: ſo my laſt day ſhall fill up my veſſell to the brim.

Satan would ſeem to be mannerly and reaſonable: making, as if he would be content with one halfe of the heart, whereas God challengeth all or none: as (indeed) he hath moſt reaſon to claim all, that made all. But this is nothing but a crafty fetch of Satan; for he knowes, that if he have any part, God will have none: ſo, the whole falleth to his ſhare alone. My heart (when it is both whole, and at the beſt) is but a ſtrait and unworthy lodging for God: if it were bigger and better, I would reſerve it all for him. Satan may look in at my doores by a tentation: but he ſhall not have ſo much as one chamber-room ſet apart for him to ſojourn in.

I ſee that in naturall motions, the neerer any thing comes to his end, the ſwifter it moveth. I have ſeen great rivers, which at their firſt riſing out of ſome hils ſide, might be covered with a buſhell; which, after many miles, fill a very broad channell; and drawing neer to the Sea, doe even make a little Sea in their own banks: So the wind at the firſt riſing, as a little vapour from the crannies of the earth, and paſſing forward about the earth, the further it goes more bluſtering and violent it waxeth. A Chriſtians motion (after he is regenerate) is made naturall to God-ward: & therfore the neerer he comes to heaven, the more zealous he is. A good man muſt not be like Hezekias Sun, that went backward; nor like Ioſhuahs Sun, that ſtood ſtill; but Davids Sun, that (like a Bridegroom) comes out of his chamber, and as a Champion rejoyceth to run his race: only herein is the difference, that when he comes to his high noon, he declineth not. How ever therefore the mind (in her naturall faculties) followes the temperature of the body, yet in theſe ſupernaturall things ſhe quite croſſes it. For with the coldeſt complexion of age, is joyned in thoſe that are truly religious, the ferventeſt zeale and affection to good things: which is therefore the more reverenced, and better acknowledged, becauſe it cannot be aſcribed to the hot ſpirits of youth. The Devill himſelf deviſed that old ſlander of early holineſſe; A young Saint, an old Devill: Sometimes young Devils have proved old Saints; never the contrary: but true Saints in youth, doe alwayes prove Angels in their age. I will ſtrive to be ever good; but if I ſhould not finde my ſelf beſt at laſt, I ſhould fear I was never good at all.

Conſent harteneth ſin; which a little diſlike would have daunted at firſt. As we ſay, There would be no theeves, if no receivers: ſo would there not be ſo many open mouths to detract and ſlander, if there were not ſo many open ears to entertain them. If I cannot ſtop another mans mouth from ſpeaking ill, I will either open my mouth to reprove it, or elſe I will ſtop mine eares from hearing it; and let him ſee in my face, that he hath no room in my heart.

I have oft wondered how fiſhes can retain their freſh taſte, & yet live in ſalt waters; ſince I ſee that every other thing participates of the nature of the place wherein it abides. So, the waters paſſing thorow the channels of their earth, vary the ſavour with the veines of ſoile, thorow which they ſlide. So, brute creatures, tranſported from one region to another, alter their former quality, and degenerate by little and little. The like danger I have ſeen in the manners of men, converſing with evill companions in corrupt places: For, beſides that, it blemiſheth our reputation, and makes us thought ill, though we be good; it breeds in us an inſenſible declination to ill; and works in us, if not an approbation, yet a leſſe diſlike of thoſe ſins, to which our eares and eyes are ſo continually inured. I may have a bad acquaintance: I will never have a wicked companion.

Expectation, in a weak minde, makes an evill greater; and a good, leſſe: but in a reſolved mind, it digeſts an evill, before it come: and makes a future good, long before preſent. I will expect the worſt, becauſe it may come: the beſt, becauſe I know it will come.

Some promiſe what they cannot doe, as Satan to Chriſt; ſome, what they could, but mean not to doe, as the ſons of Iacob to the Sechemites; ſome, what they meant for the time,

A time, and after, retrait, as Laban to Jacob; some, what they do also give, but unwillingly, as Herod; some, what they willingly give, and after repent them, as Iosua to the Gibeonites: So great distrust is there in man, whether from his impotence, or faithlesnes. As in other things, so in this, I see God is not like man: but in what ever he promises, he approves himself most faithfull, both in his ability and performances. I will therefore ever trust God on his bare word; even with hope, besides hope, above hope, against hope; and onwards I will rely on him for small matters of this life: for how shall I hope to trust him in impossibilities, if I may not in likelihoods? How shall I depend on him for raising my body from dust, and saving my soul; if I mistrust him for a crust of bread, towards my preservation?

B If the world would make me his Minion, he could give me but what he hath. And what hath he to give? but a smoke of honour, a shadow of riches, a sound of pleasures, a blast of fame; which when I have had in the best measure, I may be worse, I cannot be better: I can live no whit longer, no whit merrier, no whit happier. If he professe to hate me, what can he doe, but disgrace me in my name, impoverish me in my estate, afflict me in my body? in all which, it is easie, not to be ever the more miserable. I have been too long beguiled with the vain semblances of it: Now henceforth, accounting my self born to a better world, I will in an holy loftinesse bear my self as one too good to be enamoured of the best pleasures, to be danted with the greatest miseries of this life.

C I see there is no man so happy as to have all things; and no man so miserable, as not to have some. Why should I look for a better condition then all others? If I have somewhat, and that of the best things; I will in thankfulnesse enjoy them, and want the rest with contentment.

13

Constraint makes an easie thing toilsome; whereas again, love makes the greatest toile pleasant. How many miles doe we ride and run, to see one silly beast follow another, with pleasure! which if we were commanded to measure, upon the charge of a Superiour, we should complain of wearinesse. I see the folly of the most men, that make their lives miserable, & their actions tedious, for want of love to that they must do: I will first labour to settle in my heart a good affection to heavenly things: so Lord
D thy yoke shall be easie, and thy burthen light.

I am a stranger even at home: therefore if the dogs of the world bark at me, I neither care nor wonder.

15

It is the greatest madnesse in the world, to be an hypocrite in religious profession. Men hate thee, because thou art a Christian, so much in appearance. God hates thee double, because thou art but in appearance. So, while thou hast the hatred of both, thou hast no comfort of thy self. Yet if thou wilt not be good as thou seemest; I hold it better to seem ill as thou art. An open wicked man doth much hurt with notorious sins; but an hypocrite doth at last more shame goodnesse, by seeming good. I had
E rather be an open wicked man, then an hypocrite: but I had rather be no man, then either of them.

When I cast down mine eyes upon my wants, upon my sins, upon my miseries, me thinks no man should be worse, no man so ill as I; my means so many, so forcible, and almost violent; my progresse so small, and insensible; my corruptions so strong; my infirmities so frequent and remedilesse; my body so unanswerable to my minde. But when I look up to the blessings of that God hath enriched me withal, me thinks I should soon be induced to to think none more happy then my self: God is my friend, and my father: the world not my master, but my slave: I have friends not many, but so tried that I dare trust them: an estate not superfluous, not needy; yet nearer to defect, then abundance: A calling, if despised of men, yet honourable with God: a body not ſo ſtrong, as to admit ſecurity, (but often checking me in occaſion of pleaſure) nor yet ſo weak, as to afflict me continually: A mind not ſo furniſhed with knowledge, that I may boaſt of it; nor yet ſo naked, that I ſhould deſpair of obtaining it: My miſeries afford me joy, mine enemies advantage; my account is caſt up for another world. And if thou think I have ſaid too much good of my ſelfe, either I am thus, or I would be. A

The worldlings life is (of all other) moſt diſcomfortable. For, that which is his God, doth not alwayes favour him: that which ſhould be, never.

18

There are three meſſengers of death; Caſualty, Sickneſſe, Age. The two firſt are doubtfull; ſince many have recovered them both: the laſt is certain. The two firſt are ſudden: the laſt leiſurely and deliberate. As for all men, upon ſo many ſummons, ſo eſpecially for an old man, it is a ſhame to be unprepared for death: for where others ſee they may die, he ſees he muſt die. I was long agone old enough to die: but if I live till age, I will think my ſelf too old to live longer. B

19

I will not care what I have; whether much, or little. If little, my account ſhall be leſſe; if more, I ſhall doe the more good, and receive the more glory.

20

I care not for any companion, but ſuch as may teach me ſomewhat; or learn ſomewhat of me. Both theſe ſhall much pleaſure me, (one as an Agent, the other as a Subject to work upon) neither know I, whether more. For though it be an excellent thing to learn; yet I learn, but to teach others. C

21

If earth (that is provided for mortality, and is poſſeſſed by the Makers enemies) have ſo much pleaſure in it, that Worldlings think it worth the account of their heaven: ſuch a Sunne to enlighten it, ſuch an heaven to wall it about, ſuch ſweet fruits and flowres to adorn it, ſuch variety of creatures, for the commodious uſe of it: What muſt heaven needs be, that is provided for God himſelf, and his friends? How can it be leſſe in worth, then God is above his creatures, and Gods friends better then his enemies? I will not only be content, but deſirous to be diſſolved.

22

It is commonly ſeen, that boldneſſe puts men forth before their time, before their ability. Wherein we have ſeen many, that (like Lapwings, and Partridges) have run away with ſome part of their ſhell on their heads: whence it follows, that as they began boldly, ſo they proceed unprofitably, and conclude not without ſhame. I would rather be haled by force of others to great duties, then ruſh upon them unbidden. It were better a man ſhould want work, then that great works ſhould want a man anſwerable to their weight. D

23

I will uſe my friend as Moſes did his rod: While it was a rod, he held it familiarly in his hand: when once a Serpent, he ran away from it.

24

I have ſeldome ſeen much oſtentation, and much learning met together. The Sun, riſing, and declining makes long ſhadowes; at mid-day when he is at higheſt, none at all. Beſides that, skill when it is too much ſhown, loſeth the grace: as freſh coloured wares, if they be often opened, loſe their brightneſſe, and are ſoiled with much handling. I had rather applaud my ſelf for having much, that I ſhew not; then that others ſhould applaud me for ſhewing more then I have. E

25

An ambitious man is the greateſt enemy to himſelf, of any in the world beſides: for he ſtill torments himſelfe with hopes, and deſires, and cares: which he might avoid, if he would remit of the height of his thoughts, and live quietly. My only ambition ſhall be, to reſt in Gods favour on earth, and to be a Saint in heaven.

26

A There was never good thing easily come by. The Heathen man could say, God sels knowledge for sweat; and so he doth honour for jeopardy. Never any man hath got either wealth or learning with ease. Therefore the greatest good must needs be most difficult. How shall I hope to get Christ, if I take no paines for him? And if in all other things the difficulty of obtaining, whets the mind so much the more to seek; why should it in this alone daunt me? I will not care what I doe, what I suffer, so I may win Christ. If men can endure such cutting, such launcing, and searching of their bodies, to protract a miserable life yet a while longer; what pain should I refuse for eternitie?

27

B If I die, the world shall misse me but a little; I shal misse it lesse. Not it me, because it hath such store of better men: Nor I it, because it hath so much ill, and I shall have so much happinesse.

28

Two things make a man set by; Dignity, and Desert. Amongst fools, the first without the second is sufficient: amongst wisemen, the second without the first. Let me deserve well, though I be not advanced. The conscience of my worth shall cheer me more in others contempt, then the approbation of others can comfort me, against the secret check of my own unworthiness.

29

C The best qualities doe so cleave to their subjects, that they cannot be communicated to others. For whereas patrimony & vulgar account of honour follow the bloud, in many generations; Vertue is not traduced by propagation, nor learning bequeathed by our Will to our heires; lest the givers should wax proud, and the receivers negligent. I will account nothing my own, but what I have gotten; nor that mine own, because it is more of gift then desert.

30

Then only is the Church most happy, when Truth and Peace kisse each other; and then miserable, when either of them balke the way, or when they meet and kisse not. For truth, without peace, is turbulent: and peace, without truth, is secure injustice. Though I love peace well, yet I love main truths better. And though I love all truths well, yet I had rather conceal a small truth, then disturbe a common peace.

D 31

An indiscreet good action, is little better then a discreet mischiefe. For in this the doer wrongs only the Patient: but in that other, the wrong is done to the good action: for both it makes a good thing odious (as many good tales are mar'd in telling) and besides it prejudices a future opportunity. I will rather let passe a good gale of wind, and stay on the shore; then lanch forth, when I know the wind will be the contrary.

The World teacheth me, that it is madnesse to leave behinde me those goods that I may carry with me: Christianity teacheth me, that what I charitably give alive, I carry with me dead: and experience teacheth me, that what I leave behind, I lose.
E I will carry that treasure with me by giving it, which the worldling loseth by keeping it: so, while his corps shall carry nothing but a winding cloth to his grave, I shall be richer under the earth, then I was above it.

Every worldling is an hypocrite: for while his face naturally looks upward to heaven, his heart grovels beneath on earth: yet if I would admit of any discord in the inward and outward parts; I would have an heart that should look up to heaven in an holy contemplation of the things above, & a countenance cast down to the earth, in humiliation. This only dissimilitude is pleasing to God.

The heart of man is a short word, a small substance; scarce enough to give a Kite one meal, yet great in capacity, yea, so infinite in desire, that the round Globe of the world cannot fill the three corners of it. When it desires more, and cries, Give, give, I will set it over to that infinite good, where the more it hath, it may desire more, and see more to be desired: when it desires but what it needeth, my hands shall soon satisfie it. For, if either of them may contain it, when it is without the body; much more may both of them fill it, while it is within. A

With men it is a good rule; To try first, & then to to trust: with God it is contrary; I will first trust him (as most wise, omnipotent, mercifull) and try him afterwards. I know it is as impossible for him to deceive me, as not to be.

36

As Christ was both a Lambe, and a Lion; so is every Christian: A Lamb, for patience in suffering; and innocency of life: A Lion, for boldnesse in his innocency. I would so order my courage and mildnesse, that I may be neither Lion-like in my conversation, nor sheepish in the defence of a good cause. B

37

The godly sow in teares, & reap in joy. The seed-time is commonly wateriſh, and lowring. I will be content with a wet spring, so I may be sure of a cleer and joyfull Harvest.

38

Every man hath an Heaven and and an Hell. Earth is the wicked mans Heaven; his Hell is to come: on the contrary, the godly have their Hell upon earth; where they are vexed with tentations, and afflictions, by Satan and his complices: their Heaven is above in endlesse happinesse. If it be ill with me on earth, it is well my torment is so short, and so easie: I will not be so covetous to hope for two Heavens. C

39

Man, on his death-bed, hath a double prospect; which in his life-time the interposition of pleasure and miseries debarred from him. The good man looks upward, and sees heaven open, with Steven, and the glorious Angels ready to carry up his soule: The wicked man looks downward, and sees three terrible spectacles; Death, judgment, Hell, one beyond another, and all to be passed thorow by his soul. I marvell not that the godly have been so cheerfull in death, that those torments, whose very sight hath overcome the beholders, have seemed easie to them. I marvell not that a wicked man is so loth to hear of death; so deject, when he feeleth sickneſſe, and so desperate when he feeleth the pangs of death; nor that every Balaam would fain die the death of the righteous. Henceforth I will envy none, but a good man: I will pity nothing so much as the prosperity of the wicked. D

40

Not to be afflicted, is a signe of weakneſſe. For, therefore God imposeth no more on mee, because he sees I can bear no more. God will not make choyce of a weak Champion. When I am stronger, I will look for more: and when I sustain more, it shall more comfort me, that God findes me strong, then it shall grieve me to be pressed with an heavy affliction.

41

That the wicked have peace in themselves, is no wonder: they are as sure as Tentation can make them. No Prince makes warre with his own subjects. The godly are still enemies; therefore they must look to be assaulted both by stratagems & violence. Nothing shall more joy me, then my inward quietneſſe. A just warre is a thousand times more happy, then an ill conditioned peace. E

42

Goodneſſe is so powerfull, that it can make things simply evill (namely, our sins) good to us: not good in nature, but good in the event; good, when they are done, not good to be done. Sin is so powerfull, that it can turn the holiest ordinances of God into it self: but herein our sin goes beyond our goodneſſe; That sinne defiles a man or action otherwise good; but all the goodneſſe of the world cannot justifie one sin; as the holy flesh in the skirt, makes not the bread holy that toucheth it; but the unclean touching an holy thing, defileth it. I will loath every evill for it own sake; I will doe good, but not trust to it.

Fools measure good actions by the event: but wee are done, wisemen before-hand, by judgment upon the rules of reason and faith. Let me doe well; let God take charge of the successe. If it be well ment, it is well: if not, my thank is with God.

44

He was never good man that amends not. For, if he were good, he must needs desire to be better. Grace is so sweet, that whosoever tastes of it, must needs long after more: and if he desire it, he will endevour it; and if he doe but endevour, God will crown it with successe. Gods family admitteth of no Dwarfs (which are unthriving, and stand at a stay) but men of measures. What ever become of my body, or my estate, I will ever labour to find somewhat added to the stature of my soule.

45

Pride is the most dangerous of all sins. For, both it is most insinuative (having crept into Heaven and Paradise) and most dangerous where it is. For, whereas all other Temptations are about evill, this alone is conversant only about good things; and one dram of it poisons many measures of grace. I will not be afraid more of doing good things amisse, then of being proud when I have well performed them.

46

Not only commission makes a sin. A man is guilty of all those sins he hateth not. If I cannot avoid all, yet I will hate all.

47

Prejudice is so great an enemy to truth, that it makes the mind uncapable of it. In matters of faith, I will first lay a sure ground, and then believe, though I cannot argue, holding the conclusion in spight of the premisses: but in the other lesse matters, I will not so forestall my mind with resolution, as that I will not be willing to be better informed. Neither will I say in my selfe, I will hold it, therefore it shall be truth: but this is truth, therefore I will hold it. I will not strive for victory, but for truth.

48

Drunkennesse and Covetousnesse doe much resemble one another. For the more a man drinks, the more he thirsteth and the more he hath, still the more he coveteth. And for their effects, besides other, both of them have the power of transforming a man into a beast; and of all other beasts, into a swine. The former is evident to sense: the other, though more obscure, is no more questionable. The covetous man in two things plainly resembleth a swine; That he ever roots in the earth, not so much as looking towards heaven: That he never doth good till his death. In desiring, my rule shall be necessity of nature, or estate. In having, I will account that my good, which doth me good.

49

I acknowledge no master of Requests in Heaven, but one; Christ my Mediator. I know I cannot be so happy as not to need him; nor so miserable, that he should contemn me. I will alwayes ask, and that of none but where I am sure to speed; but where there is so much store, that when I have had the most, I shall leave no lesse behinde. Though numberlesse drops be in the Sea, yet if one be taken out of it, it hath so much the lesse, though insensible: but God, because he is infinite, can admit of no diminution. Therefore are men niggardly, because the more they give, the lesse they have: but thou, Lord, maiest give what thou wilt, without abatement of thy store. Good praiers never came weeping home: I am sure I shall receive either what I ask, or what I should ask.

50

I see that a fit booty many times makes a theef: and many would be proud, if they had but the common causes of their neighbours. I account this none of the least favours of God, That the world goes no better forward with me. For, I fear, if my estate were better to the world, it might be worse to God. As it is an happy necessity that inforceth to good; so is that next happy that hinders from evill.

51

It is the baseſt love of all others, that is for a benefit; for herein we love not another so much as our selves. Though there were no Heaven, O Lord, I would love thee:

Now

Now there is one, I will eſteem it, I will deſire it; yet ſtill I will love thee for thy goodneſſe ſake. Thy ſelf is reward enough, though thou broughteſt no more. A

52

I ſee men point the field, and deſperately jeopard their lives (as prodigall of their bloud) in the revenge of a diſgracefull word againſt themſelves; while they can be content to hear God pulled out of Heaven with blaſphemy, and not feel ſo much as a riſing of their bloud. Which argues our cold love to God, & our over-fervent affection to our ſelves. In mine own wrongs, I will hold patience laudable, but in Gods injuries, impious.

53

It is an hard thing to ſpeak well; but it is harder to be well ſilent, ſo as it may be free from ſuſpition of affection, or ſullenneſſe, or ignorance: elſe loquacity, and not ſilence, would be a note of wiſdome. Herein I will not care how little, but how well. He ſaid well for this, Not that which is much, is well; but that which is well is much. B

54

There is nothing more odious then fruitleſſe old age. Now (for that no tree bears fruit in Autumne, unleſſe it bloſſome in the ſpring) to the end that my age may be profitable, and laden with ripe fruit; I will endevour that my youth may be ſtudious, and flowred with the bloſſoms of learning and obſervation.

55

Revenge commonly hurts both the offerer, and ſufferer: as we ſee in the fooliſh Bee (though in all other things commendable, yet herein the pattern of fond ſpightfulneſſe) which in her anger invenometh the fleſh, and loſeth her ſting, and ſo lives a Drone ever after. I account it the only valour, To remit a wrong, and will applaud it to my ſelf as right noble and Chriſtian, that I might hurt, and will not. C

56

He that lives well cannot chuſe but die well. For, if he die ſuddenly, yet he dies not unpreparedly: if by leiſure, the conſcience of his well-lead life makes his death more comfortable: But it is ſeldome ſeen, that he which liveth ill, dieth well. For the conſcience of his former evils, his preſent pain, and the expectation and fear of greater, ſo take up his his heart, that he cannot ſeek God. And now it is juſt with God, not to be ſought, or not to be found, becauſe he ſought to him in his life time, and was repulſed. Whereas therefore there are uſually two main cares of good men, to Live well, and Die well: I will have but this one, to live well. D

57

With God there is no free man, but his ſervant, though in the Gallies: no ſlave, but the ſinner, though in a Palace: none noble but the vertuous, if never ſo baſely deſcended: none rich, but he that poſſeſſeth God, even in rags: none wiſe, but he that is a fool to himſelf and the world: none happy, but he whom the world pities: Let me be free, noble, rich, wiſe, happy to God, I paſſe not what I am to the world.

58

When the mouth prayeth, man heareth; when the heart, God heareth. Every good prayer knocketh at heavē for a bleſſing: but an importunate prayer pierceth it (though as hard as braſſe) and makes a way for it ſelf into the ears of the Almighty. And as it aſcends lightly up, carried with the wings of faith; ſo it comes ever laden down again upon our heads. In my prayers my thoughts ſhall not be guided by my words, but my words ſhall follow my thoughts. E

59

If that ſervant were condemned of evill, that gave God no more then his own, which he had received; what ſhall become of them that rob God of his own? If God gain a little glory by me, I ſhall gain more by him. I will labour ſo to husband the ſtock that God hath left in my hands, that I may return my ſoul better then I received it; and that he may take it better then I return it.

Heaven is compared to an hill; and therefore is figured by Olympus, among the Heathen; by mount Sion, in Gods Book: Hell contrariwiſe, to a pit. The aſcent to the

A the one is hard therefore, and the descent to the other easie and headlong: and so as if we once beginne to fall, the recovery is most difficult: and not one (of many) staies till he comes to the bottome. I will be content to pant, and blow, and sweat in climbing up to heaven: as, contrarily, I will be wary of setting the first step downward towards the pit. For, as there is a Iacobs Ladder into heaven, so there are blinde stairs that goe winding down into death, whereof each makes way for other. From the object is raised an ill suggestion: suggestion drawes on delight, delight consent, consent endevour, endevour practice, practice custome, custome excuse, excuse defence, defence obstinacy, obstinacy boasting of sin, boasting, a reprobate sense. I will watch over my waies: and doe thou Lord watch over me, that I may avoid the first degrees of sin. And if those overtake my frailty, yet keep me that presumptuous sins prevail
B not over me. Beginnings, are with more ease and safety declined, when we are free; then proceedings, when we have begun.

It is fitter for youth to learn, then teach; and for age to teach, then learn: and yet fitter for an old man to learn then to be ignorant. I know I shall never know so much, that I cannot learn more; and I hope I shall never live so long, as till I be too old to learn.

62

I never loved those Salamanders, that are never well but when they are in the fire of contention. I will rather suffer a thousand wrongs, then offer one: I will suffer an hundred, rather then return one: I will suffer many ere I will complain of one, and endevour to right it by contending. I have ever found, that to strive with my superi-
C our, is furious; with my equall, doubtfull; with my inferiour, sordid and base; with any, full of unquietnesse.

The praise of a good speech standeth in words & matter: Matter, which is as a fair and well-featur'd body; Elegance of words, which is as a neat and wel-fashioned garment. Good matter, slubbered up in rude and careless words, is made lothsom to the hearer; as a good body mis-shapen with unhandsome clothes. Elegancy without soundnesse, is no better then a nice vanity. Although therefore the most hearers are like Bees, that goe all to the flowers, never regarding the good herbs (that are of as wholesome use, as the other of fair shew:) yet let my speech strive to be profitable; plausible, as it happens: better the coat be mis-shapen, then the body.

I see, that as black and white colours to the eyes, so is the vice and vertue of others to the judgment of men. Vice gathers the beams of the sight in one; that the eye may see it and be intent upon it: Vertue scatters them abroad; and therefore hardly admits of a perfect apprehension. Whence it comes to passe, that (as judgement is according to sense) we do so soon espy, and so earnestly censure a man for one vice; letting passe many laudable qualities undiscerned, or at least unacknowledged. Yea, whereas every man is once a foole, and doth that (perhaps) in one fit of his folly, which he shall at leisure repent of (as Noah, in one houres drunkennesse, uncovered those secrets, which were hid six hundred yeers before) the world is hereupon ready to call in question all his former integrity, and to exclude him from the hope of any future amendment.
E Since God hath given me two eyes; the one shal be busied about the present fault that I see, with a detesting commiseration; the other about the commendable qualities of the offender; not without an unpartiall approbation of them. So shall I doe God no wrong, in robbing him of the glory of his gifts, mixed with infirmities: nor yet, in the mean time, encourage Vice; while I doe distinctly reserve it for a due proportion of hatred.

God is above man; the brute creatures under him; he set in the midst. Lest he should be proud that he hath infinite creatures under him, that One is infinite degrees above him. I doe therefore owe awe unto God; mercy to the inferiour creatures; knowing, that they are my fellowes, in respect of creation; whereas there is no proportion betwixt me and my Maker.

One ſaid, It is good to inure thy youth to ſpeak well, for good ſpeech is many times drawn into the affection: But, I would fear, that ſpeaking well without feeling, were the next way to procure an habituall hypocriſie. Let my good words follow good affections; not goe before them. I will therefore ſpeak as I think: but withall, I will labour to think well; and then I know, I cannot but ſpeak well.

67

When I conſider my ſoul, I could be proud, to think of how divine a nature & quality it is: but when I caſt down mine eyes to my body (as the Swan to her black legs) and ſee what loathſome matter iſſues from the mouth, noſtrils, eares, pores, and other paſſages, and how moſt carion-like of all other creatures it is after death; I am juſtly aſhamed to think, that ſo excellent a gueſt dwels but in a meer cleanly dunghill.

68

Every worldling is a mad man. For, beſides that he preferreth profit and pleaſure to Vertue, the World to God, Earth to Heaven, Time to Eternity; he pampers the body, and ſtarves the ſoule. He feeds on Fowl an hundred times, that it may feed him but once; and ſeeks all Lands and Seas for dainties, not caring whether any, or what repaſt he provideth for his ſoule. He cloaths the body with all rich ornaments, that it may be as fair without as it is filthy within; whileſt his ſoule goes bare and naked, having not a rag of knowledge to covet it. Yea, he cares not to deſtroy his ſoule, to pleaſe the body, when for the ſalvation of the ſoule, he will not ſo much as hold the body ſhort of the leaſt pleaſure. What is, if this be not, a reaſonable kind of madneſſe? Let me enjoy my ſoule no longer, then I preferre it to my body. Let me have a deformed, leane, crooked, unhealthfull, neglected body; ſo that I may finde my ſoule ſound, ſtrong, well furniſhed, well diſpoſed both for earth and heaven.

Aſa was ſick but of his feet, farre from the heart: yet becauſe he ſought to the Phyſitians, not to God, he eſcaped not. Hezekiah was ſick to die: yet becauſe he truſted to God, not to Phyſitians, he was reſtored. Meanes, without God, cannot help: God, without meanes, can, and often doth. I will uſe good meanes, not reſt in them.

70

A mans beſt monument is his vertuous actions. Fooliſh is the hope of immortality, and future praiſe, by the coſt of ſenſeleſſe ſtone; when the Paſſenger ſhall only ſay, Here lies a fair ſtone, and a filthy carkaſſe. That only can report thee rich: but for other praiſes, thy ſelf muſt build thy monument alive; and write thy own Epitaph in honeſt and honourable actions. Which are ſo much more noble then the other, as living men are better then dead ſtones: Nay, I know not if the other be not the way to work a perpetuall ſucceſſion of infamy, whiles the cenſorious Reader, upon occaſion thereof, ſhall comment upon thy bad life: whereas in this, every mans heart is a Tomb, and every mans tongue writeth an Epitaph upon the well-behaved. Either I will procure me ſuch a monument, to be remembred by; or elſe it is better to be inglorious, then infamous.

71

The baſeſt things are ever moſt plentifull. Hiſtory and experience tell us, that ſome kind of Mouſe breedeth 120. young ones in one neſt: whereas the Lion, or Elephant, beareth but one at once. I have ever found, The leaſt wit, yeeldeth the moſt words. It is both the ſureſt and wiſeſt way, to Speak little and Think more.

72

An evill man is clay to God, wax to the Devill. God may ſtamp him into powder, or temper him anew; but none of his meanes can melt him. Contrariwiſe, a good man is Gods wax, and Satans clay: he relents at every look of God, but is not ſtirred at any tentation. I had rather bow then break, to God: but, for Satan, or the world, I had rather be broken in peeces with their violence, then ſuffer my ſelf to be bowed unto their obedience.

73

It is an eaſie matter for a man to be careleſſe of himſelf; and yet much eaſier to be enamoured

It is an easie matter for a man to be careleſſe of himſelfe; and yet much easier to be enamoured of himself. For, if he be a Christian, whiles he contemneth the world perfectly, it is hard for him to reserve a competent measure of love to himself: if a worldling, it is not possible but he must over-love himself. I will strive for the mean of both; and so hate the world, that I may care for my self: and so care for my self, that I be not in love with the world.

74

I will hate popularity and ostentation (as ever dangerous; but most of all in Gods business) which who so affect, doe as ill spokesmen; who when they are sent to wooe for God, speak for themselves. I know how dangerous it is to have God my Rivall.

Earth affords no sound contentment. For, what is there under Heaven not troublesome, besides that which is called pleasure? and, that, in the end, I find most irksome of all other. My soule shall ever look upward for joy, and downward for penitence.

76

God is ever with me, ever before me. I know, he cannot but over-see me alwaies; though my eyes be held that I see him not: yea, he is still within me, though I feel him not: neither is there any moment, that I can live without God. Why do I not therfore, alwaies live with him? Why doe I not account all hours lost, wherin I enjoy him not?

There is no man so happy as the Christian. When he looks up unto Heaven, he
C thinks, That is my home: the God that made it, and owns it, is my father: the Angels, more glorious in nature then my self, are my attendants: mine enemies are my vassals. Yea, those things which are the terriblest of all to the wicked, are most pleasant to him. When he hears God thunder above his head, he thinks, This is the voice of my father. When he remembreth the Tribunall of the last judgement, he thinks, It is my Saviour that sits in it: when death, he esteems it but as the Angell set before Paradise; which with one blow admits him to eternal joy. And (which is most of all) nothing in earth or hell can make him miserable. There is nothing in the world worth envying, but a Christian.

As man is a little world: so every Christian is a little Church within himselfe. As
D the Church, therefore, is sometimes in the wane, through persecution, other times in her full glory & brightnesse: so let me expect my self somtimes drooping under Tentations, and sadly hanging down the head for the want of the feeling of Gods presence; at other times carried with the ful sail of a resolute assurance, to Heaven: knowing, that as it is a Church at the weakest stay, so shall I, in my greatest dejection, hold the Child of God.

Tentations on the right hand, are more perillous then those on the left; & destroy a thousand, to the others ten: as the Sun, more usually, causeth the traveller to cast off his cloak, then the wind. For those on the left hand miscarry men but two wayes: to distrust, and deniall of God; more rare sins: but the other to all the rest, wherewith
E mens lives are so commonly defiled. The spirit of Christians is like the English Jear; whereof we read, that it is fired with water, quenched with oyle. And these two, prosperity and adversity, are like heat & cold: the one gathers the powers of the soul together, and makes them abler to resist, by uniting them: the other diffuses them; and by such separation, makes them easier to conquer. I hold it therfore as Praise-worthy with God, for a man to contemne a proffered honour, or pleasure, for conscience sake: as, on the rack not to deny his profession. When these are offered, I will not nibble at the bait; that I be not taken with the hook.

God is Lord of my body also: and therefore challengeth as well reverent gesture, as inward devotion. I will, ever, in my prayers, either stand, as a servant, before my master; or kneel, as a subject to my Prince.

81 I have

I have not been in others breasts: but, for my own part, I never tasted of ought, that might deserve the name of pleasure. And, if I could, yet a thousand pleasures cannot countervaile one torment: because the one may be exquisite; the other, not without composition. And, if not one torment, much lesse a thousand. And if not for a moment, much lesse for eternity. And, if not the torment of a part, much lesse of the whole. For if the pain but of a tooth be so intolerable, what shall the racking of the whole body be? And if of the body; what shall that be, which is primarily of the soule? If there be pleasures that I heare not of, I will be wary of buying them so over-dear.

82

As Hypocrisie is a common counterfeit of all vertues: so there is no speciall vertue, which is not (to the the very life of it) seemingly resembled, by some speciall vice. So, devotion is counterfeited by superstition; good thrift, by niggardlinesse; charity, with vain-glorious pride. For, as charity is bounteous to the poor, so is vain glory to the wealthy: as charity sustains all, for truth; so pride, for a vain praise: both of them make a man courteous and affable. So the substance of every vertue is in the heart: which, since it hath not a window made into it, by the Creator of it, (but is reserved under lock and key for his own view) I will judge only by appearance. I had rather wrong my self, by credulity; then others, by unjust censures and suspitions.

Every man hath a kingdome within himself: Reason, as the Princesse, dwels in the highest and inwardest to me: the senses are the Guard and attendants on the Court; without whose aid, nothing is admitted into the Presence: The supreme faculties (as will, memory, &c.) are the Peeres: The outward parts, and inward affections, are the Commons: Violent Passions are as Rebels, to disturb the common peace. I would not be a Stoick, to have no passions: for that were to overthrow this inward government God hath erected in me; but a Christian, to order those I have. And for that I see, that as (in commotions) one mutinous person drawes on more; so in passions, that one makes way for the extremity of another, (as excesse of love causeth excesse of grief, upon the losse of what we loved:) I will doe as wise Princes use, to those they misdoubt for faction; so hold them down, and keep them bare, that their very impotency and remisnesse shall afford me security.

84

I look upon the things of this life, as an owner; as a stranger. As an owner, in their right; as a stranger in their use. I see, that owning is but a conceit, besides using: I can use (as I lawfully may) other mens commodities as my own; walk in their woods, look on their fair houses, with as much pleasure as my own; yet again, I will use my own, as if it were anothers; knowing that though I hold them by right, yet it is only by Tenure at will.

85

There is none like to Luthers three masters; Prayer, Tentation, Meditation. Tentation stirs up holy Meditation: Meditation prepares to prayer: and Prayer makes profit of Tentation; and fetcheth all divine knowledge from Heaven. Of others, I may learn the Theory of Divinity; of these only, the Practice. Other masters teach me by rote, to speak Parrot-like of heavenly things; these alone, with feeling and understanding.

86

Affectation is the greatest enemy both of doing well, and good acceptance of what is done. I hold it the part of a wise man, to endevour rather that fame may follow him, then goe before him.

87

I see a number, which, with Shimei, whiles they seek their servant, which is riches, lose their soules. No worldly thing shall draw me without the gates, within which God hath confined me.

88

It is an hard thing for a man to finde wearinesse in pleasure, while it lasteth; or contentment in pain, while he is under it. After both (indeed) it is easie: yet both of these must

A must be found in both; or elſe we ſhall be drunken with pleaſures, and overwhelmed with ſorrow. As thoſe, therefore, which ſhould eat ſome diſh over-deliciouſly ſweet doe allay it with tart ſawce, that they may not be cloyed: and thoſe that are to receive bitter pills (that they may not be annoyed with their unpleaſing taſte) rowl them in Sugar: So in all pleaſures it is beſt to labour, not how to make them moſt delightfull, but how to moderate them from exceſſe: and in all ſorrowes, ſo to ſettle our hearts in true grounds of comfort, that we may not care ſo much for being bemoaned of others, as how to be moſt contented in our ſelves.

In wayes, we ſee Travellers chuſe not the faireſt, and greeneſt; if it be either croſſe or contrary; but the neereſt, though miry and uneven: ſo, in opinions, let me follow not
B the plauſibleſt, but the trueſt, though more perplexed.

Chriſtian ſociety is like a bundle of ſticks laid together, whereof one kindles another. Solitary men have feweſt provocations to evill; but againe feweſt incitations to good. So much, as doing good, is better then not doing evill, will I account Chriſtian good fellowſhip better then an Eremitiſh and melancholike ſolitarineſſe.

91

I had rather confeſſe my ignorance, then falſly profeſſe knowledge. It is no ſhame, not to know all things, but it is a juſt ſhame to over-reach in any thing.

Sudden extremity is a notable triall of faith, or any other diſpoſition of the ſoule.
C For as in a ſudden feare, the bloud gathers to the heart, for guarding of that part which is principall: ſo the powers of the ſoul combine themſelves in an hard exigent, that they may be eaſily judged of. The faithfull (more ſuddenly then any caſualty) can lift up his heart to his ſtay in Heaven: Whereas the worldling ſtands amazed, and diſtraught with the evill; becauſe he hath no refuge to flie unto. For, not being acquainted with God in his peace, how ſhould he but have him to ſeek in his extremitie? When therefore ſome ſudden ſtitch girds me in the ſide, like to be the meſſenger of death; or when the ſword of my enemy, in an unexpected aſſault, threatens my body; I will ſeriouſly note how I am affected: ſo the ſuddeneſt evill, as it ſhall not come unlooked for, ſhall not goe away unthought of. If I finde my ſelfe couragious, and heavenly minded, I will rejoyce in the truth of Gods grace in me; knowing that one
D dram of tried faith is worth a whole pound of ſpeculative; and that, which once ſtood by me, will never fail me: If dejected and heartleſſe, herein I will acknowledge cauſe of humiliation; and, with all care and earneſtneſſe, ſeek to ſtore my ſelfe againſt the dangers following.

The Rules of civill policy may well be applied to the minde. As therefore for a Prince, that he may have good ſucceſſe againſt either Rebels, or forrain enemies, it is a ſure axiome, Divide and Rule: but when he is once ſeated in the Throne over loyall ſubjects, Vnite and Rule: ſo, in the regiment of the ſoule, there muſt be variance ſet in the judgement, and the conſcience and affections; that, that which is amiſſe may be ſubdued: but, when all parts are brought to order, it is the only courſe to maintaine
E their peace; that, all ſeeking to eſtabliſh and help each other, the whole may proſper. Alwayes to be at warre, is deſperate: alwayes at peace, ſecure, and over-Epicure-like. I doe account a ſecure peace, a juſt occaſion of this civill diſſention in my ſelfe; and a true Chriſtian peace, the end of all my ſecret warres: which when I have atchieved, I ſhall reigne with comfort; and never will be quiet till I have atchieved it.

I brought ſinne enough with me into the world to repent of all my life, though I ſhould never actually ſinne: and ſin enough actually every day, to ſorrow for, though I had brought none with me into the world: but laying both together, my time is rather too ſhort for my repentance. It were madneſſe in me to ſpend my whole life in jollity and pleaſure, whereof I have ſo ſmall occaſion: and neglect the opportunity of my ſo juſt ſorrow: eſpecially, ſince before I came into the World, I ſinned; after I am gone out of the world, the contagion of my ſinne paſt, ſhall adde to the guilt of it: yet, in both theſe eſtates, I am uncapable of repentance. I will do that while I may, which, when I have neglected, is unrecoverable. A

Ambition is torment enough for an enemy. For, it affords as much diſcontentment in enjoying, as in want; making men like poyſoned Rats: which when they have taſted of their bane, cannot reſt, till they drink; and then can much leſſe reſt, till their death. It is better for me to live in the wiſe mens ſtocks, in a contented want; then in a fools Paradiſe, to vex my ſelf with wilfull unquietneſſe.

96

It is not poſſible but a conceited man muſt be a fool. For, that over-weening opinion he hath of himſelf, excludes all opportunity of purchaſing knowledge. Let a veſſel be once full of never ſo baſe liquor, it will not give room to the coſtlieſt; but ſpils beſide, whatſoever is infuſed. The proud man, though he be empty of good ſubſtance, yet is full of conceit. Many men had proved wiſe, if they had not ſo thought themſelves. I am empty enough to receive knowledge enough; Let me think my ſelfe but ſo bare as I am, and more I need not. O Lord, doe thou teach me how little, how nothing I have; and give me no more, then I know I want. B

97

Every man hath his turne of ſorrow: whereby (ſome more, ſome leſſe) all men are in their times miſerable. I never yet could meet with the man that complained not of ſomewhat. Before ſorrow come, I will prepare for it: when it is come, I will welcome it: when it goes, I will take but halfe a farewell of it; as ſtill expecting his returne. C

98

There be three things that follow an injury ſo far as it concerneth our ſelves; (for, as the offence toucheth God, it is above our reach) Revenge, Cenſure, Satisfaction; which muſt be remitted of the mercifull man. Yet not all at all times: but revenge alwayes, leaving it to him that can, and will doe it: Cenſure oft-times; Satisfaction ſometimes. He that deceives me oft, though I muſt forgive him, yet charity bindes me not, not to cenſure him for untruſty; and he that hath endammaged me much, cannot plead breach of charity, in my ſeeking his reſtitution. I will ſo remit wrongs, as I may not encourage others to offer them; and ſo retain them, as I may not induce God to retaine mine to him.

Garments that have once one rent in them, are ſubject to be torn on every nail, and every bryar; and glaſſes, that are once crackt, are ſoon broken: ſuch is mans good name once tainted with juſt reproach. Next to the approbation of God, and the teſtimony of mine own conſcience, I will ſeek for a good reputation amongſt men: not by cloſe cariage concealing faults, that they may not be known to my ſhame: but avoiding all vices, that I may not deſerve it. The efficacy of the agent, is in the Patient well diſpoſed. It is hard for me ever to doe good, unleſſe I be reputed good.

Many vegetable, and many brute creatures exceed man in length of age. Which hath opened the mouths of Heathen Philoſophers to accuſe Nature, as a ſtep-mother to Man; who hath given him the leaſt time to live, that onely could make uſe of his time, in getting knowledge. But herein Religion doth moſt magnifie God, in his wiſedome and juſtice; teaching us, that other creatures live long, and periſh to nothing, only Man recompences the ſhortneſſe of his life, with eternity after it; that the ſooner he dies well, the ſooner he comes to perfection of knowledge, which he might in vain ſeek below: the ſooner he dies ill, the leſſe hurt he doth with his knowledge. There is great reaſon then, why man ſhould live long; greater, why he ſhould die early. I wil never blame God, for making mee too ſoone happy; for changing my ignorance, for knowledge; my corruption, for immortality; my infirmities, for perfection. Come Lord Ieſus, come quickly. E

DIVINE

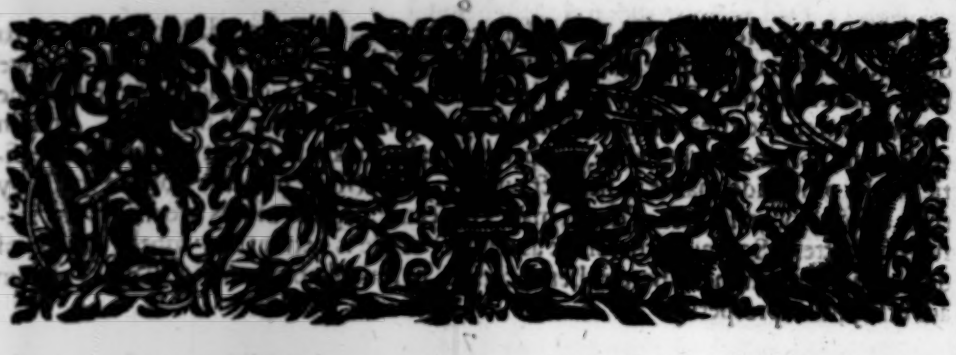
TO THE RIGHT VERTVOVS AND VVORSHIPFULL LADIE, THE Ladie DRURY, all increaſe of Grace.

MADAME, I know your Chriſtian ingenuity ſuch, that you will not grudge others the communication of this your private right: which yet I durſt not have preſumed to adventure, if I feared that either the benefit of it would be leſſe, or the acceptation. Now it ſhall be no leſſe yours: onely it ſhall be more known to be yours. Vouchſafe therefore to take part with your worthy Husband, of theſe my ſimple Meditations. And if your long and gracious experience have written you a larger volume of wholeſome Lawes, and better informed you by precepts fetcht from your own feeling, then I can hope for, by my bare ſpeculation: yet where theſe my not unlikely rules ſhall accord with yours, let your redoubled aſſent allow them, and they confirm it. I made them not for the eye, but for the heart: neither doe I commend them to your reading, but your practice: wherein alſo it ſhall not be enough that you are a meer and ordinary agent, but that you be a pattern propounded unto others imitation. So ſhall your vertuous and holy progreſſe, beſides your own peace and happineſſe, be my Crown and rejoycing, in the day of our common appearance. Halſted. Decemb. 4.

Your L. humbly devoted,

JOS. HALL.



MEDITATIONS AND VOWES.

THE SECOND CENTVRIE.

A Man under Gods affliction, is like a bird in a net; the more he ſtriveth, the more he is intangled. Gods decree cannot be eluded with impatience. What I cannot avoid, I will learne to beare.

I finde, that all worldly things require a long time in getting, and afford a ſhort pleaſure in enjoying them. I will not care much, for what I have; nothing, for what I have not.

I ſee naturall bodies forſake their own place and condition, for the preſervation of the whole; but of all other creatures, Man, and of all other Men, Chriſtians have the leaſt intereſt in themſelves. I will live, as given to others, lent only to my ſelfe.

That which is ſaid of the Elephant, that being guiltie of his deformitie, he cannot abide to look on his owne face in the water (but ſeeks for troubled and muddy channels) we ſee well morallized, in men of evill conſcience, who know their ſoules are ſo filthy, that they dare not ſo much as view them; but ſhift of all checks of their former iniquity, with vaine excuſes of good-fellowſhip. Whence it is, that every ſmall reprehenſion ſo galls them; becauſe it calls the eye of the ſoule home to it ſelfe, and makes them ſee a glimpſe of what they would not. So have I ſeen a fooliſh and timorous Patient, which knowing his wound very deep, would not endure the Chirurgion to ſearch it: whereon what can enſue, but a feſtering of the part, & a danger of the whole body? So I have ſeen many prodigall waſters run ſo farre in books, that they cannot abide to heare of reckoning. It hath beene an old and true Proverbe, Oft and even reckonings make long friends: I will oft ſum my eſtate with God, that I may know what I have to expect, and anſwer for. Neither ſhall my ſcore run on ſo long with God, that I ſhall not know my debts, or feare an Audit, or deſpaire of pardon.

I account this body, nothing, but a cloſe priſon to my ſoule, and the earth a larger priſon to my body. I may not break priſon, till I be looſed by death: but I will leave it, not unwillingly, when I am looſed.

The common feares of the World are faultleſſe, and ill placed. No man feares to doe ill; every man to ſuffer ill: wherein, if we conſider it well, we ſhall finde that we feare our beſt friends. For my part, I have learned more of God and of my ſelf, in one weekes extremitie, then all my whole lifes proſperity had taught me afore. And, in reaſon and common experience, proſperity uſually makes us forget our death: adverſitie on the other ſide, makes us neglect our life. Now (if we meaſure both of theſe, by their effects) forgetfulneſs of death makes us ſecure: neglect of this life makes us carefull of a better. So much therefore as neglect of life is better then forgetfulneſſe of death, and watchfulneſſe better then ſecuritie: ſo much more beneficiall will I eſteem adverſity, then proſperity. A

Even grief it ſelfe is pleaſant to the remembrance, when it is once paſt: as joy is, whileſt it is preſent. I will not therefore in my conceit, make any ſo great difference betwixt joy and griefe: ſith griefe paſt, is joyfull; and long expectation of joy is grievous. B

8

Every ſickneſs is a little death. I will be content to die oft, that I may die once well.

Oft-times thoſe things which have beene ſweet in opinion, have proved bitter in experience. I will therefore even ſuſpend my reſolute judgement, untill the triall and event: in the meane while I will feare the worſt, and hope the beſt.

10

In all divine and morall good things, I would faine keep that I have, and get that I want. I doe not more loath all other covetouſneſſe, then I affect this. In all theſe things alone, I profeſſe never to have enough. If I may increaſe them, therefore, either by labouring, or begging, or uſurie, I ſhall leave no meanes unattempted. C

11

Some children are of that nature, that they are never well, but while the rod is over them: ſuch am I to God; Let him beat me, ſo he amend me: let him take all away from me, ſo he give me himſelfe.

12

There muſt not be one uniform proceeding with all men, in reprehenſion: but that muſt vary according to the diſpoſition of the reproved. I have ſeen ſome men as thorns, which eaſily touched, hurt not; but if hard and unwarily, fetch bloud of the hand: others, as nettles, which if they be nicely handled, ſting and prick; but if hard and roughly preſſed, are pulled up without harme. Before I take any man in hand, I will know whether he be a thorne or a nettle. D

13

I will account no ſin little; ſince there is not the leaſt, but workes out the death of the ſoule. It is all one whether I be drowned in the ebber ſhore, or in the midſt of the deep Sea.

14

It is a baſe thing to get goods, to keep them. I ſee that God (which only is infinitely rich) holdeth nothing in his owne hands, but gives all to his creatures. But, if we will needs lay up, where ſhould we rather repoſe it, then in Chriſts treaſury? The poore mans hand is the treaſury of Chriſt. All my ſuperfluity ſhall be there hoorded up, where I know it ſhall be ſafely kept, and ſurely returned me. E

15

The School of God, and Nature, require two contrary manners of proceeding. In the Schoole of Nature, we muſt conceive, and then beleeve: in the School of God, we muſt firſt beleeve, and then we ſhall conceive. He that beleeves no more then he conceives, can never be a Chriſtian; nor he a Philoſopher, that aſſents without reaſon. In Natures School, we are taught to bolt out the truth, by Logical diſcourſe: God cannot endure a Logician. In his Schoole he is the beſt Scholler, that reaſons leaſt, and aſſents moſt. In divine things, what I may I will conceive: the reſt I will beleeve and admire. Not a curious head, but a credulous and plaine heart, is accepted with God.

A 16

No worldly pleasure hath any absolute delight in it: but as a Bee, having honey in the mouth, hath a sting in the taile. Why am I so foolish, to rest my heart upon any of these: and not rather labour to aspire to that one absolute Good, in whom is nothing savouring of griefe, nothing wanting to perfect happinesse?

17

A sharp reproof I account better then a smooth deceit. Therefore when my friend checks me, I will respect it with thankfulnesse: when others flatter me, I will suspect it, and rest in mine owne censure of my self, who should be more privy (and lesse partiall) to my owne defervings.

18

B Extremity distinguisheth friends: Worldly pleasures, like Physicians, gives us over when once we lie a dying; and yet the death-bed had most need of comforts: Christ Jesus standeth by his, in the pangs of death; and after death at the barre of judgment, not leaving them either in their bed, or grave. I will use them therefore to my best advantage; not trust them. But for thee, O my Lord, which in mercy and truth canst not faile me, (whom I have found ever faithfull and present in all extremities) Kill me, yet will I trust in thee.

We have heard of so many thousand generations passed, and we have seene so many hundreds die within our knowledge; that I wonder any man can make account to live one day. I will die daily. It is not done before the time, which may be done at C all times.

Desire oft-times makes us unthankfull. For, who so hopes for that he hath not, usually forgets that which he hath. I will not suffer my heart to rove after high or impossible hopes; lest I should, in the mean time, contemne present gifts.

21

In hoping wel, in being ill, and fearing worse, the life of man is wholly consumed. When I am ill, I will live in hope of better: when well, in feare of worse: neither will I, at any time, hope without feare; lest I should deceive my selfe with too much confidence: (wherein evill shall be so much more unwelcome and intolerable, because I looked for good) nor, again, feare without hope; lest I should be over-much dejected:
D nor doe either of them, without true contentation.

What is man to the whole earth? What is earth to the heaven? What is heaven to his Maker? I will admire nothing in it self, but all things in God, and God in all things.

23

There be three usuall causes of ingratitude, upon a benefit received: Envie, Pride, Covetousnesse: Envie, looking more at others benefits, then our owne; Pride, looking more at our selves, then the benefit; Covetousnesse, looking more at what we would have, then what we have. In good turnes, I will neither respect the giver, nor my selfe, nor the gift, nor others; but only the intent and good will from whence it proceeded. So shall I requite others great pleasures, with equall good will, and accept of E small favours, with great thankfulnesse.

Whereas the custome of the world is, to hate things present, to desire future, and magnifie what is past; I will contrarily esteeme that which is present, best. For, both what is past, was once present; and what is future, will be present: future things next, because they are present in hope; what is past, least of all, because it can not be present: yet somewhat because it was.

25

We pitie the folly of the Lark, which (while it playeth with the fether, and stoopeth to the glasse) is caught in the fowlers net: and yet cannot see our selves alike made fooles by Satan; who, deluding us by the vain fethers and glasses of the world, suddenly enwrappeth us in his snares. We see not the nets indeed, it is too much that we shall ſhall feele them, and that they are not ſo eaſily eſcaped after, as before avoided. O Lord, keep thou mine eyes from beholding vanitie. And though mine eyes ſee it, let not my heart ſtoop to it, but loath it afarre off. And, if I ſtoop at any time, and be taken, let thou my ſoule at liberty: that I may ſay, My ſoul is eſcaped, even as a bird out of the ſnare of the Fowler, the ſnare is broken, and I am delivered. A

26

In ſuffering evill, to look to ſecondary cauſes, without reſpect to the higheſt, maketh impatience. For ſo we bite at the ſtone, & neglect him that threw it. If we take a blow at our equall, we return it with uſury: if of a Prince, we repine not. What matter is it, if God kill me, whether he doe it by an Ague, or by the hand of a Tyrant? Again, in expectation of good, to look to the firſt cauſe, without care of the ſecond, argues idleneſſe and cauſeth want. As we cannot help our ſelves, without God: ſo God will not ordinarily help us, without our ſelves. In both, I will look up to God, without repining at the meanes in one, or truſting them in the other. B

27

If my money were another mans, I could but keep it: only the expending ſhewes it my own. It is greater glory, comfort, and gain, to lay it out well, then to keep it ſafely. God hath made me, not his Treaſurer, but his Steward.

28

Auguſtines friend, Nebridius, not unjuſtly hated a ſhort anſwer, to a weighty and difficult queſtion; becauſe the diſquiſition of great truths requires time, and the determining is perillous: I will as much hate a tedious and farre-fetched anſwer to a ſhort and eaſie queſtion. For as that other wrongs the truth, ſo this the hearer. C

29

Performance is a binder. I will requeſt no more favour of any man then I muſt needs. I will rather chuſe to make an honeſt ſhift, then over-much enthrall my ſelfe, by being beholding.

30

The world is a ſtage; every man an actor, and plaies his part, here, either in a Comedie, or Tragedie. The good man is a Comedian: which (how ever he begins) ends merrily: but the wicked man acts a Tragedy; and therefore ever ends in horrour. Thou ſeeſt a wicked man vaunt himſelf on this ſtage: ſtay till the laſt act, and look to his end (as David did) and ſee whether that be peace. Thou wouldeſt make ſtrange Tragedies, if thou wouldeſt have but one Act. Who ſees an Oxe, grazing in a fat and ranke paſture, and thinkes not that he is neer to the ſlaughter? whereas the lean beaſt, that toiles under the yoke, is farre enough from the ſhambles. The beſt wicked man cannot be ſo envied in his firſt ſhewes, as he is pitiable in the concluſion. D

31

Of all objects of beneficence, I will chuſe either an old man, or a childe; becauſe theſe are moſt out of hope to requite. The one forgets a good turn: the other lives not to repay it.

32

That, which Pythagoras ſaid of Philoſophers, is more true of Chriſtians: (for, Chriſtianity is nothing but a divine and better Philoſophy) Three ſorts of men come to the Market: buyers, ſellers, lookers on. The two firſt are both buſie, and carefully diſtracted about their Market: only the third live happily; uſing the world as if they uſed it not. E

33

There be three things, which of all others I will never ſtrive for: the wall, the way, the beſt ſeat. If I deſerve well, a low place cannot diſparage me ſo much as I ſhall grace it: if not, the height of my place ſhall adde to my ſhame; whiles every man ſhall condemne me of pride matched with unworthineſſe.

I ſee there is not ſo much difference betwixt a man and a beaſt, as betwixt a Chriſtian and a naturall man. For, whereas man lives but one life of reaſon, above the beaſt; a Chriſtian lives four lifes, above a naturall man: The life of inchoate regeneration,

A tion by grace; the perfect life of imputed righteousnesse; the life of glory begun, in the separation of the soul; the life of perfect glory, in the society of the body, with the soule in full happinesse: The worst whereof is better by many degrees, then the best life of a naturall man. For whereas the dignity of the life is measured, by the cause of it, (in which regard the life of the plant is basest, because it is but from the juyce, arising from the root, administred by the earth: the life of the brute creature better then it, because it is sensitive: of a man better then it, because reasonable) and the cause of this life, is the Spirit of God; so farre as the Spirit of God is above reason, so far doth a Christian exceed a meer naturalist. I thank God much that he hath made me a man, but more, that he hath made me a Christian: without which, I know not whether it had been better for me, to have been a beast, or not to have been.

Great mens favours, friends promises, and dead mens shooes, I will esteeme, but not trust to.

36

It is a fearfull thing to sinne; more fearfull to delight in sin; yet worse then worst, to boast of it. If therefore I cannot avoid sinne, because I am a man; yet will I avoid the delight, defense and boasting of sinne, because I am a Christian.

37

Those things which are most eagerly desired, are most hardly both gotten and kept; God commonly crossing our desires, in what we are over-fervent. I will therfore account all things as too good to have, so nothing too deare to lose.

C 38

A true friend is not born every day. It is best to be courteous to all, entire with few. So may we (perhaps) have lesse cause of joy: I am sure, lesse occasion of sorrow.

39

Secrecies, as they are a burthen to the minde, ere they be uttered: so are they no lesse charge to the receiver, when they are uttered. I will not long after more inward secrets, lest I should procure doubt to my selfe, and jealous feare to the discloser: But as my mouth shall be shut with fidelity, not to blab them; so mine ear shall not be too open to receive them.

40

As good Physicians, by one receit make way for another: so is it the safest course in D practice: I will reveal a great secret to none, but whom I have found faithfull in lesse.

41

I will enjoy all things in God, and God in all things; nothing in it selfe: So shall my joyes neither change, nor perish. For however the things themselves may alter, or fade: yet he in whom they are mine, is ever like himselfe, constant, and everlasting.

42

If I would provoke my self to contentation; I will cast down mine eyes to my inferiours; and there see better men in worse condition: if to humility, I will cast them up to my betters, and so much more deject my selfe to them, by how much more I see them thought worthy to be respected of others, and deserve better in themselves.

43

E True vertue rests in the conscience of it self, either for reward, or censure. If therefore I know my self upright, false rumours shall not daunt me: if not answerable to the good report of my favourers, I will my self finde the first fault, that I may prevent the shame of others.

44

I will account vertue the best riches, knowledge the next, riches the worst; and therefore will labour to be vertuous and learned, without condition: as for riches, if they fall in my way, I refuse them not; but if not, I desire them not.

45

An honest word I account better then a careless oath. I will say nothing but what I dare swear, and will perform. It is a shame for a Christian to abide his tongue a false servant, or his minde a loose mistresse.

There is a juſt and eaſie difference to be put betwixt a friend and an enemy; betwixt a familiar and a friend; and much good uſe to be made of all: but, of all, with diſcretion. I will diſcloſe my ſelf no whit to my enemy, ſomewhat to my friend, wholly to no man; leſt I ſhould be more others, then mine own. Friendſhip is brittle ſtuffe. How know I, whether he that loves me, may not hate me hereafter?

47

No man but is an eaſie Judge of his own matters; and lookers on oftentimes ſee the more. I will therefore ſubmit my ſelf to others, in what I am reproved: but in what I am praiſed only to my ſelfe.

48

I will not be ſo merry as to forget God; nor ſo ſorrowfull, to forget my ſelfe.

49

As nothing makes ſo ſtrong and mortall hoſtility, as diſcord in religions: ſo nothing in the world unites mens hearts ſo firmly, as the bond of faith. For, whereas there are three grounds of friendſhip, Vertue, Pleaſure, Profit; and by all confeſſions that is the ſureſt, which is upon vertue: it muſt needs follow, that what is grounded on the beſt, and moſt heavenly Vertue, muſt be the faſteſt: which, as it unites man to God ſo inſeparably, that no tentations, no torments, not all the gates of Hell can ſever him; ſo it unites one Chriſtian ſoule to another ſo firmely, that no outward occurrences, no imperfections in the party loved, can diſſolve them. If I love not the child of God (for his own ſake, for his Fathers ſake) more then my friend (for my commodity, or my kinsman for bloud) I never received any ſpark of true heavenly love.

The good duty that is deferred upon a conceit of preſent unfitneſſe, at laſt growes irkſome; and thereupon altogether neglected. I will not ſuffer my heart to entertain the leaſt thought of lothneſſe towards the task of devotion, wherewith I have ſtinted my ſelfe: but violently break thorow any motion of unwillingneſſe; not without a deep check to my ſelf, for my backwardneſſe.

51

Hearing is a ſenſe of great apprehenſion; yet farre more ſubject to deceit, then ſeeing: not in the manner of apprehending, but in the uncertainty of the object. Words are vocall interpreters of the minde; actions, reall: and therefore however both ſhould ſpeak according to the truth of what is in the heart; yet words do more belie the heart, then actions. I care not what words I heare, when I ſee deeds. I am ſure, what a man doth, he thinketh: not ſo alwayes, what he ſpeaketh. Though I will not be ſo ſevere a cenſor, that, for ſome few evill acts, I ſhould condemne a man of falſe-heartedneſſe: yet, in common courſe of life I need not be ſo mopiſh, as not to beleeve rather the language of the hand, then of the tongue. He, that ſayes well and doth well, is without exception commendable: but, if one of theſe muſt be ſevered from the other, I like him well, that doth well, and ſaith nothing.

52

That, which they ſay of the Pelican, that when the Shepherds, in deſire to catch her, lay fire not farre from her neſt; which ſhe finding, and fearing the danger of her young, ſeeks to blow out with her wings, ſo long till ſhe burne her ſelf and make her ſelf a prey, in an unwiſe pitie to her young; I ſee morally verified in experience, of thoſe which indiſcreetly medling with the flame of diſſention kindled in the Church, rather increaſe then quench it; rather fire their own wings then help others. I had rather bewail the fire afarre off, then ſtir in the coales of it. I would not grudge my aſhes to it, if thoſe might abate the burning: but, ſince I ſee this is daily increaſed with partaking, I will behold it with ſorrow; and meddle no otherwiſe then by prayers to God, & intreaties to men; ſeeking my own ſafety, and the peace of the Church, in the freedome of my thought, and ſilence of my tongue.

That which is ſaid of Lucillaes faction, that anger bred it, pride foſtered it, and covetouſneſſe confirm'd it, is true of all Schiſmes, though with ſome inverſion. For, the moſt

A moſt are bred through pride, (whiles men upon an high conceit of themſelves, ſcorn to goe in the common road, and affect ſingularity in opinion) are confirmed through anger, (whiles they ſtomack and grudge any contradiction) and are nouriſhed through covetouſneſſe, whiles they ſeek ability to bear out their part. In ſome others again, covetouſneſſe obtains the firſt place, anger the ſecond, pride the laſt. Herein therfore I have been always wont to commend and admire the humility of thoſe great & profound wits, whom depth of knowledge hath not led to by-paths in judgement; but (walking in the beaten path of the Church) have bent all their forces to the eſtabliſhment of received truths: accounting it greater glory to confirm an ancient verity, then to deviſe a new opinion (though never ſo profitable) unknown to their predeceſſours. I will not reject a truth, for meer novelty: (Old truths may come newly to light;
B neither is God tied to times, for the gift of his illumination) but I will ſuſpect a novell opinion, of untruth; and not entertaine it, unleſſe it may be deduced from ancient grounds.

The eare and the eye are the mindes receivers; but the tongue is only buſied in expending the treaſure received. If therefore the revenues of the mind be uttered as faſt, or faſter then they are received; it cannot be, but that the minde muſt needs be held bare, and can never lay up for purchaſe. But, if the receivers take in ſtill with no uttterance, the minde may ſoon grow a burthen to it ſelfe, and unprofitable to others. I will not lay up too much, and utter nothing, leſt I be covetous: nor ſpend much, and
C ſtore up little, leſt I be prodigall and poor.

It is a vain-glorious flattery for a man to praiſe himſelf: An envious wrong to detract from others. I will therefore ſpeak no ill of others, no good of my ſelfe.

56

That which is the miſery of Travellers, to finde many Oaſts; and few friends is the eſtate of Chriſtians in their pilgrimage to a better life. Good friends may not, therfore be eaſily forgone: neither muſt they be uſed as ſuits of apparell; which when we have worn threed-bare, we caſt off, and call for new. Nothing, but death or villany, ſhall divorce me from an old friend; but ſtill I will follow him ſo farre, as is either poſſible or honeſt: and then I will leave him, with ſorrow.

57

D True friendſhip neceſſarily requires patience. For there is no man, in whom I ſhall not miſlike ſomewhat, & who ſhall not, as juſtly miſlike ſomewhat in me. My friends faults therefore, if little, I will ſwallow and digeſt; if great, I will ſmother them: however, I will wink at them to others; but, lovingly notifie them to himſelf.

58

Injuries hurt not more in the receiving, then in the remembrance. A ſmall injury ſhall go as it comes: a great injury may dine or ſup with me; but none at all ſhall lodge with me. Why ſhould I vex my ſelfe, becauſe another hath vexed me?

59

It is good dealing with that, over which we have the moſt power. If my ſtate will not be framed to my minde, I will labour to frame my minde to my eſtate.

E 60

It is a great miſery to be either alwayes, or never alone: ſociety of men hath not ſo much gain as diſtraction. In greateſt company I will be alone to my ſelfe: in greateſt privacy, in company with God.

61

Griefe for things paſt that cannot be remedied, and care for things to come that cannot be prevented, may eaſily hurt, can never benefit me. I will therefore commit my ſelf to God in both, and enjoy the preſent.

62

Let my eſtate be never ſo mean, I will ever keep my ſelf rather beneath, then either levell or above it. A man may riſe when he will, with honour: but cannot fall without ſhame.

63

Nothing doth ſo befoole a man, as extreme paſſion. This doth both make them fooles, which otherwiſe are not; and ſhew them to be fooles, that are ſo. Violent paſſions if I cannot tame them, that they may yeeld to my eaſe; I will at leaſt ſmother them by concealement, that they may not appeare to my ſhame.

64

The minde of man, though infinite in deſire, yet is finite in capacity. Since I cannot hope to know all things, I will labour firſt to know what I needs muſt, for their uſe: next, what I beſt may, for their convenience.

65

Though time be precious to me (as all irrevocable good things deſerve to be) and of all other things, I would not be laviſh of it; yet I will account no time loſt, that is either lent to, or beſtowed upon my friend.

66

The practiſes of the beſt men are more ſubject to errour then their ſpeculations. I will honour good examples: but I will live by good precepts.

67

As charity requires forgetfulneſſe of evill deeds: ſo patience requires forgetfulneſſe of evill accidents. I will remember evills paſt, to humble me; not to vex me.

68

It is both a miſery and a ſhame for a man to be a Bankrupt in love: which he may eaſily pay, and be never the more impoveriſhed. I will be in no mans debt, for good will: but will at leaſt returne every man his own meaſure, if not with uſury. It is much better to be a Creditor, then a Debtor, in any thing; but eſpecially of this: yet of this I will ſo be content to be a Debtor, that I will alwaies be paying it where I owe it; and yet never will have ſo paid it, that I ſhall not owe it more.

69

The Spaniſh Proverb is too true; Dead men and abſent finde no friends. All mouthes are boldly opened, with a conceit of impunity. My eare ſhall be no grave to bury my friends good name. But as I will be my preſent friends ſelfe; So will I be my abſent friends deputy; to ſay for him what he would (and cannot) ſpeak for himſelfe.

70

The loſſe of my friend, as it ſhall moderately grieve me; ſo it ſhall another way much benefit me, in recompence of his want: for it ſhall make me think more often, and ſeriouſly of earth, and of heaven, Of earth, for his body which is repoſed in it: Of Heaven, for his ſoule which poſſeſſeth it before me: Of earth, to put me in minde of my like frailty and mortality: Of Heaven, to make me deſire, and (after a ſort) emulate his happineſſe and glory.

71

Variety of objects is wont to cauſe diſtraction: when againe a little one, laid cloſe to the eye (if but of a penny breadth) wholly takes up the ſight; which could elſe ſee the whole half Heaven at once. I will have the eyes of my mind ever fore-ſtalled, and filled with theſe two objects; the ſhortneſſe of my life, eternity after death.

72

I ſee that he is more happy, that hath nothing to loſe, then he that loſeth that which he hath. I will therefore neither hope for riches, nor feare poverty.

73

I care not ſo much in any thing for multitude, as for choice. Books and friends I will not have many: I had rather ſeriouſly converſe with a few, then wander amongſt many.

74

The wicked man is a very coward, and is afraid of every thing. Of God; becauſe he is his enemy: of Satan, becauſe he is his tormentor: of Gods creatures, becauſe they (joyning with their Maker) fight againſt him: of himſelf, becauſe he beares about him his own accuſer and executioner. The godly man contrarily, is afraid of nothing. Not of

A of God, because he knowes him his best friend, and therefore will not hurt him: not of A Satan, because he cannot hurt him: not of afflictions, because he knowes they proceed from a loving God, and end to his own good: not of the creatures, since the very stones of the field are in league with him: not of himself, since his conscience is at peace. A wicked man may be secure, because he knows not what he hath to fear; or desperate, through extremity of fear: but, truly courageous he cannot be. Faithlessnesse cannot chuse but be false-hearted. I will try, by my courage, take triall of my faith. By how much more I feare, by so much lesse I beleeve.

B The godly man lives hardly, and (like the Ant) toiles here, during the Summer of B his peace, holding himselfe short of his pleasures, as looking to provide for an hard Winter. Which, when it comes, he is able to weare it out comfortably: whereas the wicked man doth prodigally lash out all his joyes, in the time of his prosperity; and (like the Grashopper singing merrily all Summer) is starved in winter. I will so enjoy the present, that I will lay up more for hereafter.

I have wondred oft, and blushed for shame, to read in meer Philosophers (which had no other Mistresse, but Nature) such strange resolution in the contempt of both fortunes (as they call them:) such notable precepts for a constant setledness and tranquillity of mind; and to compare it with my own disposition, and practice: whom I have found too much drouping and dejected under small crosses; and easily again carried away with little prosperity: To see such courage and strength to contemne death,
C in those which thought they wholly perished in death; and to find such faint-heartedness in my selfe, at the first conceit of death, who yet am thorowly perswaded of the future happiness of my soul. I have the benefit of nature as well as they; besides infinite other helps that they wanted. Oh the dulness and blindness of us unworthy Christians that suffer Heathens, by the dim candle-light of Nature to go further then we by the cleer Sun of the Gospell: that an indifferent man could not tell by our practice, whether were the Pagan. Let me never for shame account my self a Christian, unlesse my Art of Christianity have imitated and gone beyond nature, so farre, that I can finde the best Heathen as farre below me in true resolution, as the vulgar sort were below them. Else, I may shame Religion; it can neither honest nor help me.

If I would be irreligious and unconscionable, I would make no doubt to be rich. For if a man will defraud, dissemble, forswear, bribe, oppresse, serve the time, make use of all men for his own turn, make no scruple of any wicked action for his advantage; I cannot see how he can escape wealth and preferment. But for an upright man to rise, is difficult: while his conscience straightly curbs him in, from every unjust action; & will not allow him to advance himselfe by indirect meanes. So riches come seldome easily, to a good man; seldome hardly, to the conscienceless. Happy is that man that can be rich with truth, or poor with contentment. I will not envy the gravell, in the unjust mans throat. Of riches let me never have more, then an honest man can bear away.

God is the God of order, not of confusion. As therfore, in naturall things, he useth to proceed from one extreame to another by degrees, through the mean: so doth he in spirituall. The Sun riseth not at once to his highest, from the darkness of midnight; but first sends forth some feeble glimmering of light in the dawning; then looks out with weak and waterish beams; and so by degrees ascends to the midst of Heaven. So in the seasons of the yeer, we are not one day scorched with a Summer heat; and on the next, frozen with a sudden extremity of cold. But Winter comes on softly; first; by cold dewes, then hoare frosts; untill at last it descend to the hardest weather of all; such are Gods spirituall proceedings: He never brings any man from the estate of sin, to the estate of glory, but through the estate of grace. And as for grace, hee seldome brings a man from grosse wickednesse to any eminence of perfection. I wil be charita-bly jealous of thoſe men, which from notorious lewdneſſe leap at once into a ſudden forwardneſſe of profeſſion. Holineſſe doth not, like Jonas gourd, grow up in a night. I like it better, to goe on, ſoft and ſure, then for an haſty fit to ranne my ſelfe out of winde; and after ſtand ſtill and breathe me. A

It hath been ſaid of old; To do well, and heare ill, is Princely. Which as it is moſt true, by reaſon of the envy which follows upon juſtice: ſo is the contrary no leſſe juſtified, by many experiments. To do ill, and to heare well, is the faſhion of many great men. To doe ill, becauſe they are born out with the aſſurance of impunity: To hear well, becauſe of abundance of Paraſites; which as Ravens to a carkaſſe, gather about great men. Neither is there any ſo great miſery in greatneſſe as this, that it conceales men from themſelves, and when they will needs have a ſight of their own actions, it ſhews them a falſe glaſſe to look in. Meanneſſe of ſtate (that I can find) hath none ſo great inconvenience. I am no whit ſorry, that I am rather ſubject to contempt, then flattery. B

80

There is no earthly bleſſing ſo precious, as health of body: without which, all other worldly good things are but troubleſome. Neither is there any thing more difficult, then to have a good ſoule, in a ſtrong and vigorous body (for, it is commonly ſeen, that the worſe part drawes away the better:) But to have an healthfull and ſound ſoul in a weak ſickly body, is no novelty; whiles the weakneſſe of the body is an help to the ſoule; playing the part of a perpetuall monitor; to incite it to good, and check it for evill. I will not be over-glad of health, nor over-fearfull of ſickneſſe. I will more fear the ſpirituall hurt, that may follow upon health, then the bodily pain that accompanies ſickneſſe. C

81

There is nothing more troubleſome to a good minde, then to doe nothing. For, beſides the furtherance of our eſtate, the mind doth both delight, and better it ſelf with exerciſe. There is but this difference then betwixt labour and idleneſſe; that labour is a profitable and pleaſant trouble: idleneſſe a trouble both unprofitable and comfortleſſe. I will be ever doing ſomething; that either God when he commeth, or Satan when he tempteth, may find me buſied. And yet, ſince (as the old proverb is) better it is to be idle then effect nothing; I will not more hate doing nothing, then doing ſomething to no purpoſe. I ſhall doe good, but a while; let me ſtrive to doe it, while I may. D

82

A faithfull man hath three eyes; The firſt of ſenſe, common to him with brute creatures: the ſecond of reaſon, common to all men: the third of faith, proper to his profeſſion: whereof each looketh beyond other; and none of them medleth with others objects. For, neither doth the eye of ſenſe reach to intelligible things and matters of diſcourſe: nor the eye of reaſon to thoſe things which are ſupernaturall and ſpirituall: neither doth faith look down, to things that may be ſenſibly ſeen. If thou diſcourſe to a brute beaſt of the depths of Philoſophy, never ſo plainly, he underſtands not, becauſe they are beyond the view of his eye, which is only of ſenſe. If to a meer carnall man, of divine things; he perceiveth not the things of God: neither indeed can doe, becauſe they are ſpiritually diſcerned. And therefore no wonder if thoſe things ſeem unlikely, incredible, impoſſible to him, which the faithfull man (having a proportionable means of apprehenſion) doth as plainly ſee, as his eye doth any ſenſible thing. Tell a plain Country-man, that the Sun, or ſome higher or leſſer ſtarre is much bigger then his Cart-wheele; or, at leaſt, ſo many ſcores bigger then the whole earth; he laughes thee to ſcorn, as affecting admiration with a learned untruth. Yet the Scholler, by the eye of reaſon, doth as plainly ſee and acknowledge this truth as that his hand is bigger then his pen. What a thick miſt, yea what a palpable, and more then Ægyptian darkneſſe, doth the naturall man live in! what a world is there that he doth not ſee at all! and how little doth he ſee in this, which is his proper element! There is no bodily thing, but the brute creatures ſee as well as he; and ſome of them better. E

As

A As for his eye of reaſon, how dim is it in thoſe things which are beſt fitted to it! what one thing is there in nature, which he doth perfectly know? what herbe, or flower, or worm that he treads on, is there, whoſe true eſſence he knoweth? No, not ſo much, as what is in his own boſome; what it is, where it is, or whence it is that gives Being to himſelfe. But, for thoſe things which concern the beſt world, he doth not ſo much as confuſedly ſee them; neither knoweth whether they be. He ſees no whit into the great and awfull Majeſty of God. He diſcernes him not in all his creatures, filling the world with his infinite and glorious preſence. He ſees not his wiſe providence, overruling all things, diſpoſing all caſuall events, ordering all ſinfull actions of men to his own glory. He comprehends nothing of the beauty, majeſty, power, and mercy of the Saviour of the world, ſitting in his humanity at his Fathers right hand. He ſees not
B the unſpeakable happineſſe of the glorified ſoules of the Saints. He ſees not the whole heavenly Common-wealth of Angels (aſcending and deſcending to the behoof of Gods children) waiting upon him at all times inviſibly (not excluded with cloſeneſſe of priſons, nor deſolateneſſe of wilderneſſes) and the multitude of evill ſpirits paſſing and ſtanding by him, to tempt him unto evill: but, like unto the fooliſh bird when he hath hid his head that he ſees no body, he thinks himſelf altogether unſeen; and then counts himſelf ſolitary, when his eye can meet with no companion. It was not without cauſe that we call a meer fool a naturall. For how-ever worldlings have ſtill thought Chriſtians Gods fooles, we know them the fools of the world. The deepeſt philoſopher that ever was (ſaving the reverence of the Schooles) is but an ignorant ſot, to the ſimpleſt Chriſtian. For the weakeſt Chriſtian may, by plain information,
C ſee ſomewhat into the greateſt myſteries of Nature, becauſe he hath the eye of Reaſon common with the beſt: but the beſt Philoſopher, by all the demonſtration in the world, can conceive nothing of the myſteries of godlineſſe, becauſe he utterly wants the eye of faith. Though my inſight into matters of the world be ſo ſhallow, that my ſimplicity moveth pity, or maketh ſport unto others; it ſhall be my contentment and happineſſe, that I ſee further into better mattters. That which I ſee not, is worthleſſe, and deſerveth little better then contempt: that which I ſee, is unſpeakable, ineſtimable, for comfort, for glory.

It is not poſſible for an inferiour to live at peace, unleſſe he have learned to be contemned. For the pride of his ſuperiours, and the malice of his equals and inferiours,
D ſhall offer him continuall and inevitable occaſions of unquietneſſe. As contentation is the mother of inward peace with our ſelves: ſo is humility the mother of peace with others. For if thou be vile in thine own eyes firſt, it ſhall the leſſe trouble thee to be accounted vile of others. So that a man of an high heart, in a low place, cannot want diſcontentment: whereas a man of low ly ſtomack, can ſwallow and digeſt contempt without any diſtemper. For, wherein can he be the worſe for being contemned, who out of his owne knowledge of his deſerts, did moſt of all contemn himſelfe? I ſhould be very improvident, if in this calling I did not look for daily contempt: wherein we are made a ſpectacle to the world, to Angels, and Men. When it comes, I will either embrace it, or contemne it: Embrace it, when it is within my meaſure; when above, contemne it. So embrace it, that I may more humble my ſelfe nnder it: and ſo con-E temne it, that I may not give heart to him that offers it; nor diſgrace him, for whom I am contemned.

Chriſt raiſed three dead men to life: One, newly departed; another, on the Bere; a third, ſmelling in the grave: to ſhew us that no degree of death is ſo deſperate, that it is paſt help. My ſins are many, and great: yet if they were more they are farre below the mercy of him that hath remitted them, and the value of his ranſome that hath payed for them. A man hurts himſelfe moſt by preſumption: but we cannot doe God a greater wrong, then to deſpair of forgiveneſſe. It is a double injury to God, firſt, that we offend his juſtice by ſinning; then, that we wrong his mercy, with deſpairing, &c.

For a man to be weary of the world through miſeries that he meets with (and for that cauſe to covet death) is neither difficult, nor commendable; but rather argues a baſe weakneſſe of minde. So it may be a cowardly part, to contemn the utmoſt of all terrible things, in a fear of lingering miſery: but for a man either living happily here on earth, or reſolving to live miſerably, yet to deſire his removall to Heaven, doth wel become a true Chriſtian courage; and argues a noble mixture of patience and faith. Of patience, for that he can & dare abide to live ſorrowfully: of faith, for that he is aſſured of his better Being other-where; and therefore prefers the abſent joyes he looks for, to thoſe he feeles in preſent: No ſorrow ſhall make me wiſh my ſelf dead, that I may not be at all. No contentment ſhall hinder me from wiſhing my ſelf with Chriſt, that I may be happier. A

It was not for nothing that the wiſe Creator of all things hath placed gold & ſilver and all precious minerals under our feet to be trod upon, and hath hid them low in the bowels of the earth, that they cannot without great labour be either found, or gotten: whereas he hath placed the nobleſt part of his creation above our heads: and that ſo open to our view, that we cannot chuſe but every moment behold them. Wherein what did he elſe intend, but to draw away our mindes from theſe worthleſſe, and yet hidden treaſures, (to which he foreſaw we would be too much addicted) and to call them to the contemplation of thoſe better things, which (beſide their beauty) are more obvious to us, that in them we may ſee and admire the glory of their maker, and withall ſeek our own? How doe thoſe men wrong themſelves, and miſconſtrue God, who (as if he had hidden theſe things, becauſe he would have them ſought, and laid the other open for neglect) bend themſelves wholly to the ſeeking of theſe earthly commodities! & do no more mind Heaven, then if there were none. If we could imagine a beaſt to have reaſon, how could he be more abſurd in his choice? How eaſie is it to obſerve, that ſtill the higher we goe, the more purity and perfection we finde! (So earth is the very droſſe and dregs of all the elements: water ſomewhat more pure then it; yet alſo more feculent then the air above it: the lower air leſſe pure then his uppermoſt regions; and yet theſe as far inferiour to the loweſt heavens: which again are more exceeded by the glorious and Empyriall ſeat of God, which is the heaven of the juſt:) Yet theſe brutiſh men take up their reſt, and place their felicity in the loweſt and worſt of all Gods workmanſhip; not regarding that which with it own glory can make them happy. Heaven is the proper place of my ſoule: I will ſend it up thither continually in my thoughts, whiles it ſojournes with me, before it goe to dwell there for ever. B C D

87

A man need not to care for more knowledge, then to know himſelf: he needs no more pleaſure, then to content himſelf: no more victory, then to overcome himſelfe: no more riches, then to enjoy himſelf. What fooles are they that ſeek to know all other things, and are ſtrangers in themſelves? that ſeek altogether to ſatisfie other mens humours, with their own diſpleaſure: that ſeek to vanquiſh Kingdomes and Countries, when they are not Maſters of themſelves; that have no hold of their own hearts, yet ſeek to be poſſeſſed of all outward commodities. Goe home to thy ſelf, firſt, vain heart: and when thou haſt made ſure work there, (in knowing, contenting, overcomming, enjoying thy ſelf) ſpend all the ſuperfluity of thy time and labour, upon others. E

88

It was an excellent rule that fell from the Epicure (whoſe name is odious to us, for the father of looſeneſſe;) That if a man would be rich, honourable, aged, he ſhould not ſtrive ſo much to adde to his wealth, reputation, yeeres, as to detract from his deſires. For certainly, in theſe things which ſtand moſt upon conceit, he hath the moſt that deſireth leaſt. A poor man that hath little, and deſires no more, is in truth richer then the greateſt Monarch, that thinketh he hath not what he ſhould, or what he might, or that grieves there is no more to have. It is not neceſſity, but ambition, that ſets mens heart on the rack. If I have meat, drink, apparell, I will learn therewith to be content. If I had the world full of wealth beſide, I could enjoy no more then I uſe: the reſt could

A could pleaſe me no otherwiſe but by looking on. And why can I not thus ſolace my ſelfe, while it is others?

An inconſtant and wavering minde, as it makes a man unfit for ſociety (for that there can be no aſſurance of his words, or purpoſes, neither can we build on them, without deceit:) ſo, beſides that, it makes a man ridiculous, it hinders him from ever attaining any perfection in himſelfe, (for a rolling ſtone gathers no moſſe; and the minde, while it would be every thing, proves nothing. Oft changes cannot be without loſſe:) Yea, it keeps him from enjoying that which he hath attained. For, it keeps him ever in work; building, pulling down, ſelling, changing, buying, commanding, forbidding. So, whiles he can be no other mans friend, he is the leaſt his own. It is the ſa-
B feſt courſe for a mans profit, credit, and eaſe, to deliberate long, to reſolve ſurely; hardly to alter, not to enter upon that, whoſe end he foreſees not anſwerable; and when he is once entred, not to ſurceaſe till he have attained the end he fore-ſaw. So may he, to good purpoſe, begin a new work, when he hath well finiſhed the old.

The way to Heaven, is like that which Ionathan and his Armour-bearer paſſed, betwixt two rocks; one Bozez, the other Seneh; that is, foule and thorny: whereto we muſt make ſhift to climbe on our hands and knees; but when we are come up, there is
C victory and triumph. Gods children have three ſutes of apparell, whereof two are worn daily, on earth; the third laid up for them in the Ward-robe of Heaven: They are ever either in black, mourning; in red, perſecuted; or in white, glorious. Any way ſhall be pleaſant to me, that leads unto ſuch an end. It matters not, what rags, or what colours I wear with men; ſo I may walke with my Saviour in white, and reign with him in glory.

There is nothing more eaſy, then to ſay Divinity by rote; and to diſcourſe of ſpirituall matters from the tongue or pen of others: but to hear God ſpeak it to the ſoul, & to feele the power of religion in our ſelves, & to expreſſe it out of the truth of experience within, is both rare, and hard. All that we feel not in the matters of God, is but hypocriſie: and therefore the more we profeſſe, the more we ſin: It will never be well with me, till in theſe greateſt things I be careleſſe of others cenſures, fearfull only of D Gods, and my own: till ſound experience have really catechiſed my heart, & made me know God, and my Saviour, otherwiſe then by words; I will never be quiet until I can ſee, and feel, and taſte God: my hearing I will account as only ſerving to effect this, and my ſpeech only to expreſſe it.

There is no enemy can hurt us, but by our own hands. Satan could not hurt us, if our own corruption betraied us not: afflictions cannot hurt us without our own impatience: tentations cannot hurt us without our own yeeldance: death could not hurt us, without the ſting of our own ſins: ſin could not hurt us, without our own impenitence: how might I defie all things, if I could obtaine not to be my own enemy? I love my E ſelf too much, and yet not enough. O God, teach me to wiſh my ſelf but ſo well as thou wiſheſt me, and I am ſafe.

It grieves me to ſee all others creatures ſo officious to their Maker in their kind: that both winds, and ſea, and heaven, and earth, obey him with all readineſſe, that each of theſe hears other, and all of them their Creator, though to the deſtruction of themſelves; and man only is rebellious, imitating herein the evill ſpirits, who in the receit of a more excellent kinde of reaſon, are yet more perverſe: hence it is, that the Prophets are oft times fain to turn their ſpeech to the earth, void of all ſenſe and life, from this living earth informed with reaſon: that only which ſhould make us more pliable, ſtifneth us. God could force us, (if he pleaſed) but he had rather incline us by gentleneſſe. I muſt ſtoop to his power, why doe I not ſtoop to his will? It is a vain thing to reſiſt his voice, whoſe hand we cannot reſiſt.

As all naturall bodies are mixt; ſo muſt all our moral diſpoſitions: no ſimple paſſion doth well. If our joy be not allayed with ſorrow, it is madneſſe: and if our ſorrow be not temperad with ſome mixture of joy, it is helliſh and deſperate: if in theſe earthly things, we hope without all doubt, or fear without al hope, we offend on both ſides; if we labour without all recreation, we grow dull and heartleſſe: if we ſport our ſelves without all labour, we grow wilde & uprofitable: theſe compoſitions are wholeſome, as for the body, ſo for the mind; which though it be not of a compounded ſubſtance, as the body; yet hath much variety of qualities and affections, and thoſe contrary to each other. I care not how ſimple my heavenly affections are, which the more free they are from compoſition, are the neerer to God: nor how compounded my earthly, which are eaſily ſubject to extremities: if joy come alone, I will aske him for his fellow; and evermore in ſpight of him, couple him with his contrary: that ſo while each are enemies to other, both may be friends to me.

Joy and ſorrow are hard to conceal: as from the countenance, ſo from the tongue: there is ſo much correſpondence betwixt the heart & the tongue, that they will move at once; every man therefore ſpeaks of his own pleaſure and care: the Hunter and Falconer of his games; the Plough-man of his teame; the Souldier of his march, and colours. If the heart were as full of God, the tongue could not refrain to talke of him. The rareneſſe of Chriſtian communication, argues the common poverty of grace. If Chriſt be not in our hearts, we are Godleſſe: if he be there without our joy, we are ſenſeleſſe: if we rejoyce in him, and ſpeak not of him, we are ſhamefully unthankfull: every man taketh, yea raiſeth occaſion to bring in ſpeech of what he liketh. As I will think of thee alwayes, O Lord, ſo it ſhall be my joy to ſpeak of thee often: and if I find not opportunity, I will make it.

96

When I ſee my Saviour hanging in ſo forlorn a faſhion upon the Croſſe; his head drouping down, his temples bleeding with thornes, his hands and feet with the nails, and ſide with the ſpear; his enemies round about him, mocking at his ſhame, and inſulting over his impotence: how ſhould I think any otherwiſe of him, then, as himſelf complaineth, forſaken of his Father? But when again I turn mine eyes, and ſee the Sun darkned, the earth quaking, the rocks rent, the graves opened, the theef confeſſing to give witneſſe to his Deity; and when I ſee ſo ſtrong a guard of providence over him, that all his malicious enemies are not able ſo much as to break one bone of that body, which ſeemed careleſly neglected, I cannot but wonder at his glory, and ſafety. God is ever neer, though oft unſeen; and if he wink at our diſtreſſe, he ſleepeth not: the ſenſe of others muſt not be judges of his preſence, & care; but our faith: what care I, if the world give me up for miſerable, whiles I am under his ſecret protection? O Lord ſince thou art ſtrong in our weakneſſe, and preſent in our ſenſleſneſſe; give me but as much comfort in my ſorrow, as thou giveſt me ſecurity, and at my worſt I ſhall be well.

In ſins & afflictions our courſe muſt be contrary: we muſt begin to deteſt the greateſt ſin firſt, and deſcend to the hatred of the leaſt; we muſt firſt begin to ſuffer ſmall afflictions with patience, that we may aſcend to the endurance of the greateſt. Then alone ſhall I be happy when by this holy method, I have drawn my ſoul to make conſcience of the leaſt evill of ſin, and not to ſhrink at the leaſt evill of affliction.

Preſcription is no plea againſt the King: much leſſe can long cuſtome plead for error againſt that our ſupream Lord, to whom a thouſand years are but as yeſterday: yea, Time, which pleads voluntarily for continuance of things lawful, will take no fee, not to ſpeak againſt an evill uſe. Hath an ill cuſtome laſted long? it is more then time it were abrogated: age is an aggravation to ſin. Hereſie or abuſe, if it be gray-headed, deſerves ſharper oppoſition: to ſay, I will doe ill becauſe I have done ſo, is perillous and impious preſumption: continuance can no more make any wickedneſſe ſafe, then the

A the author of ſin, no Devill: if I have once ſinned, it is too much; if oft, woe be to me, if the iteration of my offence cauſe boldneſſe, and not rather more ſorrow, more deteſtation: woe be to me and my ſin, if I be not the better becauſe I have ſinned.

It is ſtrange to ſee the varieties and proportion of ſpirituall and bodily diets: there be ſome creatures that are fatted and delighted with poyſons: others live by nothing but air; and ſome (they ſay) by fire: others will taſte no water but muddy: others feed on their fellowes, or (perhaps) on part of themſelves: others, on the excretions of nobler creatures: ſome ſearch into the earth for ſuſtenance, or dive into the waters: others content themſelves with what the upper earth yeelds thē without violence. All theſe and more, are anſwered in the palate of the ſoul: there be ſome (yea the moſt) to whom
B ſin (which is of a moſt venomous nature) is both food and dainties; others that think it the only life, to feed on the popular air of applauſe; others, that are never well out of the fire of contentions; and that wilfully trouble all waters with their private humours and opinions; others, whoſe cruelty delights in oppreſſion, & bloud; yea, whoſe envy gnawes upon their own hearts; others, that take pleaſure to revive the wicked and foule hereſies of the greater wits of the former times; others, whoſe worldly mindes root altogether in earthly cares; or who not content with the ordinary proviſion of doctrine, affect obſcure ſubtilties, unknown to wiſer men; others, whoſe too indifferent mindes feed on what-ever opinion comes next to hand, without any carefull diſquiſition of truth: ſo ſome feed foul; others (but few) clean, & wholeſome. As there
C is no beaſt upon Earth, which hath not his like in the Sea, and which (perhaps) is not in ſome ſort paralleled in the Plants of the earth: ſo there is no beaſtiall diſpoſition, which is not anſwerably found in ſome men. Mankind therefore hath within it ſelfe his Goats, Chameleons, Salamanders, Camels, Wolves, Dogs, Swine, Moles, & what ever ſorts of beaſts: there are but a few men amongſt men: to a wiſe man the ſhape is not ſo much as the qualities: If I be not a man within, in my choices, affections, inclinations, it had been better for me to have been a beaſt without: A beaſt is but like it ſelfe; but an evill man is halfe a beaſt, and halfe a Devill.

Forced favours are thankleſſe: and commonly with noble mindes find no acceptation: for a man to give his ſoule to God, when he ſees he can no longer hold it; or to beſtow his goods, when he is forced to depart with them; or to forſake his ſin, when
D he cannot follow it, are but unkinde and cold obediences: God ſees our neceſſity, and ſcornes our compelled offers; what man of any generous ſpirit will abide himſelfe made the laſt refuge of a craved, denied, and conſtrained curteſie? While God gives me leave to keep my ſoule, yet then to bequeath it to him, and whiles ſtrength and opportunity ſerve me to ſinne, then to forſake it, is both accepted and crowned: God loves neither grudged, nor neceſſary gifts: I will offer betimes, that he may vouchſafe to take: I will give him the beſt, that he may take all.

O God, give me this grace, that I may give thee my ſelf, freely and ſeaſonably: and then I know thou canſt not but accept me, becauſe this gift is thine own.

FINIS.

A the author of sin no Devil. If I have once sinned, it is too much if woe betide me.
if the iteration of my offence cause boldness, and not rather more sorrow, more detestation, woe be to me and my sin. If I be not the better because I have sinned.

It is strange to see the varieties and proportion of spiritual and bodily diets: there be some creatures that are lined and deligured with polypes: others live by nothing

INCREASE OF HONOUR,

ſtrength of body, perfection of Vertue.

SIR, There is no wiſe man would give his thoughts for all the world : which as they are the moſt pleaſing and noble buſineſſe of man, being the naturall and immediate iſſue of that reaſon, whereby he is ſevered from brute creatures: ſo they are in their uſe moſt beneficiall to our ſelves, and others. For, by the meanes hereof, we enjoy both God and our ſelves; and hereby we make others partners of thoſe rich excellencies, which God hath hid in the minde. And though it be moſt eaſie and ſafe, for a man, with the Pſalmiſt to commune with his own heart in ſilence; yet is it more behovefull to the common good, for which (both as men and Chriſtians) we are ordained, that thoſe thoughts which our experience hath found comfortable and fruitfull to our ſelves, ſhould (with neglect of all cenſures) be communicated to others. The concealment whereof (me thinks) can proceed from no other ground, but either timorouſneſſe, or envy. VVhich conſideration hath induced me to cloath theſe naked thoughts in plain and ſimple words, and to adventure them into the light, after their fel-

fellows: Conſecrating them the rather to your name, for that (beſides all other reſpects of duty) they are part of thoſe meditations, which in my late peregrination with you, took me up under the ſolitary hils of Ardenna, wanting as then the opportunity of their employment. I offer them to you not for that your ſelfe is not ſtored with choyce of better; but as poore men uſe to bring preſents to the rich: If they may carry acceptation from you and bring profit unto any ſoule, it ſhall abundantly ſatisfie me, who ſhould think it honour enough, if I might be vouchſafed to bring but one pin towards the decking of the Spouſe of Chriſt; whiles others, out of their abundance, adorn her with coſtly robes, and rich medals. I commend their ſucceſſe to God, their patronage to you, their uſe to the world. That God multiply his rare favours upon you, and your worthy Lady; and go you on to favour

Your Worſhips humbly devoted,

JOS. HALL.

MEDITATIONS AND VOVVES.

THE THIRD CENTURIE.

GOod men are placed by God, as so many stars in the lower firmament of the world. As they must imitate those heavenly bodies, in their light and influence; so also in their motion: and therefore as the Planets have a course proper to themselves, against the sway of the Heaven that carries them about; so must each good man have a motion out of his own judgment, contrary to the customes and opinions of the vulgar; finishing his own course with the least shew of resistāce. I will never affect singularity, except it be among those D that are vicious. It is better to do, or think well alone, then to follow a multitude in evill.

What strange variety of actions doth the eye of God see at once round about the compasse of the earth, and within it! Some building houses; some delving for metals; some marching in trooops, or encamping one against another; some bargaining in the market; some travelling on their way; some praying in their closets; others quaffing at the Taverne; some rowing in the Gallies; others dallying in their chambers; and in short, as many different actions as persons: yet all have one common intention of good to themselves; true in some, but in the most, imaginary. The glorified spirits have but one uniforme work, wherein they all joyne; The praise of their Creator. This is one difference betwixt the Saints above, and below: They above are free both from E businesse, and distraction: these below are free (though not absolutely) from distraction, not at all from businesse. Paul could think of the cloake that he left at Troas; and of the shaping of his skins for his tents: yet, thorow these he look't still at heaven. This world is made for businesse: my actions must vary according to occasions: my end shall be but one, and the same now on earth, that it must be one day in heaven.

To see how the Martyrs of God died, and the life of their persecutors, would make a man out of love with life, and out of all fear of death. They were flesh and bloud, as well as we; life was as sweet to them, as to us; their bodies were as sensible of pain as ours; we go to the same heaven with them. How comes it then that they were so courragious in abiding such torments in their death, as the very mention strikes horror into any Reader, and we are so cowardly in encountering a faire and naturall death?

If this valour had been of themſelves, I would never have looked after them in hope of imitation. Now, I know it was he for whom they ſuffered, & that ſuffered in them, which ſuſtained them. They were of themſelves as weak as I; and God can be as ſtrong in me, as he was in them. O Lord, thou art not more unable to give me this grace; but I am more unworthy to receive it: and yet thou regardeſt not worthineſſe, but mercy. Give me their ſtrength, and what end thou wilt. A

Our firſt age is all in hope. When we are in the wombe, who knowes whether we ſhall have our right ſhape and proportion of body, being neither monſtrous nor deformed? When we are borne, who knowes whether with the due features of a man, we ſhall have the faculties of reaſon and underſtanding? When yet our progreſſe in yeers diſcovereth wit or folly; who knows, whether with the power of reaſon we ſhall have the grace of faith to be Chriſtians? & when we begin to profeſſe well, whether it be a temporary, and ſeeming, or a true and ſaving faith? Our middle age is half in hope for the future, and half in proof for that is paſt: Our old age is out of hope, and altogether in proofe. In our laſt times therefore we know, both what we have been, and what to expect. It is good for youth to look forward, and ſtill to propound the beſt things unto it ſelf; for an old man to look backward, and to repent him of that wherein he hath failed, and to recollect himſelf for the preſent: but in my middle age, I will look both backward and forward; comparing my hopes with my proof; redeeming the time, ere it be all ſpent, that my recovery may prevent my repentance. It is both a folly and miſery to ſay, This I might have done. B

It is the wonderfull mercy of God, both to forgive us our debts to him in our ſins, and to make himſelf a debtor to us in his promiſes: So that now both wayes the ſoule may be ſure; ſince he neither calleth for thoſe debts which he hath once forgiven; nor withdraweth thoſe favours, and that heaven which he hath promiſed: but as he is a mercifull creditor to forgive, ſo he is a true debtor to pay whatſoever he hath undertaken: whence it is come to paſſe, that the penitent ſinner owes nothing to God but love and obedience, and God owes ſtill much and all to him: for he owes as much as he hath promiſed; and what he owes by vertue of his bleſſed promiſe, we may challenge. O infinite mercy! He that lent us all that we have, and in whoſe debt books we runne hourely forward till the ſumme be endleſſe; yet owes us more, and bids us look for payment. I cannot deſerve the leaſt favour he can give; yet will I as confidently challenge the greateſt, as if I deſerved it. Promiſe indebteth no leſſe the̅ loan or deſert. C D

It is no ſmall commendation to manage a little well. He is a good Waggoner that can turn in a narrow room. To live well in abundance, is the praiſe of the eſtate, not of the perſon. I will ſtudy more how to give a good account of my little, then how to make it more.

Many Chriſtians doe greatly wrong themſelves with a dull and heavy kind of ſullenneſſe; who not ſuffering themſelves to delight in any worldly thing, are thereupon oft-times ſo heartleſſe, that they delight in nothing. Theſe men, like to careles gueſts, when they are invited to an excellent banquet, loſe their dainties for want of a ſtomake; and loſe their ſtomake for want of exerciſe. A good conſcience keeps alwaies good cheere: he cannot chuſe but fare well that hath it, unleſſe he loſe his appetite with neglect and ſlothfulneſſe. It is a ſhame for us Chriſtians, not to finde as much joy in God, as worldlings doe in their forced merriments; and lewd wretches in the practice of their ſins. E

A wiſe Chriſtian hath no enemies. Many hate and wrong him: but he loves all and all pleaſure him. Thoſe that profeſſe love to him, pleaſure him with the comfort of their ſociety, and the mutuall reflection of friendſhip: thoſe that profeſſe hatred, make him more wary of his ways; ſhew him faults in himſelf, which his friends would either not have eſpied, or not cenſured: ſend him the more willingly to ſeek favour above

A above; and as the worſt doe beſtead him, though againſt their wills; ſo he again doth voluntarily good to them. To doe evill for evil, as Ioab to Abner, is a ſinfull weakneſſe: To doe good for good, as Ahaſuerus to Mordecai, is but naturall juſtice: To doe evill for good, as Iudas to Chriſt, is unthankfulneſſe and villanie: Only to do good for evil, agrees with Chriſtian profeſſion. And what greater work of friendſhip, then to doe good? If men wil not be my friends in love, I will perforce make them my friends in a good uſe of their hatred. I will be their friend, that are mine, and would not be.

All temporall things are troubleſome. For if we have good things, it is a troub'e to forgoe them; and when we ſee they muſt be parted from, either we wiſh they had not been ſo good, or that we never had enjoyed them. Yea, it is more trouble to loſe them, B then it was before joy to poſſeſſe them. If contrarily, we have evill things, their very preſence is troubleſome; and ſtill we wiſh that they were good, or that we were diſburdened of them. So good things are troubleſome in event, evill things in their uſe. They in the future, theſe in the preſent: they, becauſe they ſhall come to an end, theſe becauſe they doe continue. Tell me, thy wife, or thy childe lies dying, and now makes up a loving and dutifull life, with a kinde and loving parture; whether hadſt thou rather for thy own part, ſhe had bin ſo good, or worſe? would it have coſt thee ſo many hearty ſighes and teares, if ſhe had been perverſe and diſobedient? Yet if in her life time I put thee to this choice, thou thinkeſt it no choice at all, in ſuch inequalitie. It is more torment (ſayeſt thou) to live one unquiet moneth, then it is pleaſure to live an age in love. Or if thy life be yet dearer: Thou haſt lived to gray haires, not haſtned C with care, but bred with late ſucceſſion of yeers. Thy table was ever covered with variety of diſhes: Thy back ſoftly and richly clad: Thou never gaveſt denyall to either skin or ſtomake: Thou ever favouredſt thy ſelfe, and health, thee. Now death is at thy threſhold, and unpartially knockes at thy dore, doſt thou not wiſh thou hadſt lived with cruſts, and been clothed with rags? Wouldſt not thou have given a better welcome to death, if he had found thee lying upon a pallet of ſtraw, and ſupping of water-gruell, after many painfull nights, and many ſides changed in vain? Yet this beggerly eſtate thou deteſteſt in health, and pitieſt in others, as truly miſerable. The ſum is; A begger wiſheth he might be a Monarch while he lives; and the great Potentate wiſheth he had lived a begger when he comes to die: and, if beggerie be to have nothing, he ſhall be ſo in death, though he wiſed it not. Nothing therefore but eternitie D can make a man truly happy; as nothing can make perfect miſery but eternity: for as temporall good things afflict us in their ending, ſo temporall ſorrowes afford us joy in the hope of their end. What folly is this in us to ſeek for our trouble, to neglect our happineſſe? I can be but well, and this that I was well, ſhall one day be grievous. Nothing ſhall pleaſe me, but that once I ſhall be happy for ever.

The eldeſt of our fore-fathers lived not ſo much as a day to God, to whom a thouſand yeers is as no more; we live but as an hour to the day of our fore-fathers, for if nine hundred and ſixty were but their day, our fourſcore is but as the twelfth part of it: and yet of this our hour we live ſcarce a minute to God. For, take away all that time that is conſumed in ſleeping, dreſſing, feeding, talking, ſporting, of that little time E there can remain not much more then nothing: yet the moſt ſeek paſtimes to haſten it. Thoſe which ſeek to mend the pace of Time, ſpurre a running horſe. I had more need to redeem it with double care and labour, then to ſeek how to ſell it for nothing.

11

Each day is a new life, and an abridgement of the whole. I will ſo live, as if I counted every day my firſt, and my laſt: as if I began to live but then, and ſhould live no more afterwards.

It was not in vain, that the ancient founders of language uſed the ſame word in many tongues, to ſignifie both Honour and Charge, meaning herein to teach us the inſeparable connexion of theſe two. For there ſcarce ever was any charge without ſome opinion of honour: neither ever was there honour without a charge; which two as they are not without reaſon joyned together in name by humane inſtitution, ſo they are moſt wiſely coupled together by God in the diſpoſition of theſe worldly eſtates. Charge without Honour, to make it amends, would be too toilſoome, and muſt needs diſcourage and over-lay a man. Honour without charge would be too pleaſant, and therefore both would be too much ſought after, and muſt needs carry away the mind in the enjoying it. Now many dare not be ambitious, becauſe of the burden; chuſing rather to live obſcurely and ſecurely: And yet on the other ſide thoſe that are under it are refreſhed in the Charge with the ſweetneſſe of Honour. Seeing they cannot be ſeparated, it is not the worſt eſtate to want both. They whom thou envieſt for honour, perhaps envy thee more for thy quietneſſe. A

He that taketh his owne cares upon himſelfe, loads himſelfe in vaine with an uneaſie burden. The feare of what may come, expectation of what will come, deſire of what will not come, and inability of redreſſing all theſe, muſt needs breed him continuall torment. I will caſt my cares upon God, he hath bidden me, they cannot hurt him; he can redreſſe them. B

14

Our infancy is full of folly; youth, of diſorder and toil; age, of infirmity. Each time hath his burden, and that which may juſtly work our wearineſſe: yet infancy longeth after youth; and youth, after more age: and he that is very old, as he is a child for ſimplicity, ſo he would be for yeers. I account old age the beſt of three; partly, for that it hath paſſed thorow the folly & diſorder of the others; partly, for that the inconveniences of this are but bodily, with a bettered eſtate of the mind; and partly, for that it is neareſt to diſſolution. There is nothing more miſerable, then an old man that would be young again. It was an anſwer worthy the commendations, of Petrarch, and that which argued a mind truly philoſophicall of him, who when his friend bemoned his age appearing in his white temples, telling him he was ſorry to ſee him looke ſo old, replied: Nay, be ſorry rather that ever I was young, to be a fool. C

15

There is not the leaſt action or event, (what-ever the vain Epicures have imagined) which is not over-ruled, and diſpoſed by a providence: which is ſo far from detracting ought from the majeſty of God for that the things are ſmall, as that there can be no greater honour to him, then to extend his providence and decree to them becauſe they are infinite. Neither doth this hold in naturall things only, which are chained one to another by a regular order of ſucceſſion, but even in thoſe things which fall out by caſualty and imprudence: whence that worthy Father, when as his ſpeech digreſſed his intention to a confutation of the errors of the Manichees, could preſently gheſſe, that in that unpurpoſed turning of it, God intended the converſion of ſome unknown Auditor; as the event proved his conjecture true ere many daies. When ought falls out contrary to that I purpoſed, it ſhall content me, that God purpoſed it as it is fain out: ſo the thing hath attained his own end, whiles it miſſed mine. I know what I would, but God knowes what I ſhould will. It is enough that his will is done, though mine be croſſed. D

16

It is the moſt thankleſſe office in the world, to be a mans Pandar unto ſin. In other wrongs, one man is a Woolfe to another: but in this, a Devill. And, though at the firſt this damnable ſervice carry away reward, yet in concluſion it is requited with hatred and curſes. For, as the ſick man extremely diſtaſted with a loathſome potion, hateth the very cruze wherein it was brought him, ſo doth the conſcience, once ſoundly deteſting ſin, loath the means that induced him to commit it. Contrarily who withſtands a man in his proſecution of ſinne, while he doteth upon it, beares away frowns, and heart-burnings for a time: but when the offending party comes to himſelfe, and right reaſon, he recompenceth his former diſlike with ſo much more love, and ſo many more thankes. The frantick man returned to his wits, thinks him his beſt friend that bound him, and beat him moſt. I will doe my beſt to croſſe any man in his ſins, if I have not thankes of him, yet of my conſcience I ſhall. E

God must be magnified in his very judgements. He lookes for praise, not only for heaven, but for hell also. His justice is himself, as well as his mercy. As heaven then is for the praise of his mercy; so hell for the glory of his justice. We must therefore be so affected to judgements as the Author of them is, who delighteth not in bloud, as it makes his creature miserable, but as it makes his justice glorious. Every true Christian then must learn to sing that compound ditty of the Psalmist: Of mercy and judgement. It shall not only joy me to see God gracious and bountifull in his mercies, and deliverances of his owne; but also to see him terrible in vengeance to his enemies. It is no cruelty to rejoyce in justice. The foolish mercy of men is cruelty to God.

Rareneſſe causeth wonder, and more then that, incredulity, in those things which in themselves are not more admirable, then the ordinary proceedings of Nature. If a blazing star be seen in the skie, every man goes forth to gaze; and spends, every evening, some time in wondering at the beames of it. That any fowle should be bred of corrupted wood resolved into wormes: or that the Chameleon should ever change his colours, and live by aire: that the Ostrich should digest yron: that the Phœnix should burne her self to ashes, and from thence breed a successor; we wonder, and can scarce credit. Other things more usuall, no lesse miraculous, we know and neglect. That there should be a bird, that knoweth, and noteth the houres of day and night, as certainly as any Astronomer by the course of Heaven, if we knew not, who would beleeve? Or that the load-stone should by his secret vertue so draw yron to it selfe, as that a whole chain of needles should all hang by insensible points at each other, only by the influence that it sends down from the first, if it were not ordinary, would seem incredible. Who would beleeve when he sees a fowl mounted as high as his sight can descrie it, that there were an engine to be framed, which could fetch it down into his fist? Yea, to omit infinite examples, that a little despised creature should weave nets out of her own entrailes, and in her platforms of building should observe as just proportions as the best Geometrician, we should suspect for an untruth, if we saw it not daily practised in our own windows. If the sun should arise but once to the earth, I doubt, every man would be a Persian, and fall down and worship it: whereas now it riseth and declineth without any regard. Extraordinary events each man can wonder at. The frequence of Gods best workes causeth neglect: not that they are ever the worse for commonnesse, but because we are soon cloyed with the same conceit, and have contempt bred in us through familiarity. I will learne to note Gods power and wisdome, and to give him praise of both, in his ordinary works: so those things which are but triviall to the most ignorant, shall be wonders to me; and that not for nine dayes, but for ever.

19

Those that affect to tell novelties and wonders, fall into many absurdities; both in busie enquiry after matters impertinent, and in a light credulitie, to what-ever they hear; & in fictions of their own, and additions of circumstances to make their reports the more admired. I have noted these men not so much wondred at for their strange stories, while they are telling, as derided afterwards, when the event hath wrought their disproof and shame. I will deale with rumours as grave men doe with strange fashions, take them up when they are grown into common use before: I may beleeve, but I will not relate them but under the name of my author, who shall either warrant me with defence, if it be true; or if false, bear my shame.

It was a witty and true speech of that obscure Heraclitus, That all men waking are in one common world, but when we sleep, each man goes into a severall world by himselfe; which though it be but a world of fancies, yet is the true image of that little world which is in every mans heart. For the imaginations of our sleep, shew us what our disposition is awaking. And as many in their dreams reveal those their secrets to others, which they would never have spoke awake: so all may and do discloſe to themselves in their sleep those secret inclinations, which after much searching, they could not not have found out waking. I doubt not therefore, but as God heretofore hath taught future things in dreams (which kind of revelation is now ceased) so still he teacheth the present estate of the heart this way. Some dreams are from our selves, vaine and idle, like our selves: Others are divine, which teach us good, or move us to good: and others devillish, which sollicite us to evill. Such answer commonly shall I give to any temptation in the day, as I doe by night. I will not lightly passe over my very dreames. They shall teach me somewhat; so neither night nor day shall be spent unprofitably: The night shall teach me what I am, the day what I should be. A

21

Men make difference betwixt servants, friends, and sonnes. Servants, though neere us in place, yet for their inferiority, are not familiar. Friends, though by reason of their equality, and our love, they are familiar; yet still we conceive of them as others from our selves. But children we think of, affectionately, as the divided peeces of our owne bodies. But all these are one to God: his servants are his friends, his friends are his sons, his sons his servants. Many claim kindred of God, and professe friendship to him, because these are priviledges without difficultie, and not without honour: all the triall is in service. The other are most in affection, and therefore secret, and so may be dissembled, this consisting in action, must needs shew it selfe to the eyes of others. Ye are my friends, if ye doe whatsoever I command you: friendship with God is in service, and this service is in action. Many weare Gods cloth that know not their Master, that never did good chare in his service: so that God hath many retainers that weare his livery, for a countenance, never wait on him; whom he will never owne for servants either by favour, or wages; few servants, and therefore few sons. It is great favour in God, and great honour to me, that he will vouchsafe to make me the lowest drudge in his family; which place if I had not, and were a Monarch of men, I were accursed. I desire no more but to serve; yet Lord, thou givest me more, to be thy son. I heare David say, Seemeth it a small matter to you, to be the son in law to a King? What is it then, oh what is it to be the true adopted son of the King of glory? Let me not now say as David of Saul, but as Sauls grand-child to David; Oh, what is thy servant, that thou shouldest look upon such a dead dog as I am? B C

22

I am a stranger here below, my home is above; yet I can think too well of these forraine vanities, and cannot think enough of my home. Surely, that is not so far above my head, as my thoughts; neither doth so far passe me in distance, as in comprehension: and yet I would not stand so much upon conceiving, if I could admire it enough: but my strait heart is filled with a little wonder; and hath no room for the greatest part of glory that remaineth. O God, what happinesse hast thou prepared for thy chosen? What a purchase was this, worthy of the bloud of such a Saviour? As yet I doe but look towards it afar off: but it is easie to see by the outside, how goodly it is within: Although as thine house on earth, so that above hath more glory within, then can be bewrayed by the outward appearance. The outer part of thy Tabernacle here below, is but an earthly and base substance; but within, it is furnished with a living, spirituall, and heavenly guest: so the outer heavens, though they be as gold to all other materiall creatures; yet they are but drosse to thee: yet how are even the outmost wals of that house of thine, beautified with glorious lights, whereof every one is a world for bignesse, and as an heaven for goodlinesse! Oh teach me by this to long after, and wonder at the inner part, before thou letst me come in to behold it. D E

23

Riches or beauty, or what ever worldly good that hath been, doth but grieve us; that which is, doth not satisfie us; that which shall be, is uncertaine. What folly is it to trust to any of them?

24

Securitie makes worldlings merry: and therefore are they secure, because they are ignorant. That is only solid joy, which ariseth from a resolution; when the heart hath cast up a full account of all causes of disquietnes, and findeth the causes of his joy more forcible; thereupon setling it self in a stayed course of rejoycing. For the other,

so

A so soon as sorrow makes it selfe to be seen, especially in an unexpected form, is swallowed up in despaire; whereas this can meet with no occurrence, which it hath not prevented in thought. Security and ignorance may scatter some refuse morsels of joy, sauced with much bitternesse; or may be like some boasting house-keeper, which keepeth open doors for one day with much cheer, and lives starvedly all the yeere after. There is no good Ordinary but in a good conscience. I pity that unsound joy in others, and will seek for this sound joy in my selfe. I had rather weep upon a just cause, then rejoyce unjustly.

As love keeps the whole law, so love only is the breaker of it; being the ground, as of all obedience, so of all sin; for whereas sin hath been commonly accounted to
B have two roots, Love and Fear; it is plain, that fear hath his originall from love: for no man fears to lose ought but what he loves. Here is sin and righteousnesse brought both into a short sum, depending both upon one poor affection: It shall be my only care therefore to bestow my love well, both for object, and measure. All that is good, I may love, but in severall degrees; what is simply good, absolutely; what is good by circūstance, only with limitation. There be these three things that I may love without exception, God, my neighbour, my soule; yet so as each have their due place: My body, goods, fame, &c. as servants to the former. All other things I will either not care for, or hate.

One would not think, that pride and base-mindednesse should so well agree; yea,
C that they love so together, that they never goe asunder. That envy ever proceeds from a base mind, is granted of all: Now the proud man, as he fain would be envied of others, so he envieth all men. His betters he envies, because he is not so good as they: he envies his inferiours, because he feares they should prove as good as he; his equals, because they are as good as he. So under big looks, he beares a base minde, resembling some Cardinals mule, which to make up the traine, beares a costly Port-mantle stuffed with trash. On the contrary, who is more proud then the basest? (the Cynicke tramples on Platoes pride, but with a worse) especially if he be but a little exalted; wherein we see base men so much more haughty, as they have had lesse before what they might be proud of. It is just with God, as the proud man is base in himself, so to make him basely esteemed in the eyes of others; and at last to make him base without D pride. I will contemn a proud man, because he is base, & pity him, because he is proud.

Let me but have time to my thoughts; but leisure to think of Heaven, and grace to my leisure; and I can be happy in spight of the world. Nothing, but God that gives it, can bereave me of grace; and he will not; for his gifts are without repentance. Nothing but death can abridge me of time; and when I begin to want time to think of heaven, I shall have eternall leisure to enjoy it. I shall be both wayes happy, not from any vertue of apprehension in me, (which have no peer in worthinesse) but from the glory of that I apprehend; wherein the act and object are from the author of happinesse. He gives me this glory; let me give him the glory of his gift. His glory is my happinesse; let my glory be his.

E 28

God bestowes favours upon some in anger, as he strikes others ome in love: (The Israelites had better have wanted their Quailes, then to have eaten them with such sauce.) And sometimes at our instancie removing a lesser punishment, leaves a greater, though insensible, in the room of it. I will not so much strive against affliction, as displeasure. Let me rather be afflicted in love, then prosper without it.

29

It is strange that we men having so continuall use of God, and being so perpetually beholding to him, should be so strange to him, and so little acquainted with him: since we account it a perverse nature in any man, that being provoked with many kinde offices, refuses the familiarity of a worthy friend, which doth still seek it, and hath deserved it. Whence it comes, that we are so loth to think of our dissolution and going to God: for naturally where we are not acquainted, we liſt not to hazard our welcome; chuſing rather to ſpend our money at a ſimple Inne, then to turn in for a free lodging to an unknown Oaſt, whom we have only heard of, never had friendſhip with; whereas to an entire friend, whoſe nature and welcome we know, and whom we have elſe-where familiarly converſed withall, we go as boldly and willingly as to our home, knowing that no hour can be unſeaſonable to ſuch a one: whiles on the other ſide we ſcrape acquaintance with the world, that never did us good, even after many repulſes. I will not live with God, and in God, without his acquaintance, knowing it my happineſſe to have ſuch a friend. I will not let one day paſſe without ſome act of renewing my familiarity with him: not giving over till I have given him ſome teſtimony of my love to him, and joy in him; and till he hath left behinde him ſome pledge of his continued favour to me. A B

to

30

Men, for the moſt part, would neither die nor be old. When we ſee an aged man that hath over-lived all the teeth of his gummes, the hair of his head, the ſight of his eyes, the taſte of his palate; we profeſſe, we would not live till ſuch a comberſome age, wherein we prove burdens to our deareſt friends, and our ſelves: yet if it be put to our choice what yeer we would die, we ever ſhift it off till the next; and want not excuſes for this prorogation, rather then faile, alleaging, we would live to amend; when yet we doe but adde more to the heap of our ſins by continuance. Nature hath nothing to plead for this folly, but that life is ſweet: wherein we give occaſion of renewing that ancient check, or one not unlike to it, whereby that primitive viſion taxed the timorouſneſſe of the ſhrinking Confeſſors; Yee would neither live to be old, nor die ere your age: what ſhould I doe with you? The Chriſtian muſt not think it enough to endure the thought of death with patience, when it is obtruded upon him by neceſſity; but moſt voluntarily call it into his minde with joy; not only abiding it ſhould come, but wiſhing that it might come. I will not leave till I can reſolve; if I might die to day, not to live till to morrow. C

31

As a true friend is the ſweeteſt contentment in the world: ſo in his qualities he well reſembleth hony, the ſweeteſt of all liquors. Nothing is more ſweet to the taſte, nothing more ſharpe and cleanſing, when it meets with an exulcerate ſore. For my ſelfe, I know I muſt have faults; and therefore I care not for that friend, that I ſhall never ſmart by. For my friends, I know they cannot be faultleſſe; and therfore as they ſhall finde me ſweet in their praiſes and encouragements, ſo ſharp alſo in their cenſure. Either let them abide me no friend to their faults, or no friend to themſelves. D

32

In all other things we are lead by profit; but in the main matter of all, we ſhew our ſelves utterly unthrifty; and whiles we are wiſe in making good markets in theſe baſe commodities, we ſhew our ſelves fooliſh in the great match of our ſoules. God and the world come both to one ſhop, and make proffers for our ſoules. The world, like a franke Chapman, ſayes, All theſe will I give thee, ſhewing us his bagges, and promotions, and thruſting them into our hands. God offers a crown of glory, which yet he tels us we muſt give him day to performe, and have nothing in preſent, but our hope and ſome ſmall earneſt of the bargaine. Though we know there is no compariſon betwixt theſe two in value, finding theſe earthly things vain & unable to give any contentment, & thoſe others of invaluable worth and benefit: yet we had rather take theſe in hand, then truſt God on his word for the future; while yet in the ſame kind we chuſe rather to take ſome rich Lordſhip in reverſion, after the long expectation of three lives expired, then a preſent ſumme much under foot: As contrarily, when God and the world are ſellers, and we come to the Mart, the world offers fine painted wares, but will not part with them under the price of our torment: God proclaims; Come yee that want; buy for nought. Now we thrifty men, that try all ſhops for the cheapeſt penniworth, refuſe God, proffering his precious commodities for nothing; & pay an hard price for that which is worſe then nothing, painful. Surely we are wiſe for any thing but our ſouls: not ſo wiſe for the body, as fooliſh for them. O Lord, E thy

A thy payment is ſure, and who knowes how preſent? Take the ſoul that thou haſt both made and bought: and let me rather give my life for thy favour, then take the offers of the world for nothing.

33

There was never age that more bragged of knowledge, and yet never any that had leſſe ſoundneſſe. He that knowes not God, knoweth nothing; and he that loves not God, knowes him not: for he is ſo ſweet, and infinitely full of delight, that who-ever knows him cannot chuſe but affect him. The little love of God then argues the great ignorance even of thoſe that profeſſe knowledge. I will not ſuffer my affections to run before my knowledge: for then I ſhall love faſhionably only, becauſe I heare God is worthy of love; and ſo be ſubject to relapſes: but I will ever lay knowledge as the
B ground of my love. So, as I grow in divine knowledge, I ſhall ſtill profit in an heavenly zeale.

Thoſe that travell in long pilgrimages to the holy Land, what a number of weary paſes they meaſure? what a number of hard lodgings and known dangers they paſſe? and at laſt when they are come within view of their journies end, what a large tribute pay they at the Piſan Caſtle to the Turkes? And when they are come thither, what ſee they but the bare Sepulcher wherein their Saviour lay? and the earth that he trode upon, to the increaſe of a carnall devotion? What labour ſhould I willingly undertake in my journey to the true Land of promiſe, the celeſtiall Ieruſalem, where I ſhall ſee and enjoy my Saviour himſelfe? What tribute of pain or death ſhould I refuſe to
C pay for my entrance, not into his Sepulcher, but his Palace of glory? and that not to look upon, but to poſſeſſe it?

Thoſe that are all in exhortation, no whit in doctrine, are like to them that ſnuffe the candle, but powre not in oyle. Again, thoſe that are all in doctrine, nothing in exhortation, drown the wike in oyle, but light it not; making it fit for uſe, if it had fire put to it, but as it is, rather capable of good, then profitable in preſent. Doctrine, without exhortation, makes men all brain, no heart. Exhortation, without doctrine, makes the heart full, leaves the braine empty. Both together make a man: One makes a man wiſe; the other good. One ſerves that we may know our duty; the other, that we may perform it. I will labour in both: but I know not in whether more. Men cannot pra-
D ctiſe, unleſſe they know; and they know in vain, if they practiſe not.

There be two things in every good work, honour and profit. The latter God beſtowes upon us, the former he keeps to himſelf. The profit of our works redoundeth not to God. My well-doing extendeth not to thee. The honour of our work may not be allowed us. My glory I will not give to another. I will not abridge God of his part, that he may not bereave me of mine.

The proud man hath no God; the envious man hath no neighbour; the angry man hath not himſelf. What can that man have that wants himſelf? What is a man better, if he have himſelf, and want all others? What is he the neerer, if he have himſelf, and
E others, and yet want God? What good is it then to be a man, if he be either wrathful, proud, or envious?

Man that was once the ſoveraign Lord of all creatures, whom they ſerviceably attended at all times, is now ſent to the very baſeſt of all creatures to learn good qualities: Goe to the Piſmire, &c. and ſee, the moſt contemptible creatures preferd before him: The Aſſe knoweth his owner, wherein we, like the miſerable heir of ſome great Peer, whoſe houſe is decayed through the treaſon of our progenitors, heare and ſee what Honours and Lord-ſhips we ſhould have had; but now finde our ſelves below many of the vulgar: we have not ſo much cauſe of exaltation, that we are men, and not beaſts, as we have of humiliation, in thinking how much we were once better then we are, and that now in many duties we are men inferiour to beaſts: ſo as thoſe whom we contemn,

contemne, if they had our reaſon, might more juſtly contemne us; and as they are, may teach us by their examples, and doe condemne us by their practice. A

39

The idle man is the Devils cuſhion, on which he taketh his free eaſe: who as he is uncapable of any good, ſo he is fitly diſpoſed for all evill motions. The ſtanding water ſoon ſtinketh; whereas the current ever keeps cleer and cleanly: conveying down all noiſome matter that might infect it, by the force of his ſtream. If I doe but little good to others by my endevours, yet this is great good to me, that by my labour I keep my ſelfe from hurt.

40

There can be no neerer conjunction in nature, then is betwixt the body and the ſoul: yet theſe two are of ſo contrary diſpoſition, that as it falls out in an ill-matched man and wife, thoſe ſervants which the one likes beſt, are moſt diſpraiſed of the other; ſo here, one ſtill takes part againſt the other in their choice: what benefits the one, is the hurt of the other. The glutting of the body pines the ſoule; and the ſoule thrives beſt when the body is pinched. Who can wonder, that there is ſuch faction amongſt others, that ſees ſo much in his very ſelfe? True wiſdome is to take, not with the ſtronger, as the faſhion of the world is, but with the better: following herein, not uſurped power, but juſtice. It is not hard to diſcern, whoſe the right is; whether the ſervant ſhould rule or the miſtreſſe. I will labour to make and keep the peace, by giving each part his own indifferently: but if more be affected with an ambitious contention, I will rather beat Hagar out of doors, then ſhe ſhall over-rule her miſtreſſe. B

41

I ſee Iron firſt heated red hot in the fire, and after beaten and hardned with cold water. Thus will I deale with an offending friend: firſt heat him with deſerved praiſe of his vertue, and then beat upon him with reprehenſion: ſo good nurſes, when their children are fallen, firſt take them up and ſpeak them fair, chide them afterwards: Gentle ſpeech is a good preparative for rigor. He ſhall ſee that I love him, by my approbation; and that I love not his faults by my reproof. If he love himſelf, he wil love thoſe that miſlike his vices: & if he love not himſelf, it matters not whether he love me. C

42

The liker we are to God, which is the beſt and only good, the better & happier we muſt needs be. All ſins make us unlike him, as being contrary to his perfect holineſſe; but ſome ſhew more direct contrariety: ſuch is envy. For whereas God bringeth good out of evill; the envious man fetcheth evill out of good; wherein alſo his ſin proves a kinde of puniſhment: for whereas to good men even evill things work together to their good, contrarily, to the envious, good things work together to their evill. The evill, in any man, though never ſo proſperous, I will not envy, but pity: The good graces I will not repine at, but holily emulate; rejoycing that they are ſo good, but grieving that I am no better. D

43

The covetous man is like a ſpider, as in this, that he doth nothing but lay his nets to catch every Flie, gaping only for a booty of gain, ſo yet more, in that whiles he makes nets for theſe flies, he conſumeth his own bowels: ſo that which is his life is his death. If there be any creature miſerable, it is he; and yet he is leaſt to be pitied, becauſe hee makes himſelf miſerable; ſuch as he is I will account him; and will therefore ſweep down his webs and hate his poyſon. E

44

In heaven there is all life, and no dying: in hell is all death, and no life. In earth there is both living and dying; which, as it is betwixt both, ſo it prepares for both. So that he which here below dyes to ſinne, doth after live in heaven; and contrarily, he that lives in ſinne upon earth, dies in hell afterward. What if I have no part of joy here below, but ſtill ſucceſſion of afflictions? The wicked have no part in heaven, and yet they enjoy the earth with pleaſure: I would not change portions with them. I rejoyce, that ſeeing I cannot have both, yet I have the better. O Lord, let me paſſe both my deaths

A deaths here upon earth. I care not how I live or die, so I may have nothing but life to look for in another world.

The conceit of propriety hardens a man against many inconveniences, and addeth much to our pleasure. The mother abides many unquiet nights, many painfull throes, & unpleasant savours of her child, upon this thought, It is my own. The indulgent father magnifies that in his own son, which he would scarce like in a stranger. The want of this to God-ward, makes us so subject to discontentment, & cooleth our delight in him, because we think of him aloof, as one in whom we are not interessed. If we could think, It is my God that cheereth me with his presence, & blessings, while I prosper; that afflicteth me in love, when I am dejected; my Saviour is at Gods right hand; my
B Angels stand in his presence, it could not be but Gods favour would be sweeter, his chastisements more easie, his benefits more effectual. I am not in my own, while God is not mine: and while he is mine, since I doe possesse him, I will enjoy him.

Nature is of her own inclination froward, importunately longing after that which is denied her; and scornfull of what she may have. If it were appointed that we should live alwaies upon earth, how extremely would we exclaim of wearinesse, and wish rather that we were not? Now it is appointed we shall live here but a while, and then give room to our successors, each one affects a kind of eternity upon earth. I will labour to tame this peevish and sullen humour of nature, and will like that best that must be.

All true earthly pleasure forsook man, when he forsook his Creator; what honest and holy delight he took before in the dutifull services of the obsequious creatures; in the contemplation of that admirable variety, & strangenesse of their properties, in seeing their sweet accordance with each other, and all with himselfe? Now most of our pleasure is, to set one creature together by the ears with another, sporting our selves only with that deformity, which was bred through our own fault: yea, there have been, that have delighted to see one man spill anothers bloud upon the sand, and have shouted for joy at the sight of that slaughter, which hath fallen out upon no other quarrell, but the pleasure of the beholders: I doubt not but as we solace our selves in the discord of the inferiour creatures, so the evill spirits sport themselves in our dissentiD ons. There are better qualities of the creature, which we passe over without pleasure. In recreations, I will chuse those which are of best example, & best use; seeking those by which I may not only be the merrier, but the better.

There is no want for which a man may not finde a remedy in himself. Doe I want riches? He that desires but little, cannot want much. Doe I want friends? If I love God enough, and my self but enough, it matters not. Doe I want health? If I want it but a little, and recover; I shall esteem it the more, because I wanted. If I be long sick, and unrecoverably, I shall be the fitter and willinger to die; & my pain is so much lesse sharp, by how much more it lingreth. Doe I want maintenance? A little, and course, will content nature. Let my mind be no more ambitious, then my back and belly. I E can hardly complain of too little. Doe I want sleep? I am going whither there is no use of sleep; where all rest, and sleep not. Doe I want children? Many that have them, wish they wanted: It is better to be childlesse, then crossed with their miscarriage. Doe I want learning? He hath none, that saith he hath enough. The next way to get more, is to find thou wantest. There is remedy for all wants, in our selves, saving only for want of grace: and that, 'a man cannot so much as see and complain that he wants but from above.

Every vertuous action (like the Sunne eclipsed) hath a double shadow; according to the divers aspects of the beholders: one of glory, the other of envy. Glory follows upon good deserts; Envy upon glory. He that is envied, may think himself well: for he that envies him, thinks him more then well: I know no vice in another, whereof a man may make ſo good and comfortable uſe to himſelf. There would be no ſhadow, if there were no light.

In medling with the faults of friends, I have obſerved many wrongful courſes; what for feare, or ſelfe-love, or indiſcretion. Some I have ſeen, like unmercifull and covetous Chirurgians, keep the wound raw, (which they might have ſeaſonably remedied) for their own gain. Others, that have laid healing plaiſters to skin it aloft, when there hath been more need of Corroſives to eat out the dead fleſh within. Others, that have galled & drawn, when there hath been nothing but ſolid fleſh, that hath wanted only filling up. Others, that have healed the ſore, but left an unſightly ſcarre of diſcredit behinde them. He that would doe good this way, muſt have Fidelity, Courage, Diſcretion, Patience. Fidelity, not to bear with; Courage, to reprove them; Diſcretion, to reprove them well; Patience, to abide the leiſure of amendment; making much of good beginnings, and putting up many repulſes, bearing with many weakneſſes; ſtill hoping, ſtill ſolliciting; as knowing that thoſe who have been long uſed to fetters, cannot but halt a while when they are taken off.

51

God hath made all the World, & yet what a little part of it is his? Divide the World into four parts: but, one, & the leaſt containeth al that is worthy the name of Chriſtendome: the reſt overwhelmed with Turciſme, and Paganiſme: and of this leaſt part, the greater half yet holding aright concerning God and their Saviour in ſome common principles, overthrow the truth in their concluſions; and ſo leave the leſſer part of the leaſt part for God. Yet lower: of thoſe that hold aright concerning Chriſt, how few are there, that doe otherwiſe then faſhionably profeſſe him? And of thoſe that doe ſeriouſly profeſſe him, how few are there that in their lives deny him not, living unworthy of ſo glorious a calling? Wherein I doe not pity God, who will have glory even of thoſe that are not his: I pity miſerable men, that doe reject their Creator & Redeemer, and themſelves in him. And I envy Satan, that he ruleth ſo large. Since God hath ſo few, I will be more thankfull that he hath vouchſafed me one of his; and be the more zealous of glorifying him, becauſe we have but a few fellowes.

52

As thoſe that have taſted of ſome delicate diſh, finde other plain diſhes but unpleaſant; ſo it fareth with thoſe which have once taſted of heavenly things, they cannot but contemne the beſt worldly pleaſures. As therefore ſome dainty gueſt knowing there is ſo pleaſant fare to come; I will reſerve my appetite for it, and not ſuffer my ſelf cloied with the courſe diet of the world.

53

I finde many places where God hath uſed the hand of good Angels for the puniſhment of the wicked; but never could yet find one, wherein he imployed an evill Angell in any direct good to his children. Indirect I find many, if not all, through the power of him that brings light out of darkneſſe, and turnes their evill to our good: In this choice God would and muſt be imitated. From an evill ſpirit I dare not receive ought, if never ſo good; I wil receive as little as I may from a wicked man. If he were as perfectly evill as the other, I durſt receive nothing; I had rather hunger, then wilfully dip my hand in a wicked mans diſh.

54

We are ready to condemn others, for that which is as eminently faulty in our ſelves. If one blind man ruſh upon another in the way, either complains of others blindneſs, neither of his own. I have heard thoſe which have had moſt corrupt lungs, complain of the unſavoury breath of others. The reaſon is, becauſe the mind caſteth altogether outward, and reflecteth not into it ſelf. Yet it is more ſhamefull to be either ignorant of or favourable to our own imperfections. I will cenſure others vices fearfully, my own confidently, becauſe I know them; and thoſe I know not, I will ſuſpect.

55

He is a very humble man, that thinks not himſelf better then ſome others; and he is very mean, whom ſome others doe not account better then themſelves: ſo that

Veſſell

A Veſſell that ſeemed very ſmall upon the Main, ſeemes a tall ſhip upon the Thames. As there are many better for eſtate then my ſelf, ſo there are ſome worſe; and if I were yet worſe, yet would there be ſome lower: and if I were ſo low, that I accounted my ſelf the worſt of all, yet ſome would account themſelves in worſe caſe. A mans opinion is in others, his being is in himſelf. Let me know my ſelf, let others gueſſe at me. Let others either envy or pity me, I care not ſo long as I enjoy my ſelf.

56

He can never wonder enough at Gods workmanſhip, that knows not the frame of the world: for he can never elſe conceive of the hugeneſſe, and ſtrange proportion of the creature. And he that knowes this, can never wonder more at any thing elſe. I will learn to know, that I may admire; and by that little I know, I will more wonder
B at that I know not.

There is nothing below but toyling, grieving, wiſhing, hoping, fearing; and wearineſſe in all theſe. What fooles are we to be beſotted with the love of our own trouble, and to hate our liberty and reſt? The love of miſery, is much worſe then miſery it ſelf. We muſt firſt pray, that God would make us wiſe, before we can wiſh he would make us happy.

If a man referre all things to himſelf, nothing ſeemes enough: If all things to God, any meaſure will content him of earthly things; but in grace he is inſatiable. Worldlings ſerve themſelves altogether in God, making Religion but to ſerve their turnes,
C as a colour of their ambition, and covetouſneſſe. The Chriſtian ſeeks God only in ſeeking himſelf, uſing all other things but as ſubordinately to him; not caring whether himſelf win or loſe, ſo that God may win glory in both. I will not ſuffer mine eyes and mind to be bounded with theſe viſible things; but ſtill look through theſe matters at God which is the utmoſt ſcope of them: accounting them only as a thorow-fare to paſſe by, not as an habitation to reſt in.

He is wealthy enough, that wanteth not. He is great enough, that is his own Maſter. He is happy enough, that lives to die well. Other things I will not care for; nor too much for theſe, ſave only for the laſt, which alone can admit of no immoderation.

60

D A man of extraordinary parts, makes himſelf by ſtrange and ſingular behaviour, more admired; which if a man of but common facultie doe imitate, he makes himſelf ridiculous: for that which is conſtrued as naturall to the one, is diſcried to be affected in the other. And there is nothing forced by affectation can be comely. I will ever ſtrive to goe in the common road: ſo while I am not notable, I ſhall not be notorious.

61

Gold is the beſt metall, and for the purity not ſubject to ruſt, as all others: and yet the beſt gold hath ſome droſſe. I eſteeme not that man that hath no faults: I like him well that hath but a few, and thoſe not great.

Many a man mars a good eſtate, for want of skill to proportion his carriage anſwe-
E rably to his ability. A little ſaile to a large veſſell, rids no way, though the wind be faire. A large ſaile to a little Barke drownes it. A top-ſaile to a ſhip of meane burthen in a rough weather, is dangerous. A low ſaile in an eaſie gale, yeelds little advantage. This diſproportion cauſeth ſome to live miſerably in a good eſtate: and ſome to make a good eſtate miſerable. I will firſt know what I may doe for ſafety, and then I will try what I can doe for ſpeed.

The rich man hath many friends; although in truth riches have them, and not the man. As the Aſſe that carried the Ægyptian Goddeſſe, had many bowed knees, yet not to the beaſt, but to the burthen. For, ſeparate the riches from the perſon, and thou ſhalt ſee friendſhip leave the man, & follow that which was ever her object: while he may command, and can either give, or controll, he hath attendance, & proffer of love at all hands; but which of these dares acknowledge him, when he is going to prison for debt? Then these Waspes that made such musick about this Gally-pot, shew plainly, that they came only for the hony that was in it. This is the misery of the wealthy, that they cannot know their friends: whereas those that love the poor man, love him for himself. He that would chuse a true friend, must search out one that is neither covetous nor ambitious; for such a one loves but himself in thee. And if it be rare to find any not infected with qualities, the best is to entertain all, and trust few. A

That which the French Proverbe hath of sicknesses, is true of all evills: That they come on horseback, and goe away on foot. We have oft seen a sudden fall, or one meales surfet hath stuck by many to their graves; whereas pleasures come like Oxen, slow and heavily, & goe away like Post-horses, upon the spur. Sorrowes, because they are lingring guests, I will entertain but moderately; knowing, that the more they are made of, the longer they will continue: and for pleasures, because they stay not, & doe but call to drink at my doore; I will use them as passengers, with slight respect. He is his own best friend, that makes least of both of them. B

65

It is indeed more commendable to give good example, then to take it: yet imitation, how-ever in civill matters it be condemned of servility, in Christian practice hath his due praise; & though it be more naturall for beginners at their first imitation, that cannot swim without bladders; yet the best proficient shall see ever some higher steps of those that have gone to heaven before him, worthy of his tracing: wherin much caution must be had; that we follow good men, & in good: Good men, for if we propound imperfect patterns to our selves, we shall be constrained first to unlearn those il habits we have got by their imitation, before we can be capable of good: so besides the losse of labour, we are further off from our end. In good; for that a man should be so wedded to any mans person, that he can make no separation from his infirmities, is both absurdly servile, and unchristian. He therefore that would follow well, must know to distinguish well, betwixt good men, and evill; betwixt good men and better; betwixt good qualities and infirmities. Why hath God given me education, not in a Desert alone, but in the company of good & vertuous men, but that by the sight of their good carriage, I should better mine own? Why should we have interest in the vices of men, and not in their vertues? And although precepts be surer, yet a good mans action is according to precept; yea, is a precept it self. The Psalmist compares the Law of God to a Lantern; good example bears it. It is safe following him that carries the light: if he walk without the light, he shall walk without me. C D

66

As there is one common end to all good men, salvation; & one Author of it, Christ: so there is but one way to it, doing well, and suffering evill. Doing well (me thinks) is like the Zodiack in the Heaven, the high way of the Sun, thorow which it daily passeth: Suffering evill, is like the Ecliptick line that goes thorow the middest of it. The rule of doing well, the Law of God, is uniform & eternall; and the copies of suffering evill in all times agree with the originall. No man can either do wel or suffer ill without an example. Are we sawn in peeces? so was Esay. Are we beheaded? so John Baptist. Crucified? so Peter. Thrown to wild beasts? so Daniel. Into the furnace? so the three children. Stoned? so Steven. Banished? so the beloved Disciple. Burnt? so millions of Martyrs. Defamed and slandered? what good man ever was not? It were easie to be endlesse both in torments and sufferers: whereof each hath begun to other, all to us. I may not hope to speed better then the best Christians; I cannot feare to fare worse. It is no matter which way I goe, so I come to Heaven. E

67

There is nothing beside life of this nature, that it is diminished by addition. Every moment we live longer then other, and each moment that we live longer, is so much taken out of our life. It increaseth and diminisheth only by minutes, and therfore is not perceived: the shorter steps it taketh, the more slily it passeth. Time shall not so steale upon me, that I shall not discern it, & catch it by the fore-locks; nor so steale from me, that it shall carry with it no witnesse of his passage in my proficiency. 68 The

68

The prodigall man, while he ſpendeth, is magnified: when he is ſpent, is pitied: and that is all his recompence for his laviſht Patrimony. The covetous man is grudged while he live, and his death is rejoyced at: for when he ends, his riches beginne to be goods. He that wiſely keeps the mean between both, liveth well, and hears well; neither repined at by the needy; nor pitied by greater men. I would ſo manage theſe worldly commodities, as accounting them mine to diſpoſe, others to partake of.

69

A good name (if any earthly thing) is worth ſeeking, worth ſtriving for; yet to affect a bare name, when we deſerve either ill, or nothing, is but a proud hypocriſie: and to be puffed up with the wrongfull eſtimation of others miſtaking our worth, is an idle and ridiculous pride. Thou art well ſpoken of upon no deſert: what then? Thou haſt deceived thy neighbours, they one another, & all of them have deceived thee: for thou madeſt them think of thee otherwiſe then thou art; and they have made thee think of thy ſelf as thou art accounted: the deceit came from thee, the ſhame will end in thee. I will account no wrong greater, then for a man to eſteem and report me above that I am: not rejoycing in that I am well thought of, but in that I am ſuch as I am eſteemed.

70

It was a ſpeech worthy the commendation, and frequent remembrance of ſo divine a Biſhop as Auguſtine; which is reported of an aged Father in his time; who when his friends comforted him on his ſick bed, and told him, they hoped he ſhould recover, anſwered: If I ſhall not die at all, well; but if ever, why not now? Surely it is folly, what we muſt doe, to doe unwillingly. I will never think my ſoule in a good caſe, ſo long as I am loth to think of dying; and will make this my comfort: Not, I ſhall yet live longer, but, I ſhall yet doe more good.

71

Exceſſes are never alone. Commonly thoſe that have excellent parts, have ſome extremely vicious qualities: great wits have great errours; and great eſtates have great cares: whereas mediocrity of gifts or of eſtate hath uſually but eaſie inconveniences: elſe the excellent would not know themſelves, and the mean would be too much dejected. Now thoſe whom we admire for their faculties, we pity for their infirmities; and thoſe which find themſelves but of the ordinary pitch, joy that as their vertues, ſo their vices are not eminent. So the higheſt have a blemiſhed glory, and the mean are contentedly ſecure. I will magnifie the higheſt, but affect the mean.

72

The body is the caſe, or ſheath of the minde: yet as naturally it hideth it; ſo it doth alſo many times diſcover it. For although the forehead, eyes, and frame of the countenance doe ſometime belie the diſpoſition of the heart; yet moſt commonly they give true generall verdicts. An angry mans browes are bent together, and his eyes ſparkle with rage, which when he is well pleaſed, look ſmooth and cheerfully. Envy hath one look; deſire another; ſorrow yet another; contentment, a fourth, different from all the reſt. To ſhew no paſſion, is too Stoicall; to ſhew all, is impotent; to ſhew other then we feel, hypocriticall. The face and geſture doe but write, and make commentaries upon the heart. I will firſt endevour ſo to frame and order that, as not to entertain any paſſion, but what I need not care to have laid open to the world: & therefore will firſt ſee that the Text be good; then that the gloſſe be true; and laſtly, that it be ſparing. To what end hath God ſo walled in the heart, if I ſhould let every mans eyes into it by my countenance?

73

There is no publike action which the world is not ready to ſcan; there is no action ſo private, which the evill ſpirits are not witneſſes of; I will endevour ſo to live, as knowing that I am ever in the eyes of mine enemies.

74

When we our ſelves, and all other vices are old, then covetouſneſſe alone is young, and at his beſt age. This vice loves to dwell in an old ruinous cottage: yet that age can have no ſuch honeſt colour for niggardlineſſe and inſatiable deſire. A young man might might plead the uncertainty of his eſtate and doubt of his future need: but an old man A ſees his ſet period before him. Since this humour is ſo neceſſarily annexed to this age, I will turn it the right way, and nouriſh it in my ſelf. The older I grow, the more covetous I will be; but of the riches, not of the world I am leaving, but of all the world I am entring into. It is good coveting what I may have, and cannot leave behind me.

There is a mutuall hatred betwixt a Chriſtian, and the world; for on the one ſide, the love of the world is enmity with God; and Gods children cannot but take their Fathers part. On the other, The world hates you, becauſe it hated me firſt. But the hatred of the good man to the wicked is not ſo extreme, as that wherewith he is hated. For the Chriſtian hates ever with commiſeration and love of that good he ſees in the worſt; knowing that the eſſence of the very Devils is good, and that the lewdeſt man B hath ſome excellent parts of nature, or common graces of the Spirit of God, which he warily ſingleth out in his affection. But the wicked man hates him for goodneſſe, and therefore findes nothing in himſelf to moderate his deteſtation. There can be no better muſick in mine eare then the diſcord of the wicked. If he like me, I am afraid he ſpies ſome quality in me, like to his own. If he ſaw nothing but goodneſſe, he could not love me, and be bad himſelf. It was a juſt doubt of Phocion, who when the people praiſed him, asked, What evill have I done? I will ſtrive to deſerve evill of none: but not deſerving ill, it ſhall not grieve me to hear ill of thoſe that are evill. I know no greater argument of goodneſſe, then the hatred of a wicked man.

A man that comes hungry to his meale, feeds heartily on the meat ſet before him, C not regarding the metall, or forme of the platter, wherein it is ſerved; who afterwards when his ſtomacke is ſatisfied, begins to play with the diſh, or to read ſentences on his trencher. Thoſe auditors which can finde nothing to doe, but note elegant words and phraſes, or rhetoricall colours, or perhaps an ill grace of geſture in a pithy and materiall ſpeech, argue themſelves full ere they came to the feaſt: and therefore goe away with a little pleaſure, no profit. In hearing others, my only intention ſhall be to feed my mind with ſolid matter: if my eare can get ought by the way, I will not grudge it, but I will not intend it.

The joy of a Chriſtian in theſe worldly things is limited, and ever awed with fear D of exceſſe, but recompenced abundantly with his ſpirituall mirth: whereas the worldling gives the reines to the mind, and powres himſelf into pleaſure, fearing only that he ſhall not joy enough. He that is but half a Chriſtian, lives but miſerably; for he neither enjoyeth God, nor the world. Not God, becauſe he hath not grace enough to make him his own: not the world, becauſe he hath ſome taſte of grace; enough to ſhew him the vanity and ſin of his pleaſures. So the ſound Chriſtian hath his heaven above, the worldling here below, the unſetled Chriſtian no where.

Good deeds are very fruitfull; and not ſo much of their nature, as of gods bleſſing, multipliable. We think ten in the hundred extreme and biting uſury; God gives us more then an hundred for ten; yea, above the increaſe of the gain which we commend moſt for multiplication. For out of one good action of ours, God produceth a thou- E ſand; the harveſt whereof is perpetuall: Even the faithfull actions of the old Patriarkes, the conſtant ſufferings of ancient Martyres live ſtill, and doe good to all ſucceſſions of ages by their example. For publike actions of vertue, beſides that they are preſently comfortable to the doer, are alſo exemplary to others: and as they are more beneficiall to others, ſo are more crowned in us. If good deeds were utterly barren and incommodious, I would ſeek after them for the conſcience of their own goodneſſe: how much more ſhall I now be incouraged to perform them, for that they are ſo profitable both to my ſelf, and to others, and to me in others? My principall care ſhall be, that while my ſoule lives in glory in heaven, my good actions may live upon earth; and that they might be put into the bank and multiply, while my body lies in the grave and conſumeth.

79 A Chriſtian

A Christian for the sweet fruit he beares to God and men, is compared to the noblest of all plants, the Vine. Now as the most generous Vine, if it be not pruned, runs out into many superfluous stemmes, and growes at last weak and fruitlesse: so doth the best man, if he be cut short of his desires, and pruned with afflictions. If it be painfull to bleed, it is worse to wither. Let me be pruned that I may grow, rather then cut up to burn.

80

Those, that doe but superficially taste of divine knowledge, find little sweetnesse in it; and are ready for the unpleasant rellish to abhor it: whereas if they would dive deep into the Sea, they should find fresh water neer to the bottome: That it savours not well at the first, is the fault not of it, but of the distempered palate that tastes it. Good metalls & mineralls are not found close under the skin of the earth, but below in the bowels of it: No good Miner casts away his Mattock, because he finds a vein of tough clay, or a shelf of stone; but still delveth lower, and passing thorow many changes of soile, at last comes to his rich treasure. We are too soon discouraged in our spirituall gaines. I will still persevere to seek, hardning my self against all difficulty. There is comfort even in seeking, hope; and there is joy in hoping, good successe: and in that successe, is happinesse.

He that hath any experience in spiritual matters, knowes that Satan is ever more violent at the last; then raging most furiously, when he knows he shall rage but a while. Hence of the first persecutions of the first Church, the tenth and last under Diocletian and Maximinian, & those other five Tyrants, was the bloudiest. Hence this age is the most dissolute, because neerest the conclusion. And as this is his course in the universal assaults of the whole Church: so it is the same in his conflicts with every Christian soul. Like a subtill Orator he reserves his strongest force still the shutting up: And therefore miserable is the folly of those men who defer their repentance till then, when their onset shall be most sharp, and they through pain of body, & perplexednesse of mind shall be least able to resist. Those that have long furnisht themselves with spirituall munition, find work enough in this extreme brunt of temptation: how then should the careless man, that with the help of all opportunites could not find grace to repent, hope to atchieve it at the last gasp, against greater force, with lesse means, more distraction, no leisure? Wise Princes use to prepare ten yeers before for a field of one day: I will every day lay up somewhat for my last. If I win that skirmish, I have enough. The first and second blow begin the battell, but the last only wins it.

82

I observe three seasons where a wise man differs not from a fool; in his infancy, in sleep, and in silence: for in the two former we are all fools; and in silence all are wise. In the two former yet, there may be concealment of folly; but the tongue is a blab: there cannot be any kind of folly, either simple, or wicked, in the heart, but the tongue will bewray it. He cannot be wise that speaks much, or without sense, or out of season, nor he known for a fool that sayes nothing. It is a great misery to be a fool: but this is yet greater, that a man cannot be a fool but he must shew it. It were well for such a one, if he could be taught to keep close his foolishnesse: but then there should be no fools. I have heard some (which have scorned the opinion of folly in them selves) for a speech wherin they have hoped to shew most wit, censured of folly, by him that hath thought himself wiser: and another, hearing his sentence again, hath condemned him for want of wit in censuring. Surely he is not a fool that hath unwise thoughts, but he that utters them. Even concealed folly is wisdome: and sometimes wisdome uttered, is folly. While others care how to speak, my care shall be how to hold my peace.

A work is then only good and acceptable, when the action, meaning, and manner are all good: For to doe good with an ill meaning (as Iudas saluted Christ to betray him) is so much more sinfull, by how much the action is better; which being good in the kind, is abused to an ill purpose. To doe ill in a good meaning, (as Vzza in staying the the Ark)is ſo much amiſſe,that the good intention cannot bear out the unlawfull act: which although it may ſeem ſome excuſe,why it ſhould not be ſo ill,yet is no warrant to juſtifie it. To mean well and doe a good action, in an ill manner, (as the Phariſee made a good prayer,but arrogantly)is ſo offenſive,that the evil maner depraveth both the other.So a thing may be evil upon one circumſtance, it cannot be good but upon all. In what ever buſineſſe I goe about, I will enquire, What I doe for the ſubſtance, How for the manner, Why for the intention: For the two firſt, I will conſult with God;for the laſt,with my own heart. A

I can doe nothing without a million of Witneſſes: The conſcience is as a thouſand witneſſes;and God is as a thouſand conſciences:I will therefore ſo deal with men, as knowing that God ſees me;and ſo with God,as if the world ſaw me;ſo with my ſelf, and both of them,as knowing that my conſcience ſeeth me: and ſo with them all, as knowing I am alwayes over-looked by my accuſer,by my Judge. B

85

Earthly inheritances are divided oft-times with much inequality. The privilege of primogeniture ſtretcheth larger in many places now, then it did among the ancient Iewes. The younger many times ſerves the elder;and whiles the eldeſt aboundeth,all the latter iſſue is pinched. In heaven it is not ſo:all the ſons of God are heirs,none underlings;and not heirs under wardſhip,and hope,but inheritors; and not inheritors of any little pittance of land,but of a kingdome;nor of an earthly kingdome, ſubject to danger of loſſe,or alteration,but one glorious and everlaſting. It ſhal content me here, that having right to all things, yet I have poſſeſſion of nothing but ſorrow. Since I ſhall have poſſeſſion above,of all that,whereto I have right below, I will ſerve willingly,that I may reigne;ſerve for a while,that I may reign for ever. C

86

Even the beſt things ill uſed,become evils;& contrarily,the worſt things uſed wel, prove good. A good tongue,uſed to deceit;a good wit,uſed to defend errour;a ſtrong arm, to murther; authority,to oppreſſe; a good profeſſion to diſſemble; are all evill; yea Gods own Word is the ſword of the ſpirit;which if it kill not our vices, kills our ſouls. Contrariwiſe(as poyſons are uſed to wholeſome medicine)afflictions and ſins, by a good uſe prove ſo gainfull, as nothing more. Words are as they are taken: and things are as they are uſed. There are even curſed bleſſings. O Lord rather give me no favours,then not grace to uſe them. If I want them,thou requireſt not what thou doſt not give:but if I have them,and want their uſe,thy mercy proves my judgement. D

87

Man is the beſt of all theſe inferiour creatures; yet lives in more ſorrow and diſcontentment,then the worſt of them: whiles that reaſon wherein he excels them, and by which he might make advantage of his life, he abuſes to a ſuſpitious diſtruſt. How many haſt thou found of the fowles of the ayre, lying dead in the way for want of proviſion? They eat,and reſt,and ſing,and want nothing. Man, which hath far better means to live comfortably,toileth,and careth,and wanteth; whom yet his reaſon alone might teach, that he which careth for theſe lower creatures made only for man, will much more provide for man, to whoſe uſe they were made. There is an holy careleſneſſe;free from idleneſſe;free from diſtruſt. In theſe earthly things, I will ſo depend on my Maker,that my truſt in him may not exclude all my labour; and yet ſo labour(upon my confidence on him)as my endevour may be void of perplexity. E

88

The precepts,and practice of thoſe with whom we live, avail much on either part. For a man not to be ill,where he hath no provocations to evil,is leſſe commendable; but for a man to live continently in Aſia (as he ſaid)where he ſees nothing but allurements to uncleanneſſe: for Lot to be a good man in the middeſt of Sodom,to be abſtemious in Germany, and in Italy chaſte, this is truly praiſe-worthy. To ſequeſter our ſelves from the company of the world,that we may depart from their vices,proceeds from a baſe and diſtruſting minde:as if we would ſo force goodneſſe upon our ſelves, that therefore only we would be good,becauſe we cannot be ill. But for a man ſo to be be personally, and locally in the throng of the world, as to withdraw his affections from it, to use it, and yet to contemn it at once, to compell it to his service without any infection, becomes well the noble courage of a Christian. The world shall be mine, I will not be his, and yet so mine, that his evill shall be still his own.

He that lives in God, cannot be weary of his life, because he ever finds both somewhat to doe, and somewhat to solace himself with; cannot be over-loth to part with it, because he shall enter into a neerer life and society with that God in whom he delighteth. Whereas he that lives without him, lives many times uncomfortably here, because partly he knows not any cause of joy in himself; and partly he findes not any worthy employment to while himself withall; dies miserably, because he either knows not whither he goes, or knowes he goes to torment. There is no true life, but the life of faith. O Lord, let me live out of the world with thee, (if thou wilt) but let me not live in the world without thee.

90

Sinne is both evill in it self, and the effect of a former evill, and the cause of sinne following; a cause of punishment, and lastly a punishment it self. It is a damnable iniquity in man, to multiply one sin upon another; but to punish one sin by another, in God is a judgement both most just, and most fearfull; so as all the store-house of God hath not a greater vengeance: with other punishments the body smarteth, the soule with this. I care not how God offends me with punishments, so he punish me not with offending him.

91

I have seen some afflict their bodies with wilfull famine, and scourges of their own making; God spares me that labour; for he whips me daily with the scourge of a weak body; and sometimes with ill tongues. He holds me short many times of the feeling of his comfortable presence, which is in truth so much more miserable an hunger then that of the body, by how much the soule is more tender, and the food denied, more excellent. He is my Father; infinitely wise, to proportion out my correction according to my estate; and infinitely loving, in fitting me with a due measure. He is a presumptuous child, that will make choice of his own rod. Let me learn to make a right use of his corrections, and I shall not need to correct my self. And if it should please God to remit his hand a little; I wil govern my body, as a Master, not as a Tyrant.

92

If God had not said, Blessed are those that hunger, I know not what could keep weak Christians from sinking in despair: Many times all I can doe, is to find and complain that I want him, & wish to recover him: Now this is my stay, that he in mercy esteems us not only by having, but by desiring also; and after a sort accounts us to have that which we want, and desire to have: and my soule assuming, tells me I doe unfainedly wish him, and long after that grace I misse. Let me desire still more, and I know I shal not desire alwayes. There was never soule miscaried with longing after grace. O blessed hunger, that ends alwayes in fulnesse! I am sory that I can but hunger; and yet I would not be full; for the blessing is promised to the hungry: Give me more, Lord, but so as I may hunger more. Let me hunger more, and I know I shall be satisfied.

There is more in the Christian then thou seest. For he is both an entire body of himselfe, and he is a lim of another more excellent; even that glorious mysticall body of his Saviour; to whom he is so united, that the actions of either are reciprocally referred to each other. For, on the one side, the Christian lives in Christ, dies in Christ, in Christ fulfils the Law, possesseth heaven: on the other, Christ is persecuted by Paul in his members, and is persecuted in Paul afterwards by others: he suffers in us, he lives in us, he works in and by us: so thou canst not doe either good or harm to a Christian, but thou dost it to his Redeemer, to whom he is invisibly united. Thou seest him as a man, and therefore worthy of favour for humanities sake: Thou seest him not as a Christian, worthy of honour for his secret and yet true union with our Saviour. I will love every Christian, for that I see; honour him, for that I shall see.

Hell it ſelf is ſcarce a more obſcure dungeon, in compariſon of the earth, then earth is in reſpect of heaven. Here, the moſt ſee nothing, and the beſt ſee little: Here, half our life is night; and our very day is darkneſſe, in reſpect of God. The true light of the world and the Father of lights dwelleth above: There is the light of knowledge to inform us, & the light of joy to comfort us; without all change of darkneſs. There was never any captive loved his dungeon, and complained when he muſt be brought out to light and liberty: Whence then is this naturall madneſſe in us men, that we delight ſo much in this uncleane, noyſome, dark, and comfortleſſe priſon of earth? and thinke not of our releaſe to that lightſome and glorious Paradiſe above us, without grief and repining? We are ſure that we are not perfectly well here: if we could be as ſure that we ſhould be better above, we would not fear changing. Certainly our ſenſe tells us we have ſome pleaſure here; & we have not faith to aſſure us of more pleaſure above: and hence we ſettle our ſelves to the preſent, with neglect of the future, though infinitely more excellent: The heart followes the eyes: and unknown good is uncared for. O Lord, doe thou break thorow this darkneſſe of ignorance, and faithleſneſſe, wherewith I am compaſſed. Let me but ſee my heaven, and I know I ſhall deſire it.

95

To be carried away with an affectation of fame, is ſo vaine, and abſurd, that I wonder it can be incident to any wiſe man. For what a mole-hill of earth is it, to which his name can extend, when it is furtheſt carried by the wings of report? And how ſhort a while doth it continue where it is once ſpred? Time (the devourer of his own brood) conſumes both us & our memories; not braſſe, nor marble can bear age. How many flattering Poets have promiſed immortality of name to their Princes, who now together are buried long ſince in forgetfulneſſe! Thoſe names and actions, that are once on the file of heaven, are paſt the danger of defacing. I will not care whether I ke knowne, or remembred, or forgotten amongſt men, if my name and good actions may live with God in the records of eternity.

96

There is no man, nor no place free from ſpirits, although they teſtifie their preſence by viſible effects but in few. Every man is an Oaſt to entertain Angels, though not in viſible ſhapes, as Abraham and Lot. The evill ones doe nothing but provoke us to ſin, & plot miſchieves againſt us, by caſting into our way dangerous objects, by ſuggeſting ſinfull motions to our minds, ſtirring up enemies againſt us amongſt men, by frighting us with terrors in our ſelves, by accuſing us to God. On the contrary, The good Angels are ever removing our hinderances from good, and our occaſions of evill, mitigating our tentations; helping us againſt our enemies; delivering us from dangers; comforting us in ſorrowes; furthering our good purpoſes; and at laſt carrying up our ſoules to Heaven. It would affright a weak Chriſtian that knows the power and malice of wicked ſpirits, to conſider their preſence, and number; but when with the eyes of Eliſhaes ſervant, he ſees thoſe on his ſide as preſent, as diligent, more powerfull; he cannot but take heart again: eſpecially if he conſider, that neither of them is without God, limiting the one the bounds of their tentation; directing the other in the ſafeguard of his children. Whereupon it is come to paſſe, that though there be many legions of Devils, and every one more ſtrong then many legions of men, & more malicious then ſtrong, yet the little flock of Gods Church liveth and proſpereth. I have ever with me inviſible friends, and enemies. The conſideratiou of mine enemies ſhall keep me from ſecurity, and make me fearfull of doing ought to advantage them. The conſideration of my ſpirituall friends ſhal comfort me againſt the terror of the other; ſhall remedy my ſolitarineſſe; ſhall make me wary of doing ought indecently, grieving me rather, that I have ever heretofore made them turn away their eyes for ſhame of that whereof I have not been aſhamed; that I have no more enjoyed their ſociety; that I have been no more affected with their preſence. What though I ſee them not? I beleeve them. I were no Chriſtian, if my faith were not as ſure as my ſenſe.

There is no word or action, but may be taken with two hands; either with the right hand

A hand of charitable conſtruction; or the ſiniſter interpretation of malice, & ſuſpicion: and all things doe ſo ſucceed, as they are taken. I have noted evill actions well taken, paſſe currant for either indifferent or commendable: Contrarily a good ſpeech or action ill taken, ſcarce allowed for indifferent; an indifferent one, cenſured for evill; an evill one, for notorious: So favour makes vertues of vices; and ſuſpicion makes vertues faults; and faults crimes. Of the two, I had rather my right hand ſhould offend: It is alwayes ſafer offending on the better part. To conſtrue an evill act well, is but a pleaſing and profitable deceit of my ſelfe: but to miſconſtrue a good thing, is a treble wrong; to my ſelfe, the action, the author. If no good ſenſe can be made of a deed or ſpeech, let the blame light upon the author: If a good interpretation may be given, and I chuſe a worſe, let me be as much cenſured of others, as that miſconceit is puniſh-
B ment to my ſelf.

I know not how it comes to paſſe, that the mind of man doth naturally both overprize his owne, in compariſon of others, and yet contemne and neglect his own, in compariſon of what he wants. The remedy of this later evill is, to compare the good things we have, with the evils which we have not, and others grone under. Thou art in health and regardeſt it not; Look on the miſery of thoſe which on their bed of ſickneſſe, through extremity of pain and anguiſh, intreat death to releaſe them. Thou haſt clear eye-ſight, ſound limbs, uſe of reaſon; and paſſeſt theſe over with ſleight reſpect: Think how many there are which in their uncomfortable blindneſſe, would give all the world for but one glimpſe of light: how many that deformedly crawl on
C all foure, after the manner of the moſt loathſome creatures: how many that in mad phrenſies are worſe then brutiſh, worſe then dead: thus thou mighteſt be, and art not. If I be not happy for the good that I have, I am yet happy for the evils that I might have had, and have eſcaped. I have deſerved the greateſt evil; every evill that I miſſe, is a new mercy.

Earth, which is the baſeſt element, is both our mother that brought us forth, our ſtage that bears us alive, and our grave wherein at laſt we are entombed; giving to us both our originall, our harbour, our Sepulcher: She hath yeelded her back to bear thouſands of generations; & at laſt opened her mouth to receive them; ſo ſwallowing them up, that ſhe ſtill both beareth more, and looks for more; not bewraying any change in D her ſelfe, while ſhe ſo oft hath changed her brood, and her burden. It is a wonder we can be proud of our parentage, or of our ſelves, while we ſee both the baſeneſſe & ſtability of the earth, whence we came. What difference is there? Living earth treads upō the dead earth, which afterwards deſcends into the grave, as ſenſeleſſe & dead, as the earth that receives it. Not many are proud of their ſoules; and none but fooles can be proud of their bodies. While we walk & look upon the earth, we cannot but acknowledge ſenſible admonitions of humility; and while we remember them, we cannot forget our ſelves. It is a mother-like favour of the earth, that ſhe beares and nouriſhes me, and at the laſt entertaines my dead carkaſſe: but it is a greater pleaſure, that ſhe teacheth me my vileneſſe by her own, and ſends me to heaven, for what ſhe wants.

E The wicked man carrieth every day a brand to his hell, till his heap be come to the height: then he ceaſeth ſinning, & begins his torment; whereas the repentant in every fit of holy ſorrow, carries away a whole fagot from the flame, and quencheth the coals that remain, with his teares. There is no torment for the penitent; no redemption for the obſtinate. Safety conſiſteth not in not ſinning, but in repenting: neither is it ſin that condemnes, but impenitence. O Lord, I cannot be righteous, let me be repentant.

The eſtate of heavenly and earthly things is plainly repreſented to us, by the two lights of Heaven, which are appointed to rule the night & the day. Earthly things are rightly reſembled by the Moon, which being neereſt to the region of mortality, is ever in changes, and never looks upon us twice with the ſame face; and when it is at the full, is blemiſhed with ſome dark blots, not capable of any illumination. Heavenly things things are figured by the Sunne, whoſe great and glorious light is both naturall to it ſelfe, and ever conſtant. That other fickle and dimme ſtarre is fit enough for the night of miſery, wherein we live here below. And this firm and beautifull light is but good enough for that Day of glory, which the Saints live in. If it be good living here where our ſorrowes are changed with joyes; what is it to live above, where our joyes change not? I cannot look upon the body of the Sunne: and yet I cannot ſee at all without the light of it: I cannot behold the glory of thy Saints, O Lord; yet without the knowledge of it, I am blinde. If thy creature be ſo glorious to us here below; how glorious ſhall thy ſelf be to us when we are above the Sun? This Sun ſhall not ſhine upward, where thy glory ſhineth: the greater light extinguiſheth the leſſer. O thou Sunne of righteouſneſſe (which ſhalt only ſhine to me when I am glorified) doe thou heat, enlighten, comfort me with the beames of thy preſence, till I be glorified.

Amen.

HEAVEN

HEAVEN VPON EARTH:

OR OF TRVE PEACE AND Tranquillity of Minde.

By Jos. Hall.

Printed at London, 1643.

TO THE RIGHT HONOVRABLE, HENRY

Earle of Huntingdon, Lord Haſtings, Hungerford, Botreaux, Molines and Moiles, his Majeſties Lieutenant in the Counties of Leiceſter and Rutland, my ſingular good Lord:

All increaſe of true Honour, and Heaven begun upon Earth.

RIGHT HONOVRABLE,

I Have undertaken a great task, to teach men how to be happy in this life: I have undertaken and performed it: wherein I have followed Seneca, and gone beyond him; followed him as a Philoſopher, gone beyond him as a Chriſtian, as a Divine. Finding it a true cenſure of the beſt Moraliſts, that they were like to goodly Ships, graced with great titles, the Save-guard, the Triumph, the Good-ſpeed, and ſuch like, when yet they have been both extreamly Sea-beaten, and at laſt wracked. The volume is little, perhaps the uſe more; I have ever thought according to the Greek Proverb, μέγα βίβλιον μέγα κακόν. VVhat it is, even juſtice challengeth it to him, to whom the Author hath devoted himſelfe: The children of the Bondman are the goods of the Parents Maſter. I humbly betake it to your Honours protection, and your Honour to the protection of the Higheſt.

Your Honours moſt humbly devoted in all duty and ſervice,

JOS. HALL.

THE ANALYSIS OR RESOLVTION of this Treatise concerning Tranquillity.

HEAVEN VPON EARTH:

OR,

Of true Peace of Mind.

SECT. I.

WHen I had ſtudiouſly read over the morall writings of ſome wiſe heathen, eſpecially thoſe of the Stoicall profeſſion, I muſt confeſſe, I found a little envy and pity ſtriving together within me. I envied nature in them, to ſee her ſo witty in deviſing ſuch plauſible refuges for doubting and troubled minds: I pitied them, to ſee that their carefull diſquiſition of true reſt, led them in the end but to meere unquietneſſe. Wherein me thought, they were as Hounds ſwift of foot, but not exquiſite in ſent, which in an haſty purſuit take a wrong way, ſpending their mouthes, and courſes in vaine. Their praiſe of profeſſing wittily they ſhall not leeſe, their hopes both they loſt, and whoſoever followes them. If Seneca could have had grace to his wit, what wonders would he have done in this kinde? what Divine might not have yeelded him the chair for precepts of Tranquillity without any diſparagement? As he was, this he hath gained: Never any Heathen wrote more divinely: never any Philoſopher more probably. Neither would I ever deſire better Maſter, if to this purpoſe I needed no other Miſtris then Nature. But this in truth is a task, which Nature hath never without preſumption undertaken, and never performed without much imperfection. Like to thoſe vaine and wandring Empirickes, which in tables and pictures make great oſtentation of Cures, never approving their skill to their credulous Patients. And if ſhe could have truly effected it alone, I know not what employment in this life ſhe ſhould have left for grace to buſie her ſelfe about, nor what privilege it ſhould have been here below to be a Chriſtian, ſince this that we ſeek is the nobleſt work of the ſoul, & in which alone conſiſts the only heaven of this world; this is the ſum of all humane deſires: which when we have attained, then only we begin to live, and are ſure we cannot thence-forth live miſerably. No marvell then if all the Heathen have diligently ſought after it, many wrote of it, none attained it. Not Athens muſt teach this leſſon, but Ieruſalem.

SECT. II.

YEt ſomething grace ſcorneth not to learn of Nature, as Moſes may take good counſell of a Midianite. Nature hath ever had more skill in the end, then in the way to it; and whether ſhe have diſcourſed of the good eſtate of the minde, which we call Tranquillity, or the beſt, which is happineſſe, hath more happily gheſſed at the generall definition of them, then of the means to compaſſe them. She teacheth us therefore without controlement, that the Tranquillity of the mind is, as of the Sea and weather, when no wind ſtirreth, when the waves doe not tumultuouſly riſe and fall upon each other, but when the face both of the Heaven and waters is ſtill, faire, and equable. That it is ſuch an even diſpoſition of the heart, wherein the ſcoales of the mind neither riſe up towards the beam, through their own lightneſſe, or the over-weening opinion of proſperity, nor are too much depreſſed with any load of ſorrow; but hanging equall and unmoved betwixt both, give a man liberty in all occurrences to enjoy himſelfe. Not that the moſt temperate mind can be ſo the maſter of his paſſions, as not ſometimes to over-joy his griefe, or over-grieve his joy, according to the contrary occaſions of both: for not the eveneſt weights, but at their firſt putting into the balance, ſomewhat ſway both parts thereof, not without ſome ſhew of inequality, which yet after ſome little motion, ſettle themſelves in a meet poiſe. It is enough that after ſome ſudden agitation, it can return to it ſelfe, and reſt it ſelfe at laſt in a reſolved peace. And this due compoſednesſe of mind we require unto our Tranquillity, not for ſome ſhort fits of good mood, which ſoon after end in diſcontentment, but with the condition of perpetuity. For there is no heart makes ſo rough weather, as not ſometimes to admit of a calme, and whether for that he knoweth no preſent cauſe of his trouble, or for that he knoweth, that cauſe of trouble is countervailed with as great an occaſion of private joy, or for that the multitude of evils hath bred careleſneſſe, the man that is moſt diſordered, finds ſome reſpits of quietneſſe. The balances that are moſt ill matched in their unſteddy motions, come to an equality, but not ſtay at it. The frantick man cannot avoid the imputation of madneſſe, though he be ſober for many Moones, if he rage in one. So then the calme mind muſt be ſetled in an habituall reſt, not then firme when there is nothing to ſhake it, but then leaſt ſhaken when it is moſt aſſailed.

What Tranquillity is, and wherein it conſiſts.

Sect. III.

Inſufficiency of humane precepts.

WHence eaſily appeares how vainly it hath been ſought either in ſuch a conſtant eſtate of outward things, as ſhould give no diſtaſte to the minde whiles all earthly things vary with the weather, and have no ſtay but in uncertainty, or in the naturall temper of the ſoule, ſo ordered by humane wiſdome, as that it ſhould not be affected with any caſuall events to either part; ſince that cannot ever by naturall power be held like to it ſelfe; but one while is cheerefull, ſtirring and ready to undertake; another while drowſie, dull, comfortleſſe, prone to reſt, weary of it ſelfe, loathing his own purpoſes, his owne reſolutions. In both which ſince the wiſeſt Philoſophers have grounded all the rules of their Tranquillity, it is plaine that they ſaw it afar off, as they did heaven it ſelfe with a deſire and admiration, but knew not the way to it: whereupon alas, how ſlight and impotent are the remedies they preſcribe for unquietneſſe! For what is it that for the inconſtancy and lazineſſe of the minde ſtill diſpleaſing it ſelfe in what it doth, and for that diſtemper thereof which ariſeth from the fearfull, unthriving, and reſtleſſe deſires of it, we ſhould ever be imploying our ſelves in ſome publike affaires, chuſing our buſineſſe according to our inclination, and proſecuting what we have choſen? wherewith being at laſt cloyed, we ſhould retire our ſelves, and wear the reſt of our time in private ſtudies; that we ſhould make due comparative trialls of our own ability; nature of our buſineſſes; diſpoſition of our choſen friends? that in reſpect of Patrimony we ſhould be but careleſſely affected, ſo drawing it in as it may be leaſt for ſhew, moſt for uſe; removing all pompe, bridling our hopes, cutting off ſuperfluities; for croſſes, to conſider that cuſtome will abate and mitigate them, that the beſt things are but chaines and burdens to thoſe that have them, to thoſe that uſe them, that the worſt things have ſome mixture of comfort to thoſe that grone under them. Or leaving theſe lower rudiments that are given to weak and ſimple novices, to examine thoſe golden rules of Morality, which are commended to the moſt wiſe and able practitioners, what it is to account himſelfe as a Tenant at will? To fore-imagine the worſt

A in all casuall matters? To avoid all idle and impertinent businesses, all pragmaticall medling with affaires of state? not to fix our selves upon any one estate, as to be impatient of a change, to call back the mind from outward things, and draw it home into it selfe? to laugh at and esteeme lightly of others mis-demeanours? Not to depend upon others opinions, but to stand on our owne bottomes? to carry our selves in an honest and simple truth, free from a curious hypocrisie, and affectation of seeming other then we are, and yet as free from a base kind of carelessnesse? to intermeddle retiredness with society, so as one may give sweetnesse to the other, and both to us? So slackning the mind that we may not loosen it; and so bending as we may not break it? to make most of our selves, chearing up our spirits with variety of recreations, with saciety of meales, and all other bodily indulgence, saving that
B drunkennesse (me thinks) can neither beseem a wise Philosopher to prescribe, nor a vertuous man to practise? All these in their kinds please well, profit much, and are as soveraigne for both these, as they are unable to effect that for which they are propounded. Nature teacheth thee all these should be done, she cannot teach thee to doe them: and yet doe all these and no more, let me never have rest, if thou have it. For neither are here the greatest enemies of our peace so much as descried afarre off, nor those that are noted are hereby so prevented, that upon most diligent practice we can promise our selves any security: wherewith who so instructed, dare confidently give challenge to all sinister events, is like to some skilfull Fencer who stands upon his usuall wards, and plaies well; but if there come a strange fetch of an unwonted blow, is put besides the rules of his Art, and with much shame over taken. And for C those that are knowne, beleeve me, the minde of man is too weake to beare out it selfe hereby against all onsets. There are light crosses that will take an easie repulse; others yet stronger, that shake the house side, but break not in upon us; others vehement, which by force make way to the heart, where they find none, breaking open the doore of the soule that denies entrance. Others violent, that lift the mind off the hinges, or rend the barres of it in peeces: others furious, that tear up the very foundations from the bottome, leaving no monument behinde them, but ruine. The wisest and most resolute Moralist that ever was, lookt pale when he should taste of his hemlock; and by his timorousnesse made sport to those that envied his speculations. The best of the Heathen Emperours (that was honoured with the title of piety) justly magnified that courage of Christians which made them insult over their D tormentors, and by their fearlesnesse of earth-quakes, and deaths, argued the truth of their Religion. It must be, it can be none but a divine power, that can uphold the mind against the rage of many afflictions, and yet the greatest crosses are not the greatest enemies to inward peace. Let us therefore look up above our selves, and from the rules of an higher Art, supply the defects of naturall wisdome, giving such infallible directions for tranquillity, that whosoever shall follow cannot but live sweetly and with continuall delight, applauding himself at home, when all the world besides him shall be miserable. To which purpose it shall be requisite, first to remove all causes of unquietnesse, and then to set down the grounds of our happy rest.

Allowed yet by Seneca in his last chapter of Tranquillity. Senecaes rules rejected as insufficient.

Sect. IV.

E

I Find on the hand two universall enemies of Tranquillity; Conscience of evill done, Sense or feare of evill suffered. The former in one word, we call sins, the latter, crosses. The first of these must be quite taken away, the second duly tempered, ere the heart can be at rest. For first, how can that man be at peace, that is at variance with God and himselfe? How should peace be Gods gift, if it could be without him, if it could be against him? It is the profession of sinne, although faire spoken at the first closing, to be a perpetuall make-bate betwixt God and man, betwixt a man and himselfe. And this enmity, though it doe not continually shew it selfe, (as the mortallest enemies are not alwayes in pitched fields one against the other) for that the conscience is not ever clamorous, but some-while is silent, other-whiles with still murmurings bewrayes his mislikes, yet doth evermore work secret unquietnesse Enemies of inward peace divided into their rankes.

The torment of an evil conscience.

unquietneſſe to the heart. The guilty man may have a ſeeming truce, a true peace he cannot have. Look upon the face of the guilty heart, and thou ſhalt ſee it pale and ghaſtly; the ſmiles and laughters faint and heartleſſe; the ſpeeches doubtfull, and full of abrupt ſtops and unſeaſonable turnings; the purpoſes and motions unſteady, and ſavouring of much diſtraction, arguing plainly that ſin is not ſo ſmooth at her firſt motions, as turbulent afterwards: hence are thoſe vaine wearyings of places and companies together with our ſelves; that the galled ſoule doth after the wont of ſick Patients ſeek refreſhing in variety; and after many toſſed and turned ſides, complaines of remedileſſe and unabated torment. Nero after ſo much innocent bloud, may change his bed-chamber, but his Fiends ever attend him, ever are within him, and are as parts of himſelfe. Alas, what availes it to ſeeke outward reliefes, when thou haſt thine executioner within thee? If thou couldeſt ſhift from thy ſelfe, thou mighteſt have ſome hope of eaſe; now thou ſhalt never want furies ſo long as thou haſt thy ſelfe. Yea, what if thou wouldeſt run from thy ſelfe? Thy ſoule may flye from thy body; thy conſcience will not flye from thy ſoule, nor thy ſinne from thy conſcience. Some men indeed in the bitterneſſe of theie pangs of ſinne, like unto thoſe fondly impatient fiſhes, that leap out of the pan into the flame, have leapt out of this private hell that is in themſelves, into the common pit, chuſing to adventure upon the future paines that they have feared, rather then to endure the preſent horrors they have felt: wherein what have they gained, but to that hell which was within them, a ſecond hell without? The conſcience leaves not where the Fiends begin, but both joyne together in torture. But there are ſome firme and obdurate fore-heads, whoſe reſolution can laugh their ſins out of countenance. There are ſo large and able gorges, as that they can ſwallow and digeſt bloudy murders, without complaint, who, with the ſame hands which they have ſince their laſt meale imbrued in bloud, can freely carve to themſelves large morſels at the next ſitting.

The joy and peace of the guilty but diſſembled.

Beleeveſt thou that ſuch a mans heart laughes with his face? will not he dare to be an Hypocrite, that durſt be a villaine? Theſe glow-wormes, when a night of ſorrow compaſſes them, make a lightſome and fiery ſhew of joy, when if thou preſſe them, thou findeſt nothing but a cold and crude moyſture. Knoweſt thou not that there are thoſe which count it no ſhame to ſinne, yet count it a ſhame to be checked with remorſe, eſpecially ſo as others eyes may deſcry? To whom repentance ſeems baſe-mindedneſſe, unworthy of him that profeſſes wiſdome and valour. Such a man can grieve when none ſees it, but himſelf can laugh when others ſee it, himſelfe feeles not. Aſſure thy ſelfe that mans heart bleedeth, when his face counterfeits a ſmile; he weares out many waking houres, when thou thinkeſt he reſteth: yea, as his thoughts afford him not ſleep, ſo his very ſleep affords him not reſt, but while his ſenſes are tyed up, his ſin is looſe; repreſenting it ſelfe to him in the ugliеſt ſhape, and frighting him with horrible and helliſh dreames. And if perhaps cuſtome hath bred a carleſneſſe in him, (as we ſee that uſuall whipping makes the childe not care for the rod) yet an unwonted extremity of the blow ſhall fetch bloud of the ſoule, and make the back that is moſt hardned, ſenſible of ſmart: and the further the blow is fetcht through intermiſſion of remorſe, the harder it muſt needs alight: Therefore I may confidently tell the careleſſe ſinner, as that bold Tragedian ſaid to his great Pompey: The time ſhall come wherein thou ſhalt fetch deep ſighes, and therefore ſhalt ſorrow deſperately, becauſe thou ſorrowedſt not ſooner. The fire of the conſcience may lie for a time ſmoothered with a pyle of green wood, that it cannot be diſcerned, whoſe moiſture when once it hath maſtered, it ſends up ſo much greater flame, by how much it had greater reſiſtance. Hope not then to ſtop the mouth of thy conſcience from exclaiming, whiles thy ſinne continues; that endevour is both vaine and hurtfull; So I have ſeen them that have ſtopt the noſthrill for bleeding, in hope to ſtay the iſſue, when the bloud hindred in his former courſe, hath broken out of the mouth, or found way down into the ſtomacke. The conſcience is not pacifiable, while ſinne is within to vex it: no more then an angry ſwelling can ceaſe throbbing and aching, whiles the thorne or the corrupted matter lies rotting underneath. Time, that remedies all other evills of the minde, increaſeth this, which

A which like to bodily diſeaſes prove worſe with continuance, and growes upon us with our age.

Sect. V.

The remedy of an unquiet Conſcience.

THere can be therefore no peace without reconciliation, thou canſt not be friends with thy ſelfe, till with God: for thy conſcience (which is thy beſt friend while thou ſinneſt not) like an honeſt ſervant takes his Maſters part againſt thee when thou haſt ſinned; and will not look ſtraight upon thee, till thou upon God; not daring to be ſo kind to thee, as to be unfaithfull to his Maker: There can be no reconciliation without remiſſion. God can neither forget the injury of ſin, B nor diſſemble hatred. It is for men and thoſe of hollow hearts, to make pretences contrary to their affections: ſoothings, and ſmiles, and embracemens, where we mean not love, are from weakneſſe: Either for that we feare our inſufficiency of preſent revenge, or hope for a fitter opportunity afterwards, or for that we deſire to make our further advantage of him to whom we mean evill. Theſe courſes are not incident into an Almighty power; who having the command of al vengeance, can ſmite where he liſt without all doubtings or delayes. There can be no remiſſion without ſatisfaction; neither dealeth God with us as we men with ſome deſperate debters, whom after long dilations of payments, and many dayes broken, we altogether let goe for diſability, or at leaſt diſmiſſe them upon an eaſie compoſition. All ſins are debts; all Gods debts muſt be diſcharged. It is a bold word, but a true; God ſhould not be juſt, if any C of his debts ſhould paſſe unſatisfied. The conceit of the profane vulgar, makes him a God of all mercies; and thereupon hopes for pardon without payment. Fond and ignorant preſumption, to disjoyne mercy and juſtice in him to whom they are both eſſentiall; to make mercy exceed juſtice in him, in whom both are infinite. Dareſt thou hope God can be ſo kind to thee, as to be unjuſt to himſelfe? God will be juſt: go thou on to preſume and periſh. There can be no ſatisfaction by any recompence of ours: an infinite juſtice is offended, an infinite puniſhment is deſerved by every ſin, and every mans ſinnes are as near to infinite, as number can make them. Our beſt endeavour is worſe then finite, imperfect, and faulty. If it could be perfect, we owe it all in preſent; what we are bound to doe in preſent, cannot make amends for what we have not done in time paſt: which while we offer to God as good payment, we D doe with the profane traveller think to pleaſe him with empty Date-ſhells in lieu of preſervation. Where ſhall we then find a payment of infinite value, but in him which is only and all infinite? The dignity of whoſe perſon being infinite, gave ſuch worth to his ſatisfaction, that what he ſuffered in ſhort time, was proportionable to what we ſhould have ſuffered beyond all times. He did all, ſuffered all, payed all, he did it for us, we in him. Where ſhall I begin to wonder at thee, O thou divine and eternall Peace-maker, the Saviour of men, the Anointed of God, Mediator between God and man, in whom there is nothing which doth not exceed not only the conceit, but the very wonder of Angels, who ſaw thee in thy humiliation with ſilence, and adore thee in thy glory with perpetuall praiſes and rejoycings? Thou waſt for ever of thy ſelfe as God, of the Father, as the Sonne; the eternall Sonne of an eter- E nall Father; not later in being, not leſſe in dignity, not other in Subſtance. Begotten without diminution of him that begot thee, while he communicated that wholly to thee, which he retained wholly in himſelfe, becauſe both were infinite without inequality of nature, without diviſion of eſſence; when being in this eſtate, thine infinite love and mercy to deſperate mankind, cauſed thee, O Saviour, to empty thy ſelfe of thy glory, that thou mighteſt put on our ſhame and miſery. Wherefore not ceaſing to be God as thou wert, thou beganſt to be what thou wert not, Man; to the end that thou mighteſt be a perfect Mediator betwixt God and man, which wert both in one perſon; God, that thou mighteſt ſatisfie; man, that thou mighteſt ſuffer: that ſince man had ſinned, and God was offended, thou which wert God and Man, mighteſt ſatisfie God for man. None but thy ſelfe, which art the eternall Word, can expreſſe the depth of this myſtery, that God ſhould be clothed with fleſh, come down down to men, and become man, that man might be exalted into the higheſt heavens; and that our nature might be taken into the fellowſhip of the Deity. That he to whom all powers in heaven bowed, and thought it their honour to be ſerviceable, ſhould come downe to be a ſervant to his ſlaves, a ranſome for his enemies; together with our nature taking up our very infirmities, our ſhame, our torments, and bearing our ſinnes without ſinne. That thou whom the heavens were too ſtrait to containe, ſhouldſt lay thy ſelfe in an obſcure cratch: thou which wert attended of Angels, ſhouldſt be derided of men, rejected of thine own, perſecuted by Tyrants, tempted with Devils, betrayed of thy ſervant, crucified among theeves, and (which was worſe then all theſe) in thine own apprehenſion, for the time, as forſaken of thy Father; That thou whom our ſins had pierced, ſhouldſt for our ſinnes both ſweat drops of bloud in the garden, and powre out ſtreames of bloud upon the Croſſe. O the invaluable purchaſe of our peace! O ranſome enough for moe worlds! Thou which wert in the counſell of thy Father, the Lambe ſlaine from the beginning of time, cam'ſt now in fulneſſe of time to be ſlaine by man, for man; being at once the Sacrifice offered, the Prieſt that did offer, and the God to whom it was offered. How graciouſly didſt thou both proclaime our peace, as a Prophet in the time of thy life upon earth, and purchaſe it by thy bloud as a Prieſt at thy death, and now confirmeſt and applieſt it as a King in heaven! By thee only it was procured, by thee it is proffered. O mercy without example, without meaſure! God offers peace to man, the holy ſeeks to the unjuſt, the Potter to the clay, the King to the traitor. We are unworthy that we ſhould be received to peace though we deſired it; what are we then that we ſhould have peace offered for the receiving? An eaſie condition of ſo great a benefit; he requires us not to earn it, but to accept it of him: what could he give more? what could he require leſſe of us?

Sect. VI.

The receit of our peace offered by Faith.

THe purchaſe therefore of our peace was paid at once, yet muſt be ſeverally reckoned to every ſoule whom it ſhall benefit. If we have not an hand to take what Chriſts hand doth either hold, or offer, what is ſufficient in him, cannot be effectuall to us. The ſpirituall hand, whereby we apprehend the ſweet offers of our Saviour, is faith, which in ſhort is no other then an affiance in the Mediator: receive peace and be happy, beleeve and thou haſt received. From hence it is that we are intereſſed in all that either God hath promiſed, or Chriſt hath performed. Hence have we from God both forgiveneſſe and love, the ground of all either peace or glory. Hence of enemies we become more then friends, ſonnes: and as ſonnes, may both expect and challenge not only carefull proviſion and ſafe protection on earth, but an everlaſting patrimony above. This field is ſo ſpacious, that it were eaſie for a man to loſe himſelfe in it: and if I ſhould ſpend all my pilgrimage, in this walke, my time would ſooner end then my way; wherein I would have meaſured more paſes, were it not that our ſcope is not ſo much to magnifie the benefit of our peace, as to ſeek how to obtain it.

A corollary of the benefit of this receit.

Behold now, after we have ſought heaven and earth; where onely the wearied Dove may finde an Olive of peace. The apprehending of this all ſufficient ſatisfaction, makes it ours: upon our ſatisfaction we have remiſſion; upon remiſſion, followes reconciliation; upon our reconciliation, peace. When therefore thy conſcience like a ſterne Sergeant ſhall catch thee by the throat, and arreſt thee upon Gods debt, let thy only plea be that thou haſt already paid it: Bring forth that bloudy acquittance ſealed to thee from heaven upon thy true faith, ſtraitway thou ſhalt ſee the fierce and terrible look of thy conſcience changed into friendly ſmiles, & that rough and violent hand that was ready to drag thee to priſon, ſhall now lovingly embrace thee, and fight for thee againſt all the wrongfull attempts of any ſpirituall adverſary. O heavenly Peace, and more then Peace, Friendſhip, whereby alone we are leagued with our ſelves; and God with us, which who-ever wants, ſhall finde a ſad Remembrancer in the midſt of his diſſembled jollity, and after all vaine ſtrifes, ſhall fall into many many ſecret dumps, from which his guilty heart ſhall deny to be cheared, though all the world were his minſtrell! Oh pleaſure worthy to be pitied, and laughter worthy of teares, that is without this! Goe then, fooliſh man, and when thou feeleſt any check of thy ſinne, ſeek after thy jocundeſt companious, deceive the time and thy ſelfe with merry purpoſes, with buſie games, feaſt away thy cares, bury them and thy ſelf in wine and ſleep: after all theſe frivolous deferrings, it will return upon thee when thou wakeſt, perhaps ere thou wakeſt, nor will be repelled till it have ſhewed thee thy hell, nor when it hath ſhewed thee, will yet be repelled. So the ſtricken Deer having received a deadly arrow, whoſe ſhaft ſhaken out hath left the head behind it, runnes from one thicket to another, not able to change his pain with his places, but finding his wounds ſtill the worſe with continuance. Ah foole, thy ſoule feſtereth within, and is affected ſo much more dangerouſly, by how much leſſe it appeareth. Thou maieſt while thy ſelfe with variety, thou canſt not eaſe thee. Sin owes thee a ſpight, and wil pay it thee, perhaps when thou art in worſe caſe to ſuſtain it. This flitting doth but provide for a further violence at laſt. I have ſeene a little ſtream of no noiſe, which upon his ſtoppage hath ſwelled up, and with a loud guſhing hath borne over the heap of turves wherewith it was reſiſted. Thy death-bed ſhall ſmart for theſe wilfull adjournings of repentance; whereon how many have we heard raving of their old neglected ſins, and fearfully deſpairing when they have had moſt need of comfort? In ſumme, there is no way but this: Thy conſcience muſt have either ſatisfaction or torment. Diſcharge thy ſinne betimes, and be at peace. He never breaks his ſleep for debt that paies when he takes up.

The vain ſhifts of the guilty.

Sect. VII.

NEither can it ſuffice for peace, to have croſſed the old ſcrole of our ſins, if we prevent not the future; yea the preſent very importunity of tentation breeds unquietneſſe. Sinne where it hath got an haunt, looketh for more, as humours that fall towards their old iſſue: and if it be not ſtrongly repelled, doth neer as much vex us with ſolliciting as with yeelding. Let others envy their happineſſe, I ſhall never think their life ſo much as quiet, whoſe doores are continually beaten, and their morning ſleep broken with early clients, whoſe entries are daily thronged with ſuters preſſing neer for the next audience; much leſſe that through their remiſſe anſwers are daily haunted with traitors or other inſtruments of villany, offering their miſchievous ſervice, and inciting them to ſome peſtilent enterpriſe. Such are tentations to the ſoule. Whereof it cannot be rid, ſo long as it holds them in any hope of entertainment: and ſo long they will hope to prevaile, while we give them but a cold and timorous deniall. Suters are drawn on with an eaſie repulſe; counting that as half granted, which is but faintly gainſaid. Peremptory anſwers can only put ſin out of heart for any ſecond attempts. It is ever impudent when it meets not with a bold heart, hoping to prevaile by wearying us, and wearying us by intreaties. Let all ſuggeſtions therefore find thee reſolute: ſo ſhall thy ſoule find it ſelf at reſt; for as the Devill, ſo ſinne his naturall brood, flies away with reſiſtance. To which purpoſe, all our heady and diſordered affections, which are the ſecret factors of ſin & Satan, muſt be reſtrained by a ſtrong and yet temperate command of Reaſon & Religion: theſe, if they find the reynes looſe in their necks (like to the wild horſes of that chaſte hunter in the Tragedy) carry us over hils and rocks, and never leave us till we be diſmembred, and they breathleſſe: but contrarily, if they be pulled in with the ſudden violence of a ſtrait hand, they fall to plunging and careering, and never leave till their ſaddle be empty, and even then dangerouſly ſtrike at their proſtrate Rider. If there be any exerciſe of Chriſtian wiſdome, it is in the managing of theſe unruly affections, which are not more neceſſary in their beſt uſe, then pernicious in their miſgovernance. Reaſon hath alwayes been buſie in undertaking this ſo neceſſary a moderation: wherein although ſhe have prevailed with ſome of colder temper, yet thoſe which have been of more ſtubborn metall, like unto grown ſchollers, which ſcorn the ferule that ruled their minority, have ſtill deſpiſed her weak endevours.

Solliciation of ſinne remedied.

The ordering of affections.

Only

Only Chriſtianity hath this power; which with our ſecond birth gives us a new nature: ſo that now, if exceſſe of paſſions be naturall to us as men, the order of them is naturall to us as Chriſtians. Reaſon bids the angry man ſay over his Alphabet ere he give his anſwer; hoping by this intermiſſion of time, to gain the mitigation of his rage. He was never throughly angry, that can endure the recitall of ſo many idle letters. Chriſtianity gives not rules, but power to avoid this ſhort madneſſe. It was a wiſe ſpeech that is reported of our beſt and laſt Cardinall (I hope) that this Iſland either did or ſhall ſee; who when a skilfull Aſtrologer, upon the calculation of his nativity, had foretold him ſome ſpecialties, concerning his future eſtate, anſwered, Such perhaps I was born, but ſince that time, I have been born again, and my ſecond nativity hath croſſed my firſt. The power of nature is a good plea for thoſe that acknowledge nothing above nature. But for a Chriſtian to excuſe his intemperateneſſe, by his naturall inclination, and to ſay, I am born cholerick, ſullen, amorous, is an Apology worſe then the fault. Wherefore ſerves Religion, but to ſubdue or govern nature? We are ſo much Chriſtians, as we can rule our ſelves, the reſt is but forme and ſpeculation. Yea, the very thought of our profeſſion is ſo powerfull, that (like unto that precious ſtone) being caſt into this Sea, it aſſwageth thoſe inward tempeſts that were raiſed by the affections. The unregenerate mind is not capable of this power; and therefore through the continuall mutinies of his paſſions, cannot but be ſubject to perpetuall unquietneſſe. There is neither remedy nor hope in this eſtate. But the Chriſtian ſoule, that hath inured it ſelf to the awe of God, and the exerciſes of true mortification, by the only looking up at his holy profeſſion, cureth the burning venome of theſe fiery ſerpents that lurk within him. Haſt thou nothing but nature? Reſolve to look for no peace. God is not prodigall to caſt away his beſt bleſſings on ſo unworthy ſubjects. Art thou a Chriſtian? Doe but remember thou art ſo; and then if thou dar'ſt, if thou canſt, yeeld to the exceſſe of paſſions.

Sect. VIII.

The ſecond main enemy to Peace, Croſſes.

HItherto the moſt inward and dangerous enemy of our peace: which if we have once maſtered, the other field ſhalbe fought and won with leſſe bloud. Croſſes diſquiet us either in their preſent feeling, or their expectation: both of them, when they meet with weak minds, ſo extremely diſtempering them, that the patient for the time is not himſelf. How many have we known, which through a lingring diſeaſe, weary of their pain, weary of their lives, have made their own hands their executioners? How many meeting with a head-ſtrong grief, which they could not manage, have by the violence of it been carried quite from their wits? How many millions, what for incurable maladies, what for loſſes, what for defamations, what for ſad accidents to their children, rub out their lives in perpetuall diſcontentment, therefore living, becauſe they cannot yet die, not for that they like to live? If there could be any humane receipt preſcribed to avoid evils, it would be purchaſed at an high rate: but both it is impoſſible that earth ſhould redreſſe that which is ſent from Heaven; and if it could be done, even the want of miſeries would prove miſerable: for the mind cloyed with continuall felicity, would grow a burden to it ſelf, loathing that at laſt, which intermiſſion would have made pleaſant. Give a free-horſe the full reynes, and he will ſoon tire. Summer is the ſweeteſt ſeaſon by all conſents, wherein the earth is both moſt rich with increaſe, and moſt gorgeous for ornament; yet if it were not received with interchanges of cold froſts and piercing winds, who could live? Summer would be no Summer, if Winter did not both lead it in, and follow it: we may not therefore either hope or ſtrive to eſcape all croſſes; ſome we may: what thou canſt, flie from; what thou canſt not, allay and mitigate; in croſſes univerſally let this be thy rule, Make thy ſelf none, eſcape ſome, bear the reſt, ſweeten all.

Sect.

Sect. IX.

Apprehenſion gives life to croſſes: and if ſome be ſimply, moſt are as they are taken. I have ſeene many, which when God hath meant them no hurt, have framed themſelves croſſes out of imagination, and have found that inſupportable for weight, which in truth never was, neither had ever any but a fancied being. Others againe laughing out heavy afflictions, for which they were bemoaned of the beholders. One receives a deadly wound, and lookes not ſo much as pale at the ſmart; another heares of many loſſes, and like Zeno, after news of his ſhipwracke, (as altogether paſſion-leſſe) goes to his reſt, not breaking an houres ſleepe for that, which would breake the heart of ſome others. Greenham that Saint of ours (whom it cannot diſparage that he was reſerved for our ſo looſe an age) can lie ſpread quietly upon the forme looking for the Chirurgians knife, binding himſelf as faſt with a reſolved patience, as others with ſtrongeſt cords, abiding his fleſh carved, and his bowels riſled, and not ſtirring more then if he felt not, while others tremble to expect, and ſhrinke to feele but the pricking of a veine. There can be no remedy for imaginary croſſes but wiſdome, which ſhall teach us to eſteeme of all events as they are; like a true glaſſe repreſenting all things to our minds in their due proportion. So as croſſes may not ſeeme that are not, nor little and gentle ones ſeeme great and intollerable. Give thy body Ellebore, thy mind good counſell, thine eare to thy friend, and theſe fantaſticall evills ſhall vaniſh away like themſelves.

Of Croſſes that ariſe from conceit.

Sect. X.

It were idle advice to bid men avoid evils. Nature hath by a ſecret inſtinct taught brute creatures ſo much, whether wit or ſagacity: and our ſelfe-love making the beſt advantage of reaſon, will eaſily make us ſo wiſe and carefull. It is more worth our labour, ſince our life is ſo open to calamities, and nature to impatience, to teach men to beare what evils they cannot avoid, and how by a wel-diſpoſednеſſe of mind wee may correct the iniquity of all hard events; Wherein it is hardly credible, how much good Art and precepts of reſolution may availe us. I have ſeene one man, by the helpe of a little engine, lift up that weight alone, which forty helping hands by their cleare ſtrength might have indevoured in vaine. Wee live here in an Ocean of troubles, wherein we can ſee no firme land; one wave falling upon another, ere the former have wrought all his ſpight. Miſchiefes ſtrive for places, as if they feared to loſe their roome if they haſted not. So many good things as we have, ſo many evils ariſe from their privation; beſides no fewer reall and poſitive evils that afflict us. To preſcribe and apply receits to every particular croſſe, were to write a Salmeron-like commentary upon Petrarchs remedies; & I doubt whether ſo the worke would be perfect: a life would be too little to write it, and but enough to reade it.

Of true and reall croſſes.

Sect. XI.

The ſame medicines cannot help all diſeaſes of the body, of the ſoule they may. We ſee Fencers give their ſchollers the ſame common rules of poſition, of warding and weilding their weapon for offence, for defence, againſt all commers: ſuch univerſall precepts there are for croſſes. In the firſt wherof, I would preſcribe Expectation, that either killeth or abateth evils. For croſſes, after the nature of the Cockatrice, dye, if they be foreſeene; whether this providence makes us more ſtrong to reſiſt, or by ſome ſecret power makes them more unable to aſſault us. It is not credible what a fore-reſolved mind can doe, can ſuffer. Could our Engliſh Milo, of whom Spaine yet ſpeaketh ſince their laſt peace, have overthrowne that furious Beaſt, made now more violent through the rage of his baiting, if he had not ſetled himſelfe in his ſtation, & expected? The frighted multitude ran away from that overearneſt ſport, which begun in pleaſure, ended in terror. If he had turned his backe with the reſt, where had bin his ſafety, where his glory & reward? Now he ſtood ſtill, expected, overcame, by one fact he at once preſerved, honoured, enriched himſelfe. Evills will come never the ſooner for that thou lookeſt for them, they will come the easier: it is a labour well loſt, if they come not; and well beſtowed, if they doe come. We are ſure the worſt may come, why ſhould we be ſecure that it will not? Suddenneſſe finds weake minds ſecure, makes them miſerable, leaves them deſperate. The beſt way therefore is, to make things preſent, in conceit, before they come, that they may be halfe paſt in their violence when they doe come: even as with woodden waſters, we learne to play at the ſharp. As therefore good Souldiers exerciſe themſelves long at the pale, and there uſe thoſe activities, which afterwards they ſhall practiſe upon a true adverſary: ſo muſt we preſent to our ſelves imaginary croſſes, and manage them in our minde, before God ſends them in event. Now I eate, ſleepe, digeſt all ſoundly, without complaint; what if a languiſhing diſeaſe ſhould bereave me of my appetite and reſt? that I ſhould ſee dainties and loath them, ſurfetting of the very ſmell, of the thought of the beſt diſhes? that I ſhould count the lingring houres, and thinke Ezekias long day returned, wearying my ſelfe with changing ſides, and wiſhing any thing but what I am? How could I take this diſtemper? Now I have (if not what I would, yet) what I need; as not abounding with idle ſuperfluities, ſo not ſtraitned with penury of neceſſary things. What if poverty ſhould ruſh upon me as an armed man, ſpoiling me of all my little that I had, and ſend me to the fountaine for my beſt cellar? to the ground for my bed? for my bread to anothers cupbord? for my clothes to the Brokers ſhop, or my friends wardrobe? How could I brooke this want? I am now at home, walking in mine owne grounds, looking on my young plants the hope of poſterity, conſidering the nature, advantages or feares of my ſoile, enjoying the patrimony of my Fathers. What if for my Religion, or the malicious ſentence of ſome great one, I ſhould be exiled from my Country, wandring amongſt thoſe, whoſe habit, language, faſhion, my ignorance ſhall make me wonder at; where the ſolitude of places, and ſtrangenes of perſons, ſhall make my life uncomfortable? How could I abide the ſmell of forraine ſmoke? How ſhould I take the contempt and hard uſage that waits upon ſtrangers? Thy proſperity is idle, and ill ſpent, if it be not medled with ſuch fore-caſting, and wiſely ſuſpicious thoughts, if it be wholly beſtowed in enjoying, no whit in preventing. Like unto a fooliſh City, which notwithſtanding a dangerous ſituation, ſpends all her wealth in rich furnitures of chambers and ſtate-houſes; while they beſtow not one ſhovell full of earth on outward Bulwarks to their defence: this is but to make our enemies the happier, and our ſelves the more readily miſerable. If thou wilt not therefore be oppreſſed with evils Expect & exerciſe; Exerciſe thy ſelfe with conceit of evils: Expect the evils themſelves; yea exerciſe thy ſelfe in expectation: ſo while the mind pleaſeth it ſelfe in thinking, Yet I am not thus, it prepareth it ſelfe againſt it may be ſo. And if ſome that have bin good at the Foiles, have proved cowardly at the ſharp, yet on the contrary, who ever durſt point a ſingle combat in the field, that hath not bin ſomewhat trained in the Fence-ſchoole?

Sect. XII.

The next remedy of croſſes when they are come. From their Author.

NEither doth it a little blunt the edge of evils, to conſider that they come from a divine hand, whoſe almighty power is guided by a moſt wiſe providence, and tempered with a Fatherly love. Even the ſavage creatures will be ſmitten of their keeper, and repine not; if of a ſtranger, they teare him in peeces. He ſtrikes me that made me, that moderates the world; why ſtruggle I with him, why with my ſelfe? Am I a foole, or a Rebell? A foole, if I be ignorant whence my croſſes come: a Rebell, if I know it, and be impatient. My ſufferings are from a God, from my God; he hath deſtin'd me every dramme of ſorrow that I feele: thus much thou ſhalt abide, and here ſhall thy miſeries be ſtinted. All worldly helps cannot abate them, all powers of hell cannot adde one ſcruple to their weight, that he hath allotted me: I muſt therefore either blaſpheme God in my heart, detracting from his infinite juſtice, wiſdome, power, mercy, which all ſtand inviolable, when millions of ſuch wormes as I am, are gone to duſt; or elſe confeſſe that I ought to be patient. And if I profeſſe I ſhould be that I will not, I befoole my ſelfe, and bewray miſerable impotency. But (as impatience is full of excuſe) it was thine owne raſh improvidence, or the ſpight of thine enemy

A enemy that impoveriſht, that defamed thee: it was the malignity of ſome unwholſome diſh, or ſome groſſe corrupted aire, that hath diſtempered thee. Ah fooliſh curre, why doeſt thou bite at the ſtone, which could never have hurt thee, but from the hand that threw it? If I wound thee, what matters it whether with mine owne ſword, or thine, or anothers? God ſtrikes ſome immediatly from Heaven with his owne arme or with the arme of Angels, others he buffets with their owne hands; ſome by the revenging ſword of an enemy, others with the fiſt of his dumbe creatures: God ſtrikes in all; his hand moves theirs. If thou ſee it not, blame thy carnall eyes. Why doſt thou fault the inſtrument, while thou knoweſt the agent? Even the dying theefe pardons the executioner, exclaimes on his unjuſt Judge, or his malicious accuſers. Either then blame the firſt mover, or diſcharge the meanes: which as they could not have touched thee, but as from him; ſo from him they have afflicted thee juſtly, wrongfully
B perhaps as in themſelves.

Sect. XIII.

The third antidote of croſſes.

But neither ſeemeth it enough to be patient in croſſes, if we be not thankfull alſo. Good things challenge more then bare contentment. Croſſes (unjuſtly termed evils) as they are ſent of him that is all goodneſſe, ſo they are ſent for good, and his end cannot be fruſtrate. What greater good can be to the diſeaſed man, then fit and proper Phyſicke to recure him? Croſſes are the only medicines of ſick minds. Thy ſound body carries within it a ſicke ſoule; thou feeleſt it not perhaps: ſo much more art thou ſicke, and ſo much more dangerouſly. Perhaps thou laboureſt of ſome plethory of pride, or of ſome dropſie of coveteouſneſſe, or the ſtaggers of inconſtancy, or ſome fever of luxurie, or conſumption of envy, or perhaps of the Lethargie of idle-
C neſſe, or of the Phrenſie of anger: It is a rare ſoule that hath not ſome notable diſeaſe: only croſſes are thy remedies. What if they be unpleaſant? they are Phyſike: it is enough if they be wholeſome. Not pleaſant taſte, but the ſecret vertue commends medicines. If they cure thee, they ſhall pleaſe thee, even in diſpleaſing; or elſe thou loveſt thy palate above thy ſoule. What madneſſe is this? When thou complaineſt of a bodily diſeaſe, thou ſendeſt to the Phyſitian, that he may ſend thee not ſavory, but wholeſome potions: thou receiveſt them in ſpight of thine abhorring ſtomacke, and withall both thankeſt and rewardeſt the Phyſitian. Thy ſoule is ſick: thy heavenly Phyſitian ſees it, and pities thee ere thou thy ſelfe; and unſent to, ſends thee not a plauſible, but a ſoveraigne remedie: thou loatheſt the ſavor, and rather wilt hazard thy life, then offend thy palate; and in ſtead of thanks, repineſt at, revileſt the Phy-
D ſitian. How comes it that we love our ſelves ſo little (if at leaſt we count our ſoules the beſt or any part) as that we had rather undergoe death then paine, chuſing rather wilfull ſickneſſe, then an harſh remedie? ſurely we men are meere fooles in the eſtimation of our owne good: like children, our choyce is led altogether by ſhew, no whit by ſubſtance. We cry after every wel-ſeeming toy, and put from us ſolid proffers of good things. The wiſe Arbitrator of all things ſees our folly, and corrects it, with-holding our idle deſires, and forcing upon us the ſound good we refuſe. It is ſecond folly in us, if we thanke him not. The fooliſh babe cries for his fathers bright knife, or gilded pilles. The wiſer father knows that they can but hurt him; and therefore withholds them after all his teares. The child thinks he is uſed but unkindly. Every wiſe man, and himſelfe at more yeares, can ſay, it was but childiſh folly, in deſiring it, in complaining that he miſſed it. The loſſe of wealth, friends, health, is ſometimes gaine to us. Thy body, thy eſtate, is worſe; thy ſoule is better, why complaineſt thou?

Sect. XIV.

The 4. and laſt part, from their iſſue.

Nay, it ſhall not be enough (me thinks) if only we be but contented and thankfull, if not alſo chearefull in afflictions; if that, as we feele their paine, ſo we looke to their end; although indeed this is not more requiſite, then rarely found, as being proper only to the good heart. Every Bird can ſing in a cleare heaven, in a temperate ſpring; that one, as moſt familiar, ſo is moſt commended, that ſings merrie notes in the midſt of a ſhower, or the dead of Winter. Every Epicure can enlarge his heart to mirth in the mid ſt of his cups and dalliance; only the three children can ſing in the furnace, Paul and Silas in the ſtocks, Martyrs at the ſtake. It is from heaven that this joy comes, ſo contrary to all earthly occaſions, bred in the faithfull heart, through a ſerious and feeling reſpect to the iſſue of what he feeles, the quiet and untroubled fruit of his righteouſneſſe; glory, the crowne after his fight; after his minute of paine, eternity of joy. He never lookt over the threſhold of heaven, that cannot more rejoyce that he ſhall be glorious, then mourn in preſent that he is miſerable.

Sect. XV.

Of the importunity and terror of Death.

YEa, this conſideration is ſo powerfull, that it alone is able to make a part againſt the fear or ſenſe of the laſt and greateſt of all terribles, Death it ſelf: which in the conſcience of his own dreadfulneſſe, juſtly laughs at all the vaine humane precepts of Tranquility, appalling the moſt reſolute, and vexing the moſt cheerefull minds. Neither prophane Lucretius, with all his Epicurean rules of confidence, nor drunken Anacreon, with all his wanton Odes, can ſhift off the importunate and violent horror of this Adverſary. Seeſt thou the Chaldean Tyrant beſet with the ſacred bowls of Jeruſalem, the late ſpoiles of Gods Temple; and (in contempt of their owner) carowſing healths to his Queenes, Concubines, Peeres, ſinging amids his cups, triumphant carols of praiſe to his molten and carved gods? Wouldeſt thou ever ſuſpect that this high courage could be abated? or that this ſumptuous and preſumptuous banquet (after ſo royall and jocond continuance) ſhould have any other concluſion, but pleaſure? Stay but one hour longer, and thou ſhalt ſee that face, that now ſhines with a ruddy gloſſe (according to the colour of his liquor) looke pale and gaſtly, ſtained with the colours of fear and death; and that proud hand, which now lifts up his maſſie Goblets in defiance of God, tremble like a leaf in a ſtorme; and thoſe ſtrong knees, which never ſtooped to the burden of their laden body, now not able to beare up themſelves, but looſned with a ſudden palſie of feare, one knocking againſt the other: and all this, for that Death writes him a letter of ſummons to appeare that night before him; and accordingly ere the next Sunne, ſent two Eunuches for his honorable conveiance into another world. Where now are thoſe delicate morſels, thoſe deep draughts, thoſe merry ditties, wherewith the palate and eare ſo pleaſed themſelves? What is now become of all thoſe cheerfull lookes, looſe laughters, ſtately port, revels, triumphs of the feaſting Court? Why doth none of his gallant Nobles revive the fainted courage of their Lord with a new cup? or with ſome ſtirring jeſt ſhake him out of this unſeaſonable Melancholy? O death, how imperious art thou to carnall minds? aggravating their miſery not only by expectation of future paine, but by the remembrance of the wonted cauſes of their joy; and not ſuffering them to ſee ought but what may torment them? Even that monſter of Cæſars, that had been ſo well acquainted with bloud, and never had found better ſport than in cutting of throats; when now it came to his own turne, how effeminate, how deſperately cowardous did he ſhew himſelf! to the wonder of all readers, that he which was ever ſo valiant in killing, ſhould be ſo womaniſhly heartleſſe in dying.

Sect. XVI.

The grounds of the feare of death.

THere are that feare not ſo much to be dead, as to die; the very act of diſſolution frighting them with a tormenting expectation of a ſhort, but intolerable painfulneſſe. Which let if the wiſdome of God had not interpoſed to timorous nature, there would have been many more Lucreces, Cleopatres, Achitophels; and good lawes ſhould have found little opportunity of execution, through the wilfull funeralls of malefactors. For the ſoule that comes into the body without any (at leaſt ſenſible) pleaſure, departs not from it without an extremity of pain; which varying according to the manner and means of ſeparation, yet in all violent deaths eſpecially retaineth a violence not to be avoided, hard to be endured. And if diſeaſes, which are

A are deſtin'd toward death as their end, be ſo painfull, what muſt the end & perfection of diſeaſes be? Since as diſeaſes are the maladies of the body, ſo death is the malady of diſeaſes. There are that feare not ſo much to die, as to be dead. If the pang be bitter, yet it is but ſhort: the comfortleſſe ſtate of the dead ſtrikes ſome that could well reſolve for the act of their paſſage. Not the worſt of the Heathen Emperours, made that moanfull dittie on his death-bed, wherein he bewrayeth (to all memory) much feeling pittie of his ſoule, for her doubtfull and impotent condition after her parture. How doth Plato's worldling bewail the miſery of the grave, beſides all reſpect of pain! Woe is me, that I ſhall lie alone rotting in the ſilent earth, amongſt the crawling wormes, not ſeeing ought above, not ſeene. Very not-being is ſufficiently abhorred of nature, if death had no more to make it fearefull. But thoſe that have lived under light enough, to ſhew them the gates of hell, after their paſſage thorow the gates of death, (and have

B learned, that death is not only horrible for our not-being here, but for being infinitly, eternally miſerable in a future world, nor ſo much for the diſſolution of life, as the beginning of torment) thoſe cannot, without the certain hope of their immunitie, but carnally feare to die, and helliſhly feare to be dead. For if it be ſuch pain to die, what is it to be ever dying? and if the ſtraining and luxation of one joynt can ſo afflict us, what ſhall the racking of the whole body, and the torturing of the ſoule, whoſe animation alone makes the body to feele and complaine of ſmart? And if men have deviſed ſuch exquiſite torments, what can ſpirits, more ſubtile, more malicious? And if our momentany ſufferings ſeeme long, how long ſhall that be that is eternall? And if the ſorrowes indifferently incident to Gods deare ones upon earth, be ſo extreme, as ſometimes to drive them within ſight of deſpairing, what ſhall thoſe be that are re-

C ſerved only for thoſe that hate him, and that he hateth? None but thoſe who have heard the deſperate complaints of ſome guiltie Spyra, or whoſe ſoules have been a little ſcorched with theſe flames, can enough conceive of the horror of this eſtate; it being the policy of our common enemie to conceale it ſo long, that we may ſee and feele it at once, leaſt we ſhould feare it, before it be too late to be avoided.

'Οτοτοτοῖ κακὰ κακὰ, &c.

SECT. XVII.

NOw when this great Adverſary, like a proud Giant, comes ſtalking out in his fearefull ſhape, and inſults over our fraile mortalitie, daring the world to match him with an equall Champion, while a whole hoſt of worldlings ſhew him their backes for feare, the true Chriſtian (armed only with confidence and

D reſolution of his future happineſſe) dares boldly encounter him, and can wound him in the forehead (the wonted ſeate of terror) and trampling upon him, can cut off his head with his owne ſword, and victoriouſly returning, can ſing in triumph, O death, where is thy ſting? An happy victory! We die, and are not foiled: yea, we are conquerous in dying: we could not overcome death, if we died not. That diſſolution is well beſtowed, that parts the ſoule from the body, that it may unite both to God. All our life here (as that heavenly Doctor well tearmes it) is but a vitall death. How advantagious is that death that determines this falſe and dying life, and begins a true one, above all the titles of happineſſe! The Epicure or Sadduce dare not die, for feare of not being. The guiltie and looſe worldling dares not die, for feare of being miſerable. The diſtruſtfull and doubting ſemi-Chriſtian dares not die, becauſe he knowes not, whether he ſhall be, or miſerable, or not be at all. The reſolved Chriſtan dares, and

E would die, becauſe he knowes he ſhall be happy; and looking merrily towards heaven (the place of his reſt) can unfainedly ſay, I deſire to be diſſolved: I ſee thee, my home, I ſee thee, (a ſweet and glorious home, after a weary pilgrimage) I ſee thee; & now after many lingring hopes, I aſpire to thee. How oft have I looked up at thee; with admiration and raviſhment of ſoule! and by the goodly beames that I have ſeene, gheſſed at the glory that is above them! How oft have I ſcorned theſe dead and unpleaſant pleaſures of earth, in compariſon of thine! I come now, my joyes, I come to poſſeſſe you: I come through paine and death; yea if hell it ſelfe were in the way betwixt you and me, I would paſſe thorow hell it ſelfe to enjoy you. And (in truth

Remedy of the laſt and greateſt breach of peace, ariſing from death.

Auguſtine.

Tul. Tuſcul. Callimach. Epigram.

if that Heathen Cleombrotus (a follower of the ancient Academie) but upon only reading of his Maſter Platoes diſcourſes of the immortalitie of the ſoule, could caſt down himſelfe head-long from an high rocke, and wilfully breake his necke, that he might be poſſeſſed of that immortality which he beleeved to follow upon death; how contented ſhould they be to die, that know they ſhall be (more then immortall) glorious? Auguſt. de Hereſ. He went, not in an hate of the fleſh, as the Patrician Heretikes of old; but in a blind love to his ſoule, out of bare opinion: We, upon an holy love grounded upon aſſured knowledge. He, upon an opinion of future life: we on knowledge of future glory. He went, unſent for; we, called for by our Maker. Why ſhould his courage exceed ours, ſince our ground, our eſtate ſo far exceeds his? Even this age within the reach of our memorie, bred that peremptory Italian, which in imitation of the old Roman courage (leſt, in that degenerated Nation, there ſhould be no ſtep left of the qualities of their Anceſtors) entring upon his torment for killing a Tyrant, cheered himſelfe with this confidence; My death is ſharp: my fame ſhall be everlaſting. The voice of a Romane, not of a Chriſtian. My fame ſhall be eternall: in idle comfort. My fame ſhall live; not my ſoule live to ſee it. What ſhall it availe thee to be talkt of, while thou art not? Then fame only is precious, when a man lives to enjoy it. The fame that ſurvives the ſoule, is bootleſſe. Yet even this hope cheered him againſt the violence of his death. What ſhould it doe us, that (not our fame, but) our life, our glory after death, cannot die? He that hath Stephens eyes to looke into heaven, cannot but have the tongue of the Saints, Come Lord: How long? That man, ſeeing the glory of the end, cannot but contemn the hardneſſe of the way. But who wants thoſe eyes, if he ſay and ſweares that he feares not death, beleeve him not: if hee proteſt his Tranquilitie, and yet feare death, beleeve him not: beleeve him not, if he ſay he is not miſerable.

Mors aterna, Fama perpetua.

Sect. XVIII.

The ſecond ranke of the enemies of peace.

Hippocr. Aphor.

THeſe are enemies on the left hand. There want not ſome on the right, which with leſſe profeſſion of hoſtility, hurt no leſſe. Not ſo eaſily perceived, becauſe they diſtemper the mind, not without ſome kind of pleaſure. Surfet kils more then famine. Theſe are the over-deſiring and over-joying of theſe earthly things. All immoderations are enemies, as to health, ſo to peace. He that deſires, wants as much, as he that hath nothing. The drunken man is as thirſty as the ſweating traueller. Hence are the ſtudies, cares, feares, jelouſies, hopes, griefes, envies, wiſhes, platformes of atchieving, alterations of purpoſes, and a thouſand like; whereof each one is enough to make the life troubleſome. One is ſick of his neighbours field, whoſe miſ-ſhapen angles diſfigure his, and hinder his Lordſhip of entireneſſe: what he hath, is not regarded, for the want of what he cannot have. Another feeds on cruſts, to purchaſe what he muſt leave (perhaps) to a foole, or, (which is not much better) to a prodigall heire. Another, in the extremity of covetous folly, chuſes to die an unpitied death; hanging himſelfe for the fall of the market, while the commons laugh at that loſſe, and in their ſpeeches Epitaph upon him, as on that Pope, He lived as a wolfe, and died as a Dog. One cares not what attendance he dances all houres, on whoſe ſtairs he ſits, what vices he ſoothes, what deformities he imitates, what ſervile offices he doth, in an hope to riſe. Another ſtomacks the covered head and ſtiffe knee of his inferiour; angry that other men think him not ſo good as he thinks himſelfe. Another eats his own heart, with envy at the richer furniture, and better eſtate, or more honour of his neighbour; thinking his owne not good, becauſe another hath better. Another vexeth himſelfe with a word of diſgrace, paſt from the mouth of an enemie, which he neither can digeſt, nor caſt up; reſolving becauſe another will be his enemie, to be his owne. Theſe humours are as manifold, as there are men that ſeeme proſperous. For the avoiding of all which ridiculous, and yet ſpightfull inconveniences, the mind muſt be ſetled in a perſwaſion of the worthleſneſſe of theſe outward things. Let it know, that theſe riches have made many prouder, none better: That, as never man was, ſo never wiſe

The firſt remedy of an over-proſperous eſtate.

The vanity & unprofitableneſſe of riches.

The firſt enemy on the right hand.

A wiſe man thought himſelfe better for enjoying them. Would that wiſe Philoſopher have caſt his gold into the Sea, if he had not knowne he ſhould live more happily without it? If he knew not the uſe of riches, he was no wiſe man: if he knew not the beſt way to quietnes, he was no Philoſopher: now even by the voyce of their Oracle, hee was confeſſed to be both; yet caſt away his gold, that he might be happy. Would that wiſe Prophet have prayed as well againſt riches, as poverty? Would ſo many great men (whereof our little Iland hath yeelded nine crowned Kings while it was held of old by the Saxons) after they had continued their life in the Throne, have ended it in the Cell, and changed there Scepter for a Booke, if they could have found as much felicitie in the higheſt eſtate, as ſecuritie in the loweſt? I heare Peter and John (the eldeſt and deareſt Apoſtles) ſay, Gold and ſilver have I none: I heare the Devill ſay, All theſe will I give thee; and they are mine, to give; Whether
B ſhall I deſire to be in the ſtate of theſe Saints, or that devill? He was therefore a better husband then a Philoſopher, that firſt termed riches Goods: and he mended the title well, that (adding a fit Epithet) called them goods of Fortune; falſe goods aſcribed to a falſe patron. There is no fortune, to give or guide riches. there is no true goodneſſe in riches to be guided. His meaning then was (as I can interpret it) to teach us, in this title; that it is a chance, if ever riches were good to any. In ſumme, who would account thoſe as riches, or thoſe riches as goods, which hurt the owner, diſquiet others? which the worſt have; which the beſt have not, which thoſe that have not, want not; which thoſe want that have them: which are loſt in a night; and a man is not worſe, when he hath loſt them? It is true of them, that we ſay of fire and water; They are good ſervants, ill maſters. Make them thy ſlaves, they ſhall be goods indeed: in vſe, if not in nature; good to thy ſelfe, good to others by thee: But if they
C be thy maſters, thou haſt condemned thy ſelfe to thine owne gallies. If a ſervant rule, he proves a Tyrant. What madneſſe is this? thou haſt made thy ſelfe, at once a ſlave and a foole. What if thy chaines be of Gold? or if, with Heliogabalus, thou haſt made thee ſilken halters? thy ſervitude may be glorious: it is no leſſe miſerable.

Sect. XIX.

HOnour, perhaps, is yet better; ſuch is the confuſed opinion of thoſe that know little: but a diſtinct and curious head ſhall finde an hard taske, to define in what point the goodneſſe thereof conſiſteth. Is it in high diſcent of bloud? I would think ſo, if nature were tied by any law to produce children like qualities to their parents. But, although in the bruit creatures ſhe be ever thus regular, that ye
D ſhall never find a young Pigeon hatched in an Eagles neſt; neither can I think that true, or (if true, it was monſtrous) that Nicippus his ſheepe ſhould yeane a Lyon: yet in the beſt creature (which hath his forme, and her attending qualities from above) with a likeneſſe of face and features, is commonly found an unlikeneſſe of diſpoſition: only the earthly part followes the ſeed; wiſdome, valour, vertue, are of another beginning. Shall I bow to a molten Calfe, becauſe it was made of golden eare-rings? Shall I condemne all honour of the firſt head (though upon never ſo noble deſerving) becauſe it can ſhew nothing before it ſelfe, but a white ſhield? If Caſar or Agathocles, be a potters ſonne, ſhall I contemne him? Or if wiſe Bion be the ſonne of an infamous Curtizan, ſhall the cenſorious Lawyer raze him out of the Catalogue, with Partus ſequitur ventrem? Laſtly, ſhall I account that good, which E is incident to the worſt? Either therefore greatneſſe muſt ſhew ſome Charter, wherein it is priviledged with ſucceſſion of vertue; or elſe the goodneſſe of honour cannot conſiſt in bloud. Is it then, in the admiration and high opinion that others have conceived of thee, which drawes all dutifull reſpect, and humble offices from them, to thee? O fickle good, that is ever in the keeping of others! eſpecially of the unſtable vulgar, that beaſt of many heads: whoſe divided tongues, as they never agree with each other; ſo ſeldome (when ever) agree long with themſelves. Doe we not ſee the ſuperſtitious Liſtrians, that ere-while would needs make Paul a God, againſt his will; and in devout zeale, drew crowned bulls to the Altars of their new Iupiter and Mercury? violence can ſcarce hold them from ſacrificing to him: now not many houres after, gather up ſtones againſt him; hauing in their conceits turned him, from a God into a malefactor; and are ready to kill him, in ſtead of killing a ſacrifice to him. Such is the multitude; and ſuch the ſteddineſſe of their honour. There then only is true honour, where bloud and vertue meete together: the greatneſſe whereof is from bloud; the goodneſſe from vertue. Rejoyce ye great men, that your bloud is ennobled with the vertues and deſerts of your anceſtors. This onely is yours: this onely challengeth all unfained reſpect of your inferiours. Count it praiſe-worthy, not that you have, but that you deſerve honour. Bloud may be tainted; the opinion of the vulgar cannot be conſtant; onely vertue is ever like it ſelfe, and onely wins reverence, even of thoſe that hate it. Without which, greatneſſe is as a Beacon of vice, to draw mens eyes the more to behold it: and thoſe that ſee it dare loath it, though they dare not cenſure it. So, while the knee bendeth, the mind abhorreth, and telleth the body, it honours an unworthy ſubject: within it ſelfe, ſecretly, comparing that vicious great man (on whom his ſubmiſſe courteſie is caſt away) to ſome goodly faire bound Senecaes Tragedies, that is curiouſly gilded without; which if a man open, he ſhall find Thyeſtes the tombe of his owne children; or Oedipus the husband of his owne mother, or ſome ſuch monſtrous part: which he (at once) reads, and hates.

Sect. XX.

The ſecond remedy of over-joyed proſperity.

LEt him think, that not only theſe outward things are not in themſelves good, but that they expoſe their owners to miſery. For, beſides that God uſually puniſhes our over-loving them, with their loſſe, (becauſe he thinkes them unworthy Rivalls to himſelfe, who challengeth all height of love, as his only right) ſo that the way to loſe, is to love much; the largeneſſe moreover either of affection, or eſtate, makes an open way to ruine: while a man walks on plaine ground, he falls not; or, if he fall, he doth but meaſure his length on the ground, and riſe againe without harme, but he that climbeth high, is in danger of falling; and if he fall, of killing. All the ſayles hoiſed, give vantage to a tempeſt; which (through the Mariners foreſight giving timely roome thereto) by their fall, deliver the veſſell from the danger of that guſt, whoſe rage now paſſeth over with only beating her with waves for anger that he was prevented. So the larger our eſtate is, the fairer marke hath miſchiefe given to hit; and (which is worſe) that which makes us ſo eaſie to hit, makes our wound more deepe and grievous. If poore Codrus his houſe burne, he ſtands by and warmes him with the flame, becauſe he knowes it is but the loſſe of an outſide; which (by gathering ſome few ſticks, ſtraw, and clay) may with little labour, and no coſt, be repaired. But when the many lofts of the rich man doe one give fire to another, he cries out one while of his Counting houſe, another while of his Wardrobe, then of ſome noted cheſt, and ſtraight of ſome rich Cabinet: and lamenting both the frame and the furniture, is therfore impatient, becauſe he had ſomething.

Sect. XXI.

The vanitie of pleaſure; the third enemy on the right hand.

BUt, if there be any Sorcereſſe upon earth, it is pleaſure: which ſo inchanteth the mindes of men, and worketh the diſturbance of our Peace, with ſuch ſecret delight, that fooliſh men think this want of Tranquillitie, happineſſe. She turneth men into ſwine, with ſuch ſweet charmes, that they would not change their brutiſh nature, for their former reaſon. It is a good unquietneſſe (ſay they) that contenteth: it is a good enemy that profiteth. Is it any wonder that men ſhould be ſottiſh, when their reaſon is maſtered with ſenſuality? Thou foole, thy pleaſure contents thee: how much? how long? If ſhe have not more befriended thee than ever ſhe did any earthly favorite: yea, if ſhe have not given the more, than ſhe hath her ſelf; thy beſt delight hath had ſome mixture of diſcontentment. For either ſome circumſtance croſſeth thy deſire, or the inward diſtaſte of thy conſcience (checking thine appetite) permits thee not any entire fruition of thy joy. Even the ſweeteſt of all

A flowers hath his thornes: and who can determine whether the ſent be more delect able, or the pricks more irkeſome? It is enough for heaven to have abſolute pleaſures: which if they could be found here below, certainly that heaven, which is now not enough deſired, would then be feared. God will have our pleaſures here (according to the faſhion of our ſelves) compounded: ſo as the beſt delights may ſtill ſavour of their earth. See how that great King, which never had any match for wiſdome, ſcarce ever any ſuperiour for wealth, traverſed over all this inferiour world, with diligent inquiry, and obſervation, and all to find out that goodneſſe of the children of men which they enjoy under the Sunne; abridging himſelfe of nothing that either his eyes, or his heart could ſuggeſt to him: (as what is it, that he could not either know or purchaſe?) and now comming home to himſelfe (after the diſquiſition of all naturall and humane things) complains, that Behold, all is not only
B vanity, but vexation. Goe then, thou wiſe ſcholler of experience, and make a more accurate ſearch for that which he ſought, and miſſed. Perhaps ſome-where (betwixt the talleſt Cedar in Lebanon, and the ſhrubby Hyſop upon the wall) Pleaſure ſhrouded her ſelf that ſhe could not be deſcried of him; whether through ignorance, or negligence: thine inſight may be more piercing, thy means more commodious, thy ſucceſſe happier. If it were poſſible for any man to entertaine ſuch hopes, his vaine experience could not make him a greater foole: it could but teach him what he is and knoweth not. And yet ſo imperfect as our Pleaſures are, they have their ſatiety: and as their Continuance is not good, ſo their Concluſion is worſe: looke to their end, and ſee how ſudden, how bitter it is. Their only Courteſie is, to ſalute us with a farewell; and ſuch a one, as makes their ſalutation uncomfortable. This Da-
C lila ſhewes and ſpeaks faire; but in the end ſhe will bereave thee of thy ſtrength, of thy ſight, yea of thy ſelfe. Theſe gnats flie about thine eares, and make thee muſicke a while; but evermore they ſting, ere they part. Sorrow and Repentance is the beſt end of Pleaſure: Paine is yet worſe; but the worſt is Deſpaire. If thou miſſe of the firſt of theſe, one of the latter ſhall find thee; perhaps both. How much better is it for thee to want a little honie, then to be ſwolne up with a venomous ſting?

Thus then, the mind reſolved, that theſe earthly things (Honours, wealth, Pleaſures) are caſuall, unſtable, deceitfull, imperfect, dangerous; muſt learne to uſe them without truſt, & to want them without griefe; thinking ſtill, If I have them, I have ſome benefit with a great charge: If I have them not; with little reſpect of others, I have much ſecurity and eaſe, in my ſelfe: which once obtained, we cannot fare amiſſe in either eſtate; and without which, we cannot but miſcary in both.

Sect. XXII.

Poſitive Rules of our peace.

ALl the enemies of our inward peace, are thus deſcribed & diſcomfited. Which done, we have enough to preſerve us from miſery: but (ſince we moreover ſeeke how to live well & happily) there yet remaine thoſe Poſitive rules whereby our Tranquility may be both had, continued, and confirmed. Wherein, I feare not leſt I ſhould ſeeme over divine, in caſting the Anhcor of Quietneſſe ſo deepe as Heaven (the only ſeate of conſtancy;) whiles it can find no hold at all upon earth. All earthly things are full of variableneſſe: and therefore having no ſtay in themſelves, can give none to us. He that will have and hold right Tranquility, muſt find in himſelfe a ſweet fruition of God, and feeling apprehenſion of his preſence;
E that when he finds manifold occaſions of vexation in theſe earthly things, he (overlooking them all, and having recourſe to his Comforter) may find in him ſuch matter of contentment, that he may paſſe over all theſe pettie grievances with contempt: which whoſoever wants, may be ſecure, cannot be quiet. The mind of man cannot want ſome refuge, and (as we ſay of the Elephant) cannot reſt, unleſſe it have ſomething to leane upon. The Covetous man, (whoſe heaven is his cheſt) when he heares himſelfe rated and curſed for oppreſſions, comes home; and ſeeing his baggs ſafe, applauds himſelfe againſt all cenſures. The Glutton, when he loſeth friends or good name, yet joyeth in his well furniſht table, and the laughter of his wine: more pleaſing sing himselfe in one dish, then he can be grieved with all the worlds miſ-carriage. The needy Scholler (whose wealth lies all in his braine) cheares himselfe against iniquity of times, with the conceit of his knowledge. These starting holes the minde cannot want, when it is hard driven. Now, when as like to some chased Sisera, it shrowds it selfe under the harbour of these Iaels; although they give it house-roome and milk for a time, yet at last either they entertaine it with a naile in the temples, or (being guilty to their owne impotency) send it out of themselves, for safety and peace. For, if the Crosse light in that which it made his refuge (as, if the covetous man be crossed in his riches) what earthly thing can stay him from a desperate phrensie? Or, if the Crosse fall in a degree above the height of his stay; as if the rich man be sick, or dying (wherein, all wealth is either contemned, or remembred with anguish) how doe all his comforts (like vermine, from an house on fire) run away from him, and leave him over to his ruine! whiles the Soule, that hath placed his refuge above, is sure that the ground of his comfort cannot be matched with an earthly sorrow, cannot me made variable by the change of any event; but is infinitely above all casualties, and without all uncertainties. What state is there, wherein this heavenly stay shall not affoord me, not onely Peace, but Joy? Am I in Prison? or in the hell of Prisons (in some dark, low, and desolate dungeon?) Loe there Algerius (that sweet Martyr) findes more light then above; and pities the darknesse of our liberty. We have but a Sun to enlighten our world, which every cloud dimmeth, and hideth from our eyes: but the Father of lights (in respect of whom, all the bright starres of heaven are but as the snuffe of a dimme candle) shines into his pit, and the presence of his glorious Angels make that an heaven to him, which the world purposed as an hell of discomfort. What walls can keep out that infinite Spirit, that fils all things? What darknesse can be where the God of this Sun dwelleth? What sorrow where he comforteth? Am I wandring in banishment? Can I goe whither God is not? what Sea can divide betwixt him and me? then would I feare exile; if I could be driven away as well from God, as my Country. Now he is as much in all earths: His title is alike to all places; and mine in him: His Sun shines to me; his sea or earth beares me up: his presence cheareth me, whithersoever I goe. He cannot be said to flit, that never changeth his Host. He alone is a thousand companions; he alone is a world of friends. That man never knew what it was to be familiar with God, that complains of the want of home, of friends, of companions, while God is with him. Am I contemned of the world? It is enough for me, that I am honoured of God: of both, I cannot. The world would love me more, if I were lesse friends with God. It cannot hate me so much as God hates it. What care I to be hated of them whom God hateth? He is unworthy of Gods favour, that cannot think it happinesse enough without the worlds. How easie is it for such a man, whiles the world disgraces him, at once to scorne and pity it, that it cannot think nothing more contemptible then it selfe? I am impoverished with losses: That was never throughly good, that may be lost. My riches will not leese me, yea, though I forgoe all, to my skin, yet have I not lost any part of my wealth. For, if he be rich that hath something; how rich is he, that hath the Maker and owner of all things? I am weak and diseased in body: He cannot miscarry, that hath his Maker for his Physitian. Yet my soule (the better part) is sound; for that cannot be weak, whose strength God is. How many are sick in that, and complaine not? I can be content to be let blood in the arme or foot, for the curing of the head or heart. The health of the principall part is more joy to me, then it is trouble to be distempered in the inferiour. Let me know that God favours me: then I have liberty in prison, home in banishment, honour in contempt, in losses wealth, health in infirmity, life in death; and in all these happinesse. And (surely) if our perfect fruition of God be our compleat heaven; it must needs be, that our inchoate conversing with him is our heaven imperfectly, and the entrance into the other: which (me thinks) differs from this, not in the kinde of it, but in the degree. For the continuation of which happy society (sith strangeneſſe loseth acquaintance and breedeth neglect) on our part must be a daily renuing of heavenly familiarity, by seeking him up, even with the contempt of all inferiour distraction; by talking talking with him in our ſecret invocations; by hearing his conference with us; and by mutuall entertainment of each other in the ſweet diſcourſes of our daily meditations. He is a ſullen and unſociable friend, that wants words. God ſhal take no pleaſure in us if we be ſilent. The heart that is full of love, cannot but have a buſie tongue. All our talke with God is either Suites or Thankes. In them the Chriſtian heart powres out it ſelf to his Maker; and would not change this priviledge for a world. All his annoiances, all his wants, all his diſlikes are powred into the boſome of his inviſible friend; who likes us ſtill ſo much more as we aske more, as we complaine more. Oh the eaſie and happy recourſe that the poore ſoule hath to the high throne of Heaven! we ſtay not for the holding out of a golden ſcepter, to warne our admiſſion, before which our preſence ſhould be preſumption and death. No houre is unſeaſonable, no perſon too baſe, no words too homely, no fact too hard, no importunity too great. We ſpeak familiarly, we are heard, anſwered, comforted. Another while God interchangeably ſpeakes unto us by the ſecret voice of his ſpirit; or by the audible ſound of his word; we heare, adore, anſwer him; by both which the minde ſo communicates it ſelfe to God, and hath God ſo plentifully communicated unto it, that hereby it growes to ſuch an habit of heavenlineſſe, as that now it wants nothing, but diſſolution, of full glory.

Sect. XXIII.

OUt of this maine ground once ſetled in the heart (like as ſo many rivers from one common ſea) flow thoſe ſubordinate reſolutions, which we require as neceſſary to our peace, whether in reſpect of our actions, or our eſtate. For our actions, there muſt be a ſecret vow paſſed in the ſoule, both of conſtant refraining from whatſoever may offend that Majeſty we reſt upon; and above this, of true and canonicall obedience to God, without all care of difficulty, and in ſpight of all contradictions of nature. Not out of the confidence of our owne power; impotent men, who are we, that we ſhould either vow or performe? But as he ſaid; Give what thou bidſt, and bid what thou wilt. Hence the courage of Moſes durſt venture his hand to take up the crawling and hiſſing Serpent. Hence Peter durſt walke upon the pavement of the waves. Hence that heroicall ſpirit of Luther (a man made of metall fit for ſo great a worke) durſt reſolve and profeſſe to enter into that fore-warned Citie, though there had beene as many Devils in their ſtreets as tiles on their houſes. Both theſe vows as wee once ſolemnly made by others; ſo, for our peace we muſt renew in our ſelves. Thus the experienced minde both knowing that it hath met with a good friend, and withall what the price of a friend is, cannot but be carefull to retain him, and warie of diſpleaſing, and therefore to cut off all dangers of variance, voluntarily takes a double oath of allegeance of it ſelf to God; which neither benefit ſhall induce us to break, if we might gaine a world, nor feare urge us thereto, though we muſt loſe our ſelves. The wavering heart that finds continuall combats in it ſelfe betwixt Pleaſure and Conſcience, ſo equally matched that neither gets the day, is not yet capable of peace; and whether ever overcommeth, is troubled both with reſiſtance and victory. Barren Rebecca found more eaſe, then when her twins ſtruggled in her wombe. If Iacob had been there alone, ſhe had not complained of that painfull contention: One while Pleaſure holds the Fort, and Conſcience aſſaults it; which when it hath entred at laſt by ſtrong hand, after many batteries of judgements denounced; ere long Pleaſure either corrupts the watch, or by ſome cunning ſtratagem, finds way to recover her firſt hold. So, one part is ever attempting, and ever reſiſting. Betwixt both, the heart cannot have peace, becauſe it reſolves not. For while the ſoule is held in ſuſpence, it cannot enjoy the pleaſure it uſeth; becauſe it is halfe taken up with feare; only a ſtrong and reſolute repulſe of pleaſure is truly pleaſant: for therein the Conſcience (filling us with heavenly delight) maketh ſweet triumphs in it ſelfe; as being now the Lord of his own dominions, and knowing what to truſt to. No man knowes the pleaſure of this thought, I have done well, but he that hath felt it: and he that hath felt it, contemnes all pleaſure to it. It is a falſe ſlander raiſed on Chriſtianity, that it maketh men dumpiſh and melancholicke: for therefore are we heavy, becauſe we are not not enough Christians. We have religion enough to mislike pleasures, not enough to overcome them. But if we be once conquerours over our selves, and have devoted our selves wholly to God, there can be nothing but heavenly mirth in the soule. Loe here, ye Philosophers, the true Musicke of Heaven, which the good heart continually heareth, and answers it in the just measures of joy. Others may talke of mirth, as a thing they have heard of, or vainly fancied; onely the Christian feeles it; and in comparison thereof scorneth the idle, ribaldish, and scurrilous mirth of the prophane.

The ſubordinate rules of Tranquillitie. 1. For actions.

Sect. XXIV.

2. Rule for our actions.

And this resolution which we call for, must not only exclude manifestly evil actions, but also doubting and suspension of mind in actions suspected, and questionable; wherein the judgement must ever give confident determination one way. For this Tranquility consisteth in a steddinesse of the mind: and how can that vessell which is beaten upon, by contrary waves and winds (and tottereth to either part) be said to keepe a steady course? Resolution is the only mother of security. For instance: I see, that Usury which was wont to be condemned for no better then a Legall theft, hath now obtained (with many) the reputation of an honest Trade; and is both used by many, and by some defended. It is pittie that a bad practice should find any learned or religious Patron. The summe of my patrimony lieth dead by me, sealed up in the bag of my Father: my thriftier friends advise me to this easie and sure improvement; Their counsell and my gaine prevaile; my yeerely summes come in with no cost but of time, wax, parchment: my estate likes it well; better then my conscience; which tells me still, he doubts, my trade is too easie to be honest: Yet I continue my illiberall course not without some scruple and contradiction: so as my feare of offence hinders the joy of my profit, and the pleasure of my gaine heartens me against the feare of injustice; I would be rich with ease; and yet I would not be uncharitable, I would not be unjust. All the while I live in unquiet doubts, and distraction: Others are not so much entangled in my bonds, as I in my owne. At last, that I may be both just and quiet, I conclude to referre this case wholy to the sentence of my inward Judge, the Conscience: the Advocates Gaine and justice plead on either part at this barre with doubtfull successe. Gaine informes the Judge of a new and nice distinction, of toothlesse, and biting Interest, and brings presidents of particular cases of Usury so farre from any breach of charity or justice, that both parts therein confesse themselves advantaged. Justice pleads even the most toothles usury to have sharp gummes, and finds in the most harmlesse and profitable practise of it, an insensible wrong to the common body; besides the infinite wracks of private estates. The weake Judge suspends in such probable allegations, and demurreth; as being overcome of both, and of neither part: and leaves me yet no whit more quiet, no whit lesse uncertaine. I suspend my practise accordingly; being sure it is good not to doe, what I am not sure is good to be done: and now Gaine solicits me as much as Iustice did before. Betwixt both I live troublesomely: nor ever shall doe other, till (in a resolute detestation) I have whipped this evill Merchant out of the Temple of my heart. This rigour is my peace; Before, I could not be well, either full or fasting; uncertainty is much paine, even in a more tolerable action. Neither is it (I think) easie to determine, whether it bee worse to doe a lawfull act with doubting, or an evill with resolution: since that which in it selfe is good, is made evill to mee by my doubt: and what is in nature evill, is in this one point not evill to me, that I doe it upon a verdict of a Conscience: so now my judgement offends in not following the truth: I offend not in that I follow my judgement: Wherein if the most wise God had left us to rove only according to the aime of our owne conjectures, it should have been lesse faulty to be Sceptickes in our actions, and either not to judge at all, or to judge amisse: but now that he hath given us a perfect rule of eternall equity, and truth, whereby to direct the sentences of our judgement; that uncertainty which alloweth no peace to us, will afford us no excuse

A cuſe before the tribunall of Heaven: wherefore, then onely is the heart quiet, when our actions are grounded upon judgement, and our judgement upon truth.

Sect. XXV.

Rules for eſtate. 1. Reliance upon the providence of God.

FOr his eſtate, the quiet minde muſt firſt roll it ſelfe upon the providence of the Higheſt. For whoſoever ſo caſts himſelfe upon theſe outward things, that in their proſperous eſtate he rejoyceth, and (contrarily) is caſt downe in their miſcarriage; I know not whether he ſhall find more uncertainty of reſt, or more certainty of unquietneſſe; ſince hee muſt needs be like a light unballaſſed Veſſell, that riſes and falls with every wave, and depends onely on the mercy of winde and water: But who B relies on the inevitable decree, and all-ſeeing providence of God, (which can neither be croſſed with ſecond thoughts, nor with events unlooked for) layes a ſure ground of Tranquillity. Let the world toſſe how it liſt, and vary it ſelfe (as it ever doth) in ſtormes and calmes; his reſt is pitched aloft, above the ſphere of changeable mortality. To begin, is harder then to proſecute: What counſell had God in the firſt moulding of thee in the womb of thy mother? What aid ſhall hee have in repairing thee from the womb of the earth? And if he could make, and ſhall reſtore thee without thee, why ſhall he not much more (without thy endeavour) diſpoſe of thee? Is God wiſe enough to guide the Heavens, and to produce all creatures in their kinds and ſeaſons? And ſhal he not be able to order thee alone? Thou ſayeſt, I have friends, and (which is my beſt friend) I have wealth to make both them and me; and wit to put C both to beſt uſe. O the broken reeds of humane confidence! Who ever truſted on friends, that could truſt to himſelfe? Who ever was ſo wiſe, as not ſometimes to be a foole in his owne conceit? oft-times in the conceit of others? Who was ever more diſcontent, then the Wealthy? Friends may be falſe: Wealth cannot but be deceitfull: Wit hath made many fooles. Truſt thou to that, which (if thou wouldeſt) cannot faile thee. Not that thou deſireſt ſhall come to paſſe; but that which God hath decreed. Neither thy feares, nor thy hopes, nor vowes ſhal either foreſlow or alter it. The unexperienced paſſenger, when hee ſees the veſſell goe amiſſe or too farre, layes faſt hold on the contrary part, or on the Maſt for remedy: the Pilot laughes at his folly; knowing, that (what-ever he labours) the Barke will goe which way the wind and his ſterne directeth it. Thy goods are embarked: Now thou wiſheſt a direct North-wind to drive thee D to the Straits; and then a Weſt, to run in: and now, when thou haſt emptied and laded againe, thou calleſt as earneſtly for the South, and South-eaſt, to returne; and lowreſt, if all theſe anſwer thee not: As if Heaven and Earth had nothing elſe to doe, but to wait upon thy pleaſure; and ſerved onely, to bee commanded ſervice by thee. Another that hath contrary occaſion, askes for winds quite oppoſite to thine. Hee that ſits in Heaven, neither fits thy fancy nor his: but bids his winds ſpet ſometimes in thy face; ſometimes to favour thee with a ſide blaſt; ſometimes, to be boyſtrous; otherwhiles, to be ſilent, at his owne pleaſure. Whether the Mariner ſing or curſe, it ſhall goe, whither it is ſent. Strive, or lye ſtiil, thy deſtiny ſhall run on; and what muſt be, ſhall be: Not that we ſhould hence exclude benefit of meanes, (which are alwaies neceſſarily included in this wiſe preordination of all things) but perplexity of cares, E and wreſtling with providence. Oh, the idle and ill-ſpent cares of curious men, that conſult with ſtars, and ſpirits for their deſtinies, under colour of prevention! If it be not thy deſtiny; why wouldſt thou know it, what needſt thou reſiſt it? If it be thy deſtiny; why wouldſt thou know that thou canſt not prevent? That which God hath decreed, is already done in Heaven, and muſt be done on Earth. This kinde of expectation doth but haſten ſlow evils, and prolong them in their continuance: haſten them, not in their event, but in our conceit. Shortly then, if thou ſwimmeſt againſt the ſtreame of this providence, thou canſt not eſcape drowning; every wave turnes thee over, like a Porkpiſce before a tempeſt: But if thou ſwimmeſt with the ſtreame, doe but caſt thine armes abroad, thou paſſeſt with ſafety, and with eaſe: it both beares thee up, and carries thee on to the Haven (whither God hath determined thine arrivall) in peace.

Sect. XXVI.

The second rule for estate. A perswasion of the goodnesse and fitnesse of it for us.

NExt to this, the mind of the unquiet man must be so wrought by these former resolutions, that it be throughly perswaded, The estate wherein he is, is best of all; if not in it selfe, yet to him: Not out of pride, but out of contentment: Which whosoever wanteth, cannot but be continually vexed with envy, and racked with ambition. Yea, if it were possible to be in heaven without this, he could not be happy, for it is as impossible, for the mind at once to long after and enjoy, as for a man to feed and sleep at once. And this is the more to bee striven for, because we are all naturally prone to afflict our selves with our own frowardnesse: ingratefully contemning all we have, for what we would have. Even the best of the Patriarkes could say, O Lord, what wilt thou give me, since I goe childlesse? The bond-man desires now, nothing but liberty: that alone would make him happy. Once free (forgetting his former thought) he wishes some wealth to make use of his freedome; and saies, it were as good be straited in place, as in ability. Once rich, he longeth after Nobility, thinking it no praise to be a wealthy peasant. Once noble, he begins to deem it a base matter to be subject: nothing can now content him but a Crowne. Then it is a small matter to rule, so long as he hath but little dominions, and greater neighbours. He would therefore be an Universall Monarch: whither then? surely it vexeth him as much, that the earth is so small a globe, so little a mole-hill; and that there are no more worlds to conquer. And now that he hath attained the highest dignity amongst men, he would needs be a God, conceits his immortality, erects Temples to his own name, commands his dead Statues to be adored, and (not thus contented) is angry that he cannot command heaven, and controll nature. O vain fooles! whither doth our restlesse ambition climb? What shall be at length the period of our wishes? I could not blame these desires, if contentment consisted in having much: but, now that he only hath much, that hath contentment, (and that it is as easily obtained in a low estate) I can account of these thoughts no better then proudly fooliſh. Thou art poore: what difference is there betwixt a greater man and thee? save that he doth his businesses by others; thou doest them thy selfe. He hath Caters, Cookes, Baylives, Stewards, Secretaries, and all other officers for his severall services: thou provideſt, dresseſt, gathereſt, receiveſt, expendeſt, writeſt for thy selfe. His patrimony is large; thine earnings small. If Briareus feed fifty bellies with his hundred hands; what is he the better, then he that with two hands feedeth one? He is served in silver: thou in vessell of the same colour, of lesser price; as good for use, though not for value. His dishes are more dainty, thine as well relished to thee, and no lesse wholsome. He eats Olives, thou Garlike: he mislikes not more the smell of thy sawce, then thou doest the taste of his. Thou wanteſt somewhat that he hath: he wisheth something which thou haſt, and regardeſt not. Thou couldst be content to have the rich mans purse, but his gout thou wouldst not have: he would have thy health, but not thy fare. If wee might pick out of all mens estates, that which is laudable, omitting the inconveniences, we would make our selves complete: but if we must take all together, we should perhaps little advantage our selves with the change. For the most wise God hath so proportion'd out every mans condition, that he hath some just cause of sorrow inseparably mixed with other contentments, and hath allotted to no man living, an absolute happinesse, without some grievances; nor to any man such an exquisite misery, as that he findeth not somewhat wherein to solace himselfe: the weight whereof varies, according to our estimation of them. One hath much wealth, but no child to inherit it: he envies at the poore mans fruitfulnesse, which hath many heires, and no lands; and could be content, with all his abundance to purchase a successor of his own loynes. Another hath many children, little maintenance: he commendeth the careleſſe quietnesse of the barren; and thinks fewer mouths and more meat would doe better. The labouring man hath the blessing of a strong body, fit to digeſt any fare, to endure any labour: yet he wisheth himselfe weaker, on condition he might be wealthier. The man of nice education hath a feeble

A feeble ſtomacke; and (raſping ſince his laſt meale) doubts, whether he ſhould eat of his beſt diſh, or nothing: this man repines at nothing more, than to ſee his hungry Plough-men feed on a cruſt; and wiſheth to change eſtates, on condition hee might change bodies with him. Say that God ſhould give thee thy wiſh: what wouldeſt thou deſire? Let me (thou ſaiſt) be wiſe, healthfull, rich, honourable, ſtrong, learned, beautifull, immortall. I know thou loveſt thy ſelfe ſo well, that thou canſt wiſh all theſe and more. But ſay that God hath ſo ſhared out theſe gifts (by a moſt wiſe and juſt diſtribution) that thou canſt have but ſome of theſe, perhaps but one; which wouldſt thou ſingle out for thy ſelfe? Any thing, beſide what thou haſt: If learned, thou wouldeſt bee ſtrong; if ſtrong, honourable; if honourable, long lived: Some of theſe thou art already. Thou foole! cannot God chuſe better for thee, than thou for thy ſelfe? In other matches thou truſteſt the choice of a skilfuller chapman: when
B thou ſeeſt a goodly horſe in the Faire (though his ſhape pleaſe thine eye well) yet thou dareſt not buy him, if a cunning Horſe-maſter ſhall tell thee he is faulty; and art willing to take a plainer and ſounder, on his commendation, againſt thy fancy. How much more ſhould we in this caſe, allow his choyce that cannot deceive us; that cannot be deceived? But, thou knoweſt that other thou deſireſt, to be better than what thou haſt: Better perhaps for him that hath it; not better for thee. Liberty is ſweet and profitable to thoſe that can uſe it: but fetters are better for the franticke man. Wine is good nouriſhment for the healthfull; poyſon to the aguiſh. It is good for a ſound body to ſleep in a whole skinne; but he that complaines of ſwelling ſores, cannot ſleepe till it be broken. Hemlocke to the Goat, and Spiders to the Monkey, turne to good ſuſtenance; which to other creatures are accounted deadly. As in diets, ſo in eſtimation of good and evill, of greater and leſſer good, there is much variety.
C All palats commend not one diſh; and what one commends for moſt delicate, another rejects for unſavoury. And if thou know what diſh is moſt pleaſant to thee, thy Phyſitian knows beſt which is wholſome. Thou wouldeſt follow thine appetite too much; and (as the French have in their Proverbe) wouldſt dig thy owne grave with thy teeth: thy wiſe Phyſitian over-ſees and over-rules thee. He ſees, if thou wert more eſteemed, thou wouldſt be proud; if more ſtrong, licentious; if richer, covetous; if healthfuller, more ſecure: but thou thinkeſt not thus hardly of thy ſelfe. Fond man! what knoweſt thou future things? beleeve thou him, that only knowes what would be, what will be. Thou wouldeſt willingly goe to heaven; what better guide canſt thou have, than him that dwels there? If he lead thee thorow deepe ſloughs, and brakie thickets; know, that he knowes this the nearer way, though more comberſome. Can there be in him any want of wiſdome, not to foreſee the beſt? Can there
D be any want of power, not to effect the beſt? any want of love, not to give thee what he knowes is beſt? How canſt thou then faile of the beſt? Since what his power can doe, and what his Wiſdome ſees ſhould be done, his Love hath done, becauſe all are infinite. He willeth not things, becauſe they are good, but they are good, becauſe he wills them. Yea, if ought had beene better, this had not beene. God willeth what he doth: and if thy will accord not with his, whether wilt thou condemne of imperfection?

Sect. XXVII.

The concluſion of the whole.

I Have chalked out the way of Peace: What remaineth, but that we walke alone in it? I have conducted my Reader to the Mine, yea, to the Mint of happineſſe;
E and ſhewed him thoſe glorious heaps, which may eternally enrich him: If (now) he ſhall goe away with his hands and skirt empty; how is he but worthy of a miſerable want? Who ſhall pity us, while we have no mercy on our ſelves? Wilfull diſtreſs hath neither remedy, nor compaſſion. And to ſpeak freely, I have oft wondered at this painfull folly of us men, who in the open view of our peace (as if we were condemned to a neceſſary and fatall unquietneſſe) live upon our owne rack, finding no more joy, than if we were under no other hands, but our executioners. One droupeth under a fained evill; another augments a ſmall ſorrow through impatience; another drawes upon himſelfe an uncertaine evill through feare: one ſeeks true contentment, but not enough; another hath juſt cauſe of joy, and perceives it not: One is vexed, for that his grounds of joy are matched with equall grievances; another cannot complaine of any preſent occaſion of ſorrow, yet lives ſullenly, becauſe he finds not any preſent cauſe of comfort; one is haunted with his ſinne; another diſtracted with his paſſion: amongſt all which, hee is a miracle of all men, that lives not ſome way diſcontented. So we live not while we doe live, onely for that wee want either wiſdome, or will, to husband our lives to our owne beſt advantage. O the inequality of our cares! Let riches or honour be in queſtion, we ſue to them, we ſeeke for them with importunity, with ſervile ambition: our paines need no ſollicitor; yea, there is no way wrong that leads to this end; wee abhorre the patience to ſtay till they enquire for us. And if ever (as it rarely happens) our deſert and worthineſſe wins us the favour of this proffer, wee meet it with both hands, not daring with our modeſt denials to whet the inſtancie, and double the intreaties of ſo welcome ſuiters. Yet loe, here the only true and precious riches, the higheſt advancement of the ſoule, peace and happines, ſeeks for us, ſues to us for acceptation; our anſwers are coy and overly, ſuch as we give to thoſe clients that looke to gaine by our favours. If our want were through the ſcarcity of good, we might yet hope for pity to eaſe us: but now that it is through negligence, and that we periſh with our hands in our boſome, wee are rather worthy of ſtripes, for the wrong we doe our ſelves, than of pity for what wee ſuffer. That wee may and will not, in opportunity of hurting others, is noble and Chriſtian: but in our owne benefit ſluggiſh, and ſavouring of the worſt kind of unthriftineſſe.

Saieſt thou then, this peace is good to have, but hard to get? It were a ſhamefull neglect that hath no pretence. Is difficulty ſufficient excuſe to hinder thee from the purſuit of riches, of preferment, of learning, of bodily pleaſures? Art thou content to ſit ſhrugging in a baſe cottage, ragged, famiſhed, becauſe houſe, clothes, and food wil neither bee had without money, nor money without labour, nor labour without trouble and painfulneſſe? Who is ſo mercifull, as not to ſay that a whip is the beſt almes for ſo lazy and wilfull need? Peace ſhould not be good if it were not hard: Go, and by this excuſe ſhut thy ſelf out of heaven at thy death, and live miſerably till thy death, becauſe the good of both worlds is hard to compaſſe. There is nothing but miſery on earth and hell below, that thou canſt come to without labour: And if we can be content to caſt away ſuch immoderate and unſeaſonable paines upon theſe earthly trifles, as to weare our bodies with violence, and to encroach upon the night for time to get them; what madneſſe ſhall it ſeeme in us, not to afford a leſſe labour to that which is infinitely better, and which onely gives worth and goodneſſe to the other? Wherefore if we have not vowed emnity with our ſelves, if wee be not in love with miſery and vexation, if we be not obſtinately careleſſe of our owne good; let us ſhake off this unthrifty, dangerous, and deſperate negligence, and quicken theſe dul hearts, to a lively and effectuall ſearch of what only can yeeld them ſweet and abiding contentment: which once attained, how ſhall wee inſult over evils, and bid them doe their worſt? How ſhal we under this calme and quiet day, laugh at the rough weather and unſteady motions of the world? How ſhall heaven and earth ſmile upon us, and we on them; commanding the one, aſpiring to the other? How pleaſant ſhall our life bee, while neither joyes nor ſorrowes can diſtemper it with exceſſe? yea while the matter of joy that is within us, turnes all the moſt ſad occurrences into pleaſure? How deare and welcome ſhall our death be, that ſhall but lead us from one heaven to another, from peace to glory? Goe now, yee vaine and idle worldlings, and pleaſe your ſelves in the large extent of your rich Mannors, or in the homage of thoſe whom baſeneſſe of mind hath made ſlaves to your greatneſſe, or in the price and faſhions of your full warde-robe, or in the wanton varieties of your delicate Gardens, or in your coffers full of red and white earth; or if there be any other earthly thing, more alluring, more precious, enjoy it, poſſeſſe it, and let it poſſeſſe you: Let me have only my Peace; and let me never want it, till I envy you.

TO THE RIGHT VVORSHIPFVLL,

SIR RICHARD LEA, Knight,

ALL INCREASE OF TRVE HONOVR with God and men.

SIR, ever since I began to bestow my selfe upon the common good, studying wherein my labours might be most serviceable; I still found they could bee no way so well improved, as in that part which concerneth devotion, and the practice of true pietie. For on the one side I perceived the number of Polemicall bookes, rather to breed than end strifes; and those which are doctrinall by reason of their multitude, rather to oppresse than satisfie the Reader; wherein, if we write the same things, we are judged tedious; if indifferent, singular. On the other part, respecting the Reader, I saw the braines of men never more stuffed, their tongues never more stirring, their hearts never more empty, nor their hands more idle. Wherefore after those sudden meditations which passed me without rule, I was easily induced by their successe (as a small thing moves the willing) to send forth this rule of Meditation; and after my Heaven upon Earth, to discourse (although by way of example) of Heaven above. In this Art of mine, I confesse to have received more light from one obscure nameless Monke, which wrote some hundred and twelve yeeres agoe, than from the directions of all other Writers. I would his humility had not made him niggardly of his name, that wee might have known whom to have thanked. It had been easie to have framed it with more curiositie: but God and my soule know, that I made made profit the scope of my labour, and not applause; and therefore (to chuse) I wished rather to be rude than unprofitable. If now the simplicity of any Reader shall bereave him of the benefit of my precepts, I know he may make his use of my examples. Why I have honoured it with your name, I need not give account to the world, which already knoweth your worth and deserts; and shall see by this, that I acknowledge them. Goe you on happily (according to the heavenly advice of your Iunius) in your worthy and glorious profession, still bearing your selfe as one that knoweth vertue the truest Nobility, and Religion the best vertue. The God whom you serue, shall honour you with men, and crowne you in heaven. To his grace I humbly commend you: requesting you onely to accept the worke, and continue your favour to the Author.

Your VVorships humbly devoted,

Jos: Hall.

THE

THE ART OF DIVINE MEDITATION.

CHAP. I.

IT is not, I ſuppoſe, a more bold then profitable labour, after the endevours of ſo many contemplative men, to teach the Art of Meditation: An heavenly buſineſſe, as any belongeth either to man or Chriſtian; and ſuch as whereby the ſoule doth unſpeakably benefit it ſelfe. For by this doe we ranſack our deep and falſe hearts, find out our ſecret enemies, buckle with them, expell them, arme our ſelves againſt their re-entrance. By this, we make uſe of all good meanes, fit our ſelves to all good duties; by this we diſcry our weakneſſe, obtaine redreſſe, prevent tentations, cheer up our ſolitarineſſe, temper our occaſions of delight, get more light unto our knowledge, more heat to our affections, more life to our devotion. By this we grow to be (as we are) ſtrangers upon earth; and, out of a right eſtimation of all earthly things, into a ſweet fruition of inviſible comforts. By this, we ſee our Saviour with Steven, we talk with God as Moſes, and by this we are raviſhed with bleſſed Paul into Paradiſe, and ſee that Heaven which we are loth to leave, which we cannot utter. This alone is the remedy of ſecurity and worldlineſſe, the paſtime of Saints, the ladder of heaven, and in ſhort, the beſt improvement of Chriſtianity. Learn it who can, and neglect it who liſt; he ſhall never find joy, neither in God nor in himſelfe, which doth not both know and practiſe it. And how-ever of old ſome hidden Cloyſters have ingroſſed it to themſelves, and confined it within their Cells, who indeed profeſſing nothing but contemplation, through their immunity from thoſe cares which accompany an active life, might have the beſt leiſure to this buſineſſe: yet ſeeing there is no man ſo taken up with action, as not ſometimes to have a free mind; and there is no reaſonable mind ſo ſimple, as not to be able both to diſcourſe ſomewhat and to better it ſelfe by her ſecret thoughts; I deem it an envious wrong to conceale that from any, whoſe benefit may be univerſall. Thoſe that have but a little ſtock, had need to know the beſt rules of thrift.

The benefit and uſes of Meditation.

Which are univerſall to al Chriſtians, and not to be appropriated to ſome profeſſions.

CHAP. II.

THe rather, for that whereas our Divine Meditation is nothing elſe but a bending of the mind upon ſome ſpirituall object, through divers formes of diſcourſe, untill our thoughts come to an iſſue: and this muſt needs bee either ther extemporall, and occasioned by outward occurrences offered to the mind; or deliberate, and wrought out of our own heart: which again is either in matter of Knowledge, for the finding out of some hidden truth, and convincing of an heresie by profound traversing of reason; or in matter of Affection, for the enkindling of our love to God: the former of these two last, we sending to the Schooles and Masters of Controversies, search after the latter; which is both of larger use, and such as no Christian can reject, as either unnecessary, or over-difficult: for, both every Christian had need of fire put to his affections, and weaker judgements are no lesse capable of this divine heat, which proceeds not so much from reason, as from faith.

The deſcription and kinds of Meditation.

One saith (and I beleeve him) that Gods Schoole is more of Affection, then Understanding: Both lessons very needfull, very profitable; but for this age, especially the latter: for if there be some that have much zeale, little knowledge, there are more that have much knowledge without zeale. And he that hath much skill, and no affection, may doe good to others by information of judgement, but shall never have thank either of his own heart, or of God, who useth not to cast away his love on those, of whom he is but known, not loved.

Chap. III.

Concerning Meditation Extemporall.

OF Extemporall Meditation there may be much use, no rule: forasmuch as our conceits herein vary according to the infinite multitude of objects, and their divers manner of profering themselves to the mind; as also for the suddennesse of this act. Man is placed in this Stage of the world, to view the severall natures and actions of the creature; to view them, not idly, without his use, as they doe him: God made all these for man, and man for his own sake. Both these purposes were lost, if man should let the creatures passe carelesly by him, onely seen, not thought upon. He only can make benefit of what he sees; which if he doe not, it is all one as if he were blind or brute. Whence it is, that wise Salomon putteth the sluggard to schoole unto the Ant; and our Saviour sendeth the distrustfull to the Lilly of the field.

In this kind was that Meditation of the divine Psalmist, which upon the view of the glorious frame of the Heavens, was led to wonder at the mercifull respect God hath to so poore a creature as man. Thus our Saviour took occasion of the water fetcht up solemnly to the Altar, from the Well of Shilo, on the day of the great Hosannah, to meditate and discourse of the Water of life. Thus holy & sweet Augustine, from occasion of the water-course neer to his lodging, running among the pebbles, sometimes more silently, sometimes in a baser murmure, and sometimes in a shriller note, entred into the thought and discourse of that excellent order which God hath setled in all these inferiour things. Thus that learned and heavenly soule of our late Estye, when we sate together and heard a sweet comfort of Musick, seemed upon this occasion carried up for the time before-hand to the place of his rest, saying, not without some passion, What Musick may we think there is in heaven? Thus lastly (for who knowes not that examples of this kind are infinite?) that faithfull and reverend Deering, when the Sun shined on his face now lying on his death-bed, fell into a sweet Meditation of the glory of God, and his approaching joy. The thoughts of this nature are not only lawfull, but so behovefull, that we cannot omit them, without neglect of God, his creatures, our selves. The creatures are half lost, if we only employ them, not learn something of them. God is wronged, if his creatures be unregarded; our selves most of all, if we read this great volume of the creatures, and take out no lesson for our instruction.

Chap. IV.

Cautions of Extemporall Meditation.

WHerein yet caution is to be had, that our Meditations bee not either too farre fetcht, or savouring of superstition. Farre fetcht I call those which have not a faire and easie resemblance unto the matter from whence whence they are raiſed; in which caſe our thoughts prove looſe and heartleſſe, making no memorable impreſſion in the mind. Superſtitious, when we make choiſe of thoſe grounds of Meditation, which are forbidden us as Teachers of Vanity; or imploy our own devices (though well grounded) to an uſe above their reach; making them, upon our own pleaſures, not onely furtherances, but parts of Gods worſhip; in both which, our Meditations degenerate, and grow rather perillous to the ſouſe. Whereto adde, that the mind be not too much cloyed with too frequent iteration of the ſame thought; which at laſt breeds a wearineſſe in our ſelves, and an unpleaſantneſſe of that conceit, which at the firſt entertainment, promiſed much delight. Our nature is too ready to abuſe familiarity in any kind: and it is with Meditations, as with Medicines; which with over-ordinary uſe, loſe their ſoveraignty, and fill, in ſtead of purging. God hath not ſtraited us for matter, having given us the ſcope of the whole world; ſo that there is no creature, event, action, ſpeech, which may not afford us new matter of Meditation. And that which we are wont to ſay of fine wits, we may as truly affirme of the Chriſtian heart, that it can make uſe of any thing. Wherefore as travellers in a foraine country make every ſight a leſſon; ſo ought we in this our pilgrimage. Thou ſeeſt the heaven rolling above thine head, in a conſtant and unmoveable motion; the ſtarres ſo overlooking one another, that the greateſt ſhew little, the leaſt greateſt, all glorious: the aire full of the bottles of raine, or fleeces of ſnow, or divers formes of fiery Exhalations: the Sea under one uniforme face, full of ſtrange and monſtrous ſhapes beneath: the earth ſo adorned with variety of plants, that thou canſt not but tread on many at once with every foot; beſides the ſtore of creatures, that flie about it, walke upon it, live in it. Thou idle Truant, doeſt thou learne nothing of ſo many maſters? Haſt thou ſo long read theſe capitall letters of Gods great Book, and canſt thou not yet ſpell one word of them? The brute creatures ſee the ſame things, with as cleer, perhaps better eies. If thine inward eyes ſee not their uſe, as well as thy bodily eies their ſhape, I know not whether is more reaſonable or leſſe brutiſh.

Chap. V.

Of Meditation deliberate.

Wherein firſt, the qualities of the perſon. Of whom is required; Firſt, that hee bee pure from his ſins.

Deliberate Meditation is that we chiefly inquire for; which both may be well guided, and ſhall not be a little furthered by precepts; part whereof the labours of others ſhall yeeld us; and part the plaineſt miſtreſſe, Experience: wherein order requires of us firſt, the qualities of the perſon fit for meditation; then the circumſtances, manner, and proceedings of the work.

The hill of Meditation may not be climbed with a profane foot; but as in the delivery of the Law, ſo here, no beaſt may touch Gods hill, leſt he die; only the pure of heart, have promiſe to ſee God. Sin dimmeth and dazeleth the eye, that it cannot behold ſpiritual things. The Guard of heavenly Souldiers was about Eliſhaes ſervant before; he ſaw them not before, through the ſcales of his infidelity. The ſoule muſt therefore be purged, ere it can profitably meditate. And as of old they were wont to ſearch for, and thruſt out malefactors from the preſence, ere they went to ſacrifice; ſo muſt we our ſins, ere we offer our thoughts to God. Firſt, ſaith David, I will waſh my hands in innocency, then I will compaſſe thine Altar. Whereupon not unfitly did that worthy Chancellour of Paris make the firſt ſtaire of his Ladder of Contemplation, Humble Repentance. The cloth that is white (which is wont to be the colour of innocency) is capable of any Dye; the black, of none other. Not that we require an abſolute perfection, (which, as it is incident unto none, ſo if it were would exclude all need and uſe of Meditation) but rather an honeſt ſincerity of the heart, not willingly ſinning, willingly repenting when we have ſinned: which who ſo finds in himſelfe, let him not think any weakneſſe a lawfull barre to Meditation. He that pleads this excuſe, is like ſome ſimple man, which being halfe ſtarved with cold, refuſeth to come neer the fire, becauſe he findeth not heat enough in himſelfe.

Chap. VI.

Secondly, that he bee free from worldly thoughts.

NEither may the ſoule that hopeth to profit by meditation, ſuffer it ſelfe for the time intangled with the world; which is all one, as to come to Gods flaming buſh on the hill of viſions, with our ſhooes on our feet. Thou ſeeſt the bird, whoſe feathers are limed, unable to take her former flight: ſo are we, when our thoughts are clinged together by the world, to ſoare up to our heaven in Meditation. The paire of brothers muſt leave their nets if they wil follow Chriſt; Eliſha his oxen, if he will attend a Prophet. It muſt be a free and a light mind that can aſcend this Mount of Contemplation, overcomming this height, this ſteepneſſe. Cares are an heavy load, and uneaſie: theſe muſt be laid downe at the bottome of this hill, if we ever look to attaine the top. Thou art loaded with houſhould cares, perhaps publike; I bid thee not caſt them away: even theſe have their ſeaſon, which thou canſt not omit without impiety: I bid thee lay them down at thy Cloſet dore, when thou attempteſt this worke. Let them in with thee, thou ſhalt find them troubleſome companions, ever diſtracting thee from thy beſt errand. Thou wouldeſt think of heaven, thy Barne comes in thy way, or perhaps thy count-Book, or thy Coffers, or it may be, thy mind is before hand travelling upon the morrowes journey. So while thou thinkeſt of many things, thou thinkeſt of nothing; while thou wouldeſt goe many wayes, thou ſtandeſt ſtill. And as in a crowd, while many preſſe forward at once thorow one doore, none proceedeth; ſo when variety of thoughts tumultuouſly throng in upon the mind, each proveth a barre to the other, and all an hinderance to him that entertaines them.

Chap. VII.

Thirdly, that he be conſtant and that, Firſt, in time and matter.

AND as our Client of meditation muſt both be pure and free in undertaking this taſk, ſo alſo conſtant in continuing it; Conſtant both in time and in matter, both in a ſet courſe and houre reſerved for this work, and in an unwearied proſecution of it once begun. Thoſe that meditate by ſnatches and uncertaine fits, when onely all other employments forſake them, or when good motions are thruſt upon them by neceſſity, let them never hope to reach to any perfection. For theſe feeble beginnings of luke-warme grace, which are wrought in them by one fit of ſerious Meditation, are ſoone extinguiſhed by intermiſſion, and by miſ-wonting periſh: This dayes meale (though large and liberall) ſtrengthens thee not for to morrow: the body languiſheth, if there be not a daily ſupply of repaſt. Thus feed thy ſoule by meditation. Set thine houres and keepe them, and yeeld not to an eaſie diſtraction. There is no hardneſſe in this practice, but in the beginning; uſe ſhall give it not eaſe onely, but delight. Thy companion entertaineth thee this while in loving diſcourſes, or ſome inexpected buſineſſe offers to interrupt thee. Never any good work ſhall want ſome hinderance: Either break thorow the lets, except it be with incivility or loſſe; or if they be importunate, pay thy ſelf the time that was unſeaſonably borrowed: and recompence thine omitted houres with the double labors of another day: For thou ſhalt find, that deferring breeds (beſide the loſſe) an indiſpoſition to good; So that what was before pleaſant to thee being omitted, to morrow growes harſh; the next day unneceſſary; afterward odious. To day thou canſt, but wilt not; to morrow thou couldeſt, but liſteſt not; the next day thou neither wilt nor canſt bend thy mind on theſe thoughts. So I have ſeene friends that upon neglect of duty grow overly: upon overlineſſe ſtrange; upon ſtrangeneſſe to utter defiance. Thoſe, whoſe very trade is Divinity, (me thinks) ſhould omit no day without his line of meditation: thoſe which are ſecular men, not many; remembring that they have a common calling of Chriſtianity to attend, as well as a ſpeciall vocation in the world: and that other being more noble and important, may juſtly challenge both often and diligent ſervice.

Chap.

Chap. VIII.

And as this constancy requires thee to keepe day with thy selfe, unles thou wilt prove bankrupt in good exercises; so also that thy mind should dwell upon the same thought without flitting, without wearinesse, untill it have attained to some issue of spirituall profit: otherwise it attempteth much, effecteth nothing. What availeth it to knock at the doore of the heart, if we depart ere we have an answer? What are we the warmer, if we passe hastily along by the hearth, and stay not at it? Those that doe only travell thorow Africke, become not blackmoores: but those which are borne there, those that inhabite there. We account those damsels too light of their love, which betroth themselves upon the first sight, upon the first motion: and those we deeme of much price, which require long and earnest solliciting. He deceiveth himself that thinketh grace so easily wonne; there must be much suit and importunitie, ere it will yeeld to our desires: Not that we call for a perpetuity of this labour of Meditation; Humane frailtie could never beare so great a toyle. Nothing under heaven is capable of a continuall motion without complaint. It is enough for the glorified spirits above, to be ever thinking and never weary. The mind of man is of a strange metall; if it be not used, it rusteth; if used heardly, it breaketh: briefly, is sooner dulled then satisfied with a continuall Meditation. Whence it came to passe that those ancient Monkes, who intermedled bodily labour with their contemplations, proved so excellent in this divine businesse; when those at this day, which having mewed and mured up themselves from the world, spend themselves wholly upon their Beads, and Crucifix, pretending no other worke but Meditation, have cold hearts to God, and to the world shew nothing but a dull shadow of devotion; for, that if the thoughts of these latter were as divine as they are superstitious: yet being without all interchangableness bent upon the same discourse, the mind must needs grow weary, the thoughts remisse and languishing, the objects tedious: while the other refreshed themselves with this wise variety, imploying the hands, while they called off the mind, as good Comœdians so mix their parts, that the pleasantnesse of the one, may temper the austereness of the other; whereupon they gained both enough to the body, and to the soule more then if it had beene all the while busied.

Secondly, that he be constant in the continuance.

Besides, the excellency of the object letteth this assiduity of Meditation, which is so glorious, that like unto the Sunne, it may abide to have an eye cast upon it for a while, will not be gazed upon; whosoever ventureth so farre, loseth both his hope and his wits. If we hold with that blessed Monica, that such like cogitations are the food of the mind, yet even the mind also hath her satiety, and may surfet of too much. It shall be sufficient therefore, that we persever in our Meditation, without any such affectation of perpetuity, and leave without a light fickleness; making alwayes not our Houreglasse, but some competent increase of our devotion, the measure of our continuance; knowing, that as for Heaven, so for our pursuit of grace, it shall availe us little to have begun well, without perseverance, and withall that the soule of man is not alwayes in the like disposition: but sometimes is longer in setling, through some unquietnesse, or more obstinate distraction; sometimes heavier, and sometimes more active, and nimble to dispatch. * Gerson (whose authority I rather use, because our adversaries disclaime him for theirs) professeth, he hath beene sometimes foure hours together working his heart, ere he could frame it to purpose. A singular patterne of unwearied constancy, of an unconquerable spirit; whom his present unfitnesse did not so much discourage, as it whetted him to strive with himselfe till he could overcome. And surely other victories are hazzardous, this certaine, if we will persist to strive: other fights are upon hope, this upon assurance; whiles our successe dependeth upon the promise of God, which cannot disappoint us. Persist therefore, and prevaile: persist till thou hast prevailed: so that which thou beganst with difficultie, shall end in comfort.

Chap. IX.

Of the Circumstance of Meditation.

And therein, First of the place.

FRom the qualities of the Person, we descend towards the action it selfe: where first we meet with those circumstances which are necessary for our prediſposition to the worke; Place, Time, Site of the body.

Solitarinesse of Place is fittest for Meditation. Retire thy selfe from others, if thou wouldst talke profitably with thy selfe. So Jesus meditates alone in the Mount, Isaac in the fields, John Baptist in the Desart, David on his bed, Chrysostome in the Bath, each in severall places; but all solitary. There is no place free from God, none to which he is more tied; one finds his Closet most convenient, where his eyes being limited by the knowne walls, call the mind after a sort from wandring abroad. Another findeth his soule more free, when it beholdeth his heaven above and about him. It matters not so we be solitary and silent. It was a wittie and divine speech of Bernard, that the Spouse of the soule, Christ Jesus, is bashfull, neither willingly commeth to his Bride in the presence of a multitude. And hence is that sweet invitation which we find o her: Come my welt eloved, let us goe forth into the fields: let us lodge in the villages: Let us goe up early to the Vines: let us see if the Vine flourish, whether it hath disclosed the first Grape, or whether the Pomgranates blossome; there will I give thee my love. Abandon therefore all worldly societie, that thou maist change it for the company of God and his Angels; the society, I say, of the world, not outward onely, but inward also. There be many that sequester themselves from the visible company of men, which yet carry a world within them; who being alone in body, are haunted with a throng of fancies: as Ierome, in his wildest Desart, found himselfe too oft in his thoughts amongst the dances of the Roman Dames. This company is worse then the other: for it is more possible for some thoughtfull men to have a solitary mind in the midst of a market, then for a man thus disposed to be alone in a wildernesse. Both companies are enemies to Meditations: whither tendeth that ancient counsell of a great Master in this Art, of three things requisite to this businesse, Secrecy, Silence, Rest: whereof the first excludeth company, the second noise, the third motion. It cannot be spoken how subject we are in this worke, to distraction, like Salomons old man, whom the noise of every bird wakeneth: sensuall delights we are not drawne from with the three-fold cords of Judgment; but our spiritual pleasures are easily hindered. Make choise therefore of that place, which shall admit the fewest occasions of withdrawing thy soule from good thoughts: wherein also even change of places is somewhat prejudiciall; and I know not how it falls out, that we find God neerer us in the place where we have beene accustomed familiarly to meet him: not for that his presence is confined to one place above others, but that our thoughts are, through custome more easily gathered to the place where we have ordinarily cõversed with him.

Chap. X.

Secondly, of the time.

ONe Time cannot be prescribed to all: for neither is God bound to houres, neither doth the contrary disposition of men agree in one choyce of opportunities: the golden houres of the morning some find fittest for Meditation, when the body newly raised, is well calmed with his late rest, and the soule hath not as yet had from these outward things any motives of alienation. Others find it best to learne wisdome of their reines in the night; hoping with Iob, that their bed will bring them comfort in their Meditation; when both all other things are still, and themselves, wearied with these earthly cares, doe out of a contempt of them, grow into greater liking and love of heavenly things. I have ever found Isaacs time fittest, who went out in the evening, to meditate. No precept, no practise of others can prescribe to us in this circumstance. It shall be enough, that first we set our selves a time: secondly, that we set apart that time, wherein we are aptest for this service. And as no time is prejudiced with unfitnesse, but every day is without difference seasonable for this worke, so especially Gods Day. No day is barren of grace

A grace to the ſearcher of it, none alike fruitfull to this; which being by God ſanctified to himſelfe, and to be ſanctified by us to God, is priviledged with bleſſings above others: for the plentifull inſtruction of that Day ſtirreth thee up to this action, and fills thee with matter; and the zeal of thy publike ſervice warmeth thy heart to this other buſineſſe of devotion. No Manna fell to the Iſraelites on their Sabbath; our ſpirituall Manna falleth on ours, moſt frequent: if thou wouldeſt have a full ſoule, gather as it falls, gather it by hearing, reading, meditation: ſpirituall idleneſſe is a fault this Day, perhaps not leſſe then bodily worke.

Chap. XI.

B NEither is there leſſe variety in the Site and geſture of the body: the due compoſedneſſe whereof is no little advantage to this exerciſe; even in our ſpeech to God, we obſerve not alwaies one and the ſame poſition; ſometimes we fall groveling on our faces; ſometimes we bow our knees: ſometimes ſtand on our feet; ſometimes we lift up our hands, ſometimes caſt downe our eyes. God is a Spirit, who therefore being a ſevere obſerver of the diſpoſition of the ſoule, is not ſcrupulous for the body; requiring not ſo much, that the geſture thereof ſhould be uniforme, as reverent. No marvell therefore though in this all our teachers of Meditation have commended ſeverall poſitions of body, according to their diſpoſition and practice. * One, ſitting with the face turned up to heaven-ward, according to the C precept of the philoſopher, who taught him, that by ſitting and reſting, the mind gathereth wiſdome.* Another, leauing to ſome Reſt, towards the left ſide, for the greater quieting of the heart. * A third, ſtanding with the eyes lift up to Heaven, but ſhut, for feare of diſtractions. But of all other (me thinketh) Iſaacs choice the beſt, who meditated walking. In this let every man be his owne maſter; ſo be we uſe that frame of body that may both teſtifie reverence and in ſome caſes helpe to ſtirre up further devotion; which alſo muſt needs be varied according to the matter of our Meditation. If we think of our ſinnes, Ahabs ſoft paſe, the Publicans dejected eyes, and his hand beating his breſt, are moſt ſeaſonable. If of the joyes of heaven, Stevens countenance fixed above, and Davids hands lift up on high, are moſt fitting. In all which, the body, as it is the inſtrument and vaſſall of the ſoule, ſo will eaſily follow D the affections thereof; and in truth then is our devotion moſt kindly, when the body is thus commanded his ſervice by the Spirit, and not ſuffered to goe before it, and by his forwardneſſe to provoke his maſter to emulation.

Chap. XII.

NOw time and order call us from theſe circumſtances, to the matter & ſubject of Meditation: which muſt be Divine and Spirituall; not evill, nor worldly. O the Carnall and unprofitable thoughts of men! We all meditate; one, how to doe ill to others; another, how to doe ſome earthly good to himſelfe: another, E to hurt himſelfe, under a colour of good, as how to accompliſh his lewd deſires; the fulfilling whereof proveth the bane of the ſoule; how he may ſinne unſeene, and goe to hell with the leaſt noiſe of the world. Or perhaps, ſome better mindes bend their thoughts upon the ſearch of naturall things; the motions of every heaven, and of every ſtarre; the reaſon and courſe of the ebbing and flowing of the Sea; the manifold kinds of ſimples that grow out of the earth, and creatures that creepe upon it; with all their ſtrange qualities, and operations. Or perhaps, the ſeverall formes of government, and rules of State take up their buſie heads: ſo that while they would be acquainted with the whole world, they are ſtrangers at home, and while they ſeek to know all other things, they remaine unknowne of themſelves. The God that made them, the vileneſſe of their nature, the danger of their ſinnes, the multitude of their imperfections, the Saviour that bought them, the Heaven that he bought for them, are in the meane time as unknowne, as unregarded, as if they were not.

Of the matter and ſubject of our Meditation.

Thus doe fooliſh children ſpend their time and labour, in turning over leaves to look for painted babes, not at all reſpecting the ſolid matter under their hands. We fooles, when will we be wiſe, and turning our eyes from vanity, with that ſweet Singer of Iſrael, make Gods ſtatutes our ſong and meditation in the houſe of our pilgrimage? A

Earthly things profer themſelves with importunity. Heavenly things muſt with importunity be ſued to. Thoſe, if they were not ſo little worth, would not be ſo forward, and being forward, need not any Meditation to ſolicite them: Theſe, by how much more hard they are to intreat, by ſo much more precious they are being obtained; and therefore worthier our indevour. As then we cannot goe amiſſe, ſo long as we keep our ſelves in the tracke of Divinity; while the ſoule is taken up with the thoughts either of the Deity in his eſſence, and perſons, (ſparingly yet in this point, and more in faith and admiration then inquiry) or of his attributes, his Juſtice, Power, Wiſdome, Mercy, Truth: or of his workes, in the creation, preſervation, government of all things; according to the Pſalmiſt, I will meditate of the beauty of thy glorious Majeſty, and thy wonderfull workes: ſo, moſt directly in our way, and beſt fitting our exerciſe of Meditation, are thoſe matters in Divinity, which can moſt of all work compunction in the heart, and moſt ſtirre us up to devotion. Of which kind are the Meditations concerning Chriſt Jeſus our Mediator, his Incarnation, Miracles, Life, Paſſion, Buriall, Reſurrection, Aſcenſion, Interceſſion, the benefit of our Redemption, the certainty of our Election, the graces and proceeding of our Sanctification, our glorious eſtate in Paradiſe loſt in our firſt Parents, our preſent vilenes, our inclination to ſinne, our ſeverall actuall offences, the tentations and ſleights of evill Angels, the uſe of the Sacraments, nature and practice of Faith and Repentance: the miſeries of our life, with the frailty of it; the certainty and uncertainty of our death, the glory of Gods Saints above, the awfulneſſe of Judgement, the terrours of hell, and the reſt of this quality: wherein both it is fit to have variety, (for that even the ſtrongeſt ſtomack doth not alwaies delight in one diſh) and yet ſo to change, that our choyce may be free from wildneſſe and inconſtancy. B C

Chap. XIII.

The order of the work it ſelfe.

NOw after that we have thus orderly ſuited the perſon and his qualities, with the due circumſtances of time, place, diſpoſition of body, and ſubſtance of the matter diſcuſſed, I know not what can remaine, beſides the maine buſineſſe it ſelfe, and the manner and degrees of our proſecution thereof; which above all other calleth for an intentive Reader, and reſolute practice. Wherein that we may avoid all niceneſſe and obſcurity (ſince we ſtrive to profit) we will give direction for the Entrance, Proceeding, Concluſion of this Divine worke. D

Chap. XIV.

The entrance into the work.

A Goodly building muſt ſhew ſome magnificence in the gate; and great perſonages have ſeemly Uſhers to goe before them; who by their uncovered heads command reverence and way. Even very Poets of old had wont, before their Ballads to implore the aid of their gods. And the Heathen Romans entred not upon any publike civill buſineſſe, without a ſolemne apprecation of good ſucceſſe: How much leſſe ſhould a Chriſtian dare to undertake a ſpiritual work of ſuch importance, not having craved the aſſiſtance of his God? which (me thinks) is no leſſe, then to profeſſe he could doe well without Gods leave. When we think evill, it is from our ſelves: when good, from God. As Prayer is our ſpeech to God, ſo is each good Meditation (according to Bernard) Gods ſpeech to the heart: The heart muſt ſpeake to God, that God may ſpeak to it. Prayer therefore and Meditation, are as thoſe famous Twinnes in the ſtory, or as Two loving Turtles, whereof ſeparate one, the other languiſheth. E

1 the common entrance, which is Prayer.

Prayer maketh way for Meditation. Meditation giveth matter, ſtrength, and life to our

A our prayers. By which, as all other things are ſanctified to us, ſo we are ſanctified to all holy things. This is as ſome royall Eunuch to perfume and dreſſe our ſoules, that they may be fit to converſe with the King of Heaven.

But the prayer that leadeth in Meditation would not be long, requiring rather that the extenſion and length ſhould be put into the vigour and fervencie of it; for that is not here intended to be the principall buſineſſe, but an introduction to another; and no otherwiſe, then as a Portall to this building of Meditation: The matter whereof ſhall be, that the courſe of our Meditation may be guided aright and bleſſed; that all diſtractions may be avoided; our judgement enlightened, our inventions quickned, our wills rectified, our affections whetted to heavenly things, our hearts inlarged to God-ward, our devotion enkindled; ſo that we may find our corruptions abated, our B graces thriven, our ſoules and lives every way bettered by this exerciſe.

Chap. XV.

SUch is the common entrance into this worke: there is another yet more particular and proper; wherein the mind, recollecting it ſelfe, maketh choyce of that Theme or matter whereupon it will beſtow it ſelfe for the preſent; ſetling it ſelfe on that which it hath choſen: which is done by an inward inquiſition made into our heart, of what we both doe, and ſhould think upon: rejecting what is unexpedient and unprofitable. In both which, the Soule, like unto ſome noble Hawke, lets paſſe the Crows, and Larks, and ſuch other worthleſſe Birds that croſſe her way, and C ſtoopeth upon a Fowle of price, worthy of her flight: after this manner.

Particular and proper entrance into the matter, which is in our choyce thereof.

What wilt thou muſe upon, O my ſoule? thou ſeeſt how little it availeth thee to wander and rove about in uncertainties: thou findeſt how little ſavour there is in theſe earthly things, wherewith thou haſt wearied thy ſelfe; Trouble not thy ſelfe any longer (with Martha) about the many and needleſſe thoughts of the world: None but heavenly things can afford thee comfort: up then, my ſoule, and minde thoſe things that are above, whence thy ſelfe art: Amongſt all which wherein ſhouldeſt thou rather meditate then of the life and glory of Gods Saints? A worthier imployment thou canſt never find, then to thinke upon that eſtate thou ſhalt once poſſeſſe and now deſireſt.

Chap. XVI.

D HItherto the entrance; after which, our Meditation muſt proceed in due order, not troubledly, not prepoſterouſly: It begins in the underſtanding, endeth in the affection; It begins in the braine, deſcends to the heart; Begins on earth, aſcends to Heaven; Not ſuddenly, but by certaine ſtaires and degrees till we come to the higheſt.

The proceeding of our Meditation.

I have found a ſubtill ſcale of Meditation, admired by ſome Profeſſors of this Art, above all other humane devices, and farre preferred by them to the beſt directions of Origen, Auſtin, Bernard, Hugo, Bonaventure, Gerſon, and whoſoever hath beene reputed of greateſt perfection in this skill. The ſeverall ſtaires whereof (leſt I ſhould ſeeme to defraud my Reader through envy) I would willingly deſcribe, were it not E that I feared, to ſcarre him rather with the danger of obſcuritie, from venturing further upon this ſo worthy a buſineſſe: yet leſt any man perhaps might complaine of an unknowne loſſe, my Margent ſhall find roome for that which I hold too knottie for my Text.

And therein a Method allowed by ſome Authors rejected by us.

* In all which, (after the incredible commendations of ſome practitioners) I doubt not but an ordinary Reader will eaſily eſpie a double fault at the leaſt, Darkneſſe and Coincidence: that they are both too obſcurely delivered, and that divers of them fall into other, not without ſome vaine ſuperfluitie. For this part therefore which concerneth the underſtanding, I had rather to require onely a deepe and firme Conſideration of the thing propounded: which ſhall be done if we follow it in our diſcourſe, through all, or the principall of thoſe places which naturall reaſon doth afford us: wherein, let no man pleade ignorance, or feare difficultie: we are all thus farre borne Logicians; neither is there, in this, ſo much need of skill, as of induſtrie. In which courſe yet, we may not be too curious, in a preciſe ſearch of every place and argument, without omiſſion of any (though to be fetcht in with racking the invention.) For as the mind, if it goe looſe and without rule, roves to no purpoſe; ſo if it be too much fettered, with the gieves of ſtrict regularitie, moveth nothing at all.

Chap. XVII.

Premonitions concerning our proceeding in the firſt part of Meditation.

Ere I enter therefore into any particular tractation, there are three things whereof I would premoniſh my Reader, concerning this firſt part, which is in the underſtanding. Firſt, that I deſire not to binde every man to the ſame uniforme proceeding in this part: Practiſe and cuſtome may perhaps have taught other courſes more familiar, and not leſſe direct. If then we can, by any other method, worke in our hearts ſo deepe an apprehenſion of the matter meditated, as it may duly ſtirre the affections, it is that onely we require.

Secondly, that whoſoever applieth himſelfe to this direction, think him not neceſſarily tied to the proſecution of all theſe Logicall places, which he findeth in the ſequell of our Treatiſe, ſo as his Meditation ſhould be lame and imperfect without the whole number: for there are ſome Themes will not beare all theſe; as when we meditate of God, there is no roome for Cauſes or Compariſons, and others yeeld them with ſuch difficultie, that their ſearch interrupteth the chiefe worke intended. It ſhall be ſufficient, if we take the moſt pregnant, and moſt voluntary.

Thirdly, that when we ſtick in the diſpoſition of any the places following (as if, meditating of Sin, I cannot readily meet with the Materiall and Formall Cauſes, or the Appendances of it) we racke not our mindes too much with the inquiry thereof; which were to ſtrive more for Logique, then devotion: but without too much diſturbance of our thoughts, quietly paſſe over to the next. If we breake our teeth with the ſhell, we ſhall find ſmall pleaſure in the kernell.

Now then for that my only feare is, leſt this part of my diſcourſe ſhall ſeem over-perplexed unto the unlearned Reader; I will in this whole proceſſe, ſecond my rule with his example, that ſo what might ſeeme obſcure in the one, may by the other be explained; and the ſame ſteps he ſeeth me take in this, he may accordingly tread in any other Theme.

Chap.

Chap. XVIII.

The practice of Meditation, wherein, First we begin with some description of that we meditate of.

FIrst therefore it shall be expedient to consider seriously, what the thing is whereof we meditate.

What then, O my soule, is the life of the Saints, whereof thou studiest? who are the Saints, but those which having been weakly holy upon earth, are perfectly holy above? which even on earth were perfectly holy in their Saviour, now are so in themselves? which overcomming on earth, are truely canonized in Heaven? What is their life, but that blessed estate above, wherein their glorified soule hath a full fruition of God?

Chap. XIX.

Secondly, followes an easie and voluntary division of the matter meditated.

THe nature whereof, after we have thus shadowed out to our selves by a description, not curious alwayes, and exactly framed according to the rules of Art, but sufficient for our owne conceit; the next is (if it shall seeme needfull, or if the matter will beare, or offer it) some easie and voluntarie division, whereby our thoughts shall have more roome made for them, and our proceeding shall be more distinct.

There is a life of nature, when thou, my soul, dwellest in this body, and informest thine earthly burthen. There is a life of grace, whē the Spirit of God dwells in thee. There is a life of glory, when the body being united to thee, both shall be united to God: or when in the meane time, being separated from thy companion, thou enjoyest God alone. This life of thine therefore, as the other, hath his ages, hath his statures; for it entreth upon his birth, when thou passest out of thy body, and changest this earthly house for an Heavenly: It enters into his full vigour, when at the day of the common resurrection, thou resumest this thy companion, unlike to it selfe, like to thee, like to thy Saviour, immortall now, & glorious. In this life here may be degrees; there can be no imperfection. If some be like the Skie, others like the Starres, yet all shine. If some sit at their Saviours right hand, others at his left, all are blessed. If some vessels hold more, all are full; none complaineth of want, none envieth him that hath more.

Chap. XX.

3. A consideration of the causes thereof in all kinds of them.

WHich done, it shall be requisit for our perfecter understanding, and for the laying grounds of matter for our affection, to carry it thorow those other principall places, and heads of reason, which nature hath taught every man, both for knowledge and amplification: the first whereof are the Causes, of all sorts.

Whence is this eternall life, but from him which only is eternall, which only is the fountaine of life, yea life it selfe? Who but the same God that gives our tēporall life, giveth also that eternal? The Father bestoweth it, the Son meriteth it, the holy Ghost seales & applieth it. Expect it only frō him, O my soul, whose free electiō gave thee the first title to it, to be purchased by the blood of thy Saviour. For thou shalt not therefore be happy, because he saw that thou wouldest be good; but therfore art thou good, because he hath ordained, thou shalt be happy. He hath ordained thee to life, he hath givē thee a Saviour to give this life unto thee; faith, whereby thou mightest attain to this Saviour; his Word, by which thou mightst attain to this faith; what is there in this not his? And yet not his so simply, as that it is without thee: without thy merite indeed, not without thine act. Thou livest here through his blessing, but by bread; thou shalt live above through his mercy, but by thy faith below, apprehending the Author of thy life. And yet as he wil not save thee without thy faith, so thou canst never have faith without his gift. Looke to him therefore O my soule, as the beginner and finisher of thy salvation; and while thou magnifiest the Auther, be ravished with the glory of the worke: which farre passeth both the tongue of Angels, & the hart of man. It can be no good thing that is not there. How can they want water, that have the spring? Where God is enjoyed, in whō only all things are good, what good can be wanting? And what perfectiō of blisse is there, where all goodnes is met and united? In thy preſence is fulneſſe of Joy, and at thy right hand are pleaſures for evermore. O bleſſed reflection of glory! We ſee there, as we are ſeene, in that we are ſeene it is our glory; in that we ſee, it is Gods glory; therefore doth he glorifie us, that our glory ſhould be his. How worthy art thou, O Lord, that through us thou ſhouldeſt looke at thy ſelfe!

4. The conſideration of the Fruits and Effects.

THe next place ſhall be the fruits and effects following upon their ſeverall cauſes: which alſo affords very feeling and copious matter to our meditation; wherein it ſhall be ever beſt, not ſo much to ſeeke for all, as to chuſe out the chiefeſt.

No marvell then if from this glory proceed unſpeakable joy, and from this joy the ſweet ſongs of praiſe & thanksgiving. The Spirit bids us, when we are merry ſing: How much more then, whē we are merry without all mixture of ſorrow, beyond all meaſure of our earthly affections, ſhall we ſing joyful Hallelu-jahs & Hoſannahs to him that dwelleth in the higheſt heavens? our hearts ſhall be ſo full, that we cannot chuſe but ſing, and we cannot but ſing melodiouſly. There is no jar in this Muſick, no end of this ſong. O bleſſed change of the Saints! They do nothing but weep below, and now nothing but ſing above. We ſowed in teares, reape in joy; there was ſome comfort in thoſe teares, when they were at the worſt; but there is no danger of complaint in this heavenly mirth. If we cannot ſing here with Angels, On earth peace, yet there we ſhall ſing with them, Glory to God on high; and joyning our voices to theirs, ſhall make up that celeſtiall conſort, which none can either heare or beare part in, and not be happy.

Chap. XXII.

5. Conſideration of the Subject wherein, or whereabout it is.

AFter which comes to be conſidered the Subject, either wherein that is, or whereabout that is imployed, which we meditate of: As,

And indeed, what leſſe happineſſe doth the very place promiſe, wherein this glory is exhibited? which is no other then the Paradiſe of God. Here below we dwell, or rather we wander in a continued wilderneſſe, there we ſhall reſt us in the true Eden: I am come into my Garden, my Siſter, my Spouſe. Kings uſe not to dwell in cottages of Clay, but in Royall Courts fit for their eſtate: How much more ſhall the King of Heaven, who hath prepared for men ſo faire manſions on earth, make himſelfe an habitation ſutable to his Majeſtie? even earthly Princes have dwelt in Cedar and Ivory: But the great City, Holy Jeruſalem, the Palace of the Higheſt, hath her walls of Iaſper, her building of gold, her foundation of precious ſtones, her gates of pearle: How glorious things are ſpoken of thee, O thou City of God! we ſee but the pavement, and yet how goodly it is! The beleeving Centurion, thought himſelfe unworthy that Chriſt ſhould come under his roofe: yet wert thou, O Saviour, in thine humbled eſtate, in the forme of a ſervant: How then ſhall I thinke my ſelfe worthy to come under this roofe of thine, ſo ſhining and glorious? O, if this clay of mine may come to this honour above, let it be trampled upon and deſpiſed on earth.

Chap. XXIII.

6. Conſid. of the Appendances and Qualities of it.

SIxtly, ſhall follow the Appendances and Qualities, which cleave unto the ſubject whereof we meditate: As,

But were the place leſſe noble and majeſticall; yet the company which it affordeth, hath enough to make the ſoule bleſſed. For, not the place giveth ornament to the gueſt, ſo much as the gueſt to the place. How loath are we to leave this earth, only for the ſociety of ſome few friends in whom we delight, which yet are ſubject every day to mutuall diſlikes? what pleaſure ſhall we then take in the enjoying of the Saints; when there is nothing in them not amiable, nothing in us that may coole the fervour of our love? There ſhalt thou, my ſoule, thy ſelf glorified, meet with thy deare Parents and friends alike glorious, never to be ſevered: There thou ſhalt ſee & converſe with thoſe ancient Worthies of the former world; the bleſſed Patriarkes & Prophets, with the crowned Martyrs and Confeſſors; with the holy Apoſtles, and the Fathers

A Fathers of that Primitive & this present Church, shining each one according to the measure of his blessed labors. There shalt thou live familiarly in the sight of those Angels, whom now thou receivest good from, but seest not. There (which is the head of all thy felicity,) thine eies shall see Him whom now thine heart longeth for, (that Saviour of thine) in the only hope of whom now thou livest. Alas, how dimly, and afarre off dost thou now behold him? How imperfectly dost thou enjoy him, while every temptation bereaves thee for the time, of his presence? I sought him whom my soule loveth: I sought him, but found him not; his back is now towards thee many times, through thy sins, and therefore thou hardly discerneſt him. Otherwhile & often thy back is turned unto him through negligence, that when thou mightest obscurely see him, thou dost not: now thou shalt see him, and thine eyes thou fixed shall not be removed. Yet neither could this glory make us happy, if being thus absolute, it were not
B perpetuall. To be happy, is not so sweet a state, as it is miserable to have been happy. Left ought therefore should be wanting, behold, this felicity knoweth no end, feareth no intermission, and is as eternall for the continuance, as he that had no beginning. O blessednesse truly infinite! Our earthly joyes dot scarce ever begin; but when they begin, their end bordereth upon their beginning. One hour seeth us oft-times joyfull & miserable: here alone is nothing but eternity. If then the Divine Prophet thought here one day in Gods earthly house, better then a thousand other-where, what shall I compare to thousands of millions of yeers in Gods heavenly Temple? Yea, millions of yeers are not so much as a minute to eternity, and that other house not a cottage to this.

Chap. XXIV.

7 Of that which is divers from it, or contrary to it.

SEventhly, our thoughts, leaving a while the consideration of the thing as it is in it selfe, shall descend unto it as respectively with others; and therefore first shall meditate of that which is diverse from it, or contrary unto it.

What dost thou here then, O my soule? What dost thou here groveling upon earth? where the best things are vanity, the rest no bettter then vexation. Look round about thee, and see whether thine eies can meet with any thing but either sinnes or miseries. Those few & short pleasures thou seest, and ever sorrowfully, and in the mean time are intermingled with many grievances. Here thou haarest one cry out of a sick body, wherof there is no part which affords not choise of diseases. This man layeth his hand upon his consuming lungs, & complaineth of short wind: that other, upon his rising spleene: a third shaketh his painfull head: another
D roars out for the torment of his reins or bladder: another for the racking of his gowty joynts: one is distempered with a watery Dropsie, another with a windy Collick, a third with a fiery Ague, a fourth with an earthen melancholy; one grovels & soweth with the falling sickneſs; another lyeth bed rid, half senseleſſe with a dead Palsie. There are but few bodies that complaine not of some disease; and that thou maiest not look farre, it is a wonder if thy ſelf feel not alwaies one of these evils within thee. There, thou heareſt another lament his losse: either his estate is impaired by suretiship, or stealth, or shipwrack, or oppression; or his child is unruly, or miscaried; or his wife dead, or disloyall; another tormented with paſsions; each one is some way miserable. But, that which is yet more irkesome, thy one eare is beaten with cursings and blaſphemies; thy other with scornfull, or wanton, or murthering speeches; thine eies
E see nothing but pride, filthinesse, profaneneſſe, blood, exceſſe, & whatsoever else might vex a righteous soule: and if all the world besides were innocent, thou findest enough within thy selfe to make thy selfe weary, and thy life loathsome. Thou needest not fetch cause of complaint from others; thy corruptions yeeld thee too much at home; ever sinning, ever presuming; Sinning even when thou haſt repented: yea, even while thou repenteſt, sinning. Goe to now, my soule, and solace thy selfe here below, and suffer thy selfe besotted with these goodly contentments; worthy of no better, while thou fixeſt thy self on these: see if thou canst find any of these above; and if thou canst meet with any distemper, any losse, any sin, any complaint, from thy selfe or any other above, despise thine Heaven, as much as now thou loveſt the earth. Or if all this cannot enough commend unto thee the state of Heavenly glory, cast down thine eies yet lower, into that deep and bottomleſſe pit, full of horrour, full of torment, where there is nothing but flames, and tears, and shricks, and gnaſhing of teeth, nothing but Fiends, and tortures: where there is palpable darkneſſe, and yet perpetuall fire; where the damned damned are ever boyling, never consumed; ever dying, never dead; ever complaining, never pitied; where the Glutton, that once would not give a crust of bread, now begs for one drop of water; and yet alas, if whole rivers of water should fall into his mouth, how should they quench those rivers of Brimstone that feed this flame? where there is no intermission of complaints, no breathing from paine, & after millions of yeeres, no possibility of comfort. And if the rod wherewith thou chastisest thy children, O Lord, even in this life, be so smart and galling, that they have been brought down to the brim of despaire, and in the bitternesse of their soul have intreated death to release them: What shall I think of their plagues, in whose righteous confusion thou consultest, and saiest; Aha, I will avenge me of mine enemies? Even that thou shalt not be thus miserable, O my soule, is some kind of happinesse: but that thou shalt be as happy, as the reprobate are miserable, how worthy is it of more estimation, then thy self is capable of?

Chap. XXV.

3 Of comparisons and similitudes whereby it may be most fitly set forth.

After this opposition, the mind shall make comparison of the matter meditated, with what may neerest resemble it; and shall illustrate it with fittest similitudes, which give no small light to the understanding, nor lesse force to the affection.

Wonder then, O my soule, as much as thou canst, at this glory; and in comparison thereof, contemne this earth, which now thou treadest upon; whose joyes if they were perfect, are but short; and if they were long, are imperfect. One day when thou art above, looking down from the height of thy glory, and seeing the sons of men creeping like so many Ants on this Molehill of earth, thou shalt think, Alas, how basely I once lived! Was yonder silly dungeon the place I so loved, and was so loth to leave! Think so now before hand, and since of heaven thou canst not, yet account of the earth as it is worthy. How heartlesse and irkesome are ye, O yee best earthly pleasures, if ye be matched with the least of those above? How vile are you, O yee sumptuous buildings of Kings, even if all the entrails of the earth had agreed to enrich you, in comparison of this frame not made with hands? It is not so high above the earth in distance of place, as in worth and Majesty. We may see the face of heaven from the heart of the earth; but frō the neerest part of the earth who can see the least glory of heaven? The three Disciples on mount Tabor, saw but a glimpse of this glory shining upon the face of their Saviour; & yet being ravished with the sight, cryed out, Master, it is good being here, and, thinking of building of three Tabernacles (for Christ, Moses, Elias) could have been content themselves to have lien without shelter, so they might always have enjoyed that sight. Alas, how could earthly Tabernacles have fitted those heavenly bodies? They knew what they saw; what they said they knew not. Lo, these three Disciples were not transfigured; yet how deeply they were affected even with the glory of others! How happy shall we be, when our selves shall be changed into glorious? & shall have Tabernacles not of our own making, but prepared for us by God? & yet not tabernacles, but eternall Mansions? Moses saw God but a while, and shined: how shall we shine that shall behold his face for ever? What greater honour is there then in Soveraignty? What greater pleasure then in feasting? This life is both a Kingdome and a feast. A kingdome: He that overcomes, shall rule the Nations, and shall sit with me in my Throne: O blessed promotion! Oh large dominion and royall seat! to which Salomons Throne of Ivory was not worthy to become a foot-stoole. A feast: Blessed are they that are called to the Marriage-supper of the Lamb. Feasts have more then necessity of provision, more then ordinary dyet; but mariage feasts yet more then common abundance; but the Mariage-feast of the sonne of God to his blessed Spouse the Church, must so farre exceed in all heavenly munificence and variety, as the persons are of the greater state and Majesty. There is new wine, pure Manna, and all manner of spirituall dainties; and with the continuall cheere, a sweet and answerable welcome; while the Bridegroom lovingly cheereth us up, Eat, O friends, drink, and make you merry, O welbeloved: yea, there shalt thou be my soule, not a guest, but (how unworthy soever) the Bride her selfe, whom he hath everlastingly espoused to himself in truth and righteousnesse. The contract is passed here below, the mariage is consummate above, and solemnized with a perpetuall feast: so that now thou maiest safely say, My well-beloved is mine, and I am

A am his: Wherefore hearken, O my ſoule, and conſider and incline thine eare, forget alſo thine owne people, and thy fathers houſe, (thy ſuppoſed home of this world) ſo ſhall the King have pleaſure in thy beauty; for he is the Lord, and worſhip thou him.

Chap. XXVI.

THe very Names and Titles of the matter conſidered, yeeld no ſmall ſtore to our Meditation: which being commonly ſo impoſed, that they ſecretly comprehend the nature of the thing which they repreſent, are not unworthy of our diſcourſe. 9. The Titles and Names of the thing conſidered.

What need I ſeeke thoſe reſemblances, when the very name of life implieth ſweetneſſe to men on earth, even to them which confeſſe to live with ſome diſcontentment? Surely the
B light is a pleaſant thing, and it is good to the eyes to ſee the Sun: yet when Temporall is added to Life, I know not how this addition detracteth ſomething, and doth greatly abate the pleaſure of Life; for thoſe which joy to think of Life grieve to thinke it but Temporall: ſo vexing is the end of that whoſe continuance was delightfull. But now when there is an addition (above Time) of Eternity, it maketh life ſo much more ſweet as it is moſt laſting; and laſting infinitely, what can it give leſſe than an infinite contentment? Oh dying and falſe life, which we enjoy here, and ſcarce a ſhadow and counterfeit of that other! What is more eſteemed than glory? which is ſo precious to men of ſpirit, that it makes them prodigall of their bloud, proud of their wounds, careleſſe of themſelves: and yet (alas) how pent, and how fading is this glory, effected with ſuch dangers and death? hardly after all Trophees and
C monuments, either knowne to the next Sea, or ſurviving him that dieth for it: It is true glory to triumph in heaven, where is neither envy nor forgetfulneſſe.

What is more deare to us than our Countrey? which the worthy and faithfull Patriots of all times have reſpected above their parents, their children, their lives; counting it only happy to live in it, and to dye for it. The baniſht man pines for the want of it: the traveller digeſteth all the tedioufneſſe of his way, all the ſorrowes of an ill journey, in the only hope of home; forgetting all his forraine miſeries, when he feeleth his owne ſmoke. Where is our Countrey but above? Thence thou cameſt, O my ſoule; thither thou art going, in a ſhort, but weary pil-
D grimage. O miſerable men, if we account our ſelves at home in our pilgrimage; if in our journey, we long not for home! Doeſt thou ſee men ſo in love with their native ſoyle, that even when it is all deformed with the deſolations of warre, and turned into rude heaps, or while it is even now flaming with the fire of civill broiles, they covet yet ſtill to live in it, preferring it to all other places of more peace and pleaſure? and ſhalt thou, ſeeing nothing but peace and bleſſedneſſe at home, nothing but trouble abroad, content thy ſelfe with a faint wiſh of thy diſſolution? If heaven were thy Iayle, thou couldeſt but thinke of it uncomfortably. Oh what affection can be worthy of ſuch an home!

Chap. XXVII.

LAſtly, if wee can recall any pregnant Teſtimonies of Scripture concerning our Theme, thoſe ſhall fitly conclude this part of our Meditation. Of Scripture; for that in theſe matters of God, none but divine authority can command aſſent, and ſettle the conſcience. Witneſſes of holy men may ſerve for colours, but the ground muſt be only from God. 10. Conſid. of fit teſtimonies of Scripture, concerning our Theme.

There it is (ſaith the Spirit of God, which cannot deceive thee) that all teares ſhall be wiped
E from our eyes; there ſhall be no more death, nor ſorrow, nor crying, neither ſhall there be any more paine: yea, there ſhall not only be an end of ſorrowes, but an abundant recompence for the ſorrowes of our life; as he that was rapt up into the third Heaven, and there ſaw what cannot be ſpoken, ſpeaketh yet thus of what he ſaw: I count, that the afflictions of this preſent time are not worthy of the glory which ſhall be ſhewed to us: It was ſhewed unto him what ſhould hereafter be ſhewed unto us, and he ſaw, that if all the world full of miſeries were laid in one ballance, & the leaſt glory of heaven in another, thoſe would be incomparably light, yea (as that divine Father) that one dayes felicity above, were worth a thouſand yeeres torment below; what then can bee matched with the eternity of ſuch joyes? Oh how great therefore is this thy goodneſſe, O Lord, which thou haſt laid up for them that fear thee, and done to them that truſt in thee, before the ſons of men!

Chap. XXVIII.

Of our ſecond part of Meditation: which is in the affections.

THe moſt difficult and knotty part of Meditation thus finiſhed, there remaineth that which is both more lively, and more eaſie unto a good heart to be wrought altogether by the affections: which if our diſcourſes reach not unto, they prove vaine and to no purpoſe. That which followeth therefore, is the very ſoule of Meditation, whereto all that is paſt ſerveth but as an inſtrument. A man is a man by his underſtanding part: but he is a Chriſtian by his will and affections. Seeing therefore, that all our former labour of the brain is only to affect the heart, after that the mind hath thus traverſed the point propoſed through all the heads of reaſon, it ſhall endevour to find in the firſt place ſome feeling touch, and ſweet reliſh in that which it hath thus chewed; which fruit through the bleſſing of God, will voluntarily follow upon a ſerious Meditation. David ſaith, Oh taſte, and ſee how ſweet the Lord is. In Meditation we doe both ſee, and taſte; but we ſee before we taſte: ſight, is of the underſtanding: taſte, of the affection; neither can we ſee, but we muſt taſte; we cannot know aright, but we muſt needs be affected. Let the heart therefore firſt conceive and feele in it ſelf the ſweetneſſe or bitterneſſe of the matter meditated: which is never done, without ſome paſſion; nor expreſſed, without ſome hearty exclamation.

Wherein is required a Taſte and reliſh of what we have thought upon.

Oh bleſſed eſtate of the Saints! O glory not to be expreſſed, even by thoſe which are glorified! O incomprehenſible ſalvation! What ſavour hath this earth to thee? Who can regard the world, that beleeveth thee? Who can think of thee, and not be raviſhed with wonder and deſire? Who can hope for thee, and not rejoyce? Who can know thee, and not be ſwallowed up with admiration at the mercy of him that beſtoweth thee? O bleſſednes worthy of Chriſts blood to purchaſe thee! Worthy of the continuall ſongs of Saints and Angels to celebrate thee! How ſhould I magnifie thee! How ſhould I long for thee! How ſhould I hate all this world for thee!

Chap. XXIX.

Secondly, a Complaint, bewailing our wants and untowardneſſe.

AFter this Taſte ſhall follow a Complaint, wherein the heart bewaileth to it ſelf his own poverty, dulneſſe, and imperfection; chiding and abaſing it ſelfe in reſpect of his wants and indiſpoſition: wherein Humiliation truly goeth before glory. For the more we are caſt downe in our conceit, the higher ſhall God lift us up at the end of this exerciſe, in ſpirituall rejoycing.

But alas, where is my love? Where is my longing? Where art thou, O my ſoul? What heavineſſe hath overtaken thee? How hath the world bewitched and poſſeſſed thee, that thou art become ſo careleſſe of thine home, ſo ſenſeleſſe of ſpirituall delights, ſo fond upon theſe vanities? Doſt thou doubt whether there be an heaven? or whether thou have a God, and a Saviour there? O far be from thee this Atheiſme: far be from thee the leaſt thought of this deſperate impiety. Woe were thee, if thou beleeveſt not: But, O thou of little Faith, doſt thou beleeve there is happineſſe, and happineſſe for thee, and deſireſt it not, and delighteſt not in it? Alas, how weak and unbeleeving is thy beleefe! How cold and faint are thy deſires? Tell me, what ſuch goodly entertainment haſt thou met with all here on earth, that was worthy to withdraw thee from theſe heavenly joyes? What pleaſure in it ever gave thee contentment? or what cauſe of diſlike findeſt thou above? Oh no, my ſoule, it is onely thy miſerable drouſineſſe, onely thy ſecurity: The world, the world hath beſotted thee, hath undone thee with careleſneſſe. Alas, if thy delight be ſo cold, what difference is there in thee from an ignorant Heathen, that doubts of another life: yea, from an Epicure that denies it? Art thou a Chriſtian, or art thou none? If thou be what thou profeſſeſt, away with this dull and ſenſeleſſe worldlineſſe; away with this earthly uncheerfulneſſe; ſhake off at laſt this profane and godleſſe ſecurity, that hath thus long weighed thee down from mounting up to thy joyes. Looke up to thy God, and to thy Crowne, and ſay with confidence, O Lord, I have waited for thy ſalvation.

Chap.

Chap. XXX.

After this Complaint, must succeed an hearty and passionate Wish of the soule which ariseth cleerely from the two former degrees: For, that which a man hath found sweet, and comfortable, and complaines that he still wanteth, he cannot but wish to enjoy.

Thirdly, an hearty Wish of the soule, for what it complaineth to want.

O Lord, that I could wait and long for thy salvation! Oh that I could mind the things above: that as I am a stranger indeed, so I could be also in affection! Oh that mine eyes, like the eyes of thy first Martyr, could by the light of Faith see but a glimpse of heaven! Oh that my heart could be rapt up thither in desire! How should I trample upon these poore vanities of the earth! How willingly should I endure all sorrowes, all torments! How scornefully should I passe by all pleasures! How should I be in travaile of my dissolution! Oh when shall that blessed day come, when all this wretched worldlinesse removed, I shall solace my self in my God? Behold, as the Heart brayeth for the rivers of waters, so panteth my soule after thee, O God: My soule thirsteth for God, even for the living God; Oh when shall I come and appeare before the presence of God?

Chap. XXXI.

After this Wishing, shall follow humble Confession, by just order of nature: for, having bemoaned our want, and wished supply, not finding this hope in our selves, we must needs acknowledge it to him, of whom onely we may both seeke and find; where it is to be duly observed, how the mind is by turnes depressed, and lifted up: being lifted up with our estate of joy, it is cast downe with Complaint: lift up with Wishes, it is cast downe with Confession; which order doth best hold it in ure, and just temper; and maketh it more feeling of the comfort which followeth in the conclusion. This Confession must derogate all from our selves, and ascribe all to God.

4. An humble Confession of our disabilitie to effect what we wish.

Thus I desire, O Lord, to be aright affected towards thee and thy glory; I desire to come to thee: but, alas, how weakely? how heartlesly? Thou knowest that I can neither come to thee, nor desire to come, but from thee. It is Nature that holds me from thee; this treacherom Nature favours it self, loveth the world, hateth to thinke of a dissolution, and chuseth rather to dwell in this dungeon with continuall sorrow and complaint, then to endure a parting, although to liberty and joy. Alas, Lord, it is my misery that I love my paine. How long shall these vanities thus besot me? It is thou only that canst turne away mine eyes from regarding these follies, and my heart from affecting them: thou only, who as thou shalt one day receive my soul into heaven, so now before-hand canst fix my soule upon heaven and thee.

Chap. XXXII.

After Confession, naturally followes Petition; earnestly requesting that at his hands, which we acknowledge our selves unable, and none but God able to performe.

5. An earnest Petition for that which we confesse to want.

O carry it up therefore, thou that hast created and redeemed it, carry it up to thy glory: Oh let me not alwayes be thus dull and brutish; let not these scales of earthly affection alwayes dim and blind mine eyes: Oh thou that layedst clay upon the blindmans eyes, take away this clay from mine eyes, wherewith (alas) they are so daubed up, that they cannot see Heaven. Illuminate them from above, and in thy light let me see light. Oh thou that hast prepared a place for my soule, prepare my soule for that place; prepare it with holinesse, prepare it with desire: and even while it sojourneth on earth, let it dwell in heaven with thee, beholding ever the beauty of thy face, the glory of thy Saints, and of it selfe.

Chap. XXXIII.

6. A vehement Enforcement of our petition.

After Petition shall follow the Enforcement of our request, from argument and importunate obsecration; wherein we must take heed of complementing in termes with God, as knowing that he will not be mocked by any fashionable forme of suit, but requireth holy and feeling intreatie.

How graciously hast thou proclaimed to the world, that who ever wants wisdome, shall aske it of thee, which neither denyest nor upbraidest! O Lord, I want heavenly wisedome, to conceive aright of heaven; I want it, and aske it of thee; give me to aske it instantly, and give me according to thy promise abundantly. Thou seest it is no strange favour that I beg of thee: no other then that which thou hast richly bestowed upon all thy valiant Martyrs, Confessors, Servants, from the beginning: who never could have so cheerefully embraced death and torment, if through the middest of their flames and paine they had not seen their Crown of glory. The poore Theefe on the Crosse had no sooner craved thy remembrance when thou camest to thy Kingdome, then thou promisedst to take him with thee into heaven. Presence was better to him then remembrance. Behold, now thou art in thy Kingdome, I am on earth; remember thine unworthy servant, and let my soule in conceit, in affection, in conversation, be this day and for ever with thee in Paradise. I see, man walketh in a vaine shadow, and disquieteth himself in vaine: they are pittifull pleasures he enjoyeth, while he forgetteth thee; I am as vaine, make me more wise: O let me see heaven, and I know, I shall never envy, nor follow them. My times are in thine hand: I am no better then my fathers, a stranger on earth. As I speak of them, so the next, yea this generation shall speak of me as one that was. My life is a bubble, a smoak, a shadow, a thought: I know, it is no abiding in this thorow-fare: Oh suffer me not so mad, as while I passe on the way, I should forget the end. It is that other life that I must trust to; with thee it is that I shall continue: Oh let me not be so foolish, as to settle my selfe on what I must leave, and to neglect eternitie. I have seene enough of this earth, and yet I love it too much. O let me see heaven another while, and love it so much more then the earth, by how much the things there are more worthy to be loved. Oh God, looke downe on thy wretched Pilgrim, and teach me to looke up to thee, and to see thy goodnesse in the Land of the living. Thou that boughtest heaven for me, guide me thither; and for the price that it cost thee, for thy mercies sake, in spight of all tentations, enlighten thou my soule, direct it, crowne it.

Chap. XXXIV.

7. A cheerefull Confidence of obtaining what we have requested and enforced.

After this Enforcement, doth follow Confidence; wherein the soule, after many doubtfull and unquiet bickerings, gathereth up her forces, and cheerefully rowzeth up it selfe; and like one of Davids Worthies, breaketh thorow a whole Armie of doubts, and fetcheth comfort from the Well of life, which, though in some latter, yet in all is a sure reward from God of sincere Meditation.

Yea, be thou bold, O my soule, and doe not meerly crave, but challenge this favour of God, as that which he oweth thee; he oweth it thee, because he hath promised it, and by his mercy hath made his gift, his debt: Faithfull is he that hath promised, which will also doe it. Hath he not given thee not only his hand in the sweet hopes of the Gospel, but his seale also in the Sacraments? Yea, besides promise, hand, seale, hath he not given thee a sure earnest of thy salvation, in some weake, but true graces? Yet more, hath he not given thee, besides Earnest, possession? while he that is the Truth and Life, saith, He that beleeveth hath everlasting life, and hath passed from death to life. Canst thou not then be content to cast thy selfe upon this blessed issue; If God be mercifull, I am glorious; I have thee already, Oh my life? God is faithfull, and I doe beleeve: who shall separate me from the love of Christ? from my glory with Christ? who shall pull me out of my heaven? Goe to then, and returne to thy rest, O my soule; make use of that heaven wherein thou art, and be happy.

Thus we have found, that our Meditation, like the wind, gathereth strength in proceeding; and as naturall bodies, the neerer they come to their places, move with more celeritie; so doth the soule in this course of Meditation, to the unspeakeable benefit of it selfe.

Chap.

Chap. XXXV.

The Conclusion of our Meditation, in what order it must be.

THe Conclusion remaineth: wherein we must advise (like as Physitians doe in their sweats and exercise) that we cease not over-suddenly, but leave off by little and little. The mind may not be suffered to fall head-long from this height, but must also descend by degrees.

First with Thanksgiving.

The first whereof, after our Confidence, shall be an hearty Gratulation, and thanksgiving. For, as man naturally cannot be miserable, but he must complaine, and crave remedy; so the good heart cannot find it selfe happy, and not be thankfull: and this thankfulnesse which it feeleth and expresseth, maketh it yet more good, and effecteth it more.

What shall I then doe to thee for this mercy, O thou Saviour of men? What should I render to my Lord, for all his benefits? Alas! what can I give thee, which is not thine own before? Oh that I could give thee but all thine! Thou giveſt me to drinke of this cup of salvation: I will therefore take the cup of salvation, and call upon the name of the Lord: Praise thou the Lord, O my soule; and all that is within me, praise his holy name. And since here thou beginnest thine heaven, begin here also that joyfull song of thanksgiving, which there thou shalt sing more sweetly, and never end.

Chap. XXXVI.

Secondly, with Recommendation of our soules and wayes to God.

AFter this Thanksgiving, shall follow a faithfull recommendation of our selves to God; wherein the soule doth cheerefully give up it selfe, and repose it selfe wholly upon her Maker and Redeemer; committing her selfe to him in all her wayes, submitting her selfe to him in all his wayes, desiring in all things to glorifie him, and to walke worthy of her high and glorious calling.

Both which latter shall be done (as I have ever found) with much life and comfort, if for the full conclusion, we shall lift up our heart and voyce to God, in singing some Versicle of Davids divine Psalmes, answerable to our disposition, and matter; whereby the heart closes up it selfe with much sweetnesse and contentment.

This course of Meditation thus heartily observed, let him that practiseth it, tell me whether he find not that his soule, which at the beginning of this exercise did but creepe and grovell upon earth, doe not now in the conclusion soare aloft in Heaven; and being before aloofe off, doe not now find it selfe neere to God, yea with him and in him.

Chap. XXXVII.

An Epilogue.

THus have I endevoured (Right Worshipfull Sir) according to my slender faculty, to prescribe a method of Meditation: not upon so strict tearmes of necessity, that whosoever goeth not my way, erreth. Divers paths lead oft-times to the same end, and every man aboundeth in his owne sense. If experience and custome hath made another forme familiar to any man, I forbid it not: as that learned Father said of his Translation, Let him use his owne, not contemne mine. If any man be to chuse, and begin, let him practice mine, till he meet with a better Master: If another course may be better, I am sure this is good. Neither is it to be suffered, that like as fantasticall men, while they doubt what fashioned sute they should weare, put on nothing; so, that we Christians should neglect the matter of this worthy businesse, while we nicely stand upon the forme thereof. Wherein give me leave to complaine with just sorrow and shame, that if there be any Christian duty, whose omission is notoriously shamefull and prejudiciall to the soules of Professors, it is this of Meditation. This is the very end God hath given us our soules for: we mis-spend them, if we use them not thus. How lamentable is it, that we so employ them, as if our facul ty of discourse served for nothing but our earthly provision? as if our reasonable and Christian minds were appointed for the slaves and drudges of this body, onely to be the Caters and Cookes of our Appetite?

Reproving the neglect of Meditation.

The world filleth us, yea cloyeth us: we find our ſelves worke enough to thinke; What have I yet? How may I get more? What muſt I lay out? What ſhall I leave for poſterity? How may I prevent the wrong of mine Adverſary? How may I returne it? What anſwers ſhall I make to ſuch allegations? What entertainment ſhall I give to ſuch friends? What courſes ſhall I take in ſuch ſuits? In what paſtime ſhall I ſpend this day? In what the next? What advantage ſhall I reape by this practice, what loſſe? What was ſaid, anſwered, replied, done, followed? A Goodly thoughts, and fit for ſpirituall minds! Say there were no other world; how could we ſpend our cares otherwiſe? Unto this onely neglect, let me aſcribe the commonneſſe of that Laodicean temper of men; or (if that be worſe) of the dead coldneſſe which hath ſtricken the hearts of many, having left them nothing but the bodies of men, and viſors of Chriſtians; to this only, They have not meditated. It is not more impoſſible to live without an heart, then to be devoute without Meditation. B

Exhorting to the uſe of Meditation.

Would God therefore my words could be in this (as the Wiſe-man ſaith the words of the wiſe are) like unto Goads in the ſides of every Reader, to quicken him up out of this dull and lazy ſecurity, to a cheerefull practice of this Divine Meditation. Let him curſe me upon his death-bed, if looking backe from thence to the beſtowing of his former times, he acknowledge not theſe houres placed the moſt happily in his whole life; if he then wiſh not he had worn out more dayes in ſo profitable and heavenly a worke.

A MEDITATION
OF DEATH ACCORDING to the former Rules.

AND now, my ſoule, that thou haſt thought of the end, what can fit thee better then to thinke of the way? And though the forepart of the way to Heaven be a good life, the latter and more immediate is death: Shall I call it the way, or the gate of life? Sure I am, that by it onely we paſſe into that bleſſedneſſe, whereof we have ſo thought; that we have found it cannot be thought of enough. The Entrance.

What then is this death, but the taking downe of theſe ſtickes, whereof this earthly Tent is compoſed? The ſeparation of two great and old friends till they meet againe? The Gaole-delivery of a long priſoner? Our journey into that other world, for which we, and this thorowfare were made? Our payment of our firſt debt to Nature, the ſleepe of the body, and the awaking of the ſoule? The Deſcription.

But leſt thou ſhouldeſt ſeeme to flatter him, whoſe name and face hath ever ſeemed terrible to others, remember that there are more deaths then one: if the firſt death be not ſo fearefull as he is made, (his horrour lying more in the conceit of the beholder, then in his owne aſpect) ſurely, the ſecond is not made ſo fearefull as he is. No living eye can behold the terrours thereof: it is as impoſſible, to ſee them, as to feele them, and live. Nothing but a name is common to both: The firſt hath men, caſualties, diſeaſes, for his executioners: the ſecond Devils. The power of the firſt is in the grave: the ſecond in hell. The worſt of the firſt, is ſenſleſneſſe; the eaſieſt of the ſecond, is, a perpetuall ſenſe of all the paine that can make a man exquiſitely miſerable. The diviſion.

Thou ſhalt have no buſineſſe, O my ſoule, with the ſecond death: Thy firſt Reſurrection hath ſecured thee: Thanke him that hath redeemed thee, for thy ſafety. And how can I thanke thee enough, O my Saviour, which haſt ſo mercifully bought off my torment, with thy owne; and haſt drunke off that bitter potion of thy Fathers wrath, whereof the very taſte had beene our death? Yea, ſuch is thy mercy, O thou Redeemer of men, that thou haſt not onely ſubdued the ſecond death, but reconciled the firſt; ſo as thy children taſte not at all of the ſecond, and find the firſt ſo ſweetned to them by thee, that they complaine of bitterneſſe. It was not thou, O God, that madeſt death; our hands are they that were guilty of this evill. Thou ſaweſt all thy worke that it was good; we brought forth ſin, and ſin brought forth death. To the diſcharge of thy Juſtice and Mercy, we acknowledge this miſerable conception; and needs muſt that child be ugly, that hath ſuch parents. Certainly, if Being and Good be (as they are) of an equall extent, then the diſſolution of our Being muſt needs in it ſelfe be evill. How full of darkneſſe and horrour then is the privation of this vitall light? eſpecially ſince thy wiſdome intended it to the revenge of ſinne, which is no leſſe then the violation of an infinite Juſtice? it was thy juſt pleaſure to plague The Cauſes.

plague us with this brood of our own begetting: Behold, that death which was not till then in the world, is now in every thing: one great Conquerour finds it in a Slate, another finds it in a Fly; one finds it in the kernel of a Grape, another in the pricke of a thorne; one in the taſte of an herb, another in the ſmell of a flower; one in a bit of meat, another in a mouthfull of aire; one in the very ſight of a danger, another in the conceit of what might have beene: Nothing in all our life is too little to hide death under it: There need no cords, nor knives, nor ſwords, nor Peeces: we have made our ſelves as many wayes to death, as there are helps of living. A

But if we were the authors of our death, it was thou that didſt alter it: our diſobedience made it, and thy mercy made it not to be evill. It had been all one to thee, to have taken away the very Being of death from thine owne: but thou thoughteſt it beſt to take away the ſting of it onely, as good Phyſitians, when they would apply their Leeches, ſcowre them with Salt and Nettles, and when their corrupt blood is voyded, imploy them to the health of the patient. It is more glory to thee, that thou haſt removed enmity from this Eſau, that now he meets us with kiſſes in ſtead of frownes: and if we receive a blow from this rough hand, yet that very ſtripe is healing. Oh how much more powerfull is thy death, then our ſinne! O my Saviour, how haſt thou perfumed and ſoftned this bed of my grave by dying? How can it grieve me to tread in thy ſteps to glory? B

The Effects. Our ſinne made death our laſt enemy; thy goodneſſe hath made it the firſt friend that we meet with, in our paſſage to another world: For as ſhe that receives us from the knees of our mother, in our firſt entrance to the light, waſheth, cleanſeth, dreſſeth us, and preſents us to the breſt of our nurſe, or the armes of our mother, challenges ſome intereſt in us when we come to our growth; ſo death, which in our paſſage to that other life, is the firſt that receives and preſents our naked ſoules to the hands of thoſe Angels, which carry it up to her glory, cannot but thinke this office friendly and meritorious. What if this guide lead my careaſs through corruption and rottenneſſe, when my ſoule in the very inſtant of her ſeparation knowes it ſelfe happy? What if my friends mourne about my bed and coffin, when my ſoule ſees the ſmiling face and loving embracements of him that was dead, and is alive? What care I, who ſhuts theſe earthen eyes, when death opens the eye of my ſoule, to ſee as I am ſeene? What if my name be forgotten of men, when I live above with the God of Spirits? C

The Subject. If death would be ſtill an enemy, it is the worſt part of me that he hath any thing to doe withall: the beſt is above his reach, and gaines more then the other can leeſe. The worſt peece of the horrour of death is the grave: and ſet aſide infidelity, what ſo great miſery is this? That part which is corrupted, feeles it not: that which is free from corruption, feeles an abundant recompence, and foreſees a joyfull reparation. What is here but a juſt reſtitution? We carry heaven and earth wrapt up in our boſomes: each part returnes homeward: And if the exceeding glory of heaven cannot countervaile the doleſomeneſſe of the grave, what doe I beleeving? But if the beauty of that celeſtiall Sanctuary doe more then equalize the horrour of the bottomeleſſe pit, how can I ſhrinke at earth like my ſelfe, when I know my glory? And if examples can move thee any whit, looke behind thee, O my ſoule, and ſee which of the Worthies of that ancient latter world, which of the Patriarchs, Kings, Prophets, Apoſtles, have not trod in theſe red ſteps. Where are thoſe millions of generations, which have hitherto peopled the earth? How many paſſing-bels haſt thou heard for thy known friends? How many ſick beds haſt thou viſited? How many eyes haſt thou ſeene cloſed? How many vaine men haſt thou ſeene that have gone into the field to ſeeke death, in hope to find an honour as fooliſh as themſelves? How many poore creatures haſt thou mulcted with death for thine owne pleaſure? And canſt thou hope that that God will make a by-way and a poſtern for thee alone, that thou maiſt paſſe to the next world, not by the gates of death, not by the bottome of the grave? D E

The Adjunct. What then doſt thou feare, O my ſoule? There are but two ſtages of death, the bed and the grave: This latter, if it have ſenſleſneſſe, yet it hath reſt: The former, if it have paine, yet it hath ſpeedineſſe; and when it lights upon a faithfull heart, meets with

A with many and ſtrong antidotes of comfort. The evill that is ever in motion, is not fearefull: That which both time and eternity finds ſtanding where it was, is worthy of terrour. Well may thoſe tremble at death, which find more diſtreſſe within, then without, whoſe conſciences are more ſicke, and neerer to death, then their bodies. It was thy Fathers wrath that did ſo terrifie thy ſoule, O my Saviour, that it put thy body into a bloudy ſweat. The mention and thought of thy death ended in a Pſalme, but this began in an agony. Then didſt thou ſweat out my feares. The power of that agony doth more comfort all thine, then the Angels could comfort thee. That very voice deſerved an eternall ſeparation of horrour from death, where thou ſaidſt, My God, my God, why haſt thou forſaken me? Thou hadſt not complained of being left, if thou wouldeſt have any of thine left deſtitute of comfort in their parting. I know
B not whom I can feare, while I know whom I have beleeved; how can I be diſcouraraged with the ſight of my loſſe, when I ſee ſo cleere an advantage?

What diſcomfort is this, to leave a fraile body, to be joyned unto a glorious head? To forſake vaine pleaſures, falſe honours, bootleſſe hopes, unſatisfying wealth, ſtormy contentments, ſinfull men, perillous tentations, a ſea of troubles, a gally of ſervitude, and evill world, and a conſuming life; for Freedome, Reſt, Happineſſe, Eternitie? And if thou wert ſentenced, O my ſoule, to live a thouſand yeares in this body, with theſe infirmities, how wouldeſt thou be wearie, not of being onely, but of complaining? Whiles, ere the firſt hundred, I ſhould be a child; ere the ſecond, a beaſt; a ſtone, ere the third; and therefore ſhould be ſo farre from finding pleaſure in my continuance, that I ſhould not have ſenſe enough left, to feele my ſelfe miſerable.
C And when I am once gone, what difference is there betwixt the aged ſt of the firſt Patriarchs, and me, and the child that did but live to be borne, ſave onely in what was; and that which was, is not? And if this body had no weakneſſe, to make my life tedious, yet what a torment is it, that while I live, I muſt ſinne? Alas my ſoule, every one of thy knowne ſins is not a diſeaſe, but a death. What an enemie art thou to thy ſelfe, if thou canſt not be content, that one bodily death ſhould excuſe thee from many ſpirituall; to caſt off thy body, that thou mayeſt be ſtripped of the rags, yea the fetters of thy ſinne, and cloathed with the Robes of glory? Yet theſe termes are too hard: Thou ſhalt not be caſt off, O my body; rather thou ſhalt be put to making: this change is no leſſe happy for thee, then for thy partner. This very skin of thine, which is now tawnie, and wrinkled, ſhall once ſhine; this earth ſhall be heaven, this
D duſt ſhall be glorious: Theſe eyes, that are now wearie of being witneſſes of thy ſins and miſeries, ſhall then never be weary of ſeeing the beauty of thy Saviour, and thine owne in his: Theſe eares, that have beene now tormented with the impious tongues of men, ſhall firſt heare the voice of the Sonne of God, and then the voices of Saints and Angels in their ſongs of Alleluiah: And this tongue, that now complaines of miſeries, and feares, ſhall then beare a part in that divine harmony.

The contrary.

In the meane time, thou ſhalt but ſleep in this bed of earth: he that hath tried the worſt of death, hath called it no worſe; very Heathens have termed them couſins; and it is no unuſuall thing for couſins of blood, to carry both the ſame names & features. Haſt thou wont, O my body, when the day hath wearied thee, to lie down unwillingly to thy reſt? Behold in this ſleep there is more quietneſſe, more pleaſure of viſions,
E more certaintie of waking, more chearefulneſſe in riſing: why then art thou loth to thinke of laying off thy rags, and repoſing thy ſelfe? Why art thou like a child, unwilling to goe to bed? Haſt thou ever ſeene any bird, which when the cage hath been opened, would rather ſit ſtill and ſing within her grates, then flie forth unto her freedome in the woods? Haſt thou ever ſeene any priſoner, in love with his bolts and fetters? Did the Chiefe of the Apoſtles, when the Angell of God ſhined in his Jayle, and ſtrooke him on the ſide, and looſed his two chaines, and bad him, Ariſe quickly, and opened both the woodden, and Iron gate, ſay, What, ſo ſoone? yet, a little ſleep? What madneſſe had it beene, rather to ſlumber betwixt his two Keepers, then to follow the Angell of God into liberty? Haſt thou ever ſeene any Mariner that hath ſaluted the Sea with ſongs, and the Haven with teares? What ſhall I ſay to this diffidence, O my ſoule, that thou art unwilling to think of reſt after thy toile, of freedome after after thy durance, of the Haven after an unquiet and tempestuous passage? How many are there that seeke death, and cannot find it? meerely out of the irksomnesse of life. Hath it found thee, and offered thee better conditions, not of immunity from evils, but of possession of more good, then thou canst thinke, and wouldest thou now flie from happinesse, to be rid of it? A

The Names. What? Is it a name that troubles thee? what if men would call sleepe death, wouldst thou be afraid to close thine eyes? what hurt is it then, if he that sent the first sleepe upon man, whilest he made him an helper, send this last and soundest sleepe upon me, whiles he prepares my soule for a glorious spouse to himselfe? It is but a parting which we call death; as two friends, when they have led each other on the way, shake hands till they returne from their journey: If either could miscarry, there were cause of sorrow; now they are more sure of a meeting, then of a parture; what folly is it, not to be content to redeeme the unspeakable gaine of so deare a friend, with a little intermission of enjoying him? He will returne laden with the riches of heaven, and will fetch his old partner to the participation of this glorious wealth. Goe then, my Soule, to this sure and gainfull traffique, and leave my other halfe in an harbour as safe, though not so blessed; yet so shalt thou be separated, that my very dust shall be united to thee still, and to my Saviour in thee. B

The Testimonies. Wert thou unwilling at the command of thy Creator to joyne thy selfe at the first with this body of mine? why art thou then loath to part with that, which thou hast found, though intire, yet troublesome? Dost thou not heare Salomon say, The day of death is better then the day of thy birth? dost thou not beleeve him? or art thou in love with the worse, and displeased with the better? If any man could have found a life worthy to be preferred unto death, so great a King must needs have done it; now in his very Throne, he commends his Coffin. Yea, what wilt thou say to those Heathens that mourned at the birth, and feasted at the death of their children? They knew the miseries of living as well as thou, the happinesse of dying they could not know; and if they rejoyced out of a conceit of ceasing to be miserable; how shouldest thou cheere thy selfe, in an expectation, yea an assurance of being happy? He that is the Lord of Life, and tryed what it was to die, hath proclaimed them blessed that die in the Lord. Those are blessed, I know, that live in him, but they rest not from their labours; Toyle and sorrow is betweene them, and a perfect enjoying of that blessednesse, which they now possesse only in hope and inchoation; when death hath added rest, their happinesse is finished. C

The taste of our Meditation. O death, how sweet is that rest, wherewith thou refreshest the weary Pilgrims of this vale of mortality? How pleasant is thy face to those eyes, that have acquainted themselves with the sight of it, which to strangers is grim and gastly? How worthy art thou to be welcome, unto those that know whence thou art, and whither thou tendest? who that knowes thee, can feare thee? who that is not all nature, would rather hide himself amongst the baggage of this vile life, then follow thee to a Crown? what indifferent Judge that should see life painted over, with vaine semblances of pleasures, attended with troups of sorrowes on the one side, and on the other with uncertaintie of continuance, and certaintie of dissolution; and then should turne his eyes unto death, and see her black, but comely, attended on the one hand with a momentany paine, with eternity of glory on the other, would not say out of choice, that which the Prophet said out of passion, It is better for me to die then to live? D

The Complaint. But, O my Soule, what ailes thee to be thus suddenly backward, and fearefull? No heart hath more freely discoursed of death, in speculation; no tongue hath more extolled it in absence. And now, that it is come to thy beds side, and hath drawne thy curtaines, and takes thee by the hand, and offers thee service, thou shrinkest inward, and by the paleneſse of thy face, and wildnes of thine eye, bewraiest an amazement at the presence of such a guest. That face, which was so familiar to thy thoughts, is now unwelcome to thine eyes; I am ashamed of this wea irresolution. Whitherto have tended all thy serious meditations? what hath Christianity done to thee, if thy feares be still heathenish? is this thine imitation of so many worthy Saints of God, whom thou hast seene entertaine the violentest deaths with smiles and songs? Is this the E fruit

A fruit of thy long and frequent inſtruction? Didſt thou think death would have been content with words? didſt thou hope it would ſuffice thee to talk, while all other ſuffer? Where is thy faith? Yea, where art thou thy ſelf, O my ſoule? Is heaven worthy of no more thanks, no more joy? Shall Hereticks, ſhall Pagans give death a better welcome than thou? Hath thy Maker, thy Redeemer ſent for thee, and art thou loth to goe? hath he ſent for thee, to put thee in poſſeſſion of that glorious Inheritance, which thy wardſhip hath cheerfully expected, and art thou loth to goe? Hath God with this Sergeant of his, ſent his Angels to fetch thee, and art thou loth to go? Rouſe up thy ſelfe for ſhame, O my ſoule: and if ever thou haſt truly beleeved, ſhake off this unchriſtian diffidence, and addreſſe thy ſelfe joyfully for thy glory.

The wiſh.

Yea, O my Lord, it is thou, that muſt raiſe up this faint and drooping heart of mine; thou only canſt rid me of this weak and cowardly diſtruſt; Thou that ſendeſt for my
B ſoule, canſt prepare it for thy ſelfe; thou only canſt make thy meſſenger welcome to me. O that I could but ſee thy face through death! O that I could ſee death, not as it was, but as thou haſt made it! Oh that I could heartily pledge thee, my Saviour, in this cup, that ſo I might drink new wine with thee, in thy Fathers Kingdome!

The Confeſſion.

But alas, O my God, nature is ſtrong and weak in me, at once: I cannot wiſh to welcome death, as it is worthy; when I look for moſt courage, I find ſtrongeſt temptations: I ſee and confeſſe, that when I am my ſelfe, thou haſt no ſuch coward as I: Let me alone, and I ſhall ſhame that name of thine, which I have profeſſed: every ſecure worldling ſhall laugh at my feebleneſſe. O God, were thy Martyrs thus haled to their ſtakes? might they not have been looſed from their racks, and chooſe to die in thoſe torments? Let it be no ſhame for thy ſervant to take up that complaint which thou mad'ſt of thy better Attendants; The ſpirit is willing, but the fleſh is weak.

The Petition and enforcement.

C O thou God of ſpirits, that haſt coupled theſe two together, unite them in a deſire of their diſſolution; weaken this fleſh to receive, and encourage this ſpirit either to deſire, or to contemne death; and now, as I grow neerer to my home, let me increaſe in the ſenſe of my joyes: I am thine, ſave me, O Lord; It was thou that didſt put ſuch courage into thine ancient, and late witneſſes, that they either invited, or challenged death; and held their perſecutors their beſt friends, for letting them looſe from theſe gieves of fleſh. I know, thine hand is not ſhortned; neither any of them hath received more proofes of thy former mercies; Oh let thy goodneſſe enable me to reach them in the comfortable ſteadineſſe of my paſſage: Doe but draw this Vaile a little, that I may ſee my glory, and I cannot but be enflamed with the deſire of it: It was not I, that either made this body for the earth, or this ſoule for my body, or this heaven for my ſoule, or this glory of heaven, or this entrance into glory: All is D thine own work; Oh perfect what thou haſt begun, that thy praiſe and my happineſſe may be conſummate at once.

The aſſurance or Confidence.

Yea, O my ſoule, what need'ſt thou wiſh the God of mercies to be tender of his own honour? Art thou not a member of that body, whereof thy Saviour is the Head? canſt thou drowne, when thy Head is above? was it not for thee, that he triumpht over death? Is there any feare in a foyled adverſary? Oh my Redeemer, I have already overcome in thee: how can I miſcarry in my ſelfe? Oh my ſoule, thou haſt marched valiantly! Behold, the Damoſels of that heavenly Jeruſalem come forth with Timbrels and Harps to meet thee, and to applaud thy ſucceſſe: And now, there remains nothing for thee but a Crown of righteouſneſſe, which that righteous Judge ſhall give thee, at that day: Oh death, where is thy ſting? Oh grave, where is thy victory?

The Thankſgiving.

Returne now unto thy reſt, O my ſoule; for the Lord hath been beneficiall unto E thee. O Lord God, the ſtrength of my ſalvation, thou haſt covered my head in the day of battell: O my God, and King, I will extoll thee, and will bleſſe thy Name for ever, and ever. I will bleſſe thee daily, and praiſe thy Name for ever, and ever. Great is the Lord, and moſt worthy to be praiſed, and his greatneſſe is incomprehenſible: I will meditate of the beauty of thy glorious Majeſty, and thy wonderfull works: Hoſanna, thou that dwelleſt in the higheſt Heavens. Amen.

HOLY OBSERVATIONS.

LIB. I.

By Jos: Hall.

¶ Imprinted at London, 1640.

HOLY OBSERVATION

TO THE RIGHT HONOVRABLE EDWARD Lord DENNY, BARON OF WALTHAM,

My moſt bountifull Patron,

Grace and Peace.

RIGHT HONOVRABLE,

THis advantage a Scholler hath above others, that he cannot be idle, and that hee can worke without inſtruments. For, the mind inured to contemplation, will ſet it ſelfe on worke, when other occaſions faile: and hath no more power not to ſtudy, than the eye which is open, hath, not to ſee ſomething; in which buſineſſe it carries about his owne Library, neither can complaine to want Bookes while it enjoyeth it ſelfe.

I could not then neglect the commodity of this plentifull leaſure in my ſo eaſie attendance here; but (though beſides my courſe, and without the helpe of others writings) muſt needs buſie my ſelfe in ſuch thoughts as I have ever given account of, to your Lordſhip: ſuch as I hope ſhall not bee unprofitable, nor unwelcome to their Patron, to their Readers. I ſend them forth from hence, under your Honourable name; to ſhew you that no abſence, no imployment can make me forget my due reſpect to your Lordſhip: to whom (next under my gracious Maſter) I have deſervedly bequeathed my ſelfe and my endeavours. Your goodneſſe hath not wont to magnifie it ſelfe more in giving, than in receiving ſuch like holy preſents: the knowledge whereof hath intitled you to more labours of this nature (if I have numbred aright) than any of your Peeres. I miſdoubt not either your acceptation, or their uſe. That God, who hath above all his other favours given your Lordſhip, even in theſe careleſſe times, an heart truly religious, give you an happie increaſe of all his heavenly graces by my unworthy ſervice. To his gracious care I daily commend your Lordſhip with my Honourable Lady; wiſhing you both, all that little joy earth can affoord you, and fulneſſe of glory above.

Non-ſuch. July 3.

Your Lordſhips

Moſt humbly devoted for ever in all dutie and obſervance,

JOS: HALL.

1.

AS there is nothing ſooner dry than a teare; ſo there is nothing ſooner out of ſeaſon than worldly ſorrow: which if it be freſh and ſtill bleeding, finds ſome to comfort and pity it; if ſtale and skinned over with time, is rather entertained with ſmiles, than commiſeration: But the ſorrow of repentance comes never out of time. All times are alike unto that Eternitie, whereto wee make our ſpirituall mones: That which is paſt, that which is future, are both preſent with him. It is neither weake nor uncomely, for an old man to weepe for the ſinnes of his youth. Thoſe teares can never be ſhed either too ſoone, or too late.

Some men live to be their owne executors for their good name; which they ſee (not honeſtly) buried, before themſelves die. Some other of great place, and ill deſert, part with their good name and breath, at once. There is ſcarce a vicious man, whoſe name is not rotten before his carcaſſe. Contrarily, the good mans name is oft-times heire to his life; either borne after the death of the parent, for that envy would not ſuffer it to come forth before: or perhaps ſo well growne up in his life-time, that the hope thereof is the ſtaffe of his age, and joy of his death. A wicked mans name may be feared a while; ſoone after, it is either forgotten or curſed: The good man either ſleepeth with his body in peace, or waketh (as his ſoule) in glory.

Oft-times thoſe which ſhew much valour while there is equall poſſibility of life, when they ſee a preſent neceſſity of death, are found moſt ſhamefully timorous. Their courage was before grounded upon hope: that, cut off, leaves them at once deſperate and cowardly: whereas men of feebler ſpirits meet more cheerefully with death; becauſe though their courage be leſſe, yet their expectation was more.

I have ſeldome ſeene the ſon of an excellent and famous man, excellent: But that an ill bird hath an ill egge, is not rare; children poſſeſſing as the bodily diſeaſes, ſo the vices of their parents. Vertue is not propagated: Vice is; even in them which have it not reigning in themſelves. The graine is ſowne pure, but comes up with chaffe and huske. Haſt thou a good ſonne? He is Gods, not thine. Is he evill? Nothing but his ſinne is thine. Help by thy prayers and endevours to take away that which thou haſt given him, and to obtaine from God that which thou haſt, and canſt not give: Elſe thou maiſt name him a poſſeſſion; but thou ſhalt finde him a loſſe.

Theſe things be comely and pleaſant to ſee, and worthy of honor from the beholder: A young Saint, an old Martyr, a religious Souldier, a conſcionable Stateſman, a great man courteous, a learned man humble, a ſilent woman, a child underſtanding the eye of his Parent, a merry companion without vanity, a friend not changed with honour, a ſick man cheerefull, a ſoule departing with comfort and aſſurance. A

I have oft obſerved in merry meetings ſolemnly made, that ſomewhat hath fallen out croſſe: either in the time, or immediatly upon it; to ſeaſon (as I think) our immoderation in deſiring or enjoying our friends: and againe, events ſuſpected, have proved ever beſt; God here in bleſſing our awfull ſubmiſſion with good ſucceſſe. In all theſe humane things, indifferency is ſafe. Let thy doubts be ever equall to thy deſires: ſo thy diſappointment ſhall not be grievous, becauſe thy expectation was not peremptory.

You ſhall rarely find a man eminent in ſundry faculties of mind, or ſundry manuary trades. If his memory be excellent, his fantaſie is but dull: if his fancy bee buſie and quicke, his judgement is but ſhallow: If his judgement bee deepe, his utterance is harſh: which alſo holds no leſſe in the activities of the hand. And if it happen that one man bee qualified with skill of divers trades, and practiſe this variety, you ſhall ſeldome find ſuch one thriving in his eſtate: with ſpirituall gifts it is otherwiſe; which are ſo chained together, that who excels in one, hath ſome eminency in more, yea, in all. Looke upon faith: ſhee is attended with a Bevy of Graces: Hee that beleeves, cannot but have hope: if hope, patience. Hee that beleeves and hopes, muſt needs find joy in God: if joy, love of God; he that loves God, cannot but love his brother: his love to God, breeds piety and care to pleaſe, ſorrow for offending, feare to offend: his love to men, fidelity and Chriſtian beneficence. Vices are ſeldome ſingle; but vertues goe ever in troups: they goe ſo thick, that ſometimes ſome are hid in the crowd; which yet are, but appeare not. They may be ſhut out from ſight; they cannot be ſevered. B C

8.

The heaven ever moves, and yet is the place of our reſt. Earth ever reſts, and yet is the place of our trouble. Outward motion can be no enemy to inward reſt; as outward reſt may well ſtand with inward unquietneſſe.

None live ſo ill, but they content themſelves in ſomewhat: Even the begger likes the ſmell of his diſh. It is a rare evill that hath not ſomething to ſweeten it, either in ſenſe, or in hope: otherwiſe men would grow deſperate, mutinous, envious of others, weary of themſelves. The better that thing is wherein wee place our comfort, the happier we live: and the more we love good things, the better they are to us. The worldlings comfort, though it be good to him becauſe hee loves it; yet becauſe it is not abſolutely and eternally good, it failes him: wherein the Chriſtian hath juſt advantage of him, while he hath all the ſame cauſes of joy refined and exalted; beſides, more and higher, which the other knowes not of: the worldling laughs more, but the Chriſtian is more delighted. Theſe two are eaſily ſevered. Thou ſeeſt a goodly picture, or an heape of thy gold: thou laugheſt not, yet thy delight is more than in a jeſt that ſhaketh thy ſpleene. As griefe, ſo joy is not leſſe when it is leaſt expreſſed. D 10.

I have ſeene the worſt natures, and moſt depraved minds, not affecting all ſinnes: but ſtill ſome they have condemned in others, and abhorred in themſelves. One exclaimes on covetouſnes, yet he can too well abide riotous good fellowſhip. Another inveighs againſt drunkenneſſe and exceſſe, not caring how cruell he be in uſury and oppreſſion. One cannot endure a rough and quarrellous diſpoſition, yet gives himſelf over to unclean and laſcivious courſes. Another hates all wrongs, ſave wrong to God. One is a civill Atheiſt, another a religious Uſurer, a third an honeſt Drunkard, a fourth an unchaſte Juſticer, a fift a chaſte Quarreller. I know not whether every Devill excell in all ſinnes: I am ſure ſome of them have denomination from ſome ſinnes more ſpeciall. Let no man applaud himſelfe for thoſe ſins he wanteth, but condemne himſelfe rather for that ſin he hath. Thou cenſureſt another mans ſin, he thine; God curſeth both. E

11.

Gold is the heavieſt of all metals: It is no wonder that the rich man is uſually carried downeward to his place. It is hard for the ſoule, clogged with many weights, to aſcend to Heaven: It muſt be a ſtrong and nimble ſoule, that can carrie up it ſelfe, and ſuch a load, yet Adam and Noah flew up thither with the double Monarchy of the world, the Patriarks with much wealth, many holy Kings with maſſie Crownes and Scepters. The burthen of covetous deſires is more heavy to an empty ſoule, than much treaſure to the full. Our affections give poize or lightneſſe to earthly things. Either abate of thy load, if thou find it too preſſing, whether by having leſſe, or loving leſſe: or adde to thy ſtrength and activity, that thou maieſt yet aſcend. It is more commendable, by how much more hard, to climb into heaven with a burden.

A Chriſtian in all his wayes muſt have three guides: Truth, Charity, Wiſdome. Truth to goe before him; Charity and Wiſdome on either hand. If any of the three be abſent, he walkes amiſſe. I have ſeene ſome doe hurt by following a truth uncharitably. And others, while they would ſalve up an error with love, have failed in their wiſdome, and offended againſt juſtice. A charitable untruth, and an uncharitable truth, and an unwiſe menaging of truth or love, are all to be carefully avoided of him, that would goe with a right foot in the narrow way.

God brought man forth at firſt, not into a wilderneſſe, but a Garden; yet then he expected the beſt ſervice of him. I never find that he delights in the miſery, but in the proſperity of his ſervants. Cheerefulneſſe pleaſes him better than a dejected and dull heavineſſe of heart. If we can be good with pleaſure, hee grudgeth not our joy: If not, it is beſt to ſtint our ſelves; not for that theſe comforts are not good, but becauſe our hearts are evill: faulting not their nature, but our uſe and corruption.

The homelieſt ſervice that we doe in an honeſt calling, though it be but to plow, or dig, if done in obedience, and conſcience of Gods Commandement, is crowned with an ample reward; whereas the beſt workes for their kind (preaching, praying, offering Evangelicall ſacrifices) if without reſpect of Gods injunction and glory, are loaded with curſes. God loveth adverbs; and cares not how good, but how well.

The golden infancy of ſome hath proceeded to a brazen youth, and ended in a leaden age. All humane maturities have their period: onely grace hath none. I durſt never lay too much hope on the forward beginnings of wit and memory, which have been applauded in children. I knew, they could but attaine their vigor; and that if ſooner, no whit the better: for the earlier is their perfection of wiſdome, the longer ſhall be their witleſſe age. Seaſonableneſſe is the beſt in all theſe things which have their ripeneſs and decay. We can never hope too much of the timely bloſſomes of grace, whoſe ſpring is perpetuall, and whoſe harveſt begins with our end.

A man muſt give thankes for ſomewhat which he may not pray for. It hath been ſaid of Courtiers, that they muſt receive injuries, and give thankes. God cannot wrong his, but hee will croſſe them; thoſe croſſes are beneficiall; all benefits challenge thanks: yet I have read, that Gods children have with condition prayed againſt them, never for them. In good things, we pray both for them, and their good uſe: in evill, for their good uſe, not themſelves; yet we muſt give thanks for both. For there is no evill of paine which God doth not; nothing that God doth, is not good; no good thing but is worthy of thankes.

One halfe of the world knowes not how the other lives: & therfore the better ſort pitty not the diſtreſſed; and the miſerable envy not thoſe which fare better, becauſe they know it not. Each man judges of others conditions, by his owne. The worſt ſort would be too much diſcõtented, if they ſaw how far more pleaſant the life of others is. And if the better ſort (ſuch we call thoſe which are greater) could look downe to the the infinite miſeries of inferiours, it would make them either miſerable in compaſſion, or proud in conceit. It is good, ſometimes, for the delicate rich man to looke into the poore mans Cupbord: and ſeeing God in mercy gives him not to know their ſorrow by experience, to know it yet in ſpeculation: This ſhall teach him more thanks to God, more mercy to men, more contentment in himſelfe.

Such as a mans prayer is for another, it ſhall be in time of his extremity for himſelfe: for though he love himſelfe more than others, yet his apprehenſion of God is alike for both. Such as his prayer is in a former extremity, it ſhall be alſo in death: this way we may have experience even of a thing future: If God have been far off from thee in a fit of thine ordinary ſickneſſe, feare leſt hee will not bee neerer thee in thy laſt: what differs that from this, but in time? Correct thy dulneſſe upon former proofes; or elſe at laſt thy devotion ſhall want life before thy body.

Thoſe that come to their meat as to a medicine (as Auguſtine reports of himſelfe) live in an auſtere and Chriſtian temper, and ſhall be ſure not to joy too much in the creature, nor to abuſe themſelves: Thoſe that come to their medicine as to meat, ſhall be ſure to live miſerably and dye ſoone. To come to meat, if without a gluttonous appetite and palate, is allowed to Chriſtians: To come to meat as to a ſacrifice unto the belley, is a moſt baſe and brutiſh idolatry.

The worſt that ever were, even Cain and Iudas, have had ſome Fautors that have honoured them for Saints: and the Serpent that beguiled our firſt Parents, hath in that name had divine honour and thanks. Never any man trod ſo perillous and deep ſteps, but ſome have followed, and admired him. Each maſter of Hereſie hath found ſome clients; even hee, that taught all mens opinions were true. Againe, no man hath beene ſo exquiſite, but ſome have detracted from him, even in thoſe qualities, which have ſeemed moſt worthy of wonder to others. A man ſhall bee ſure to bee backed by ſome, either in good or evill, and by ſome ſhouldered in both. It is good for a man not to ſtand upon his Abbetters, but his quarrell, and not to depend upon others, but himſelfe.

Wee ſee thouſands of creatures dye for our uſe, and never doe ſo much as pitty them: why doe we thinke much to dye once for God? They are not ours ſo much as we are his; nor our pleaſure ſo much to us, as his glory to him: their lives are loſt to us, ours but changed to him.

22.

Much ornament is no good ſigne: painting of the face argues an ill complexion of body, a worſe mind. Truth hath a face both honeſt and comely, and lookes beſt in her owne colours: but, above all, Divine Truth is moſt faire, and moſt ſcorneth to borrow beauty of mans wit or tongue: ſhe loveth to come forth in her native grace, like a princely Matron; and counts it the greateſt indignity, to bee dallied with as a wanton Strumpet: ſhee lookes to command reverence, not pleaſure: ſhee would bee kneeled to, not laughed at. To prank her up in vaine dreſſes and faſhions, or to ſport with her in a light and youthfull manner, is moſt abhorring from her nature: they know her not, that give her ſuch entertainment; and ſhall firſt know her angry, when they doe know her. Againe, ſhe would be plaine, but not baſe, not ſluttiſh: ſhe would be clad, not gariſhly, yet not in rags: ſhe likes as little to be ſet out by a baſe foile, as to ſeem credited with gay colours. It is no ſmall wiſdome to know her juſt guiſe, but more to follow it; and ſo to keep the meane, that while we pleaſe her, we diſcontent not the beholders.

In worldly carriage, ſo much is a man made of, as he takes upon himſelfe: but ſuch is Gods bleſſing upō true humility, that it ſtil procureth reverence. I never ſaw Chriſtian leſſe honoured for a wiſe neglect of himſelfe. If our dejection proceed from the cōſcience of our want, it is poſſible we ſhould be as little eſteemed of others, as of our ſelves:

A ſelves: but if we have true graces, and prize them not at the higheſt, others ſhall value both them in us, and us for them, and with uſury give us that honour wee withheld modeſtly from our ſelves.

He that takes his full liberty in what he may, ſhall repent him: how much more in what he ſhould not? I never read of Chriſtian that repented him of two little worldly delight. The ſureſt courſe I have ſtill found in all earthly pleaſures, to riſe with an appetite, and to be ſatisfied with a little.

There is a time when Kings goe not forth to warfare: our ſpirituall warre admits no intermiſſion: it knowes no night, no winter, abides no peace, no truce. This calls us not into garriſon, where we may have eaſe and reſpit, but into pitched fields con-
B tinually: we ſee our enemies in the face alwayes, and are alwayes ſeene and aſſaulted; ever reſiſting, ever defending, receiving and returning blowes. If either we be negligent or weary, wee dye: what other hope is there while one fights, and the other ſtands ſtill? We can never have ſafety and peace, but in victory. There muſt our reſiſtance be couragious and conſtant, where both yeelding is death, and all treaties of peace mortall.

Neutrality in things good or evill, is both odious, and prejudiciall; but in matters of an indifferent nature is ſafe and commendable. Herein taking of parts maketh ſides, and breaketh unity. In an unjuſt cauſe of ſeparation, hee that favoureth both parts may (perhaps) have leaſt love of either ſide, but hath moſt charity in himſelfe.

C Nothing is more abſurd than that Epicurean reſolution, Let us eat and drink, to morrow we ſhall dye: As if we were made onely for the panch, and lived that wee might live: yet there was never any naturall man found ſavour in that meat which he knew ſhould be his laſt: whereas they ſhould ſay, Let us faſt and pray, to morrow wee ſhall dye: for, to what purpoſe is the body ſtrengthned, that it may periſh, whoſe greatter ſtrength makes our death more violent? No man beſtowes a coſtly roofe on a ruinous tenement: that mans end is eaſie and happy, whom death finds with a weake body, and a ſtrong ſoule.

Sometime, even things in themſelves naturally good, are to be refuſed for thoſe, which (being evill) may be an occaſion to a greater good. Life is in it ſelfe good, and death evill: elſe David, Elias, and many excellent Martyrs would not have fled, to
D hold life, and avoid death; nor Ezechiah have prayed for it, nor our Saviour have bidden us to flee for it, nor God promiſed it to his for a reward: yet if in ſome caſes we hate not life, we love not God, nor our ſoules. Herein, as much as in any thing, the perverſneſſe of our nature appeares, that we wiſh death, or love life upon wrong cauſes: we would live for pleaſure, or we would dye for paine; Iob for his ſores, Elias for his perſecution, Ionas for his Gourd would preſently die, and will needs out-face God that it is better for him to dye than to live: wherein we are like to garriſon-ſouldiers, that while they live within ſafe walls, and ſhew themſelves once a day rather for ceremonie and pompe, than need or danger, like warfare well enough; but if once called forth to the field, they wiſh themſelves at home.

Not onely the leaſt, but the worſt is ever in the bottome: what ſhould God doe
E with the dregs of our age? When ſinne will admit thee his Client no longer, then God ſhall bee beholden to thee for thy ſervice: Thus is God dealt with in all other offerings: The worſt and leaſt ſheafe muſt be Gods Tenth: The deformedſt or ſimpleſt of our children muſt bee Gods Miniſters: the uncleanlieſt and moſt careleſſe houſe muſt be Gods Temple: the idleſt and ſleepieſt houres of the day muſt be reſerved for our prayers: The worſt part of our age for devotion. We would have God give us ſtill of the beſt, and are ready to murmure at every little evill he ſends us: yet nothing is bad enough for him, of whom we receive all. Nature condemnes this inequality;

equality; and tels us, that he which is the Author of good, ſhould have the beſt; and he which gives all ſhould have his choyce. A 30.

When we go about an evill buſineſſe, it is ſtrange how ready the devill is to ſet us forward; how carefull, that we ſhould want no furtherances. So that if a man would be lewdly witty, he ſhall be ſure to be furniſhed with ſtore of prophane jeſts, wherein a looſe heart hath double advantage of the conſcionable. If he would be voluptuous, he ſhall want neither objects nor opportunities. The currant paſſage of ill enterpriſes is ſo farre from giving cauſe of encouragement, that it ſhould juſtly fright a man to looke back to the Author; and to conſider that hee therefore goes faſt, becauſe the devill drives him.

In the choyce of companions for our converſation, it is good dealing with men of good natures: for though grace exerciſeth her power in bridling nature, yet, (ſith we are ſtill men, at the beſt) ſome ſwinge ſhe will have in the moſt mortified. Auſterity, ſullenneſſe, or ſtrangeneſſe of diſpoſition, and whatſoever qualities may make a man unſociable, cleave faſter to our nature, than thoſe which are morally evill. True Chriſtian love may be ſeparated from acquaintance, and acquaintance from intireneſſe: Theſe are not qualities to hinder our love, but our familiaritie. B

32.

Ignorance, as it makes bold, intruding men careleſly into unknowne dangers; ſo alſo it makes men oft-times cauſeleſly fearefull. Herod feared Chriſts comming, becauſe he miſtooke it: if that Tyrant had knowne the manner of his ſpirituall Regiment, he had ſpared both his owne fright and the bloud of other. And hence it is that we feare death, becauſe wee are not acquainted with the vertue of it. Nothing but innocency and knowledge can give ſound confidence to the heart. C 33.

Where are divers opinions, they may be all falſe; there can be but one true: and that one truth oft-times muſt bee fetcht by peece-meale out of divers branches of contrary opinions. For, it falls out not ſeldome, that Truth is through ignorance or raſh vehemency, ſcattered into ſundry parts; and like to a little Silver melted amongſt the ruines of a burnt houſe, muſt be tried out from heapes of much ſuperfluous aſhes. There is much paines in the ſearch of it; much skill in finding it: the value of it once found, requites the coſt of both.

Affectation of ſuperfluity, is in all things a ſigne of weakneſſe: As, in words, he that uſeth circumlocutions to expreſſe himſelf, ſhews want of memory and want of proper ſpeech: And much talke argues a braine feeble and diſtempered. What good can any earthly thing yeeld us beſide his uſe? and what is it but vanity, to affect that which doth us no good? and what uſe is in that which is ſuperfluous? It is a great skill to know what is enough, and great wiſdome to care for no more. D 35.

Good things, which in abſence were deſired, now offering themſelves to our preſence, are ſcarce entertained; or at leaſt not with our purpoſed cheerefulneſſe. Chriſts comming to us, and our going to him, are in our profeſſion well eſteemed, much wiſhed: but when he ſingleth us out by a direct meſſage of death, or by ſome fearefull ſigne giveth likelihood of a preſent returne, wee are as much affected with feare, as before with deſire. All changes, although to the better, are troubleſome for the time, untill our ſetling: There is no remedy hereof but inward prevention: Our minde muſt change, before our eſtate be changed. E

36.

Thoſe are greateſt enemies to Religion, that are not moſt irreligious. Atheiſts, though in themſelves they be the worſt, yet are ſeldome found hot Perſecutors of others: whereas thoſe which in ſome one fundamentall point be hereticall, are commonly moſt violent in oppoſitions. One hurts by ſecret infection, the other by open reſiſtance: One is careleſſe of all truth, the other vehement for ſome untruth.

truth. An Atheiſt is worthy of more hatred, an Heretike of more feare; both of avoydance.

Wayes, if never uſed, cannot but be faire; if much uſed, are made commodiouſly paſſable; if before oft uſed, and now ſeldome, they become deepe and dangerous. If the heart be not at all inured to meditation, it findeth no fault with it ſelfe; not for that it is innocent, but ſecure; if often, it findeth comfortable paſſage for his thoughts; if rarely, and with intermiſſion, tedious and troubleſome. In things of this nature, we only eſcape complaint, if we uſe them either alwayes or never.

Our ſenſuall hand holds faſt whatſoever delight it apprehendeth: our ſpirituall hand eaſily remitteth; becauſe appetite is ſtronger in us than grace: whence it is, that we ſo hardly deliver our ſelves of earthly pleaſures, which we have once entertained; and with ſuch difficulty draw our ſelves to a conſtant courſe of faith, hope, and ſpirituall joy, or to the renued acts of them once intermitted. Age is naturally weak, and youth vigorous; but in us the old man is ſtrong, the new faint and feeble: the fault is not in grace, but in us: Faith doth not want ſtrength, but we want faith.

It is not good in worldly eſtates for a man to make himſelfe neceſſary; for hereupon hee is both more toyled, and more ſuſpected: but in the ſacred Commonwealth of the Church, a man cannot be engaged too deeply by his ſervice. The ambition of ſpirituall well-doing breeds no danger. He that doth beſt, and may worſt be ſpared, is happieſt.

40.

It was a fit compariſon of worldly cares, to thornes: for as they choke the Word, ſo they pricke our ſoules: Neither the Word can grow up amongſt them, nor the heart can reſt upon them: Neither body nor ſoule can find eaſe while they are within, or cloſe to us. Spirituall cares are as ſharp; but more profitable: they paine us, but leave the ſoule better. They breake our ſleep, but for a ſweeter reſt: wee are not wel, but either while we have them, or after we have had them. It is as impoſſible to have ſpirituall health without theſe, as to have bodily ſtrength with the other.

41.

In temporall good things, it is beſt to live in doubt; not making full account of that which we hold in ſo weake a tenure: In ſpirituall, with confidence; not fearing that which is warranted to us by an infallible promiſe and ſure earneſt. Hee lives more contentedly, that is moſt ſecure for this world, moſt reſolute for the other.

42.

God hath in nature given every man inclinations to ſome one particular calling; which if he follow, he excells; if he croſſe, he proves a non-proficient, and changeable: but all mens natures are equally indiſpoſed to grace, and to the common vocation of Chriſtianity; we are all borne Heathens. To do well, Nature muſt in the firſt be obſerved and followed, in the other croſſed and overcome.

Good-man is a title given to the loweſt; whereas all Titles of Greatneſſe, Worſhip, Honour, are obſerved and attributed with choyce. The ſpeech of the world bewrayes their mind, and ſhews the common eſtimation of goodneſſe compared with other qualities. The World therefore is an ill Herald, and unskilfull in the true ſtiles. It were happy that Goodneſſe were ſo common; and pity that it either ſhould not ſtand with Greatneſſe, or not be preferred to it.

Amongſt all actions, Satan is ever buſieſt in the beſt, and moſt in the beſt part of the beſt; as in the end of Prayer, when the heart ſhould cloſe up it ſelfe with moſt comfort. He never feares us, but when we are well employed: and the more likelihood he ſees of our profit, the more is his envy and labour to diſtract us. We ſhould love our ſelves as much as he hates us; and therfore ſtrive ſo much the more towards our good, as his malice ſtriveth to interrupt it. Wee doe nothing, if we contend not,

when

when wee are reſiſted. The good ſoule is ever in contradiction; denying what is granted, and contending for that which is denied; ſuſpecting when it is gain-ſaid, and fearing liberty.

45.

God fore-warnes ere he trie, becauſe he would be prevented: Satan ſteales upon us ſuddenly by temptations, becauſe he would foile us. If we relent not upon Gods premonition, and meet not the lingring paſe of his puniſhments, to fore-ſtall them, hee puniſheth more, by how much his warning was more evident and more large. Gods trialls muſt be met when they come: Satans muſt be ſeene before they come; and if we be not armed ere we be aſſaulted, we ſhall be foyled ere wee can be armed.

46.

It is not good to be continuall in denunciation of judgement: The noiſe to which we are accuſtomed (though loud) wakes us not; whereas a leſſe (if unuſuall) ſtirreth us. The next way to make threatnings contemned, is to make them common. It is a profitable rod that ſtrikes ſparingly, and frights ſomewhat oftner than it ſmiteth.

47.

Want of uſe cauſeth diſability, and cuſtome perfection. Thoſe that have not uſed to pray in their Cloſet, cannot pray in publike, but coldly and in forme. He that diſcontinues meditation, ſhall be long in recovering; whereas the man inured to theſe exerciſes (who is not dreſſed till he have prayed, nor hath ſupped till he have meditated) doth both theſe well, and with eaſe. Hee that intermits good duties, incurres a double loſſe: of the bleſſing that followeth good; of the faculty of doing it.

Chriſtianity is both an eaſie yoke, and a hard; hard to take up; eaſie to beare when once taken. The heart requires much labour, ere it can be induced to ſtoop under it; and finds as much contentment when it hath ſtooped. The worldling thinks Religion ſervility; but the Chriſtian knowes whoſe ſlave hee was, till he entred into this ſervice; and that no bondage can be ſo evill, as freedome from theſe bonds.

49.

It is a wonder how full of ſhifts Nature is; ready to turne over all good purpoſes. If we thinke of death, ſhe ſuggeſts ſecretly; Tuſh, it ſhall not come yet: If of judgement for ſinne; This concernes not thee; it ſhall not come at all: If of heaven, and our labour to reach it; Trouble not thy ſelfe; it will come ſoone enough alone. Addreſſe thy ſelfe to pray; It is yet unſeaſonable; ſtay for a better opportunity: To give almes; Thou knoweſt not thine owne future wants: To reprove; What needſt thou thruſt thy ſelfe into wilfull hatred? Every good action hath his let: He can never be good, that is not reſolute.

50.

All Arts are Maids to Divinity; therefore they both vaile to her, and doe her ſervice, and ſhe like a grave Miſtreſſe, controlles them at pleaſure: Naturall Philoſophy teacheth, that of nothing can be nothing made; and that from the privation to the habit, is no returne: Divinity takes her up for theſe; and upon ſupernaturall principles, teaches her a Creation, a Reſurrection. Philoſophy teaches us to follow ſenſe, as an infallible guide: Divinity tells her, that faith is of things not ſeene. Logick teaches us firſt to diſcourſe, then to reſolve: Divinity, to aſſent without arguing. Civill Law teacheth, that long cuſtome preſcribeth: Divinity, that old things are paſſed. Morall Philoſophy, that tallying of injuries is juſtice: Divinity, that good muſt be returned for ill. Policy, that better is a miſchiefe than an inconvenience: Divinity, that we may not doe evill, that good may enſue. The Schoole is well ordered, while Divinity keeps the Chaire: but if any other skill uſurpe it, and check their Miſtreſſe, there can follow nothing but confuſion and Atheiſme.

Much difference is to be made betwixt a revolter and a man trained up in error. A Jew and an Arrian both deny Chriſts Deity, yet this opinion is not in both puniſht with bodily death. Yea, a revolt to a leſſe errour, is more puniſhable than education in in a capitall Heriſie. Errours of judgment, though leſſe regarded than errours of practice, yet are more pernicious: but none ſo deadly as theirs, that once were in the truth. If truth be not ſued to, it is dangerous; but if forſaken, deſperate.

It is an ill argument of a good action not well done, when wee are glad that it is done. To bee affected with the comfort of the conſcience of well performing it, is good: but meerely to rejoyce that the act is over, is carnall. Hee never can begin cheerefully, that is glad he hath ended.

53.

He that doth not ſecret ſervice to God with ſome delight, doth but counterfeit in publike. The truth of any act or paſſion is then beſt tried, when it is without witneſs. Openly, many ſiniſter reſpects may draw from us a forme of religious duties: ſecretly, nothing but the power of a good conſcience. It is to be feared, God hath more true and devout ſervice in Cloſets, than in Churches.

54.

Words and diſeaſes grow upon us with yeeres. In age, we talke much, becauſe we have ſeen much, and ſoon after ſhall ceaſe talking for ever: We are moſt diſeaſed, becauſe nature is weakeſt; & death which is neere, muſt have harbingers: ſuch is the old age of the World. No marvell, if this laſt time be full of writing, and weak diſcourſe, full of ſects and hereſies, which are the ſickneſſes of this great and decayed body.

55.

The beſt ground untilled, ſooneſt runs out into rank weeds. Such are Gods children; Over-growne with ſecurity ere they are aware, unleſſe they be well exerciſed both with Gods plow of affliction, and their owne induſtry in meditation. A man of knowledge that is either negligent or un-corrected, cannot but grow wild and godleſſe.

56.

With us, vileſt things are moſt common; But with God the beſt things are moſt frequently given. Grace, which is the nobleſt of all Gods favours, is unpartially beſtowed upon all willing receivers; whereas nobility of blood and height of place, bleſſings of an inferiour nature, are reſerved for few. Herein the Chriſtian followes his Father; his prayers which are his richeſt portion, he communicates to all; his ſubſtance according to his ability, to few.

God therefore gives, becauſe he hath given; making his former favours, arguments for more; Man therefore ſhuts his hand, becauſe he hath opened it. There is no ſuch way to procure more from God, as to urge him with what he hath done. All Gods bleſſings are profitable and excellent; not ſo much in themſelves, as that they are inducements to greater.

58.

Gods immediate actions are beſt, at firſt. The frame of this creation how exquiſite was it under his hand! afterward, blemiſhed by our ſinne: mans indevours are weak in their beginnings, and perfecter by degrees. No ſcience, no device hath ever beene perfect in his cradle; or at once hath ſeene his birth and maturitie: of the ſame nature are thoſe actions which God worketh mediately by us according to our meaſure of receit. The cauſe of both is, on the one ſide the infiniteneſſe of his wiſdome and power, which cannot be corrected by any ſecond aſſayes: On the other, our weakneſs, helping it ſelfe by former grounds and trialls. He is an happy man that detracts nothing from Gods workes, and addes moſt to his owne.

The old ſaying is more common than true; that thoſe which are in hell, know no other heaven: for this makes the damned perfectly miſerable, that out of their owne torment, they ſee the felicity of the Saints; together with their impoſſibility of attaining it. Sight without hope of fruition, is a torment alone: Thoſe that here might ſee God and will not, or doe ſee him obſcurely and love him not, ſhall once ſee him with anguiſh of ſoule and not enjoy him.

Sometimes evill ſpeeches come from good men, in their unadviſedneſſe: and ſometimes even the good ſpeeches of men may proceed from an ill ſpirit. No confeſſion could be better than Satan gave of Chriſt: It is not enough to conſider what is ſpoken, or by whom; but whence, and for what. The ſpirit is oftentimes tried by the ſpeech: but other-times the ſpeech muſt bee examined by the ſpirit; and the ſpirit, by the rule of an higher word.

Greatneſſe puts high thoughts, and bigge words into a man; whereas the dejected mind takes, careleſly, what offers it ſelf. Every worldling is baſe-minded; and therefore his thoughts creepe ſtill low upon the earth. The Chriſtian both is and knowes himſelfe truly great; and thereupon mindeth and ſpeaketh of ſpirituall, immortall, glorious, heavenly things. So much as the ſoule ſtoopeth unto earthly thoughts, ſo much is it unregenerate.

Long acquaintance, as it maketh thoſe things which are evill, to ſeeme leſſe evill, ſo it makes good things, which at firſt were unpleaſant, delightfull. There is no evill of paine, nor no morall good action, which is not harſh at the firſt. Continuance of evill, which might ſeeme to weary us, is the remedy and abatement of wearineſſe: and the practice of good, as it profiteth, ſo it pleaſeth. He that is a ſtranger to good and evill, finds both of them troubleſome. God therefore doth well for us, while he exerciſeth us with long afflictions: and we doe well to our ſelves, while we continually buſie our ſelves in good exerciſes.

Sometimes it is well taken by men, that we humble our ſelves lower than there is cauſe. Thy ſervant Iacob, ſaith that good Patriarch, to his brother, to his inferior. And no leſſe well doth God take theſe ſubmiſſe extenuations of our ſelves; I am a worme, and no man: Surely I am more fooliſh than a man, and have not the underſtanding of a man in me. But I never find that any man bragged to God, although in a matter of truth, and within the compaſſe of his deſert, and was accepted. A man may be too lowly in his dealing with men, even unto contempt: with God he cannot; but the lower he falleth, the higher is his exaltation.

The ſoule is fed as the body, ſtarved with hunger as the body, requires proportionable diet and neceſſary variety, as the body. All ages and ſtatures of the ſoule beare not the ſame nouriſhment. There is milke for ſpirituall Infants, ſtrong meate for the growne Chriſtian. The ſpoone is fit for one, the knife for the other. The beſt Chriſtian is not ſo growne, that he need to ſcorn the ſpoone: but the weake Chriſtian may find a ſtrong food dangerous. How many have been caſt away with ſpirituall ſurfets, becauſe being but new-borne, they have ſwallowed downe big morſels of the higheſt miſteries of godlineſſe, which they never could digeſt; but together with them have caſt up their proper nouriſhment? A man muſt firſt know the power of his ſtomack, ere he know how with ſafety and profit to frequent Gods Ordinary.

It is very hard for the beſt man in a ſudden extremity of death, to ſatisfie himſelf in apprehending his ſtay, and repoſing his heart upon it: for the ſoule is ſo oppreſſed with ſudden terrour, that it cannot well command it ſelfe, till it have digeſted an evill. It were miſerable for the beſt Chriſtian, if all his former prayers and meditations did not ſerve to aid him in his laſt ſtraits, and meet together in the center of his extremitie; yeelding, though not ſenſible releeſe, yet ſecret benefit to the ſoule: whereas the worldly man in this caſe, having not laid up for this houre, hath no comfort from God, or from others, or from himſelfe.

All externall good or evill is meaſured by ſenſe: neither can we account that either good or ill, which doth neither actually availe, nor hurt us: ſpiritually this rule holds not. All our beſt good is inſenſible. For all our future (which is the greateſt) good, we hold

A hold only in hope, and the preſent favour of God we have many times; and feele not. The ſtomacke finds the beſt digeſtion even in ſleepe, when we leaſt perceive it: and whiles we are moſt awake, this power worketh in us either to further ſtrength or diſeaſe, without our knoledge of what is done within: And on the other ſide; that man is moſt dangerouſly ſick, in whom nature decayes without his feeling, without complaint. To know our ſelves happy, is good: but woe were to us Chriſtians, if we could not be happy, and know it not.

There are none that ever did ſo much miſchiefe to the Church, as thoſe that have been excellent in wit and learning. Others may be ſpightful enough, but want power to accompliſh their malice. An enemie that hath both ſtrength and craft, is worthy to be feared. None can ſin againſt the Holy Ghoſt, but thoſe which have had former
B illumination. Tell not me what parts a man hath, but what grace: honeſt ſottiſhneſſe is better than prophane eminence.

The entertainment of all ſpirituall events muſt be with feare, or hope; but, of all earthly extremities, muſt be with contempt or deriſion. For what is terrible, is worthy of a Chriſtians contempt; what is pleaſant, to be turned over with a ſcorne. The meane requires a meane affection betwixt love and hatred. We may not love them, becauſe of their vanity: we may not hate them, becauſe of their neceſſary uſe. It is an hard thing to he a wiſe Oaſt, and to fit our entertainment to all commers: which if it be not done, the ſoule is ſoone waſted, either for want of cuſtomers, or for the miſ-rule of ill gueſts.

C God and man build in a contrary order. Man layes the foundation firſt, then addes the walles, the roofe laſt. God began the roofe firſt, ſpreading out this vault of heaven, ere he laid the Baſe of the earth. Our thoughts muſt follow the order of his workmanſhip. Heaven muſt bee minded firſt; earth afterward: and ſo much more, as it is ſeene more. Our meditation muſt herein follow our ſence: A few miles give bounds to our view of earth; whereas we may neere ſee halfe the heaven at once. He that thinkes moſt both of that which is moſt ſeene, and of that which is not ſeene at D all, is happieſt.

I have ever noted it a true ſigne of a falſe-heart, To be ſcrupulous and nice in ſmall matters, negligent in the maine: whereas the good ſoule is ſtill curious in ſubſtantiall points, and not careleſſe in things of an inferiour nature; accounting no duty ſo ſmall as to be neglected, and no care great enough for principall duties, not ſo tything Mint and Cummin, that he ſhould forget juſtice and judgement; nor yet ſo regarding judgement and juſtice, that hee ſhould contemne Mint and Cummin. He that thus miſplaces his conſcience, will be found either hypocriticall or ſuperſtitious.

71.

It argues the world full of Atheiſts, that thoſe offences which may impeach humane ſocietie, are entertained with an anſwerable hatred and rigour: thoſe which doe immediately wrong the ſupreme majeſtie of God, are turned over with ſcarce ſo much as diſlike. If we converſed with God as we doe with men, his right would be at leaſt as precious to us as our owne. All that converſe not with God, are without God: not onely thoſe that are againſt God, but thoſe that are without God, are Atheiſts. We may be too charitable: I feare not to ſay, that theſe our laſt times abound
E with honeſt Atheiſts.

The beſt thing corrupted, is worſt: An ill man is the worſt of all creatures, an ill Chriſtian the worſt of all men, an ill profeſſour the worſt of all Chriſtians, an ill Miniſter the worſt of all profeſſours.

73.

Naturally, life is before death; and death is only a privation of life: Spiritually, it is contrary. As Paul ſaith of the graine, ſo may we of man in the buſineſſe of regeneration: He muſt die before he can live: yet this death preſuppoſes a life that was once and ſhould be. God chuſes to have the difficulteſt, firſt: we muſt be content with the paine of dying, ere we feele the comfort of life. As we die to nature, ere wee live in glory: ſo we muſt die to ſinne, ere we can live to grace.

Death did not firſt ſtrike Adam the firſt ſinfull man, nor Cain the firſt hypocrite, but Abel the innocent & righteous. The firſt ſoule that met with death, overcame death: the firſt ſoule that parted from earth, went to heaven. Death argues not diſpleaſure; becauſe he whom God loved beſt, dies firſt; & the murtherer is puniſhed with living.

75.

The lives of moſt are miſ-ſpent, only for want of a certaine end of their actions: wherein they do as unwiſe Archers, ſhoot away their arrows they know not at what mark. They live only out of the preſent, not directing themſelves and their proceedings to one univerſall ſcope: whence they alter upon all change of occaſions, and never reach any perfection; neither can doe other but continue in uncertainty, and end in diſcomfort. Others aime at one certaine mark, but a wrong one. Some (though fewer) levell at the right end, but amiſſe. To live without one maine and common end, is idleneſſe and folly. To live to a falſe end, is deceit and loſſe. True Chriſtian wiſdome both ſhews the end, and finds the way. And as cunning Politicks have many plots to compaſſe one and the ſame deſigne by a determined ſucceſſion; ſo the wiſe Chriſtian failing in the meanes, yet ſtill fetcheth about to his ſteady end with a conſtant change of endevours: ſuch one only lives to purpoſe, and at laſt repents not that he hath lived.

76.

The ſhipwrack of a good conſcience, is the caſting away of all other excellencies. It is no rare thing to note the ſoule of a wilful ſinner ſtripped of all her graces, and by degrees expoſed to ſhame: ſo thoſe, whom we have knowne admired, have fallen to be levell with their fellowes; and from thence beneath them, to a mediocritie; and afterwards to ſottiſhneſſe and contempt, below the vulgar, Since they have caſt away the beſt, it is juſt with God to take away the worſt; and to caſt off them in leſſer regards, which have rejected him in greater.

It hath ever been counted more noble and ſucceſſefull to ſet upon an open enemie in his owne home, than to expect till he ſet upon us, whiles he make only a defenſive warre. This rule ſerves us for our laſt enemy Death: whence that old demand of Epicure is eaſily anſwered, Whether it be better Death ſhould come to us, or that wee ſhould meet him in the way: meet him in our miuds, ere hee ſeize upon our bodies. Our cowardlineſſe, our unpreparation is his advantage: whereas true boldneſſe in confronting him, diſmaies and weakens his forces. Happy is that ſoule, that can ſend out the ſcouts of his thoughts before-hand, to diſcover the power of death afarre off; and then can reſolutely encounter him at unawares upon advantage: ſuch one lives with ſecurity, dies with comfort.

Many a man ſends others to heaven, and yet goes to hell himſelfe: and not few having drawne others to hell, yet themſelves returne by a late repentance, to life. In a good action, it is not good to ſearch too deeply into the intention of the agent, but in ſilence to make our beſt benefit of the work: In an evill, it is not ſafe to regard the qualitie of the perſon, or his ſucceſſe, but to conſider the action abſtracted from all circumſtances, in his owne kind. So we ſhall neither neglect good deeds, becauſe they ſpeed not well in ſome hands, nor affect a proſperous evill.

God doth ſome ſingular actions, wherein wee cannot imitate him; ſome, wherein we may not; moſt, wherein he may and would faine be followed. He fetcheth good out of evill; ſo may we turne our owne and others ſinnes to private or publike good: we may not do evill for a good uſe; but we muſt uſe our evill once done, to good. I hope I ſhall not offend, to ſay, that the good uſe which is made of ſins, is as gainfull

to

to God, as that which ariſes from good actions. Happy is that man, that can uſe either his good well, or his evill.

80.

There is no difference betwixt anger and madneſſe, but continuance: for, raging anger is a ſhort madneſſe. What elſe argues the ſhaking of the hands and lips, paleneſſe, or redneſſe, or ſwelling of the face, glaring of the eyes, ſtammering of the tongue, ſtamping with the feet, unſteady motions of the whole body, raſh actions which we remember not to have done, diſtracted and wild ſpeeches? and madneſſe againe is nothing but a continued rage, yea ſome madneſſe rageth not: ſuch a mild madneſſe is more tolerable, than frequent and furious anger.

81.

Thoſe that would keepe ſtate, muſt keepe aloofe off; eſpecially if their qualities be not anſwerable in height to their place. For many great perſons are like a welwrought picture upon a courſe cloth; which afarre off ſhewes faire, but neer-hand the roundneſſe of the threed marres the good workmanſhip. Concealment of gifts, after ſome one commended act, is the beſt way to admiration, and ſecret honour: but he that would profit, muſt vent himſelfe oft, and liberally, and ſhew what he is, without all private regard. As therefore, many times, honour followes modeſty unlookt for; ſo, contrarily, a man may ſhew no leſſe pride in ſilence and obſcuritie, than others, which ſpeak and writ for glory. And that other pride is ſo much the worſe, as it is more unprofitable: for whereas thoſe which put forth their gifts, benefit others whiles they ſeeke themſelves; theſe are ſo wholly devoted to themſelves, that their ſecrecy doth no good to others.

Such as a mans delights and cares are in health, ſuch are both his thoughts and ſpeeches commonly on his death-bed: the proud man talks of his faire ſutes, the glutton of his diſhes, the wanton of his beaſtlineſs, the religious man of heavenly things. The tongue will hardly leave that to which the heart is inured. If wee would have good motions to viſit us while we are ſick, wee muſt ſend for them familiarly in our health.

He is a rare man, that hath not ſome kind of madneſſe raigning in him: One a dull madneſſe of melancholy, another a conceited madneſſe of pride; another a ſuperſtitious madneſſe of falſe devotion; a fourth of ambition, or covetouſneſſe; a fift, the furious madneſſe of anger; a ſixt, the laughing madneſſe of extreme mirth; a ſeventh, a drunken madneſſe; an eight, of outragious luſt; a ninth, the learned madneſſe of curioſitie; a tenth, the worſt madneſſe of prophaneneſſe and Atheiſme. It is as hard to reckon up all kinds of madneſſes, as of diſpoſitions. Some are more noted and puniſhed than others; ſo that, the mad-man in one kind as much condemnes another, as the ſober man condemnes him. Onely that man is both good, and wiſe, and happie, that is free from all kinds of phrenſie.

There be ſome honeſt errours, where-with I never found that God was offended. That an husband ſhould thinke his owne Wife comely, although ill-favoured in the eyes of others: That a man ſhould think more meanly of his owne good parts, than of weaker in others: To give charitable (though miſtaken) conſtructions of doubtfull actions and perſons (which are the effects of naturall affection, humility, love) were never cenſured by God: Herein alone we erre, if we erre not.

No marvell if the worldling eſcape earthly afflictions. God corrects him not, becauſe he loves him not. He is baſe borne and begot. God will not doe him the favour to whip him. The world afflicts him not, becauſe he loves him: for each man is indulgent to his owne. God uſes not the rod where he meanes to uſe the ſword. The Pillory or ſcourge is for thoſe malefactors which ſhall eſcape execution.

86.

Weak ſtomacks which cannot digeſt large meals, feed oft and little: For our ſoules, that which we want in meaſure, we muſt ſupply in frequence. Wee can never fully enough comprehend in our thoughts the joyes of heaven, the meritorious ſuffe- A rings of Chriſt, the terrours of the ſecond death: therefore wee muſt meditate of them often.

87.

The ſame thoughts doe commonly meet us in the ſame places; as if we had left them there till our returne. For that the mind doth ſecretly frame to it ſelfe memorative heads, whereby it recalls eaſily the ſame conceits. It is beſt to imploy our mind there, where it is moſt fixed. Our devotion is ſo dull, it cannot have too many advantages.

I find but one example in all Scripture, of any bodily cure which our Saviour wrought by degrees: only the blind man, whoſe weak faith craved help by others, not by himſelf, ſaw men firſt like trees, then in their true ſhape. All other miraculous B cures of Chriſt were done at once, and perfect at firſt. Contrarily, I find but one example of a ſoule fully healed (that is) ſanctified and glorified, both in a day; all other by degrees and leiſure. The ſteps of grace are ſoft and ſhort. Thoſe externall miracles he wrought immediately by himſelfe; and therefore no marvell if they were abſolute like their Author. The miraculous work of our Regeneration he works together with us: He giveth it efficacie; we give it imperfection.

DAVID'S PSALMS

OR

SONGS

TO MY LOVING AND LEARNED COVSIN,

Mr. SAMUEL BURTON,

Archdeacon of Gloceſter.

INdeed, my Poetry was long ſithence out of date, and yeelded her place to graver ſtudies: but whoſe veine would it not revive, to looke into thoſe heavenly Songs? I were not worthy to be a Divine, if it ſhould repent me to bee a Poet with David, after I ſhall have aged in the Pulpit. This worke is holy and ſtrict, and abides not any youthfull or heatheniſh liberty, but requires hands free from prophaneſs, looſeneſſe, affection. It is a ſervice to God and the Church by ſo much more carefully to bee regarded, as it is more common. For who is there that will not challenge a part in this labour? and that ſhall not find himſelf much more affected with holy meaſure rightly cõpoſed: Wherefore I have oft wondred, how it could be offenſive to our adverſaries, that theſe divine Ditties which the Spirit of God wrote in verſe, ſhould bee ſung in verſe; and that an Hebrew Poem ſhould bee made Engliſh. For if this kind of compoſition had been unfit, God would never have made choice of numbers, wherein to expreſſe himſelfe. Yea, who knows not that ſome other Scriptures, which the Spirit hath indited in proſe, have yet been happily & with good allowance put into ſtrict numbers? If hiſtories tell us of a Wanton Poet of old, which loſt his eyes while he went about to turne Moſes into verſe; yet every ſtudent knowes with what good ſucceſſe and commendation Nonnus hath turned Iohns Goſpel into Greek Heroicks. And Appollinarius, that learned Syrian matched with Baſil and Gregory (who lived in his time) in the termes of this equality, that Baſils ſpeech Was τριθερώπερος, but Appollinaries ἀδροπλόκος, wrote, as Suidas reports, all the Hebrew Scripture in Heroicks, as Sozomen (ſomewhat more reſtrainedly) all the Archaiology of the Iewes, till Sauls government, in 24. parts; or as Socrates yet more particularly, all Moſes in Heroicks, and all the other Hiſtories in divers metres: but how-ever his other labours lie hid, his Metaphraſe of the Pſalmes is ſtill in our hands, with the applauſe of all the learned: beſides the the labours of their owne Flaminius and Arias Montanus (to ſeeke for no more) which have worthily beſtowed themſelves in this ſubject. Neither doe I ſee how it can be offenſive to our friends, that wee ſhould deſire our Engliſh Metaphraſe bettered. I ſay nothing to the diſgrace of that we have: I know how glad our adverſaries are of all ſuch advantages; which they are ready enough to find out without me, ever reprochfully upbraiding us with theſe defects. But ſince our whole Tranſlation is now univerſally reviſed, what inconvenience or ſhew of innovation can it beare, that the verſe ſhould accompany the proſe? eſpecially ſince it is well knowne how rude and homely our Engliſh Poſie was in thoſe times, compared with the preſent; wherein, if ever, it ſeeth her full perfection. I have beene ſollicited by ſome reverend friends to undertake this taske; as that which ſeemed well to accord with the former exerciſes of my youth, and my preſent profeſſion. The difficulties I found many, the worke long and great; yet not more painfull than beneficiall to Gods Church: whereto as I dare not profeſſe any ſufficiency; ſo I will not deny my readineſſe and utmoſt endevour, if I ſhall be emploied by Authority: wherefore, in this part, I doe humbly ſubmit my ſelfe to the grave cenſures of them, whoſe wiſdome manageth theſe common affaires of the Church: and am ready either to ſtand ſtill or proceed, as I ſhall ſee their Cloud or Fire go before or behind me. Only (howſoever) I ſhall for my true affection to the Church, wiſh it done by better workmen: wherein as you approve, ſo further my bold, but not unprofitable motion, and commend it unto greater cares: as I doe you to the Greateſt.

Non-ſuch. July 3.

Your loving Kinſman

JOS: HALL.

Some fewe of DAVIDS Pſalmes Metaphraſed.

PSALME 1.

In the tune of the 148. Pſalme.

Give laud unto the Lord.

WHo hath not walkt aſtray,
In wicked mens advice,
Nor ſtood in ſinners way;
Nor in their companies
That ſcorners are,
As their fit mate,
In ſcoffing chaire,
Hath ever ſate.

2 But in thy lawes divine,
O Lord ſets his delight,
And in thoſe lawes of thine
Studies all day and night;
Oh, how that man
Thrice bleſſed is!
And ſure ſhall gaine
Eternall bliſſe.

3 He ſhall be like the tree
Set by the water-ſprings,
Which when his ſeaſons be Moſt pleaſant fruit forth brings,
Whoſe boughs ſo greene
Shall never fade,
But covered beene
With comely ſhade.

So, to this happy wight,
All his deſignes ſhall thrive:
4 Whereas the man unright,
As chaffe which winds doe drive,
With every blaſt
Is toſt on hie,
Nor can at laſt
In ſafety lie.

5 Wherefore in that ſad doome,
They dare not riſe from duſt:
Nor ſhall no ſinner come,
To glory of the juſt.
For, God will grace
The juſt mans way;
While ſinners race
Runs to decay.

PSALME 2.

In the tune of the 125. Pſalme.

Thoſe that doe put their confidence.

WHy do the Gentiles tumults make,
And nations all conſpire in vaine,
2 And earthly Princes counſell take
Againſt their God, againſt the Raigne
Of his deare Chriſt? let us, they ſaine,
3 Breake all their bonds: and from us ſhake
Their thraldome, yoke, and ſervile chaine,
4 Whiles thus (alas) they fondly ſpake,

He that aloft rides on the skies,
Laughs all their lewd device to ſcorne,
5 And when his wrathfull rage ſhall riſe,
With plagues ſhall make them all forlorne,
And in his fury thus replies;
6 But I, my King with ſacred horne
Anointing, ſhall in princely guiſe
His head with royall Crowne adorne.

Vpon my Sions holy mount
His Empires glorious ſeat ſhall be.
And I thus rais'd ſhall farre recount
The tenour of his true degree.
7 My Sonne thou art, ſaid God, I thee
Begat this day by due account:
Thy Scepter, doe but aske of me,
All earthly kingdomes ſhall ſurmount.

8 All nations to thy rightfull ſway,
I will ſubject from furtheſt end
9 Of all the world, and thou ſhalt bray
Thoſe ſtubborne foes that will not bend,
With iron Mace (like Potters clay)
10 In peeces ſmall: ye Kings attend;
And yee, whom others wont obey,
Learne wiſdome, and at laſt amend.

11 See,

11 See, ye serve God, with greater dread
Than others you: and in your feare
Rejoyce the while; and (lowly spread)
12 Doe homage to his Sonne so deare:
Lest he be wroth, and doe you dead
13 Amids your way, if kindled
His wrath shall be; O blessed those
That doe on him their trust repose.

PSALME 3.

As the 113. Psalme.

Ye children which, &c.

AH Lord! how many be my foes!
How many are against me rose,
2 That to my grieved soule have sed,
Tush, God shall him no succour yeeld;
3 Whiles thou, Lord, art my praise, my shield,
And dost advance my carefull head!

4 Loud with my voice to God I cry'd:
His Grace unto my sute reply'd,
From out his holy Hill.
5 I laid me downe, slept, rose againe:
For thou, O Lord, dost me sustaine,
And sav'st my soule from feared ill.

6 Not if ten thousand armed foes
My naked side should round enclose,
Would I be thereof ought a-dread.
Vp, Lord, and shield me from disgrace:
7 For thou hast broke my foe-mens face,
And all the wickeds teeth hast shed.

8 From thee, O God, is safe defence;
Doe thou thy free beneficence
Vpon thy people largely spread.

PSALME 4.

As the ten Commandements.

Attend my people.

THou witnesse of my truth sincere,
My God, unto my poore request
Vouchsafe to lend thy gracious eare:
Thou hast my soule from thrall releast.

2 Favour me still, and daigne to heare
Mine humble sute. O wretched wights,
3 How long will yee mine honour deare
Turne into shame through your despights?

Still will ye love what thing is vaine,
4 And seeke false hopes? know then at last, A
That God hath chose, and will maintaine
His favourite, whom ye disgrac't.

God Will regard my instant mone.
5 Oh! tremble then, and cease offending;
And on your silent bed alone,
Talke with your hearts, your wayes amending

6 Offer the truest sacrifice
Of broken hearts; on God besetting
7 Your onely trust. The most devise
The wayes of worldly treasure getting: B

But thou, O Lord, lift up to me
The light of that sweet looke of thine;
8 So shall my soule more gladsome be,
Than theirs with all their corne and wine.

9 So I in peace shall lay me downe,
And on my bed take quiet sleepe;
Whiles thou, O Lord, shalt me alone
From dangers all securely keepe. C

PSALME 5.

In the tune of the 124. Psalme.

Now Israel may say, &c.

BOw downe thine eare,
Lord, to these words of mine,
And well regard the secret plaints I make.
2 My King, my God,
to thee I doe betake D
My sad estate:
oh doe thine eare incline
To these loud cries that to thee powred bin.

3 At early morne
thou shalt my voice attend:
For, at day break,
I will my selfe addresse
Thee to implore,
and wait for due redresse.
4 Thou dost not Lord, E delight in wickednesse;
Nor to bad men
wilt thy protection lend.

5 The boasters proud cannot before thee stay:
Thou hat'st all those that

A that are to sin devoted:
6 The lying lips,
and who with blood are spotted,
Thou doest abhorre,
And wilt for ever slay:
7 But I unto thine house shall take the way.

And through thy grace abundant shall adore,
With humble feare
within thy holy place.
B 8 Oh! leade me, Lord, within thy righteous trace:
Even for their sakes
that malice me so sore,
Make smooth thy paths
my dimmer eyes before.

9 Within their mouth
no truth is ever found:
Pure mischiefe is their heart: a gaping tombe
10 Is their wide throat;
C and yet their tongues still sound,
11 With smoothing words.
O Lord give them their doome,
And let them fall
in those their plots profound.
In their excesse of mischiefe them destroy

12 That Rebels are;
so those that to thee flye,
Shall all rejoyce
and sing eternally:
D 13 And whom thou dost protect, and who love thee,
And thy deere name,
in thee shall ever joy;
Since thou with blisse
the righteous dost reward,
And with thy grace,
as with a shield him guard.

PSALME 6.

As the 50. Psalme.

The mighty God, &c.

E LEt me not, Lord,
be in thy wrath reproved:
Oh! scourge me not when thy fierce wrath is moved.
2 Pity me, Lord,
that doe with languor pine:
Heale me whose bones
with paine dissolved bin;
3 Whose weary soule is vexed above measure.
O Lord; how long shall I bide thy displeasure!
4 Turne thee, O Lord,
rescue my soule distrest;
5 And save me of thy grace.
'Mongst those that rest
In silent death can none remember thee;
And in the grave
how shouldst thou praised be?
6 Weary with sighs
all night I caus'd my bed
To swim: with teares,
my couch I watered.
7 Deepe sorrow hath consum'd my dimmed eyne, Sunk in with griefe
at these lewd foes of mine:
8 But now hence, hence,
vaine plotters of mine ill:
The Lord hath heard
my Lamentations shrill;
6 God heard my suit and still attends the same:
10 Blush now my foes,
and flye with sudden shame.

PSALME 7.

As the 112. Psalme.

The man is blest that God, &c.

ON thee, O Lord my God, relies
My onely trust: from bloudy spight
Of all my raging enemies
Oh! let thy mercy me acquite.
2 Lest they like greedy Lyons rend
My soule while none shall it defend.

3 O Lord, if I this thing have wrought,
If in my hands be found such ill:
4 If I with mischiefe ever sought
To pay good turnes, or did not still Doe good unto my causelesse foe,
That thirsted for my overthrow;

5 Then let my foe in eager chase,
Ore-take my soule, and proudly tread
My life below, and with disgrace
In dust lay downe mine honour dead.
6 Rise up in rage, O Lord, e'r soone

Advance thine arme against my foe:

And wake for me, till thou fulfill 7 My promis'd right, so shall glad throngs
Of people flocke unto thine hill.
For their sakes then revenge my wrongs,
8 And rouse thy selfe. Thy judgements be O're all the world: Lord judge thou me.

As truth and honest innocence
Thou find'st in me, Lord, judge thou me,
9 Settle the just with sure defence:
Let me the wicked's malice see
10 Brought to an end. For thy just eye
Doth heart and inward reines descry.

11 My safety stands in God who shields
The sound in heart: whose doome each day
12 To just men and contemners yeelds
13 Their due. Except he change his way,
His sword is whet, to blood intended.
His murdering Bow is ready bended.

14 Weapons of death he hath addrest
And arrowes keene to pierce my foe,
15 Who late bred mischiefe in his brest;
But when he doth on travell goe,
16 Brings forth a lye; deep pits doth delve,
And fall into his pits himselve.

17 Back to his owne head shall rebound
His plotted mischiefe; and his wrongs
18 His crowne shall craze: But I shall sound
Iehovah's praise with thankfull songs,
And will his glorious name expresse,
And tell of all his righteousnesse.

PSALME 8.

As the 113. Psalme.

Ye children which, &c.

HOw noble is thy mighty Name, (frame
O Lord, o're all the worlds wide Whose glory is advanc'd on high above the rowling heavens rack!
2 How for the graceless scorners sake,
To still th' avenging enemy,
Hast thou thy tender infants tongue,
The praise of by great name made strong,
While they hang sucking on the brest!
3 But when I see the heavens bright,
The moone and glittering stars of night,
By thine almighty hand addrest,
4 Oh! what is man, poore silly man,
That thou so mind'st him, and dost daine
To looke at his unworthy seed!
5 Thou hast him set not much beneath
Thine Angels bright; And with a wreath
Of glory hast adorn'd his head.
6 Thou hast him made high soveraigne
7 Of all thy workes, and stretcht his raigne
Vnto the heards and beasts untame,
8 To fowles, and to the scaly traine,
That glideth through the watry Maine.
9 How noble each-where is thy name!

PSALME 9.

To the tune of that knowne song, beginning;

Preserve us, Lord.

THee, and thy wondrous deeds, O God,
With all my soule I sound abroad:
2 My joy, my triumph is in thee.
Of thy dread name my song shall be.

3 O highest God: since put to flight,
And fal'ne and vanisht at thy sight
4 O're all my foes; for thou hast past
Iust sentence on my cause at last:

And sitting on thy throne above,
A rightfull Iudge thy selfe dost prove:
5 The troups profane thy checks have stroid,
And made their name for ever void.

6 Wheres now, my foes, your threatned wrack
So well you did our Cities sack,
And bring to dust; while that ye say,
Their name shall dye as well as they.

7 Loe, in the eternall state God sits:
And his high Throne to justice fits:
8 Whose righteous hand the world shal weild
And to all folke just doome shall yeeld.

9 The poore from high find his releefe;
The poore in needfull times of griefe:
10 Who knows the Lord, to thee shall cleave,
That never dost thy clients leave.

11 Oh! sing the God that doth abide,
On Sion mount; and blazon wide
12 His worthy deeds. For he pursues
The guiltlesse blood with vengeance due:

He minds their cause, nor can passe o're
Sad clamours of the wronged poore.

13 Oh!

13. Oh! mercy Lord: thou that do'ſt ſave
My ſoule from gates of death and grave:

Oh! ſee the wrong my foes have done:
14 That I thy praiſe, to all that gone
Through daughter Sions beauteous gate,
With thankfull ſongs may loud relate;

And may rejoyce in thy ſafe aid.
15 Behold, the Gentiles whiles they made
A deadly pit my ſoule to drowne,
Into their pit are ſunken downe;

In that cloſe ſnare they hid for me,
Lot, their owne feet entangled be.
16 By this juſt doome the Lord is knowne,
That th'ill are puniſht with their owne.

17 Downe ſhall the wicked backward fall
To depeſt hell, and nations all 18 That God forget; nor ſhall the poore
Forgotten be for evermore.

The conſtant hope of ſoules oppreſt
19 Shall not aye dye. Riſe from thy reſt,
Oh Lord, Let not men baſe and rude
Prevaile: judge thou the multitude

20 Of lawleſſe Pagans: ſtrike pale feare
Into thoſe breſts that ſtubborne were:
And let the Gentiles feele and find,
They beene but men of mortall kind.

PSALME 10.

As the 51. Pſalme.

O God, conſider.

WHy ſtand'ſt thou Lord, aloofe ſo long,
And hidſt thee in due times of need,
2 Whiles lewd men proudly offer wrong
Vnto the poore? In their owne deed,
And their device let them be caught.
3 For loe, the wicked braves and boaſts
In his vile and outragious thought,
And bleſſeth him that ravines moſt.

4 On God he dares inſult: his pride
Scornes to enquire of powers above,
But his ſtout thoughts have ſtill deni'd
5 There is a God; His wayes yet prove
Aye proſperous: thy judgements hye
Doe farre ſurmount his dimmer ſight.
6 Therefore doth he all foes defie:
His heart ſaith, I ſhall ſtand in ſpight,

Nor ever move; nor danger bide.
7 His mouth is fill'd with curſes foule,
And with cloſe fraud: His tongue doth hide
8 Miſchiefe and ill: he ſeekes the ſoule
Of harmleſſe men in ſecret wait,
And in the corners of the ſtreet
Doth ſhed their blood; with ſcorne and hate,
His eyes upon the poore are ſet.

9 As ſome fell Lion in his den,
He cloſely lurks the poore to ſpoyle:
He ſpoiles the poore and helpleſſe men,
When once he ſnares them in his toyle.
10 He crowcheth low in cunning wile
And bowes his breſt; whereon whole throngs
Of poore, whom his faire ſhewes beguile,
Fall to be ſubject to his wrongs.

11 God hath forgot (in ſoule he ſayes)
He hides his face to never ſee.
12 Lord God, ariſe, thine hand up-raiſe:
Let not thy poore forgotten be.
13 Shall theſe inſulting wretches ſcorne
Their God, and ſay, thou wilt not care?
14 Thou ſee'ſt (for all thou haſt forborne)
Thou ſee'ſt what all their miſchiefes are;

That to thine hand of vengeance juſt
Thou maiſt them take: the poore diſtreſſed
Relye on thee with conſtant truſt,
The helpe of Orphans and oppreſſed.
15 Oh! breake the wickeds arme of might,
And ſearch out all their curſed traines,
And let them vaniſh out of ſight.
16 The Lord as King for ever reignes.

From forth his coaſts, the heathen ſect
17 Are rooted quite: thou Lord attendſt
To poore mens ſuits; thou do'ſt direct
Their hearts: to them thine eare thou bendſt;
18 That thou mayſt reſcue from deſpight,
The wofull fatherleſſe, and poore:
That ſo, the vaine and earthen wight
On us may tyrannize no more.

A PREMONITION OF THE TITLE AND USE of Characters.

READER,

THe Divines of the old Heathens were their Morall Philosophers: These received the Acts of an inbred law, in the Sinai of Nature, and delivered them with many expositions to the multitude: These were the Overseers of manners, Correctors of vices, Directors of lives, Doctors of vertue, which yet taught their people the body of their naturall Divinity, not after one manner: While some spent themselves in deepe discourses of humane felicity, and the way to it in common; others thought it best to apply the generall precepts of goodnesse or decency, to particular conditions and persons. A third sort in a meane course betwixt the two other, and compounded of them both, bestowed their time in drawing out the true lineaments of every vertue and vice, so lively, that who saw the medals, might know the face: which Art they significantly tearmed Charactery. Their papers were so many tables, their writings so many speaking pictures, or living images, whereby the ruder multitude might even by their sense learne to know vertue, and discerne what to detest. I am deceived if any course could be more likely to prevaile; for herein the grosse conceit is led on with pleasure, and informed while it feeles nothing but delight. And if pictures have beene accounted the bookes of Idiots, behold here the benefit of an image without the offence. It is no shame for us to learne wit of Heathens, neither is it materiall, in whose Schoole we take out a good lesson: yea, it is more shame not to follow their good, than not to lead them better. As one therefore that in worthy examples holds imitation better than invention, I have trod in their paths, but with an higher and wider step; and out of their Tablets have drawne these larger portraitures of both sorts. More might be said, I deny not, of every Vertue, of every Vice: I desired not to say all, but enough. If thou doe but read or like these, I have spent good houres ill; but if thou shalt hence abjure those Vices, which before thou thoughtest not ill favoured, or fall in love with any of these goodly faces of Vertue; or shalt hence finde where thou hast any little touch of these evils, to cleare thy selfe or where any defect in these graces to supply it, neither of us shall need to repent of our labour.

CHARACTERISMES OF VERTVES.

By Jos: Hall.

¶ Imprinted at London, 1640.

THE PROOEME.

VErtue is not loved enough, becauſe ſhee is not ſeene, and Vice loſeth much deteſtation, becauſe her ugline ſſe is ſecret. Certainly, my Lords, there are ſo many beauties, and ſo many graces in the face of Goodneſſe, that no eye can poſſibly ſee it without affection, without raviſhment: and the viſage of Evill is ſo monſtrous through loathſome deformities, that if her lovers were not ignorant, they would be mad with diſdaine and aſtoniſhment. What need wee more than to diſcover theſe two to the world? This Worke ſhall ſave the labour of exhorting, and diſſwaſion. I have here done it as I could, following that ancient Maſter of Morality, who thought this the fitteſt taske for the ninety and ninth yeare of his age, and the profitableſt monument that he could leave for a fare-well to his Grecians. Loe here then Vertue and Vice ſtript naked to the open view, and deſpoiled, one of her rags, the other of her ornaments, and nothing left them but bare preſence to plead for affection: ſee now whether ſhall find more ſuters. And if ſtill the vaine minds of lewd men ſhall dote upon their old miſtreſſe, it will appeare to bee, not becauſe ſhe is not foule, but for that they are blind, and bewitched. And firſt behold the goodly features of VViſdome, an amiable Vertue, and worthy to lead this Stage: which as ſhee extends her ſelfe to all the following Graces, ſo amongſt the reſt is for her largeneſſe moſt conſpicuous.

Theophraſtus.

CHARACTER OF THE WISE MAN.

THere is nothing that he desires not to know, but most and first himselfe: and not so much his owne strength, as his weaknesses; neither is his knowledge reduced to discourse, but practice. He is a skilfull Logician, not by nature so much as use; his working mind doth nothing all his time but make syllogismes, and draw out conclusions, every thing that he sees and heares, serves for one of the premisses: with these he cares first to informe himselfe, then to direct others. Both his eyes are never at once from home, but one keeps house while the other roves abroad for intelligence. In materiall and weighty points he abides not his mind suspended in uncertainties; but hates doubting, where he may, where he should be resolute: and first he makes sure worke for his soule; accounting it no safety to be unsetled in the foreknowledge of his finall estate. The best is first regarded; and vaine is that regard which endeth not in security. Every care hath his just order; neither is there any one either neglected or misplaced. He is seldome overseene with credulity; for knowing the falsenesse of the world, he hath learn'd to trust himselfe alwaies; others so farre, as he may not be dammaged by their disappointment. He seekes his quietnesse in secrecy, and is wont both to hide himselfe in retiredness, and his tongue in himselfe. He loves to be guessed at, not knowne; and to see the world unseene; and when he is forced into the light, shewes by his actions that his obscurity was neither from affectation nor weakness. His purposes are neither so variable as may argue inconstancy; nor obstinately unchangeable, but framed according to his after-wits, or the strength of new occasions. He is both an apt scholler and an excellent master; for both every thing he sees informes him, and his mind enriched with plentifull observation, can give the best precepts. His free discourse runs back to the ages past; and recovers events out of memory, and then preventeth Time in flying forward to future things; and comparing one with the other, can give a verdict well-neere propheticall: wherein his conjectures are better than anothers judgements. His passions, are so many good servants, which stand in a diligent attendance ready to be commanded by reason, by Religion; and if at any time forgetting their duty, they be miscarried to rebell, he can first conceale their mutiny; then suppresse it. In all his just and worthy designes, he is never at a losse, but hath so projected all his courses, that a second begins where the first failed; and fetcheth strength from that which succeeded not. There be wrongs which he wil not see; neither doth he alwaies look that way which he meaneth; nor take notice of his secret smarts, when they come from great ones. In good turnes, he loves not to owe more than he must; in evil to owe and not pay. Just censures hee deserves not, for hee lives without the compasse of an adversary; unjust he contemneth, and had rather suffer false infamy to dye alone, than lay hands upon it in an open violence. He confineth himselfe in the circle of his owne affaires, and lists not to thrust his finger into a needlesse fire. He stands like a center unmoved, while while the circumference of his estate is drawne above, beneath, about him. Finally, his wit hath cost him much; and he can both keep, and value, and employ it. He is his owne Lawyer; the treasury of knowledge, the oracle of counsell; blind in no mans cause, best sighted in his owne.

Of an Honest man.

HE lookes not to what he might doe, but what he should. Justice is his first guide; the second law of his actions, is expedience. He had rather complaine than offend, and hates sin more for the indignity of it, than the danger: his simple uprightnesse works in him that confidence, which oft-times wrongs him, and gives advantage to the subtill, when he rather pities their faithlesnes, than repents of his credulity: he hath but one heart, and that lies open to sight; and were it not for discretion, he never thinkes whereof he would avoid a witnesse: his word is his parchment, and his yea, his oath, which he will not violate for feare, or for losse. The mis-haps of following events, may cause him to blame his providence, can never cause him to eat his promise: neither saith he, This I saw not, but, This I said. When he is made his friends Executor, he defrais his debts, payes legacies, and scorneth to gaine by Orphans, or to ransack graves; and therefore will be true to a dead friend, because he sees him not. All his dealings are square & above the boord: he bewrayes the fault of what he sels, & restores the overseen gaine of a false reckoning. He esteemes a bribe venomous, though it come guilded over with the colour of gratuity. His cheekes are never stained with the blushes of recantation; neither doth his tongue falter, to make good a lye with the secret glosses of double or reserved senses; and when his name is traduced, his innocency beares him out with courage: then, loe, he goes on the plaine way of truth, and will either triumph in his integrity, or suffer with it. His conscience over-rules his providence; so as in all things good or ill, he respects the nature of the actions, not the sequell. If he see what he must doe, let God see what shall follow. He never loadeth himselfe with burdens above his strength, beyond his will; and once bound, what he can he will doe, neither doth he will but what he can doe. His eare is the Sanctuary of his absent friends name, of his present friends secret: neither of them can mis-carry in his trust. He remembers the wrongs of his youth, and repaies them with that usury which he himselfe would not take. He would rather want, than borrow, and beg, than not to pay: his faire conditions are without dissembling; and he loves actions above words. Finally, he hates falshood worse than death: he is a faithful client of truth; no mans enemy; and it is a question, whether more another mans friend or his owne; and if there were no heaven, yet he would be vertuous.

Of the Faithfull man.

HIs eyes have no other objects, but absent and invisible; which they see so cleerly, as that to them sense is blinde: that which is present they see not; if I may not rather say, that what is past or future, is present to them. Herein he exceeds all others, that to him nothing is impossible, nothing difficult, whether to beare, or undertake. He walks every day with his Maker, and talks with him familiarly, and lives ever in heaven, and sees all earthly things beneath him: when he goes in, to converse with God, he weares not his own cloathes, but takes them still out of the rich Wardrobe of his Redeemer, and then dare boldly prease in and challenge a blessing. The celestiall spirits doe not scorne his company, yea, his service. He deales in these worldly affaires as a stranger, and hath his heart ever at home: without a written warrant hee dare doe nothing, and with it any thing. His warre is perpetuall, without without truce; without intermission; and his victory certaine: hee meets with the infernall powers, and tramples them under feet. The shield that he ever beares before him, can neither be missed, nor pierced; if his hand be wounded, yet his heart is safe: he is oftē tripped, seldome foyled; and if sometimes foyled, never vanquished. He hath white hands, and a cleane soule, fit to lodge God in, all the roomes whereof are set apart for his Holinesse: Iniquity hath oft called at the doore, and craved entertainment, but with a repulse; or if sin of force will be his tenant, his Lord he cannot. His faults are few, and those he hath, God will not see. He is allied so high, that hee dare call God father, his Saviour Brother: heaven his Patrimony: and thinkes it no presumption to trust to the attendance of Angels. His understanding is inlightned with the beames of divine truth; God hath acquainted him with his will; and what he knowes, hee dare confesse: there is not more love in his heart, than liberty in his tongue. If torments stand betwixt him and Christ, if death, he contemnes them; and if his owne parents lye in his way to God, his holy carelesnesse makes them his footsteps. His experiments have drawn forth rules of confidence, which he dares oppose against all the feares of distrust: wherein he thinkes it safe to charge God with what he hath done; with what he hath promised. Examples are his proofes, and instances his demonstrations. What hath God given, which he cannot give? What have others suffered, which he may not be enabled to endure? Is he threatned banishment? There hee sees the deare Evangelist in Pathmos. Cutting in peeces? he sees Esay under the saw. Drowning? he sees Ionas diving in the living gulfe. Burning? he sees the three Children in the hot walke of the Furnace. Devouring? he sees Daniel in the sealed den amids his terrible companions. Stoning? he sees the first Martyr under his heape of many grave-stones. Heading? loe there the Baptists necke bleeding in Herodias platter. He emulates their paine, their strength, their glory. He wearies not himselfe with cares: for he knowes he lives not of his owne cost: not idlely, omitting meanes, but not using them with diffidence. In the midst of ill rumours and amazements, his countenance changeth not; for he knowes both whom he hath trusted, and whither death can lead him. He is not so sure he shall dye, as that he shal be restored; and outfaceth his death with his resurrection. Finally, he is rich in works, busie in obedience, cheerefull and unmoved in expectation, better with evils, in common opinion miserable, but in true judgement more than a man.

Of the Humble man.

HE is a friendly enemy to himselfe: for though he be not out of his owne favour, no man sets so low a value of his worth as himselfe; not out of ignorance, or carelesnesse, but of a voluntary and meeke dejectednesse. Hee admires every thing in another, whiles the same or better in himselfe he thinks not unworthily contemned: his eyes are full of his owne wants, and others perfections. He loves rather to give than take honour, not in a fashion of complementall courtesie, but in simplicitie of his judgement; neither doth he fret at those, on whom hee forceth precedency, as one that hoped their modesty would have refused; but holds his mind unfainedly below his place, and is ready to goe lower (if need bee) without discontent. When he hath but his due, hee magnifieth courtesie, and disclaimes his deserts. He can be more ashamed of honour, than grieved with contempt; because he thinkes that causlesse, this deserved: His face, his carriage, his habit, savour of lowlinesse without affectation, and yet he is much under that he seemeth. His words are few and soft, never either peremptory or censorious, because hee thinkes both each man more wise, and none more faulty than himselfe: and when hee approacheth to the Throne of God, hee is so taken up with the divine greatnesse, that in his owne eyes he is either vile or nothing. Places of publike charge are faine to sue to him, and hale him out of his chosen obscurity; which he holds off, not cunningly to cause importunity, but sincerely in the conscience of his defects. Hee frequenteth not the ſtages of common reſorts, and then alone thinkes himſelfe in his naturall element, when he is ſhrowded within his own wals. He is ever jealous over himſelfe, and ſtill ſuſpecteth that which others applaud. There is no better object of beneficence; for what he receives, he aſcribes meerely to the bounty of the giver; nothing to merit. He emulates no man in any thing but goodneſſe, and that with more deſire, than hope to overtake. No man is ſo contented with his little, and ſo patient under miſeries, becauſe he knowes the greateſt evils are below his ſinnes, and the leaſt favours above his deſervings. Hee walkes ever in awe, and dare not but ſubject every word and action to an high and juſt cenſure. He is a lowly valley ſweetly planted and well watered; the proud mans earth, whereon he trampleth; but ſecretly full of wealthy Mines, more worth than he that walkes over them; a rich ſtone ſet in Lead; and laſtly, a true Temple of God built with a low roofe.

Of a Valiant man.

HE undertakes without raſhneſſe, and performes without feare: he ſeeks not for dangers; but when they find him, hee beares them over with courage, with ſucceſs. He hath oft times lookt Death in the face, and paſſed by it with a ſmile, and when he ſees he muſt yeeld, doth at once welcome and contemne it. He fore-caſts the worſt of all events, and encounters them before they come in a ſecret and mentall warre; and if the ſuddenneſſe of an unexpected evill have ſurprized his thoughts, and infected his cheeks with paleneſſe; he hath no ſooner digeſted it in his conceit, than he gathers up himſelfe, and inſults over miſchiefe. Hee is the maſter of himſelfe, and ſubdues his paſſions to reaſon; and by his inward victory workes his owne peace. Hee is afraid of nothing but the diſpleaſure of the Higheſt, and runs away from nothing but ſin: he looks not on his hands, but his cauſe; not how ſtrong he is, but how innocent: and where goodneſſe is his warrant, he may be over-maſtered, he cannot be foyled. The ſword is to him the laſt of all trials, which he drawes forth ſtill as Defendant, not as Challenger, with a willing kind of unwillingneſſe: no man can better mannage it with more ſafety, with more favour: he had rather have his bloud ſeen than his back; and diſdaines life upon baſe condition. No man is more milde to a relenting or vanquiſht adverſary, or more hates to ſet his foot on a carcaſe. He had rather ſmother an injury, than revenge himſelfe of the impotent: and I know not whether more deteſts cowardlineſſe or cruelty. He talks little, and brags leſſe; and loves rather the ſilent language of the hand; to be ſeen than heard. He lies ever cloſe within himſelf, armed with wiſe reſolution, and will not be diſcovered but by death or danger. He is neither prodigall of blood to miſ-ſpend it idlely, nor niggardly to grudge it, when either God calls for it, or his Countrey; neither is he more liberall of his owne life than of others. His power is limited by his will, and he holds it the nobleſt revenge, that he might hurt and doth not. Hee commands without tyrrany and imperiouſneſſe, obeyes without ſervility, and changes not his mind with his eſtate. The height of his ſpirits over-lookes all caſualties, and his boldneſs proceeds neither from ignorance nor ſenſeleſneſſe: but firſt he values evils, and then deſpiſes them: he is ſo ballaced with wiſdome, that hee floats ſteddily in the midſt of all tempeſts. Deliberate in his purpoſes, firme in reſolution, bold in enterpriſing, unwearied in atchieving, and howſoever, happy in ſucceſſe: and if ever he be overcome, his heart yeelds laſt.

Of

Of a Patient man.

THe patient man is made of a metall, not so hard as flexible: his shoulders are large, fit for a load of injuries; which hee beares not out of baseneſſe and cowardlineſſe, becauſe he dare not revenge; but out of Chriſtian fortitude, becauſe he may not: hee hath ſo conquered himſelfe, that wrongs cannot conquer him; and herein alone finds, that victory conſiſts in yeelding. Hee is above nature, while he ſeemes below himſelfe. The vildeſt creature knowes how to turne againe, but to command himſelfe not to reſiſt being urged, is more than heroicall. His conſtructions are ever full of charity and favour; either this wrong was not done, or not with intent of wrong; or if that, upon miſ-information; or if none of theſe, raſhneſſe (though a fault) ſhal ſerve for an excuſe. Himſelf craves the offendors pardon, before his confeſſion; and a ſlight anſwer contents, where the offended deſires to forgive. He is Gods beſt witneſſe, and when he ſtands before the barre for truth, his tongue is calmely free, his fore-head firme, and he with erect and ſetled countenance heares his juſt ſentence, and rejoyces in it. The Jaylors that attend him, are to him his Pages of honour, his dungeon, the lower part of the vault of heaven, his rack or wheele, the ſtaires of his aſcent to glory, he challengeth his executioners, and encounters the fierceſt paines with ſtrength of reſolution, and while he ſuffers, the beholders pity him, the tormentors complaine of wearineſſe, and both of them wonder. No anguiſh can maſter him whether by violence or by lingring. He accounts expectation no puniſhment, and can abide to have his hopes adjourned till a new day. Good lawes ſerve for his protection, not for his revenge; and his owne power, to avoyd indignities, not to returne them. His hopes are ſo ſtrong, that they can inſult over the greateſt diſcouragements, and his apprehenſions ſo deepe, that when he hath once faſtned, he ſooner leaveth his life than his hold. Neither time nor perverſeneſſe can make him caſt off his charitable endevours, and deſpaire of prevailing, but in ſpight of all croſſes, and all denials, he redoubleth his beneficiall offers of love. Hee trieth the ſea after many ſhipwracks, and beats ſtill at that doore which he never ſaw opened. Contrariety of events doth but exerciſe, not diſmay him; and when croſſes afflict him, hee ſees a divine hand inviſibly ſtriking with theſe ſenſible ſcourges: againſt which he dares not rebell or murmure. Hence all things befall him alike, and he goes with the ſame minde to the ſhambles, and to the fold. His recreations are calme and gentle; and not more full of relaxation than void of fury. This man onely can turne neceſſity into vertue, and put evill to good uſe. Hee is the ſureſt friend, the lateſt and eaſieſt enemy, the greateſt conquerour, and ſo much more happy than others, by how much he could abide to be more miſerable.

Of the true Friend.

HIs affections are both united and divided; united to him he loveth; divided betwixt mother and himſelfe; and his owne heart is ſo parted, that whiles he hath ſome, his friend hath all. His choice is led by vertue, or by the beſt of vertues, Religion; not by gaine, not by pleaſure; yet not without reſpect of equall condition, of diſpoſition not unlike; which once made, admits of no change, except hee whom he loved, be changed quite from himſelfe; nor that ſuddenly, but after long expectation. Extremity doth but faſten him, whiles he, like a wel-wrought vault, lies the ſtronger, by how much more weight he beares. When neceſſity calls him to it, he can be a ſervant to his equall, with the ſame will wherewith he can command his inferior; and though he riſe to honor, forgets not his familiarity, nor ſuffers inequality of eſtate to work ſtrangeneſſe of countenance; on the other ſide, he lifts up his friend to advancement, with a willing hand, without envy, without dissimulation. When his mate is dead, he accounts himselfe but halfe alive; then his love not dissolved by death, derives it selfe to those orphans which never knew the price of their father; they become the heires of his affection, and the burden of his cares. He embraces a free community of all things, save those which either honesty reserves proper, or nature; and hates to enjoy that which would doe his friend more good; his charity serves to cloke noted infirmities, not by untruth, not by flattery, but by discreet secrecy; neither is he more favourable in concealement, than round in his private reprehensions; and when anothers simple fidelity shews it selfe in his reproofe, he loves his monitor so much the more, by how much more he smarteth. His bosome is his friends closet, where he may safely lay up his complaints, his doubts, his cares; & look how he leaves, so he finds them; save for some addition of seasonable counsell for redresse. If some unhappy suggestion shall either disjoynt his affection, or breake it, it soone knits againe, and growes the stronger by that stresse. Hee is so sensible of anothers injuries, that when his friend is stricken, he cries out, and equally smarteth untouched, as one affected not with sympathy, but with a reall feeling of paine: and in what mischiefe may be prevented, he interposeth his aid, and offers to redeeme his friend with himselfe; no houre can be unseasonable, no businesse difficult, nor paine grievous in condition of his ease: and what either he doth or suffereth, hee neither cares nor desires to have knowne; lest he should seeme to looke for thanks. If he can therefore steale the performance of a good office unseene, the conscience of his faithfulnesse herein is so much sweeter as it is more secret. In favours done, his memory is fraile; in benefits received, eternall: hee scorneth either to regard recompence, or not to offer it. He is the comfort of miseries, the guide of difficulties, the joy of life, the treasure of earth; and no other than a good Angell clothed in flesh.

Of the Truly-Noble.

HE stands not upon what he borrowed of his Ancestors, but thinkes he must work out his owne honour: and if he cannot reach the vertue of them that gave him outward glory by inheritance, he is more abashed of his impotency, than transported with a great name. Greatnesse doth not make him cornfull and imperious, but rather like the fixed stars; the higher he is, the lesse he desires to seem. Neither cares he so much for pompe and frothy ostentation, as for the solid truth of Nobleneſſe. Courtesie & sweet affability can be no more severed from him, than life from his soule; not out of a base and servile popularity, & desire of ambitious insinuation; but of a native gentleness of disposition, and true value of himselfe. His hand is open and bounteous; yet not so as that he should rather respect his glory, than his estate; wherein his wisdome can distinguish betwixt parasites and frends, betwixt changing of favours and expending them. He scorneth to make his height a privilege of looseneſs, but accounts his titles vaine, if he be inferiour to others in goodnes: and thinks he should be more strict, the more eminent he is, because he is more observed, and now his offences are become exemplar. There is no vertue that he holds unfit for ornament, for use, nor any vice which he condemnes not as sordid, and a fit companion of basenes, and whereof he doth not more hate the blemish, than affect the pleasure. He so studies, as one that knows, ignorãce can neither purchase honor, nor wield it; & that knowledge must both guide & grace him. His exercises are from his childhood ingenious, manly, decent, & such as tend still to wit, valor, activity: and if (as seldome) he descend to disports of chance, his games shall never make him either pale wth fear, or hot with desire of gain. He doth not so use his followers, as if he thought they were made for nothing but his servitude; whose felicity were only to be commanded and please: wearing them to the back, and then either finding or framing excuses to discard them empty; but upon all opportunities lets them tele the sweetnes of their owne serviceableneſſe and his bounty. Silence in officious ervice is the best

Oratory

Oratory to plead for his respect: All diligence is but lent to him, none lost. His wealth stands in receiving, his honor in giving: he cares not either how many hold of his goodnes, or to how few he is beholden: and if he have cast away favours, he hates either to upbraid them to his enemy, or to challenge restitution. None can be more pitifull to the distressed, or more prone to succour; and then most, where is least meanes to sollicite, least possibility of requitall. He is equally addressed to warre and peace; and knowes not more how to command others, than how to be his Countries servant in both. He is more carefull to give true honour to his Maker, than to receive civill honour from men. He knowes that his service is free and noble, and ever loaded with sincere glory; and how vaine it is to hunt after applause from the world, till he be sure of him that moldeth all hearts, and powreth contempt on Princes; and shortly, so demeanes himselfe, as one that accounts the body of Nobility to consist in Bloud, the soule in the eminence of Vertue.

Of the good Magistrate.

HE is the faithfull deputy of his Maker, whose obedience is the rule whereby he ruleth; his brest is the Ocean whereinto all the cares of private men empty themselves; which as he receives without complaint and overflowing, so he sends them forth again by a wise conveyance in the streams of justice: his doores, his ears are ever open to suters; and not who comes first speeds well, but whose cause is best. His nights, his meales are short and interrupted; all which he beares well, because he knowes himselfe made for a publike servant of Peace and Justice. Hee sits quietly at the sterne, and commands one to the top-saile, another to the main, a third to the plummet, a fourth to the anchor, as he sees the need of their course & weather requires; and doth no lesse by his tongue, than all the Marriners with their hands. On the Bench hee is another from himselfe at home; now all private respects of bloud, alliance, amity are forgotten; and if his owne Son come under triall, he knowes him not: Pity which in all others is wont to be the best praise of humanity, and the fruit of Christian love, is by him throwne over the bar for corruption: as for Favour, the false Advocate of the gracious, he allows him not to appeare in the Court; there only causes are heard speake, not persons: Eloquence is then only not discouraged, when she serves for a Client of truth: meere narrations are allowed in this Oratory, not Proems, not excursions, not Glosses: Truth must strip her selfe, and come in naked to his barre, without false bodies, or colors without disguises: A bribe in his Closet, or a letter on the bench, or the whispering and winks of a great neighbour, are answered with an angry and couragious repulse. Displeasure, Revenge, Recompence, stand on both sides the Bench, but hee scornes to turne his eye towards them; looking onely right forward at Equity, which stands full before him. His sentence is ever deliberate and guided with ripe wisdome, yet his hand is slower than his tongue; but when he is urged by occasion either to doome, or execution, he shewes how much hee hateth mercifull injustice: neither can his resolution or act be reversed with partiall importunity. His forehead is rugged and severe, able to discountenance villany, yet his words are more awfull than his brow, and his hand than his words. I know not whether hee be more feared or loved, both affections are so sweetly contempered in all hearts. The good feare him lovingly, the middle sort love him fearefully, and onely the wicked man feares him slavishly without love. He hates to pay private wrongs with the advantage of his Office; and if ever he be partiall, it is to his enemy. He is not more sage in his gown, than valarous in armes, & increaseth in the rigor of discipline, as the times in danger. His sword hath neither rusted for want of use, nor surfetteth of bloud, but after many threats is unsheathed, as the dreadfull instrument of divine revenge. He is the Guard of good laws, the Refuge of innocency, the Comet of the guilty, the Pay-master of good deserts, the Champion of justice, the Patron of peace, the Tutor of the Church, the Father of his Country, & as it were another God upō earth.

Of the Penitent.

HE hath a wounded heart and a ſad face; yet not ſo much for feare, as for unkindneſſe: The wrong of his ſin troubles him more than the danger: None but hee is the better for his ſorrow; neither is any paſſion more hurtfull to others, than this is gainfull to him; The more he ſeeks to hide his griefe, the leſſe it will be hid; Every man may read it not only in his eyes but in his bones. Whiles he is in charity with all others, he is ſo fallen out with himſelfe, that none but God can reconcile him: He hath ſued himſelfe in all Courts, accuſeth, arraigneth, ſentenceth, puniſheth himſelfe unpartially, and ſooner may find mercy at any hand, than at his owne. He onely hath pulled off the faire viſor of ſin; ſo as that appeares not but maſked unto others, is ſeen of him barefac'd; and bewrayes that fearfull uglineſſe, which none can conceive but he that hath viewed it. Hee hath lookt into the depth of the bottomleſſe pit, and hath ſeene his owne offence tormented in others, and the ſame brands ſhaken at him. He hath ſeen the change of faces in that evill one, as a tempter, as a tormenter; and hath heard the noiſe of a conſcience, and is ſo frighted with all theſe, that he can never have reſt, till he have run out of himſelfe, to God; in whoſe face at firſt, he finds rigour, but afterwards, ſweetneſſe in his boſome: He bleeds firſt from the hand that heales him. The Law of God hath made worke for mercy; which he hath no ſooner apprehended, than he forgets his wounds, & looks careleſly upon all theſe terrors of guiltineſs. When he caſts his eye backe upon himſelf; he wonders where he was, and how he came there; and grants, that if there were not ſome witchcraft in ſinne, hee could not have beene ſo ſottiſhly graceleſſe. And now, in the iſſue, Satan finds, (not without indignation and repentance) that he hath done him a good turne in tempting him: For hee had never beene ſo good if he had not ſinned; he had never fought with ſuch courage if he had not ſeen his blood, and beene aſhamed of his foyle: Now he is ſeene, and felt in the front of the ſpirituall battell; and can teach others how to fight, and incourage them in fighting. His heart was never more taken up with the pleaſure of ſinne, than now with care of avoyding it: The very ſight of that cup, wherein ſuch a fulſome potion was brought him, turnes his ſtomack: the firſt offers of ſinne make him tremble more now, than he did before at the judgements of his ſinne; neither dares he ſo much as look towards Sodom. All the powers and craft of hell cannot fetch him in for a cuſtomer to evill; his infirmity may yeeld once, his reſolution never. There is none of his ſenſes or parts, which he hath not within covenants for their good behaviour; which they cannot ever breake with impunity. The wrongs of his ſin he repaies to men with recompence, as hating it ſhould be ſaid, he owes any thing to his offence; to God (what in him lies) with ſighs, teares, vowes, and endevours of amendment. No heart is more waxen to the impreſſions of forgiveneſs; neither are his hands more open to receive, than to give pardon. All the injuries which are offered to him, are ſwallowed up in his wrongs to his Maker, and Redeemer; neither can he call for the arrerages of his farthings, when he lookes upon the millions forgiven him; hee feeles not what he ſuffers from men, when hee thinks of what he hath done, and ſhould have ſuffered. Hee is a thankfull Herauld of the mercies of his God; which if all the world heare not from his mouth, it is no fault of his: Neither did he ſo burne with the evill fires of concupiſcence, as now with the holy flames of zeale to that glory which hee hath blemiſhed; and his eyes are full of moiſture, as his heart of heat. The gates of heaven are not ſo knockt at by any ſuter, whether for frequence, or importunity. You ſhall find his cheeks furrowed, his knees hard, his lips ſealed up, ſave when he muſt accuſe himſelfe, or glorifie God, his eyes humbly dejected, and ſometimes you ſhall take him breaking off a ſigh in the midſt; as one that would ſteale an humiliation unknowne, and would bee offended with any part that ſhould not keep his counſell. When hee finds his ſoule oppreſſed with the heavy guilt of a ſinne, hee gives it vent thorow his mouth, into the

A the care of his ſpirituall Phyſitian, from whom hee receives Cordials anſwerable to his complaint. He is a ſevere exactor of diſcipline, firſt upon himſelfe, on whom hee impoſes more than one Lent; then, upon others, as one that vowed to bee revenged on ſinne whereſoever he finds it; and though but one hath offended him, yet his deteſtation is univerſall. He is his owne taske-maſter for devotion; and if Chriſtianity have any worke more difficult, or perillous than other, that he enjoynes himſelfe, and reſolves contentment even in miſcarriage. It is no marvell if the acquaintance of his wilder times know him not; for hee is quite another from himſelfe; and if his mind could have had any intermiſſion of dwelling within his breſt, it could not have knowne this was the lodging: Nothing but an out-ſide is the ſame it was, and that altred more with Regeneration, than with age. None but he can reliſh the promiſes of the Goſpel; which he finds ſo ſweet, that he complaines not, his thirſt after them
B is unſatiable; and now that he hath found his Saviour he hugs him ſo faſt, and holds him ſo deare, that he feeles not when his life is fetcht away from him, for his martyrdome. The latter part of his life is ſo led, as if he deſired to unlive his youth; and his laſt Teſtament is full of reſtitutions, and legacies of piety. In ſumme, he hath ſo lived and died, as that Satan hath no ſuch match, ſinne hath no ſuch enemy, God hath no ſuch ſervant as he.

He is an Happy man,

C THat hath learn'd to read himſelfe more than all books; and hath ſo taken out this leſſon, that he can never forget it; That knows the world, and cares not for it; That after many traverſes of thoughts, is grown to know what he may truſt to, and ſtands now equally armed for all events. That hath got the maſtery at home, ſo as he can croſſe his will without a mutiny, and ſo pleaſe it, that he makes it not a wanton: That in earthly things wiſhes no more than nature, in ſpirituall is ever graciouſly ambitious: That for his condition, ſtands on his owne feet, not needing to leane upon the great; and can ſo frame his thoughts to his eſtate, that when he hath leaſt, he cannot want, becauſe he is as free from deſire, as ſuperfluity: That hath ſeaſonably broken the head-ſtrong reſtineſſe of proſperity, and can now menage it at pleaſure: Upon whom, all ſmaller croſſes light as haile-ſtones upon a roofe; and for the greater calamities, he can take them as tributes of life, and tokens of love; and if his ſhip be toſſed, yet he is ſure his Anchor is faſt. If all the world were his, he could
D be no other than he is; no whit gladder of himſelfe, no whit higher in his carriage, becauſe he knowes, contentment lies not in the things he hath, but in the mind that values them. The powers of his reſolution can either multiply, or ſubſtract at pleaſure. He can make his cottage a Mannor, or a Palace when he liſts; & his home-cloſe, a large dominion; his ſtaind-cloth, Arras; his earth, plate, and can ſee ſtate in the attendance of one ſervant; as one that hath learned, a mans greatneſſe or baſeneſs is in himſelfe; and in this he may even conteſt with the proud, that hee thinks his owne the beſt. Or, if he muſt be outwardly great, hee can but turne the other end of the glaſſe, and make his ſtately Manor a low and ſtrait Cottage; and in all his coſtly furniture, he can ſee, not richneſſe, but uſe; hee can ſee droſſe in the beſt metall, and earth thorow the beſt clothes; and in all his troup, hee can ſee himſelfe his owne ſervant.
E He lives quietly at home, out of the noiſe of the world, and loves to enjoy himſelfe alwaies, and ſometimes his friend, & hath as full ſcope to his thoughts, as to his eies. He walks ever even, in the mid-way betwixt hopes and feares, reſolved to feare nothing but God, to hope for nothing but that which he muſt have. He hath a wiſe and vertuous mind in a ſerviceable body; which that better part affects as a preſent ſervãt and a future companion; ſo cheriſhing his fleſh, as one that would ſcorne to bee all fleſh. He hath no enemies, not for that all love him, but becauſe he knowes to make a gaine of malice. He is not ſo ingaged to any earthly thing, that they two cannot part on even tearmes; there is neither laughter in their meeting, nor in their ſhaking of hands, hands, teares. He keeps ever the beſt company, the God of Spirits, and the Spirits of that God; whom he entertaines continually in an awfull familiarity, not being hindred, either with too much light, or with none at all. His conſcience and his hand are friends, and (what Devill ſoever tempt him) will not fall out. That divine part goes ever uprightly and freely, not ſtooping under the burden of a willing ſinne, not fettered with the gieves of unjuſt ſcruples. Hee would not, if he could, run away from himſelfe, or from God; not caring from whom he lies hid, ſo he may looke theſe two in the face. Cenſures and applauſes are paſſengers to him, not gueſts; his eare is their thorow-fare, not their harbour; he hath learned to fetch both his counſell, and his ſentence from his owne breſt. He doth not lay weight upon his owne ſhoulders, as one that loves to torment himſelfe with the honour of much imploiment, but as he makes work his game, ſo doth he not liſt to make himſelf worke. His ſtrife is ever to redeeme, and not to ſpend them. It is his trade to doe good; and to thinke of it, his recreation. He hath hands enow for himſelf and others, which are ever ſtretched forth for beneficence, not for need. He walks cheerefully in the way that God hath chalked, and never wiſhes it more wide, or more ſmooth. Thoſe very tentations whereby he is foiled, ſtrengthen him; he comes forth crowned, and triumphing out of the ſpirituall Battels, and thoſe ſcars that he hath, make him beautifull. His ſoule is every day dilated to receive that God, in whom he is; and hath attained to love himſelfe for God, and God for his owne ſake. His eyes ſtick ſo faſt in heaven, that no earthly object can remove them; yea his whole ſelfe is there before his time, and ſees with Steven, and heares with Paul, and enjoyes with Lazarus, the glory that he ſhall have; and takes poſſeſſion before-hand of his roome amongſt the Saints: and theſe heavenly contentments have ſo taken him up, that now he looks downe diſpleaſedly upon the earth, as the Region of his ſorrow and baniſhment; yet joying more in hope than troubled with the ſenſe of evils, hee holds it no great matter to live, and his greateſt buſines to die; and is ſo well acquainted with his laſt gueſt, that he feares no unkindneſſe from him: neither makes he any other of dying, than of walking home when he is abroad, or of going to bed when he is weary of the day. He is well provided for both worlds, and is ſure of peace here, of glory hereafter; and therefore hath a light heart, and a cheerfull face. All his fellow-creatures rejoyce to ſerve him; his betters, the Angels, love to obſerve him: God himſelfe takes pleaſure to converſe with him, and hath Sainted him afore his death, and in his death crowned him.

THE SECOND BOOKE.

CHARACTERISMES OF VICES.

THE SECOND BOOKE OF CHARACTERISMES

THE PROOEME.

I Have ſhewed you many faire Vertues: I ſpeake not for them; if their ſight cannot command affection, let them loſe it. They ſhall pleaſe yet better, after you have troubled your eyes a little with the view of deformities; and by how much more they pleaſe, ſo much more odious, and like themſelves, ſhall theſe deformities appeare. This light, contraries give to each other, in the midſt of their enmity, that one makes the other ſeeme more good, or ill. Perhaps in ſome of theſe (which thing I doe at once feare, and hate) my ſtile ſhall ſeeme to ſome leſſe grave, more Satyricall: if you find me not without cauſe jealous, let it pleaſe you to impute it to the nature of thoſe vices, which will not be otherwiſe handled. The faſhions of ſome evils are beſides the odiouſneſſe, ridiculous; which to repeat, is to ſeeme bitterly merry. I abhorre to make ſport with wickedneſſe, and forbid any laughter here, but of diſdaine. Hypocriſie ſhall lead this ring; worthily, I thinke, becauſe both ſhe commeth neareſt to Vertue, and is the worſt of Vices.

CHARACTER OF THE HYPOCRITE.

AN Hypocrite is the worſt kinde of Player, by ſo much as he acts the better part; which hath always two faces, oft-times two hearts: That can compoſe his forehead to ſadneſſe and gravity, (while he bids his heart be wanton and careleſſe within,) and (in the meane time) laughs within himſelfe, to think how ſmoothly he hath cozened the beholder; In whoſe ſilent face are written the characters of Religion, which his tongue and geſtures pronounce, but his hands recant. That hath a clean face and garment, with a foule ſoule: whoſe mouth belies his heart, and his fingers belie his mouth. Walking early up into the City, he turnes into the great Church, and ſalutes one of the pillars on one knee, worſhipping that God which at home he cares not for, while his eye is fixed on ſome window, on ſome paſſenger, and his heart knowes not whether his lips goe. He riſes, and looking about with admiration, complaines on our frozen charity, commends the ancient. At Church he will ever ſit where he may be ſeen beſt, and in the middeſt of the Sermon puls out his tables in haſte, as if he feared to loſe that note; when he writes either his forgotten errand, or nothing: then he turnes his Bible with a noiſe, to ſeek an omitted quotation; and folds the leafe, as if he had found it; and askes aloud the name of the Preacher, and repeats it, whom he publikely ſalutes, thanks, praiſes, invites, entertaines with tedious good counſell, with good diſcourſe, if it had come from an honeſter mouth. He can command teares when he
D ſpeaks of his youth; indeed becauſe it is paſt, not becauſe it was ſinfull: himſelfe is now better, but the times are worſe. All other ſinnes he reckons up with deteſtation, while he loves and hides his darling in his boſome. All his ſpeech returns to himſelf, and every occurrent drawes in a ſtory to his own praiſe. When he ſhould give, he looks about him, and ſayes, Who ſees me? No almes, no prayers fall from him without a witneſſe; belike leſt God ſhould deny that he hath received them: and when he hath done (leſt the world ſhould not know it) his own mouth is his Trumpet to proclaime it. With the ſuperfluity of his uſury he builds an Hoſpitall, and harbours them whom his extortion hath ſpoiled; ſo while he makes many beggers, he keeps ſome. He turneth all Gnats into Camels, and cares not to undoe the world for a circumſtance. Fleſh
E on a Friday is more abomination to him then his neighbours bed: Hee abhorres more not to uncover at the name of Jeſus, then to ſwear by the name of God. When a Rimer reads his Poeme to him, he begs a Copy, and perſwades the Preſſe; there is nothing that he diſlikes in preſence, that in abſence he cenſures not. Hee comes to the ſick bed of his ſtepmother, and weeps, when he ſecretly feares her recovery. He greets his friend in the ſtreet with ſo cleare a countenance, ſo faſt a cloſure, that the other thinks he reads his heart in his face; and ſhakes hands with an indefinite invitation of When will you come? and when his back is turned, joyes that he is ſo well rid of a gueſt: yet if that gueſt viſite him unfeared, he counterfeits a ſmiling welcome, and excuſes his chear, when cloſely he frownes on his wife for too much. He ſhews well, and ſaies well; and himſelfe is the worſt thing he hath. In briefe, he is the ſtrangers Saint, the neighbours diſeaſe, the blot of goodneſſe; a rotten ſtick in a dark night, a Poppy in a corn field, an ill tempered candle, with a great ſnuffe, that in going out ſmels ill; and an Angel abroad, a Devill at home; and worſe when an Angel, then when a Devil.

Of the Buſie-body.

HIs eſtate is too narrow for his mind, and therefore he is faine to make himſelf roome in others affaires; yet ever in pretence of love. No newes can ſtir but by his doore; neither can he know that, which he muſt not tell. What every man ventures in Guiana voyage, and what they gained, he knowes to a haire. Whether Holland will have peace he knowes, and on what conditions, and with what ſucceſſe, is familiar to him ere it be concluded. No Poſt can paſſe him without a queſtion, and rather then he will leeſe the newes, he rides back with him to appoſe him of tidings; and then to the next man he meets, he ſupplies the wants of his haſty intelligence, and makes up a perfect tale; wherewith he ſo haunteth the patient auditor, that after many excuſes, he is faine to endure rather the cenſure of his manners in running away, then the tedioufneſſe of an impertinent diſcourſe. His ſpeech is oft broken off with a ſucceſſion of long parentheſis, which he ever vowes to fill up ere the concluſion, & perhaps would effect it, if the others ear were as unweariable as his tongue. If he ſee but two men talke and reade a letter in the ſtreet, he runs to them, and askes if he may not be partner of that ſecret relation; and if they deny it, he offers to tell, ſince he may not hear, wonders: and then falls upon the report of the Scottiſh Mine, or of the great Fiſh taken up at Linne, or of the freezing of the Thames; and after many thanks and diſmiſſions, is hardly intreated ſilence. He undertakes as much as he performes little: this man will thruſt himſelf forward to be the guide of the way he knowes not; and calls at his neighbours window, and askes why his ſervants are not at work. The Market hath no commodity which he prizeth not, and which the next table ſhall not heare recited. His tongue, like the taile of Sampſons Foxes, carries firebrands, and is enough to ſet the whole field of the world on a flame. Himſelfe begins table-talke of his neighbour at anothers boord, to whom he bears the firſt news, and adjures him to conceale the reporter: whoſe cholerick anſwer he returns to his firſt Oaſt, inlarged with a ſecond addition; ſo, as it uſes to be done in the fight of unwilling Maſtives, he claps each on the ſide apart, and provokes them to an eager conflict. There can no act paſſe without his Comment, which is ever farre-fetcht, raſh, ſuſpicious, delatory. His eares are long, and his eyes quick, but moſt of all to imperfections; which as he eaſily ſees, ſo he increaſes with intermedling. He harbours another mans ſervant, and amids his entertainment askes what fare is uſuall at home, what houres are kept, what talke paſſeth their meales, what his Maſters diſpoſition is, what his government, what his gueſts? & when he hath by curious inquiries extracted all the juice and ſpirit of hoped intelligence, turnes him off whence he came, and works on a new. He hates conſtancy as an earthen dulneſſe, unfit for men of ſpirit: and loves to change his work and his place; neither yet can he be ſo ſoon weary of any place, as every place is weary of him; for, as he ſets himſelf on work, ſo others pay him with hatred, and look how many maſters he hath, ſo many enemies: neither is it poſſible that any ſhould not hate him, but who know him not. So then he labours without thanks, talks without credit, lives without love, dies without teares, without pity; ſave that ſome ſay it was pity he died no ſooner.

Of the Superſtitious.

SUperſtition is godleſſe Religion, devout impiety. The ſuperſtitious is fond in obſervation, ſervile in feare, he worſhips God but as he liſts: he gives God what he askes

A askes not, more then he askes; and all but what he should give; and makes more sinne then the Ten Commandements. This man dares not stirre forth till his brest be crosse, and his face sprinkled: if but an Hare crosse him the way, he returnes; or if his journey began unawares on the dismall day; or if he stumble at the threshold. If he see a Snake unkilled, he feares a mischiefe; if the salt fall towards him, he lookes pale and red, and is not quiet till one of the waiters have powred wine on his lappe; and when he neezeth thinks them not his friends that uncover not. In the morning he listens whether the Crow crieth even or odde, and by that token presages of the weather. If he hear but a Raven croke from the next roofe, he makes his will, or if a Bittour flie over his head by night: but if his troubled fancy shall second his thoughts with the dreame of a faire garden, or green rushes, or the salutation of a
B dead friend, he takes leave of the world, and saies he cannot live. He will never set to sea but on a Sunday; neither ever goes without an Erra Pater in his pocket. Saint Pauls day and Saint Swithunes with the Twelve, are his Oracles; which he dares beleeve against the Almanack. When he lies sick on his death-bed, no sin troubles him so much, as that he did once eat flesh on a friday, no repentance can expiate that; the rest need none. There is no dreame of his without an interpretation, without a prediction; and if the event answer not his exposition, he expounds it according to the event. Every dark grove and pictured wall strikes him with an awfull, but carnall devotion. Old wives and Starres are his counsellers; his night spell is his guard, and charmes his Physitian. He weares Paracelsian Charactars for the tooth-ach, and a little hollowed wax is his Antidote for all evils. This man is strangely credulous, and
C calls impossible things, miraculous: If he heare that some sacred block speaks, moves, weeps, smiles, his beare feet carry him thither with an offering: and if a danger misse him in the way, his Saint hath the thankes. Some way he will not goe, and some he dares not; either there he bugges, or he faineth them; every lanterne is a ghost, and every noise is of chaines. He knowes not why, but his custome is to goe a little about, and to leave the crosse still on the right hand. One event is enough to make a rule; out of these he concludes fashions proper to himselfe, and nothing can turne him out of his own course. If he have done his taske, he is safe, it matters not with what affection. Finally, if God will let him be the carver of his owne obedience, he could not have a better subject, as he is, he cannot have a worse.

Of the profane.

THe superstitious hath too many gods: the profane man hath none at all, unlesse perhaps himself be his owne deity, and the world his heaven. To matter of Religion, his heart is a peece of dead flesh, without feeling of love, of feare, of care, or of paine from the deafe strokes of a revenging conscience. Custome of sinne hath wrought this senslesnesse, which now hath been so long entertained, that it pleads prescription and knowes not to be altered. This is no sudden evill: we are born sinfull, but have made our selves profane; through many degrees we climbe
E to this height of impiety. At first he sinned, and cared not; now he sinneth and knoweth not. Appetite is his Lord, and Reason his servant, and Religion his drudge. Sense is the rule of his beleefe; and if piety may be an advantage, he can at once counterfeit and deride it. When ought succeedeth to him, he sacrifices to his nets, and thinks either his fortune, or his wit; and will rather make a false God, then acknowledge the true: if contrary, he cries out of destiny, and blames him to whom he will not be beholden. His conscience would faine speak with him, but he will not heare it; sets the day, but he disappoints it; and when it cries loud for audience, he drownes the noise with good fellowship. He never names God, but in his oathes; never thinks of him, but in extremity; and then he knowes not how to think of him, because he begins but then. He quarrels for the hard conditions of his pleasure, for his future damnation; and from himself laies all the fault upon his Maker; and from his decree fetcheth excuſes of his wickedneſſe. The inevitable neceſſity of Gods counſell makes him deſperately careleſſe: ſo with good food he poyſons himſelfe. Goodneſſe is his Minſtrell; neither is any mirth ſo cordiall to him as his ſport with Gods fooles. Every vertue hath his ſlander, and his jeſt to laugh it out of faſhion: every vice his colour. His uſualleſt theame is the boaſt of his young ſinnes, which he can ſtill joy in, though he cannot commit; and (if it may be) his ſpeech makes him worſe then he is. He cannot think of death with patience, without terrour, which he therefore feares worſe then hell, becauſe this he is ſure of, the other he but doubts of. He comes to Church as to the Theater, ſaving that not ſo willingly; for company, for cuſtome, for recreation, perhaps for ſleep; or to feed his eyes or his eares: as for his ſoule, he cares no more then if he had none. He loves none but himſelfe, and that not enough to ſeek his true good; neither cares he on whom he treads that he may riſe: His life is full of licence, and his practice of outrage. He is hated of God, as much as he hateth goodneſſe, and differs little from a Devill, but that he hath a body.

Of the Male-content.

HE is neither well full nor faſting; and though he abound with complaints, yet nothing diſlikes him but the preſent: for what he condemned while it was, once paſt he magnifies, and ſtrives to recall it out of the jawes of Time. What he hath, he ſees not, his eyes are ſo taken up with what he wants; and what he ſees he cares not for, becauſe he cares ſo much for that which is not. When his friend carves him the beſt morſell, he murmures that it is an happy feaſt wherein each one may cut for himſelfe. When a preſent is ſent him, he askes, Is this all? and, What, no better? and ſo accepts it, as if he would have his friend know how much he is bound to him for vouchſafing to receive it. It is hard to entertaine him with a proportionable gift. If nothing, he cries out of unthankfulneſſe; if little, that he is baſely regarded; if much, he exclaimes of flattery, and expectation of a large requitall. Every bleſſing hath ſomewhat to diſparage and diſtaſte it: Children bring cares, ſingle life is wilde and ſolitary; eminency is envious; retiredneſſe obſcure; faſting painfull; ſaciety unweildy; Religion nicely ſevere; liberty is lawleſſe; wealth burthenſome; mediocrity contemptible: Every thing faulteth, either in too much, or too little. This man is ever head-ſtrong, and ſelfe-willed, neither is he alwaies tied to eſteeme or pronounce according to reaſon; ſome things he muſt diſlike he knowes not wherefore, but he likes them not: and other-where rather then not cenſure, he will accuſe a man of vertue. Every thing he medleth with, he either findeth imperfect, or maketh ſo: neither is there any thing that ſoundeth ſo harſh in his eare, as the commendation of another, wherto yet perhaps he faſhionably and coldly aſſenteth, but with ſuch an after-clauſe of exception, as doth more then marre his former allowance; and if he liſt not to give a verball diſgrace, yet he ſhakes his head and ſmiles, as if his ſilence ſhould ſay, I could and will not. And when himſelf is praiſed without exceſſe, he complaines that ſuch imperfect kindneſſe hath not done him right. If but an unſeaſonable ſhowre croſſe his recreation, he is ready to fall out with heaven, and thinks he is wronged, if God will not take his times when to raine, when to ſhine. He is a ſlave to envy, and loſeth fleſh with fretting, not ſo much at his own infelicity, as at others good; neither hath he leiſure to joy in his owne bleſſings whileſt another proſpereth. Faine would he ſee ſome mutinies, but dares not raiſe them; and ſuffers his lawleſſe tongue to walke thorow the dangerous paths of conceited alterations; but ſo, as in good manners he had rather thruſt every man before him when it comes to acting. Nothing but feare keepes him from conſpiracies, and no man is more cruell when he is not manicled with danger. He ſpeaks nothing but Satyrs and Libels, and lodgeth no gueſts in his heart but Rebels. The inconſtant and he agree well in their felicity, which both place in change: but herein they differ; the inconſtant man affects that which will be, the male-content commonly that which was. Finally, he is a querulous curre, whom

A whom no horſe can paſſe by without barking at; yea, in the deep ſilence of night the very moone-ſhine openeth his clamorous mouth: he is the wheele of a well-couched fire-work; that flies out on all ſides, not without ſcorching it ſelfe. Every eare is long agoe weary of him, and he is now almoſt weary of himſelfe. Give him but a little reſpit, and he will die alone; of no other death, then others welfare.

Of the Vnconſtant.

B THe inconſtant man treads upon a moving earth, and keeps no paſe. His proceedings are ever heady and peremptory; for he hath not the patience to conſult with reaſon, but determines meerly upon fancy. No man is ſo hot in the purſuit of what he liketh; no man ſooner weary. He is fiery in his paſſions, which yet are not more violent then momentany: it is a wonder if his love or hatred laſt ſo many dayes as a wonder. His heart is the Inne of all good motions, wherein if they lodge for a night, it is well; by morning they are gone, and take no leave: and if they come that way again, they are entertained as gueſts, not as friends. At firſt like another Ecebolius he loved ſimple truth, thence diverting his eyes, he fell in love with idolatry; thoſe heatheniſh ſhrines had never any more doting and beſotted client; and now of late he is leapt from Rome to Munſter, and is growne to giddy Anabaptiſme: what he will be next, as yet he knoweth not; but ere he have wintred his opi-
C nion, it will be manifeſt. He is good to make an enemy of, ill for a friend; becauſe as there is no truſt in his affection, ſo no rancor in his diſpleaſure. The multitude of his changed purpoſes brings with it forgetfulneſſe; and not of others more then of himſelfe. He ſaies, ſweares, renounces, becauſe what he promiſed, he meant not long enough to make an impreſſion. Herein alone he is good for a common-wealth, that he ſets many on work, with building, ruining, altering; and makes more buſineſſe then Time it ſelfe; neither is he a greater enemy to thrift, then to idleneſſe. Propriety is to him enough cauſe of diſlike; each thing pleaſes him better that is not his own. Even in the beſt things, long continuance is a juſt quarrell; Manna it ſelfe growes tedious with age, and Novelty is the higheſt ſtile of commendation to the meaneſt offers: neither doth he in bookes and faſhions aske How good, but, How new. Variety
D carries him away with delight, and no uniforme pleaſure can be without an irkſome fulneſſe. He is ſo transformable into all opinions, manners, qualities, that he ſeems rather made immediately of the firſt matter, then of well tempered elements; and therefore is in poſſibility any thing, or every thing; nothing in preſent ſubſtance. Finally, he is ſervile in imitation, waxey to perſwaſions, witty to wrong himſelf, a gueſt in his own houſe, an Ape of others, and in a word, any rather then himſelfe.

Of the Flatterer.

E FLattery is nothing but falſe friendſhip, fawning hypocriſie, diſhoneſt civility, baſe merchandize of words, a plauſible diſcord of the heart and lips. The Flatterer is bleare-eyed to ill, and cannot ſee vices; and his tongue walks ever in one track of unjuſt praiſes, and can no more tell how to diſcommend, then to ſpeak true. His ſpeeches are full of wondring interjections; and all his titles are ſuperlative, and both of them ſeldome ever but in preſence. his baſe mind is well matched with a mercenary tongue, which is a willing ſlave to another mans eare; neither regardeth he how true, but how pleaſing. His Art is nothing but a delightfull coozenage, whoſe rules are ſmoothing, and garded with perjury; whoſe ſcope is to make men fooles, in teaching them to over-value themſelves, and to tickle his friends to death. This man is a Porter of all good tales, and mends them in the carriage: One of Fames beſt friends, and his owne; that helps to furniſh her with thoſe rumours, that may advantage himſelfe. Conſcience hath no greater adverſary; for when ſhe is about to play her juſt part of accuſation, he ſtops her mouth with good tearmes, and wel-neer ſtrangleth her with ſhifts: Like that ſubtill fiſh, he turnes himſelfe into the colour of every ſtone, for a booty. In himſelfe he is nothing, but what pleaſeth his Great one, whoſe vertues he cannot more extoll, then imitate his imperfections, that he may think his worſt gracefull. Let him ſay it is hot, he wipes his forehead and unbraceth himſelfe; if cold, he ſhivers, and calls for a warmer garment. When he walkes with his friend, he ſweares to him, that no man elſe is looked at; no man talked of; and that whomſoever he vouchſafes to look on and nod to, is graced enough: That he knowes not his owne worth, leſt he ſhould be too happy; and when he tells what others ſay in his praiſe, he interrupts himſelfe modeſtly, and dares not ſpeak the reſt: ſo his concealment is more inſinuating then his ſpeech. He hangs upon the lips which he admireth, as if they could let fall nothing but Oracles, and finds occaſion to cite ſome approved ſentence, under the name he honoureth; and when ought is nobly ſpoken, both his hands are little enough to bleſſe him. Sometimes even in abſence he extolleth his Patron, where he may preſume of ſafe conveyance to his eares; and in preſence ſo whiſpereth his commendation to a common friend, that it may not be unheard where he meant it. He hath ſalves for every ſore, to hide them, not to heale them; complexion for every face: ſin hath not any more Artificiall Broker, or more impudent Baud. There is no vice, that hath not from him his colour, his allurement; and his beſt ſervice is, either to further guiltineſſe, or ſmother it. If he grant evill things inexpedient, or crimes errours, he hath yeelded much; either thy eſtate gives privilege of liberty, or thy youth; or if neither, What if it be ill? yet it is pleaſant. Honeſty to him is nice ſingularity, repentance ſuperſtitious melancholy, gravity dulneſſe, and all vertue an innocent conceit of the baſe-minded. In ſhort, he is the Moth of liberall mens coats, the Eare-wig of the mighty, the bane of Courts, a friend and a ſlave to the trencher, and good for nothing but to be a factor for the Devill.

Of the Slothfull.

HE is a religious man, and weares the time in his Cloiſter; and as the cloke of his doing nothing, pleads contemplation; yet is he no whit the leaner for his thoughts, no whit learneder. He takes no leſſe care how to ſpend time, then others how to gaine by the expenſe; and when buſineſſe importunes him, is more troubled to fore-think what he muſt doe, then another to effect it. Summer is out of his favour, for nothing but long daies that make no haſt to their even. He loves ſtill to have the Sunne witneſſe of his riſing; and lies long, more for lothneſſe to dreſſe him, then will to ſleep: and after ſome ſtreaking and yawning, calls for dinner, unwaſhed; which having digeſted with a ſleep in his chaire, he walks forth to the bench in the Market-place, and lookes for Companions: whomſoever he meets, he ſtaies with idle queſtions, and lingring diſcourſe; how the daies are lengthned, how kindly the weather is, how falſe the clock, how forward the Spring, and ends ever with what ſhal we doe? It pleaſeth him no leſſe to hinder others, then not to work himſelf. When all the people are gone frō Church, he is left ſleeping in his ſeat alone. He enters bonds, and forfeits them by forgetting the day: and askes his neighbour when his own field was fallowed, whether the next peece of ground belong not to himſelfe. His care is either none, or too late: when Winter is come, after ſome ſharp viſitations, he looks on his pile of wood, and askes how much was cropped the laſt Spring. Neceſſity drives him to every action, and what he cannot avoid he will yet deferre. Every change troubles him, although to the better; and his dulneſſe counterfeits a kind of contentment. When he is warned on a Jury, he had rather pay the mulct, then appeare. All but that which nature will not permit, he doth by a Deputy, and counts it troubleſome to doe nothing; but to doe any thing, yet more. He is witty in nothing but framing excuſes to ſit ſtill, which if the occaſion yeeld not, he coyneth with eaſe. There is no work that is not either dangerous or thankleſſe, and whereof he foreſees

A foreſees not the inconvenience and gainleſneſſe before he enters; which if it be verified in event, his next idleneſſe hath found a reaſon to patronize it. He had rather freeze then fetch wood, & chuſes rather to ſteale then work; to begge then take paines to ſteale, and in many things to want then begge. He is ſo loth to leave his neighbours fire, that he is faine to walk home in the dark; and if he be not lookt to, weares out the night in the chimney corner; or if not that, lies downe in his clothes to ſave two labours. He eats and prayes himſelfe aſleep; and dreames of no other torment but work. This man is a ſtanding Poole, and cannot chuſe but gather corruption: he is deſcried amongſt a thouſand neighbours by a dry and naſty hand, that ſtill ſavours of the ſheet, a beard uncut, unkembed; an eye and eare yellow, with their excretions; a coat ſhaken on, ragged, unbruſht; by linnen and face ſtriving whether
B ſhall excell in uncleanneſſe. For body, he hath a ſwoln legge, a dusky and ſwiniſh eye, a blowne cheek, a drawling tongue, an heavy foot, and is nothing but a colder earth molded with ſtanding water. To conclude, is a man in nothing but in ſpeech & ſhape.

Of the Covetous.

HEE is a ſervant to himſelfe, yea to his ſervant; and doth baſe homage to that which ſhould be the worſt drudge. A liveleſſe peece of earth is his Maſter, yea his God, which he ſhrines in his coffer, and to which he ſacrifices his
C heart. Every face of his coine is a new image, which he adores with the higheſt veneration; yet takes upon him to be Protector of that he worſhippeth: which he feares to keep, and abhorres to loſe: not daring to truſt either any other god, or his own. Like a rrue Chymiſt he turnes every thing into ſilver, both what he ſhould eat, and what he ſhould weare; and that he keeps to look on, not to uſe. When he returnes from his field, he askes not without much rage, what became of the looſe cruſt in his cup-boord, and who hath rioted among his Leeks. He never eats good meale but on his neighbours trencher; and there he makes amends to his complaining ſtomach for his former and future faſts. He bids his neighbonrs to dinner, and when they have done, ſends in a trencher for the ſhot. Once in a yeere perhaps, he gives himſelfe leave to feaſt, and for the time thinks no man more laviſh; wherein he D liſts not to fetch his diſhes from farre; nor will be beholden to the ſhambles; his own proviſion ſhall furniſh his boord with an inſenſible coſt, and when his gueſts are parted, talkes how much every man devoured, and how many cups were emptied, and feeds his family with the mouldy remnants a moneth after. If his ſervant break but an earthen diſh for want of light, he abates it out of his quarters wages. He chips his bread, and ſends it back to exchange for ſtaler. He lets money, and ſells Time for a price; and will not be importuned either to prevent or deferre his day; and in the mean time looks for ſecret gratuities, beſides the maine intereſt which he ſells and returnes into the ſtock. He breeds of money to the third generation; neither hath it ſooner any being, then he ſets it to beget more. In all things he affects ſecrecy and propriety; he grudgeth his neighbour the water of his Well: and next to ſtealing,
E he hates borrowing. In his ſhort and unquiet ſleeps he dreams of theeves, and runs to the doore, and names more men then he hath. The leaſt ſheafe he ever culls out for Tithe; and to rob God, holds it the beſt paſtime, the cleereſt gaine. This man cries out above others, of the prodigality of our times, and tells of the thrift of our fore-fathers: How that great Prince thought himſelf royally attired; when he beſtowed thirteen ſhillings and foure pence on half a ſute. How one wedding gowne ſerved our Grandmothers, till they exchanged it for a winding ſheet; & praiſes plainneſſe, not for leſſe ſin, but for leſſe coſt. For himſelf, he is ſtill known by his fore-fathers coat, which he means with his bleſſing, to bequeath to the many deſcents of his heires. He neither would be poore, nor be accounted rich. No man complains ſo much of want, to avoid a Subſidy; no man is ſo importunate in begging, ſo cruell in exaction; and when he moſt complains of want, he feares that which he complains to have.

No

No way is indirect to wealth; whether of fraud or violence. Gaine is his godlineſſe; which if conſcience goe about to prejudice, and grow troubleſome by exclaiming againſt, he is condemned for a common Barretor. Like another Ahab, he is ſick of the next field, and thinks he is ill ſeated, while he dwels by neighbours. Shortly, his neighbours doe not much more hate him, then he himſelfe. He cares not (for no great advantage) to loſe his friend, pine his body, damne his ſoule; and would diſpatch himſelf when corn falls, but that he is loath to caſt away mony on a cord.

Of the Vaine-glorious.

ALL his humour riſes up into the froth of oſtentation; which if it once ſettle, falls down into a narrow room. If the exceſſe be in the underſtanding part, all his wit is in print; the preſſe hath left his head empty; yea, not only what he had, but what he could borrow without leave. If his glory be in his devotion, he gives not an Almes but on record; and if he have once done well, God heares of it often; for upon every unkindneſſe he is ready to upbraid him with merits. Over and above his owne diſcharge, he hath ſome ſatisfactions to ſpare for the common treaſure. He can fulfill the Law with eaſe, and earne God with ſuperfluity. If he have beſtowed but a little ſumme in the glazing, paving, parieting of Gods houſe, ye ſhal find it in the Church-window. Or if a more gallant humour poſſeſſe him, he weares all his land on his back; and walking high, looks over his left ſhoulder, to ſee if the point of his Rapier follow him with a Grace. He is proud of another mans horſe; and well mounted, thinks every man wrongs him, that looks not at him. A bare head in the ſtreet doth him more good then a meales meat. He ſweares bigge at an Ordinary, and talkes of the Court with a ſharp accent; neither vouchſafes to name any not honourable, nor thoſe without ſome tearme of familiarity, and likes well to ſee the hearer look upon him amazedly, as if he ſaid, How happy is this man that is ſo great with Great-Ones! Under pretence of ſeeking for a ſcrol of newes, he draws out an handfull of letters indorſed with his own ſtile, to the height: and half reading every title, paſſes over the latter part with a murmur; not without ſignifying, what Lord ſent this, what great Lady the other; and for what ſutes; the laſt paper (as it happens) is his newes from his honourable friend in the French Court. In the midſt of dinner, his Lacquay comes ſweating in, with a ſealed note from his Creditor, who now threatens a ſpeedy arreſt, and whiſpers the ill newes in his Maſters eare, when he aloud names a Counſellor of State, and profeſſes to know the employment. The ſame meſſenger he calls with an imperious nod; and after expoſtulation, where he hath left his fellowes, in his ear ſends him for ſome new ſpur-lethers or ſtockings by this time footed; and when he is gone halfe the roome, recalls him, and ſaith aloud, It is no matter, Let the greater bagge alone till I come; and yet again calling him cloſer, whiſpers (ſo that all the Table may hear) that if his crimſon ſute be ready againſt the day, the reſt need no haſte. He picks his teeth when his ſtomack is empty, and calls for Pheſants at a common Inne. You ſhall find him prizing the richeſt Iewels, and faireſt horſes, when his purſe yeelds not money enough for earneſt. He thruſts himſelfe into the preaſe before ſome great Ladies; and loves to be ſeene neere the head of a great traine. His talke is how many Mourners he furniſht with gownes at his Fathers funerall, how many meſſes, how rich his Coat is, and how ancient, how great his alliance: what challenges he hath made and anſwered; what exploits he did at Cales or Newport; and when he hath commended others buildings, furnitures, ſutes, compares them with his owne. When he hath undertaken to be the Broker for ſome rich Diamond, he weares it; and pulling off his Glove to ſtroke up his haire, thinks no eye ſhould have any other object. Entertaining his friend, he chides his Cook for no better cheer, and names the diſhes he meant, and wants. To conclude, he is ever on the Stage, and acts ſtill a glorious part abroad, when no man caries a baſer heart, no man is more ſordid and careleſſe at home. He is a Spaniſh Souldier on an Italian Theater; a Bladder full of wind, a skin full of words, a fooles wonder, and a wiſe mans foole.

Of the Presumptuous.

PResumption is nothing but hope out of his wits, an high house upon weak pillars. The presumptuous man loves to attempt great things, only because they are hard and rare; his actions are bold and venturous, and more full of hazard then use. He hoiseth saile in a tempest, and saith never any of his Ancestors were drowned: he goes into an infected house, and saies, the plague dares not seize on noble bloud: he runs on high battlements, gallops down steep hills, rides over narrow bridges, walkes on weak Ice, and never thinks, What if I fall? but, What if I runne over and fall not? He is a confident Alchymist, and braggeth, that the wombe of his Furnace hath conceived a burthen that will doe all the world good: which yet he desires secretly borne, for feare of his own bondage: in the meane time, his Glasse breaks; yet he upon better luring laies wagers of the successe, and promiseth wedges before-hand to his friend. He saith, I will sinne, and be sorry, and escape; either God will not see, or not be angry, or not punish it, or remit the measure. If I doe well, he is just to reward; if ill, he is merciful to forgive. Thus his praises wrong God no lesse then his offence; and hurt himself no lesse then they wrong God. Any pattern is enough to encourage him: shew him the way where any foot hath trod, he dare follow, although he see no steps returning; what if a thousand have attempted, and miscarried; if but one have prevailed, it sufficeth. He suggests to himself false hopes of never too late; as if he could command either Time or repentance: and dare deferre the expectation of mercy, till betwixt the bridge and the water. Give him but where to set his foot, and he will remove the earth. He fore-knowes the mutations of States, the events of warre, the temper of the seasons; either his old prophecy tels it him, or his starres. Yea, he is no stranger to the Records of Gods secret counsel, but he turnes them over, and copies them out at pleasure. I know not whether in all his enterprises he shew lesse feare, or wisdom: no man promises himself more, no man more beleeves himself. I will goe and sell, and returne and purchase, and spend and leave my sonnes such estates; all which if it succeed, he thanks himselfe; if not, he blames not himselfe. His purposes are measured, not by his ability, but his will, and his actions by his purposes. Lastly, he is ever credulous in assent, rash in undertaking, peremptory in resolving, witlesse in proceeding, and in his ending miserable; which is never other, then either the laughter of the wise, or the pity of fooles.

Of the Distrustfull.

THE distrustfull man hath his heart in his eyes, or in his hand; nothing is sure to him but what he sees, what he handles. He is either very simple, or very false; and therefore beleeves not others, because he knows how little himself is worthy of beleefe. In spirituall things, either God must leave a pawne with him, or seek some other Creditor. All absent things and unusuall, have no other but a conditionall entertainment: they are strange, if true. If he see two neighbours whisper in his presence, he bids them speak out, and charges them to say no more then they can justifie. When he hath committed a message to his servant, he sends a second after him, to listen how it is delivered. He is his own Secretary, and of his own counsell, for what he hath, for what he purposeth: and when he tells over his bags, looks thorow the key-hole, to see if he have any hidden witnesse, and askes aloud who is there? when no man heares him. He borrowes money when he needs not, for feare lest others should borrow of him. He is ever timorous, and cowardly; and askes every mans errand at the doore, ere he opens. After his first sleep, he starts up, and askes if the furthest gate were barred, and out of a fearfull sweat calls up his servant, and and bolts the doore after him; and then ſtudies whether it were better to lie ſtill and beleeve, or riſe and ſee. Neither is his heart fuller of fears, then his head full of ſtrange projects, and farre-fetcht conſtructions: What meanes the ſtate, think you, in ſuch an action, and whither tends this courſe? Learne of me (if you know not:) the wayes of deep policies are ſecret, and full of unknowne windings; that is their act, this will be their iſſue: ſo caſting beyond the Moone, he makes wiſe and juſt proceedings ſuſpected. In all his predictions and imaginations, he ever lights upon the worſt; not what is moſt likely will fall out, but what is moſt ill. There is nothing that he takes not with the left hand: no text which his gloſſe corrupts not. Words, oathes, parchments, ſeales, are but broken Reeds; theſe ſhall never deceive him; he loves no payments but reall. If but one in age have miſcarried by a rare caſualty, he miſdoubts the ſame event. If but a Tile falne from an high roof, have brained a paſſenger, or the breaking of a Coach-wheele have endangered the burden, he ſweares he will keep home or take him to his horſe. He dares not come to Church, for feare of the croud; not ſpare the Sabbaths labour, for feare of the want; not come neer the Parliament houſe, becauſe it ſhould have been blown up. What might have been, affects him as much as what will be. Argue, vow, proteſt, ſweare; he heares thee, and beleeves himſelfe. He is a Sceptick, and dare hardly give credit to his ſenſes, which he hath often arraigned of falſe intelligence. He ſo lives, as if he thought all the world were theeves, and were not ſure whether himſelf were one. He is uncharitable in his cenſures, unquiet in his feares; bad enough alwaies, but in his own opinion much worſe then he is.

Of the Ambitious.

AMbition is a proud covetouſneſſe, a dry thirſt of honour, the longing diſeaſe of reaſon, an aſpiring and gallant madneſſe. The ambitious climbes up high and perillous ſtaires, and never cares how to come downe; the deſire of riſing hath ſwallowed up his feare of a fall. Having once cleaved (like a burre) to ſome great mans coat, he reſolves not to be ſhaken off with any ſmall indignities, and finding his hold thorowly faſt, caſts how to inſinuate yet neerer, and therefore he is buſie and ſervile in his endevours to pleaſe, and all his officious reſpects turn home to himſelfe. He can be at once a ſlave to command, an Intelligencer to inform, a Paraſite to ſooth and flatter, a Champion to defend, an Executioner to revenge any thing for an advantage of favour. He hath projected a plot to riſe, and woe be to the friend that ſtands in his way. He ſtill haunteth the Court, and his unquiet ſpirit haunteth him; which having fetcht him from the ſecure peace of his Country-reſt, ſets him new and impoſſible taskes; and after many diſappointments, incourages him to try the ſame ſea in ſpight of his ſhipwracks, and promiſes better ſucceſſe. A ſmall hope gives him heart againſt great difficulties, and drawes on new expence, new ſervility; perſwading him (like fooliſh boies) to ſhoot away a ſecond ſhaft, that he may find the firſt. He yeeldeth, and now ſecure of the iſſue, applauds himſelf in that honour, which he ſtill affecteth, ſtill miſſeth; and for the laſt of all trialls, will rather bribe for a troubleſome preferment, then returne void of a little. But now when he finds himſelf deſperately croſſed, and at once ſpoiled both of advancement and hope, both of fruition and poſſibility, all his deſire is turned into rage, his thirſt is now only of revenge; his tongue ſounds of nothing but detraction & ſlander: Now the place he ſought for, is baſe, his rivall unworthy, his adverſary injurious, officers corrupt, Court infectious; and how well is he that may be his own man, his own maſter; that may live ſafely in a meane diſtance, at pleaſure, free from ſtarving, free from burning? But if his deſignes ſpeed well, ere he be warm in that ſeat, his mind is poſſeſſed of an higher. What he hath, is but a degree to what he would have: now he ſcorneth what he formedly aſpired to; his ſucceſſe doth not give him ſo much contentment as provocation, neither can he be at reſt, ſo long as he hath one, either to over-look, or to match, or to emulate him. When his Country-friend comes to viſit him, he carries him up to the awful preſence;

an

A and now in his ſight crowding neerer to the Chaire of State, deſires to be lookt on, deſires to be ſpoken to by the greateſt, and ſtudies how to offer an occaſion, leſt he ſhould ſeeme unknown, unregarded; and if any geſture of the leaſt grace fall haply upon him, he looks back upon his friend, leſt he ſhould careleſly let it paſſe, without a note: and what he wanteth in ſenſe, he ſupplies in Hiſtory. His diſpoſition is never but ſhamefully unthankfull: for unleſſe he have all, he hath nothing. It muſt be a large draught, whereof he will not ſay, that thoſe few drops doe not ſlake, but inflame him: ſo ſtill he thinks himſelf the worſe for ſmall favours. His wit ſo contrives the likely plots of his promotion, as if he would ſteale it away without Gods knowledge, beſides his will: neither doth he ever look up, and conſult in his forecaſts with the ſupreme Moderator of all things; as one that thinks honour is ruled B by Fortune, and that heaven medleth not with the diſpoſing of theſe earthly lots: and therefore it is juſt with that wiſe God to defeat his faireſt hopes, and to bring him to a loſſe in the hotteſt of his chace; and to cauſe honour to flie away ſo much the faſter, by how much it is more eagerly purſued. Finally, he is an importunate ſuter, a corrupt client, a violent undertaker, a ſmooth Factor, but untruſty, a reſtleſſe maſter of his owne; a Bladder puft up with the wind of hope, and ſelfe-love. He is in the common body, as a Mole in the earth, ever unquietly caſting; and in one word, is nothing but a confuſed heap of envy, pride, covetouſneſſe.

Of the Vnthrift.

C HE ranges beyond his pale; and lives without compaſſe. His expence is meaſured, not by ability, but will. His pleaſures are immoderate, and not honeſt. A wanton eye, a lickoriſh tongue, a gameſome hand have impoveriſht him. The vulgar ſort call him bountifull, and applaud him while he ſpends, and recompence him with wiſhes when he gives, with pity when he wants. Neither can it be denied that he taught true liberality, but overwent it. No man could have lived more laudably, if when he was at the beſt, he had ſtayed there. While he is preſent, none of the wealthier gueſts may pay ought to the ſhot, without much vehemency, without danger of unkindneſſe. Uſe hath made it unpleaſant to him, not to ſpend. D He is in all things more ambitious of the title of good fellowſhip, then of wiſdome. When he lookes into the wealthy cheſt of his Father, his conceit ſuggeſts that it cannot be emptied; and while he takes out ſome deale every day, he perceives not any diminution; and when the heap is ſenſibly abated, yet ſtill flatters himſelfe with enough. One hand couzens the other, and the belly deceives both: he doth not ſo much beſtow benefits, as ſcatter them. True merit doth not carry them, but ſmoothneſſe of adulation. His ſenſes are too much his guides, and his purveyors; and appetite is his ſteward. He is an impotent ſervant to his luſts; and knowes not to governe either his minde or his purſe. Improvidence is ever the companion of unthriftineſſe; This man cannot look beyond the preſent, and neither thinks nor cares what ſhall bee; much leſſe ſuſpects what may be: and while he laviſhes out E his ſubſtance in ſuperfluities, thinks he onely knowes what the world is worth, and that others overprize it. He feels poverty before he ſees it, never complaines till he be pinched with wants; never ſpares till the bottome, when it is too late either to ſpend or recover. He is every mans friend ſave his owne, and then wrongs himſelfe moſt, when he courteth himſelfe with moſt kindneſſe. He vies Time with the ſlothfull, and it is an hard match, whether chaſes away good houres to worſe purpoſe; the one by doing nothing, or the other by idle paſtime. He hath ſo dilated himſelfe with the beames of proſperity, that he lies open to all dangers, and cannot gather up himſelfe, on juſt warning, to avoid a miſchiefe. Hee were good for an Almner, ill for a Steward. Finally, hee is the living tombe of his fore-fathers, of his poſterity; and when he hath ſwallowed both, is more empty then before hee devoured them.

Of the Envious.

HE feeds on others evils, and hath no diſeaſe but his neighbours welfare: whatſoever God doe for him, he cannot be happy with company; and if he were put to chuſe, whether he would rather have equals in a common felicity, or ſuperiours in miſery, he would demurre upon the election. His eye caſts out too much, and never returnes home, but to make compariſons with anothers good. He is an ill prizer of forraine commodity; worſe of his own; for, that he rates too high, this under value. You ſhall have him ever inquiring into the eſtates of his equals and betters; wherein he is not more deſirous to heare all, then loth to heare any thing over-good: and if juſt report relate ought better then he would, he redoubles the queſtion, as being hard to beleeve what he likes not; and hopes yet, if that be averred again to his griefe, that there is ſomewhat concealed in the relation, which if it were known, would argue the commended party miſerable, and blemiſh him with ſecret ſhame. He is ready to quarrell with God, becauſe the next field is fairer growne; and angerly calculates his coſt, and time, and tillage. Whom he dares not openly backbite, nor wound with a direct cenſure, he ſtrikes ſmoothly with an over-cold praiſe; and when he ſees that he muſt either maliciouſly oppugne the juſt praiſe of another, (which were unſafe) or approve it by aſſent, he yeeldeth; but ſhewes withall that his meanes were ſuch, both by nature and education, that he could not, without much neglect, be leſſe commendable: ſo his happineſſe ſhall be made the colour of detraction. When an wholeſome law is propounded, he croſſeth it, either by open, or cloſe oppoſition; not for any incommodity or inexpedience, but becauſe it proceeded from any mouth beſides his owne. And it muſt be a cauſe rarely plauſible, that will not admit ſome probable contradiction. When his equall ſhould riſe to honour, he ſtrives againſt it unſeen; and rather with much coſt ſuborneth great adverſaries; and when he ſees his reſiſtance vaine, he can give an hollow gratulation in preſence; but in ſecret, diſparages that advancement; either the man is unfit for the place, or the place for the man: or if fit, yet leſſe gainfull, or more common then opinion: whereto he addes, that himſelfe might have had the ſame dignity upon better termes, and refuſed it. He is witty in deviſing ſuggeſtions, to bring his Rivall out of love, into ſuſpition. If he be curteous, he is ſeditiouſly popular; if bountifull, he bindes over his clients to a faction; if ſucceſſefull in warre, he is dangerous in peace; if wealthy, he layes up for a day; if powerfull, nothing wants but opportunity of rebellion. His ſubmiſſion is ambitious hypocriſie; his religion, politike inſinuation; no action is ſafe from a jealous conſtruction. When he receives a good report of him whom he emulates, he ſaith, Fame is partiall, and is wont to blanch miſchiefes; and pleaſeth himſelf with hope to finde it worſe; and if Ill-will have diſperſed any more ſpightfull narration, he laies hold on that, againſt all witneſſes, and brocheth that rumour for trueſt, becauſe worſt: and when he ſees him perfectly miſerable, he can at once pity him, and rejoyce. What himſelfe cannot doe, others ſhall not: he hath gained well, if he have hindred the ſucceſſe of what he would have done, and could not. He conceales his beſt skill, not ſo as it may not be knowne that he knowes it, but ſo as it may not be learned; becauſe he would have the world miſſe him. He attained to a ſoveraigne medicine, by the ſecret Legacy of a dying Empericke, whereof he will leave no heire, leſt the praiſe ſhould be divided. Finally, he is an enemy to Gods favours, if they fall beſide himſelf; the beſt nurſe of ill Fame; a man of the worſt diet; for he conſumes himſelfe; and delights in pining; a thorn-hedge covered with nettles; a peeviſh Interpreter of good things, and no other then a lean and pale carcaſſe quickned with a Fiend.

SALOMON'S DIVINE ARTS

TO THE RIGHT HONOVRABLE, AND HOPEFVLL LORD, ROBERT, EARLE OF ESSEX, my ſingular good Lord, all increaſe of Grace and true Honour.

RIGHT HONOVRABLE,

WHileſt I deſired to congratulate your happy returne with ſome worthy preſent; I fell upon this: which I dare not onely offer, but commend; the royalleſt Philoſopher and wiſeſt King, giving you thoſe precepts, which the Spirit of God gave him. The matter is all his: nothing is mine but the method; which I doe willingly ſubmit to cenſure. In that, he could not erre; in this, I cannot but have erred, either in Art, or application, or ſenſe, or diſorder, or defect: yet not wilfully. I have meant it well, and faithfully to the Church of God, and to your Honour, as one of her great hopes. If any man ſhall cavill, that I have gone about to correct Salomons order, or to controule Ezekias ſervants: I complaine both of his charity, and wiſdome; and appeale to more lawfull judgement. Let him as well ſay, that every Concordance perverts the Text. I have onely endevoured to be the common place-book of that great King, and to referre his Divine rules to their heads, for more eaſe of finding, for better memory, for readier uſe. See how that God, whoſe wiſdome thought good to bereave mankind of Salomons profound Commentaries of Nature, hath reſerved theſe his Divine Morals, to out-live the world; as knowing, that thoſe would but feed mans curioſity, theſe would both direct his life, and judge it. He hath not done this without expectation of our good, and glory to himſelfe: which if we anſwer, the gaine is ours. I know how little need there is, either to entreat your Lordſhips acceptation, or to adviſe your uſe. It is enough to have humbly preſented them to your hands, and through them to the Church: the deſire of whoſe good is my good; yea, my recompence and glory. The ſame God, whoſe hand hath led and returned you in ſafety, from all forraine evils, guide your wayes at home, and graciouſly increaſe you in the ground of all true honour, Goodneſſe. My prayers ſhall ever follow you:

Who vow my ſelfe your Honours in all humble and true duty.

GOVERNMENT OF Behaviour and Manners.

THE FIRST BOOKE.

FELICITIE.

§ 1. Of Ethicks in common
- The description.
- The chiefe end, which is Felicity.

D ETHICKS is a Doctrine of of wisdome and knowledge to live well, & of the madnesse and foolishnesse of vice: or instruction to doe wisely by justice, and judgement, and equity, & to doe good in our life: The end whereof is; to see and attaine that chiefe goodnesse of the children of men, which they enjoy under the Sunne, the whole number of the dayes of their life. Ec.1.17. Ec.7.27. Pr.1.3. Ec.3.12. Ec.2.3.

§ 2. Wherein Felicity is not,
- Not in pleasure,
- Not in wealth: for herein is
  1. No satisfaction.
  2. Increased expence.
  3. Restlesnesse.
  4. Want of fruition.
  5. Uncertainty.
  6. Necessity of leaving it.

E WHich consists not in pleasure; for I said in my heart, Goe to now, I will prove thee with joy, therefore take thou pleasure in pleasant things; yea, I with-drew not my heart from any joy: for my heart rejoyced in all my labour: and who could eat, and who could haste to outward things more then I? and behold, this also is vanity. Ec.2.1. Ec.2.10. Ec.2.25. Ec.2.1.

Not in riches. 1. For he that loveth silver shall not be satisfied with silver, and he that loveth riches shall be without the fruit of them: this also is vanity. Ec.5.9.

2. When riches increase, they are increased that eat them: and what good commeth to the owners thereof, but the beholding therof with their eyes? yea much evill; Ec.5.10. Ec.5.11.

for

Ec.5.12. for whereas the sleep of him that travelleth is sweet, whether he eat little or much; contrarily, The satiety of the rich will not suffer him to sleep; To there is an evill sicknesse, which I have seen under the Sunne, riches reserved to the owners thereof, for their evill, and after, not for their good: for there is another evill, which I have seen under the Sunne, and it is frequent among men; A man to whom God hath given riches, and treasures, and honour, and he wanteth nothing for his soule, of all it desireth; but God giveth him not power to eat thereof; and if he have that, yet how long? Riches remaine not alwayes, but taketh her to her wings as an Eagle, and flieth to the heavens. And for their owner. As he came forth of his mothers belly, he shall return naked, to goe as he came, and shall beare away nothing of his labour, which he caused to passe by his hand: And this is also an evill sicknesse, that in all points as he came, so shall he goe: and what profit hath he, that he hath travelled for the wind?

Ec.6.1. Ec.6.2. Pr.27.24. Pr.23.5. Ec.5.14. Ec.5.15.

§. 3. Not in magnificence { of estate, { Royalty, Great attendance, } of works, { Planting, Gathering Treasures, Building, &c. }

Not in honour and magnificence. I the Preacher have been King over Israel in Jerusalem, and I was great, and increased above all that were before me in Jerusalem, which also I shewed in effect; for I made me great works, I built me houses, I planted me Vineyards, I made me Gardens, and Orchards, and planted in them Trees of all fruits; I made me ponds of water, to water therewith the woods that grow with trees; I got men servants, and maids, and had children born in the house; also I had great possessions of beeves, and sheep, above all that were before me in Ierusalem; I gathered to me also silver and gold, and the chiefe treasures of Kings and Provinces; I provided men-singers, and Women-singers, and the delights of the sons of men, musicall consorts of all kinds. Yea, I King Salomon made my self a Palace of the trees of Lebanon; I made the pillars thereof of silver, and the pavement thereof of gold; the hangings thereof of purple, whose mids was paved with the love of the daughters of Israel: Then I looked on all my works that my hands had wrought, (as who is the man that will compare with the King in things which men now have done?) and on the travell that I laboured to doe; and behold, all is vanity, and vexation of spirit; and there is no profit under the Sunne.

Ec.1.12. Ec.1.16. Ec.2.9. Ec.2.4. Ec.2.5. Ec.2.6. Ec.2.7. Ec.2.8. Can.3.9. Can.3.10. Ec.2.11. Ec.2.12. Ec.2.11.

§ 4. Long life and issue rejected, for { certain end, unperfect satisfaction, remembrance and continuance of darknesse.

Not in long life, and plenteous issue: for If a man beget an hundred children, and live many yeares, and the dayes of his yeares be multiplyed, and his soule be not satisfied with good things, and he be not buried, I say, that an untimely fruit is better then he. For he commeth into vanity, and goeth into darknesse: and his name shall be covered with darknesse: Also, he hath not seen the Sunne; nor known it; therefore this hath more rest then the other: And if he had lived a thousand yeares twice told, and had seen no good; shall not all goe to one place? and howsoever, the light surely is a pleasant thing, and it is good for the eyes to see the Sun; yet though a man live many yeares, and in them all he rejoyce; if he shall remember the dayes of darknesse, because they are many, and all that commeth, is Vanity.

Ec.6.3. Ec.6.4. Ec.6.5. Ec.6.6. Ec.11.7. Ec.11.1.

§ 5. Know-

§. 5. Knowledge { Though better then folly; / yet rejected, upon { experience, / indifferency of events, / imperfection. }

Not in learning, and humane knowledge. I have given my heart to search and find out wisdome in all things that are done under the heaven, (this sore travell hath God given the sonnes of men to humble them thereby) yea, I thought in mine heart and said, Behold, I have amplified and increased wisdome, above all them that have been before mee, in the Court and university of Jerusalem, and mine heart hath seen much wisdome and knowledge: for (when I was at the wildest) my wisdome remained with me: Then I saw indeed, that there is profit in wisdome more then in folly, as the light is more excellent then darkenesse: For the wise-mans eyes are in his head, but the foole walketh in darkenesse: but yet, I know that the same condition falleth to them all. Then I thought in mine heart, It befalleth to me as it befalleth to the foole; why therefore do I labour to be more wise? For what hath the wise-man more then the foole? There shall be no remembrance of the wise, nor of the foole for ever: for that that now is, in the dayes to come shall be forgotten; and how dieth the wise-man? as doth the foole: Besides the imperfection of the best knowledge; for the eye is not satisfied with seeing, nor the eare filled with hearing: I thought I would be wise, but it went farre from me; it is farre off, what may it be? and it is a profound deepnesse, who can find it? yea, so far is it from giving contentment, that in the multitude of wisdome is much griefe, and he that increaseth knowledge, increaseth sorrow.

Lastly, not in any humane thing: for I have considered all the works that are done under the Sunne; and behold, all is vanity and vexation of spirit.

§ 6. Wherein Felicity is, 1. In approving our selves to God. From hence { Life, / Blessing; { Favour, / Ioy, / Preservation, / Prosperity. / Long life, &c. }

Wherein then doth it consist? Let us heare the end of all, Feare God, and keep his Commandements; for this is the whole of Man, the whole duty, the whole scope, the whole happinesse; for Life is in the way of righteousnesse, and in that path there is no death; and attending thereon; all Blessings are upon the head of the righteous. Wouldest thou have favour? A good man getteth favour of the Lord. Ioy? The righteous shall sing and rejoyce; and surely to a man that is good in his sight, God giveth wisdome and knowledge & joy; so that the light of the righteous rejoyceth, but the candle of the wicked shall be put out. Preservation and deliverance? Loe, the righteous is an everlasting foundation; for the way of the Lord is strength to the upright man, so as the righteous shall never be removed; and if he be in trouble; Riches avail not in the day of wrath, but righteousnesse delivereth from death, so the righteous shall come out of adversity, and escape out of trouble, and the wicked shall come in his stead; thus every way Righteousnesse preserveth the upright in heart. Prosperity and wealth? The house of the righteous shall have much treasure, and his tabernacle shall flourish. Long life? The feare of the Lord increaseth the daies; and not only himselfe, but his house shall stand. And though a sinner doe evill an hundred times, and God prolong his dayes, yet know I that it shall be well to them that feare the Lord, and doe reverence before him. And lastly, whatsoever good? God will grant the desire of the righteous, and he that keepeth the Law, is blessed.

Contrarily there is perfect misery in wickednes. Look on all that might seem good in this estate, Wealth. The treasures of the wicked profit nothing; the Lord will not famish the soule of the righteous, but he either casteth away the substance of the wicked, so that the belly of the wicked shall want, or else employeth it to the good of his: for the wicked shalbe a ransome for the just; and to the sinner God giveth pain to gather, and to heap, to give to him that is good before God. The wicked man may be rich: but how? The revenues of the wicked is trouble. Life; The yeares of the wicked shall be diminished: As the whirle-wind passeth, so is the wicked no more; for God overthroweth the wicked, and they are not. Whatsoever therefore their hope be, the wicked shall be cut off from the earth, and the transgressors shall be routed out; it shall not be well to the wicked, neither shall he prolong his dayes; he shalbe like to a shadow, because he feared not God; yea the very house of the wicked shall be destroyed. Fame: Whereas the memoriall of the just shall be blessed, the name of the wicked shall rot: yea, look upon his best endevours; his Prayers. The Lord is farre off from the wicked, but heareth the prayer of the righteous: farre off from accepting. For, He that turneth away his eare from hearing the Law, even his prayer shall be abominable; His sacrifice (though well intended) as all the rest of his ways, is no better then abomination to the Lord; how much more when he brings it with a wicked mind? And as no good, so much evill, whether of losse: The way of the wicked wil deceive them; their hope shal perish, especially when they dye; their candle shall be put out, their works shall prove deceitfull: Or of paine; for the Excellent that formed all things, rewardeth the foole, and the transgressor; and he hath appointed, that Affliction should follow sinners: Follow? yea overtake them: his own iniquity shall take the wicked himself, and cover his mouth; & he shall be holden with the cords of his own sinne: even in the transgression of the evill man is his snare; so the wicked shall fall in his own wickednesse; for of it own selfe, iniquity overthroweth the sinner: But besides that, the curse of the Lord is in the house of the wicked: though hand joyn in hand, he shall not be unpunished: behold, the righteous shall be paid upon earth, how much more the wicked and the sinner? That then which the wicked man feareth, shall come upon him, both, Death; He shall dye for the default of instruction, and that by his own hands: for, by following evill he seeks his own death; and after that damnation; The wicked shall be cast away for his malice: Hell and destruction are before the Lord, and a man of wicked imaginations will he condemne; so both in life, in death, after it, nothing but Terrour shall be for the workers of iniquity: where contrarily, The fear of the Lord leadeth to life; and he that is filled therewith, shall continue, and shall not be visited with evill.

§.1. Of Vertue: { Wherein it consisteth. / Whereby it is ruled and directed.

Vertue consists in the meane; vice in extremes. Let thy wayes bee ordered aright; Turne not to the right hand, nor to the left, but remove thy foot from evill; The rule whereof is Gods Law: for the commandement is a lanterne, and instruction a light; and every word of God is pure. My sonne, hearken to my words, incline thine eare to my sayings; let them not depart from thine eyes, but keep them in the midst of thine heart. For they are life unto those that find them, and health unto all their flesh. Keep my commandements, and thou shalt live, and mine instruction as the apple of thine eye: Bind them upon thy fingers, and write them upon the Table of thine heart.

THe prudent man is he, whose eyes are in his head to see all things, and to foresee: and whose heart is at his right hand to doe all dexterously, and with judgement. Wisdome dwels with Prudence, and findeth forth knowledge, and counsels. And to describe it: The wisdome of the Prudent is to understand his way, his own: If thou be wise thou shalt be wise for thy self: An excellent vertue, for Blessed is the man that findeth wisdome, and getteth understanding: The merchandize thereof is better then silver, and the gaine thereof is better then gold: It is more precious then pearles, and all the things that thou canst desire, are not to be compared to her. Length of dayes is in her right hand; and in her left hand riches and glory: Her wayes are wayes of pleasure, and all her paths prosperity: She is a tree of life to them that lay hold on her, and blessed is he that receiveth her. The fruits of it are singular: for first, A wise heart doth not onely seek, but get knowledge, without which the mind is not good: and the eare of the wise, learning: And not get it only, but lay it up, and not so only, but works by it: and yet more, is crowned with it. Besides knowledge, here is safety. When wisdome entreth into thy heart, and knowledge delighteth thy soule, then shall counsell preserve thee, and understanding shall keep thee; and deliver thee from the evill way, and from the man that speaketh froward things, and from them that leave the wayes of righteousnesse, to walk in the wayes of darknesse; and as from sin, so from judgement. The way of life is on high, the prudent to avoid from hell beneath. Thirdly, good direction. 1. For actions: Wisdome causeth to walk in the way of righteousnesse, and in the mids of the paths of judgement. 2. For words, The heart of the wise guideth his mouth wisely, and addeth doctrine to his lips: So that the words of the mouth of a wiseman have grace: yea, he receives grace from others. Either instruct or reprove the Prudent, and he will understand knowledge. Not to speak of wealth: she causeth them that love her, to inherit substance, and filleth their treasures: she giveth not only honour: for the wisdome of a man doth make his face to shine, and the wise man shall inherit glory; but life: Understanding is a well-spring of life, to him that hath it: and he that findeth me (saith Wisdome) findeth life, and shall obtain favour of the Lord. Wherefore get wisdome: get understanding: forget not, neither decline from the words of my mouth. Forsake her not, and she shall keep thee: love her, and she shall preserve thee. Wisdome is the beginning: get wisdome therefore, and above all possessions get understanding: Exalt her, and she shall exalt thee: She shall bring thee unto honour, if thou embrace her: she shall give a goodly ornament to thine head: yea, she shall give thee a Crown of glory.

Ec.8.5. Ec.8.6. Ec.8.7. Ec.9.12. Pr.20.24. Pr.22.3. Pr.30.25. Ec.11.4.

Providence is that whereby the heart of the wise fore-knoweth the time, and judgement; the time when it will be; the judgement how it will be done: both which are appointed to every purpose under heaven: Not that man can fore-see all future things: No, he knoweth not that, that shall be; For who can tell him when it shall be? not so much as concerning himself. Neither doth man know his time, but as the fishes are taken with an evill net, and as the birds which are caught in the snare; so are the children of men snared in the evill time, when it falleth on them suddenly; yea, the steps of a man are ruled by the Lord; how should a man then understand his own way? But sometimes he may: The prudent man seeth the plague afarre off, and fleeth: and as for good things, With the Pismire he provideth his meat in Summer; working still according to fore-knowledge; yet not too strictly, and fearefully: for he that observeth the wind shall not sow; and he that regardeth the clouds, shall not reap.

Discretion is that whereby a man is wise in his businesses, and whereby the heart of the wise guideth his mouth wisely, and addeth doctrine to his lips; For actions: The prudent will consider his steps, and make choice of his times: for To all things there is an appointed time; and a time for every purpose under heaven; a time to plant, and a time to pluck up that which is planted; a time to slay, and a time to heale, &c. a time of warre, and a time of peace: from hence it is that the wise man is strong, and rich: for by knowledge shall the chambers be fild with precious things, which he knowes how to employ well: The crown of the wise is their riches; from hence that his good understanding maketh him acceptable to others. For speeches; The tongue of the wise useth knowledge aright, and in the lips of him that hath understanding, wisdome is found; and his words have grace, both 1. for the seasonablenesse, A word spoken in his place, is like apples of gold with pictures of silver: and how good is a word in due season! 2. for the worth of them: The lips of knowledge are a precious jewell: lastly for their use: The lips of the wise shall preserve them, and their tongue is health, and with health, pleasure: Faire words are as an honey-combe; sweetnesse to the soul, and health to the bones.

Here are two extremes: On the right hand; Make not thy selfe over-wise, wherefore shouldest thou be desolate? On the left: Neither be foolish; why shouldest thou perish, not in thy time? The foole, is that man that wandreth out of the way of wisdome, which hath none heart, that is, is destitute of understanding, either to conceive, or to doe as he ought: Of which sort is, 1. The meer foole; That foole who when he goeth by the way, his heart faileth; whose folly is foolishnes, in whose hand there is a price in vain to get wisdome, which is too high for him to attaine; lastly, in whom are not the lips of knowledge. 2. The rash foole, that is hasty in his matters, that powreth out all his mind at once: which the wise man keeps in, till afterward; that hasteth with his feet, and therefore sinneth. There is more hope of the other fool then of him. 3. The wicked foole; That despiseth wisdome and instruction, that maketh a mock of sin; to whom it is an abomination to depart from evill; to whom foolishnesse is joy; yea, it is his pastime to doe wickedly; and his practice to spread abroad folly. And this man is obstinate in his courses; for though thou bray a foole in a morter among wheat, brayd with a pestell, yet will not his foolishnesse depart from him: and though it seem to depart, yet as a dog turneth againe to his vomit, so returnes he to his foolishnesse. Spare thy labour therefore, speak not in the eares of a foole; for hee will despise the wisdome of thy words. To these saith Wisdome, O ye foolish, how long will ye love foolishnesse, and the scornfull take pleasure in scorning, and fooles hate knowledge? Turn you at my correction. Loe, I will powre out my mind unto you, and make you understand my words. Because I have called, and yee refused; I have stretched out my hand, and none would regard; but ye have despised all my counsell and would none of my correction; I will also laugh at your destruction, and mock when your feare commeth, like sudden desolation; and your destruction shall come like a whirle-wind; when affliction and anguish shall come upon you. IVSTICE.

*Honour and Obedience are indeed mixed duties of Iustice both to God and man: but because as they belong to man, they are politick vertues and there handled; here we consider them only as due to God.

NExt to prudence, is Iustice. A man of understanding walketh uprightly: The just man, therefore, is he that walketh in his integrity; and whose path is to decline from evill; and briefly, he that deals truly in giving each his own.

our wayes: so that, he that walketh in his righteousnesse, feareth the Lord; but he that is lewd in his wayes, despiseth him: which grace, as it is the beginning of knowledge, and the very instruction of wisdome, so in some respect knowledge is the beginning of it; for If thou callest after knowledge, and cryest for understanding; if thou seekest her as silver, and searchest for her as treasures; then shalt thou understand the feare of the Lord, and find the knowledge of God; and this feare gives both contentment; Better is a little with the feare of the Lord, then great treasure and trouble therewith; and 2. future hope. Feare the Lord continually: for surely there is an end, and thy hope shall not be cut off. In which regard, This feare of the Lord is an assured strength, to depend upon; because his children shall have hope, yea and present health and joy. Fear the Lord, and depart from evill, so health shall be to thy navell, and marrow to thy bones: and with health life eternall. The fear of the Lord leadeth to life, yea is a well-spring thereof, and he that is filled therewith, shall continue, and shall not be visited with evill; so that Blessed is the man that feareth alway: whereas on the contrary, He that hardeneth his heart, and denies God, and saith, Who is the Lord? shall fall into evill.

Thirdly, Obedience. He that obeyeth me, shall dwell safely, (saith wisdome) and be quiet from feare of evill: whether in attendance to the will of God; My sonne, hearken to my words, incline thine eare unto my sayings; Let them not depart from thine eies, but keep them in the midst of thine heart: for, He that regardeth instruction, is in the way of life; whereas he that turneth away his eare from it, his very prayer shall be abominable; or in executing of it: He that keepeth the commandement, is a child of understanding; yea he is blessed, and thereby keepeth his owne soule: where they that forsake the Law, praise the wicked: and he that despiseth his wayes, shall die.

Fidelity: both, first in performing that we have undertaken: If thou have vowed a vow to God, deferre not to pay it; for he delighteth not in fooles; pay therefore that thou hast vowed; It is better that thou shouldest not vow; then that thou shouldest vow, and not pay it: Suffer not thy mouth to make thy flesh to sinne; Neither say before the Angell, that this is ignorance: Wherefore shall God be angry by thy voyce, and destroy the work of thine hands? For, It is destruction to a man, to devoure that which is sanctified, and after the vowes to inquire. Neither this to God only, but to man, They that deale truly, are his delight; and the upright shall inherit good things: yea, The faithfull man shall abound in blessings; whereas the perfidious man, as he wrongs others (for Confidence in an unfaithfull man in time of trouble, is like a broken tooth, and a sliding foot) so he gaineth not in the end, himself, He that rewardeth evill for good, evill shall not depart from his house.

Of the firſt kind, is he that drinks the waters of his own Ciſterne; that deſires not the beauty of a ſtranger in his heart; neither lets her take him with her eye-lids: contrarily, the incontinent is he that delights in a ſtrange woman, and embraces the boſome of a ſtranger; or ſhe that forſakes the guide of her youth, and forgetteth the covenant of God; ſhe lieth in wait for a prey, and ſhe increaſeth the tranſgreſſors amongſt men. Fortitude is that, whereby the spirit of a man sustaines his infirmities; which makes the righteous bold as a Lion: contrarily, the weake of strength is he that is faint in the day of adversity; whose feare bringeth a snare upon him, and that desperate: A wounded spirit who can bear? which is often caused through guiltinesse: The wicked fleeth when none pursueth him. Confidence is, to trust in the Lord with all thine heart, and not to lean to thine own wisdome; but in all thy wayes to acknowledge him, and to commit thy works to the Lord, and to have hope in thy death: and though in other things, The hope that is deferred, is the fainting of the heart; yet in this, he that trusteth in the Lord, shall be fat; for, from hence, not only his thoughts and wayes are directed, but he receiveth safety and protection: He is a shield to those that trust in him. The horse is prepared for the day of battell, but salvation is of the Lord. Yea, The name of the Lord is a strong tower: the righteous runneth to it, and is exalted. So that, He that trusteth in the Lord, he is blessed; whereas, he that trusteth in his own heart, is a foole: and it is a vain thing to boast thy self of to morrow; for thou knowest not what a day will bring forth. Patience is, not to refuse the chastening of the Lord, neither to be grieved with his correction: The patient man, in the day of wealth, is of good comfort, and in the day of affliction considereth, God also hath made his contrary to that, that man should find nothing after him whereof to complain: knowing that the Lord correcteth whom he loveth; and that the patient abiding of the righteous shall be gladnesse: Contrarily, the heart of the fool fretteth against the Lord; he is careless, and rageth: but to what purpose? Man cannot strive with him that is stronger then he; yea, rather, the man that hardneth his neck when he is rebuked, shall suddenly be destroyed, and cannot be cured: in respect of mens injuries. He saith not, I will recompence evill; but waits upon the Lord, and he shall save him. In which regard, the patient in spirit that suffers, is better then the proud of spirit that requites. E

Contrarily he must be temperate; Blessed art thou, O Land, when thy Princes eat in time, for strength, and not for drunkennesse; Iust and righteous, for false balances (especially in the hand of government) are an abomination to the Lord: but a perfect weight pleaseth him: A vertue beneficiall, both 1. to himself (for the Throne is established by justice) and 2. to the State; Justice exalteth a Nation; then which nothing doth more bind and cheer the hearts of the people: for, When the righteous are in authority, the people rejoyce, but when the wicked bears rule, the people sigh: & with truth and justice, must mercy be joyned inseparably: for Mercy and truth preserve the King: and his Throne shall be established, also, by mercy. And all these must have wisdome to manage them: By it Princes rule, and are terrible to the ill-deserving. A wise King, scattereth the wicked, and causeth the wheele to turn over them. To all these must be added bounty: A Prince that hateth covetousnesse, shall prolong his dayes; where contrarily, A man of gifts destroyeth his countrey: and yet further, a conquest of his own passions, a princely victory: for He that is slow to anger, is better then the mighty man, and he that ruleth his own mind, better then he that winneth a City; because of all other, The Kings wrath is like the roaring of a Lion: and what is that but the Messenger of death? and if it may be, a conquest of all others, through valour. There are three things, that order well their going, yea foure are comely in going: whereof the last and principall is, A King against whom no man dares rise up. Lastly, secrecy in determinations: The Heaven in height, & earth in deepnesse, and the Kings heart can no man (no man should) search out: neither should it be in any hands but the Lords; who as he knows it, so he turnes it whithersoever it pleaseth him.

Neither is Justice lesse essentiall then either; for to doe justice and judgement, is more acceptable to the Lord then sacrifice: To know faces, therefore (in a Iudge) is not good, for that man will transgresse for a peece of bread; much lesse to accept the person of the wicked, to cause the righteous to fall in judgement: He that saith to the wicked, Thou art righteous, him shall the people curse, and the multitude shall abhorre him: yea yet higher; He that justifieth the wicked, and condemneth the just, both are abomination to the Lord. Wherefore howsoever The wicked man taketh a gift out of the bosome, to wrest the wayes of judgement; and commonly, A mans gift inlargeth him, and leadeth him (with approbation) before great men: yet he knoweth, that the reward destroyeth the heart; that the acceptance of it is but the robbery of the wicked; which shall destroy them, because they have refused to execute judgement: he hateth gifts, then, that he may live, and it is a joy to him to doe judgment. He doth unpartially smite the scorner, yea severely punish him, that the wickedly fooolish may beware and become wise. And whereas Every way of a man is right in his own eyes, and a false record will speak lies, and use deceit: he so maketh inquiry, that a false witnesse shall not be unpunished: and he that speaketh lies shall perish: Lastly, his hand is free from oppression of his inferiours: which as it makes a wise man mad; so the actor of it, miserable; for He that oppresseth the poor, reproveth him that made him: and if the afflicted be oppresst in judgement, the Lord will defend their cause, and spoile the soule that spoileth them; and upon all occasions, he so determineth, that they shall kisse the lips of him that answereth upright words.

SALOMONS OECONOMICKS. OR FAMILIE.

§. 1. The Head of the Family: { Wiſdome, Stayednesse, Thrift. } in whom is required

THe man is the head, and guide of the family; In whom wiſdome is good with an inheritance: for Through wiſdome an houſe is builded and eſtabliſhed: which directs him to doe all things in due order; firſt, to prepare his work without, and then after, to build his houſe; and therewith ſtayednesse. For, as a bird that wandreth from her neſt, ſo is a man that wandreth from his own place; and (which is the chief ſtay of his eſtate) thriftinesse; for He that troubleth his own houſe (by exceſſe) ſhall inherit the wind: & the fool ſhall be ſervant to the wiſe in heart: for which purpoſe he ſhall find, that The houſe of the righteous ſhall have much treaſure, while the revenues of the wicked is but trouble: or if not much, yet Better is a little with the feare of the Lord, then great treaſure, and trouble therewith: Howſoever, therefore, let him be content with his eſtate: Let the Lambs be ſufficient for his cloathing, and let the Goats be the price of his field. Let the milk of his Goats be ſufficient for his food, for the food of his family, and the ſuſtenance of his maids: and if he have much revenue, let him look for much expence. For, When goods increaſe, they are increaſed that eat them: and what good commeth to the owners thereof, but the beholding thereof with their eyes?

goods) thy flesh and thy body, and say, How have I hated instruction, and mine heart despised correction? I was almost plunged into all evill, of sinne and torments; and that which is most shamefull, in the midst of the assembly, in the face of the world. Let therefore that thine own Fountaine be blessed, and rejoyce with the wife of thy youth: Let her be as the loving Hind, & pleasant Roe: let her brests satisfie thee at all times, and erre thou in her love continually; For why shouldest thou delight, my sonne, in a strange woman; or (whether in affection, or act) embrace the bosome of a stranger? For the wayes of man are before the eyes of the Lord, and he pondereth all his paths: & if thy godlinesse regard not that, yet for thine own sake, Desire not her beauty in thy heart, neither let her take thee with her eye-lids; for because of the whorish woman, a man is brought to a morsell of bread, yea to the very hulks: and more then that, a Woman wil hunt for the precious life of a man. Thou sayest thou canst escape this actual defilement: Can a man take fire in his bosome, and his clothes not be burnt? Or can a man go upon coles and his feet not be burnt? So he that goeth in to his neighbours wife, shall not be innocent, whosoever toucheth her: This sinne is farre more odious then theft: For, men doe not despise a Theef when he stealeth to satisfie his soule, because he is hungry: But if he be found, he shall restore seven-fold, or he shall give all the substance of his house; and it is accepted. But he that commits adultery with a woman, is mad: he that would destroy his own soule, let him doe it: For, he shall find a wound and dishonour, and his reproach shall never be put away: Neither is the danger lesse then the shame. For, jealousie is the rage of man: therefore the wronged husband will not spare in the day of vengeance. He cannot beare the sight of any ransome: neither will he consent to remit it, though thou multiply thy gifts. And though stoln waters be sweet and hid bread be pleasant to our corrupt taste; yet the adulterer knows not that the dead are there: and that her guests are in the deeps of hell, that her house tendeth to death; And howsoever her lips drop as an honey-comb, and her mouth is more soft then oil, yet the end of her is bitter as wormwood, and sharp as a two-edged sword: her feet goe down to death, and her steps take hold of hell: yea, the mouth of the strange woman is a deep pit, and he with whom the Lord is angry, shall fall into it.

3. Quietly, and lovingly: for, Better is a dinner of green herbs where love is, then a stalled Oxe, and hatred therewith: yea, Better is a dry morsell, if peace be with it, then an house full of sacrifices with strife. And if he find sometime cause of blame, The discretion of a man deferreth his anger, and his glory is to passe by an offence: and only He that covereth a transgression, seeketh love: Rejoice with thy wife whom thou hast loved all the dayes of the life of thy vanity, which God hath given thee under the Sun. For this is thy portion in this life. And in the travels wherein thou laboureſt under the Sunne.

A Vertuous wife is the Crown of her husband: Who shall find such a one? for her price is farre above the pearles. She is true to her husbands bed; such as the heart of her husband may trust to, as knowing that she is tied to him by the Covenant of God; not wanton and unchaste; such one as I once saw from the window of my house: I looked thorow my window, and saw among the fooles, and considered among the children a young man wanting wit, who passed thorow the street by her corner, and went toward her house, in the twilight in the evening, when the night began to be black and dark, so as he thought himself unseene; and behold, there met him (the same he sought for) a woman with an harlots fashion; and close in heart, as open in her habit. Shee is babling and perverse; whose feet (contrary to the manner of all modest wives, which only attain honour) cannot abide in her house, but are ever gadding. Now she is without the gates, now in the streets, and lieth in wait in every corner; or at the least, sitteth at the doore of her house, on a seat in the hie places of the City:

A City: so she (not staying to be sollicited) caught him by the neck, and kissed him. and with an impudent face said unto him, I have the flesh of peace-offerings; (both good chear, and Religion pretended) this day have I paid my vowes: therefore I came forth, on purpose to meet thee, that I might earnestly seek thy face, of all others; and now, how happy am I, that I have found thee! I have decked my bed with ornaments, with curtaines, and strings of Ægypt: I have perfumed my bed with Myrrh, Aloes, and Cinnamon, that we may lye sweet; Come, goe, let us take our fill of loves, untill the morning, let us take our pleasure in dalliance; fear nothing. For my husband is not at home, he is gone a journey farre off, neither needest thou to doubt his returne; for, he hath taken with him a bag of silver, and will come home at his set day: sooner he cannot, this she said: what followed? By the abundance of the sweetnesse of her speech, she caused him B to yeeld: and with the flattery of her lips, she enticed him; and straightwayes he followes her, as an Oxe goeth to the slaughter, and as a fool to the stocks for correction, till a Dart strike thorow his Liver, the seat of his lust: or as a bird hasteneth to the snare, and knoweth not that it is against his own life: thus she doth, and when her husband returnes, she wipeth her mouth and saith, I have not committed iniquity. (2.) She is dutifull and obedient; by a soft answer appeasing wrath: not hatefull; for whom, a whole world is moved; not stubborn, not quarrellous: for, the contentions (and brawlings) of a wife, are like a continuall dropping in the day of raine: a discomfort to the husband; a rotting to the house. So, It is better to dwell in a corner of the house top, then with a contentious woman in a wide house. And though, for society, Two be better then one; yet It is better to dwell alone in the Wilderneſſe, then with a contentious C and angry woman. For herein as his griefe cannot be avoyded, so his shame cannot be conceived. For, He that hideth her, hideth the wind; and she is as oyle in his right hand, that uttereth it selfe.

TO THE RIGHT HONOVRABLE, MY SINGVLAR GOOD LORD AND PATRON,

EDWARD Lord DENNY Baron of VValtham, All Grace and Happineſſe.

RIGHT HONOVRABLE,

WHen I would have withdrawn my hand from divine Salomon, the Heavenly Elegance of this his beſt Song drew me unto it, and would not ſuffer me to take off mine eyes, or pen. VVho can read it with underſtanding, and not be tranſported from the world, from himſelfe? and be any otherwhere ſave in Heaven, before his time? I had rather ſpend my time in admiration, then Apology. Surely, here is nothing that ſavours not of extaſie, and ſpirituall raviſhment; neither was there ever ſo high and paſſionate a ſpeculation delivered by the Spirit of God, to mankind: which by how much more divine it is, by ſo much more difficult. It is well, if theſe myſteries can be found out by ſearching: Two things make the Scripture hard: Prophecies, Allegories; both are met in this: but the latter ſo ſenſibly to the weakeſt eyes, that this whole whole Paſtorall-marriage-ſong (for ſuch it is) is no other then one Allegory ſweetly continued: where the deepeſt things of God are ſpoken in Riddles, how can there be but obſcurity and diverſe conſtruction? All judgements will not (I know) ſubſcribe to my ſenſes; yet I have been fearfull and ſpiritually nice, not often diſſenting from all Interpreters; alwayes, from the unlikelieſt. It would be too tedious to give my account for every line; let the learned ſcan and judge. VVhat-ever other cenſures be, your Honours was favourable; and (as to all mine) full of love and incouragement. That, therefore, which it pleaſed you to allow from my pen, vouchſafe to receive from the Preſſe; more common, not leſſe devoted to you. VVhat is there of mine that doth not joy in your name, and boaſt it ſelfe in ſerving you? To whoſe ſoule and people, I have long agone addicted my ſelfe, and my labours, and ſhall ever continue

Your Lordſhips, in all humble and unfained duty,

SALOMONS SONG OF SONGS PARAPHRASED.

CHAP. I.

Dialogue. The Church to CHRIST.

1. Let him kisse me with the kisses of his mouth; for thy love is better then wine.

C HE that he would bestow upon me the comfortable testimonies of his love, and that he would vouchsafe me yet a neerer conjunction with himself; as in glory hereafter, so for the mean time in his sensible graces! For thy love, O my Saviour, and these fruits of it, are more sweet unto me, then all earthly delicates can be to the bodily taste.

2. Because of the savour of thy good oyntments, thy name is as an oyntment powred out: therefore the Virgins love thee.

Yea, so wonderfully pleasant are the savours of those graces that are in thee, wherewith I desire to be endued, that all whom thou hast blessed with the sense thereof, make as high and dear account of thy Gospell, whereby they are wrought, as of some precious ointment, or perfume: the delight whereof is such, that (hereupon) the pure
D and holy soules of the faithfull place their whole affection upon thee.

3. Draw me, we will run after thee: the King hath brought me into his chambers, we will rejoyce, and be glad in thee: we will remember thy love, more then wine, the righteous doe love thee.

Pull me therefore out from the bondage of my sinnes: deliver me from the world, and doe thou powerfully incline my will and affections toward thee: and in spight of all tentations, give me strength to cleave unto thee; and then both I, and all those faithfull children thou hast given mee, shall all at once with speed and earnestnesse walk to thee, and with thee: yea, when once my Royall and glorious Husband hath brought me both into these lower rooms of his spirituall treasures on earth, and into
E his heavenly chambers of glory, then will we rejoyce and be glad in none, but thee, which shalt be all in all to us: then will we celebrate and magnifie thy love above all the pleasures we found upon earth; for all of us thy righteous ones, both Angels and Saints, are inflamed with the love of thee.

4. I am black, O daughters of Ierusalem, but comely: If I be as the tents of Kedar, yet I am as the curtains of Salomon.

Never upbraid me (O ye forrain congregations) that I seem in outward appearance discoloured by my infirmities, and duskish with tribulations: for whatsoever I seem to you, I am yet inwardly well-favoured in the eyes of him whom I seek to please; and though I be to you black, like the tents of the Arabian shepherds; yet to him, and in him, I am glorious and beautifull, like the Curtaines of Salomon.

5. Regard

5. Regard ye me not, because I am black: for the Sunne hath looked upon me; the sonnes of my mother were angry against me: they made me keeper of the vines; but I kept not mine own vine.

Look not therefore disdainfully upon me, because I am blackish, and dark of hiew: for this colour is not so much naturall to me, as caused by that continuall heat of afflictions wherewith I have been usually scorched: neither this, so much upon my own just desert, as upon the rage and envy of my false brethren, the world: who would needs force upon me the observation of their idolatrous religions, and superstitious impieties; through whose wicked importunity, and my own weakness, I have not so entirely kept the sincere truth of God committed to me, as I ought.

6. Shew me, O thou whom my soule loveth, where thou feedest, where thou liest at noone: for why should I be as she that turneth aside to the flocks of thy companions?

Now therefore that I am some little started aside from thee, O thou whom my soule notwithstanding dearly loveth, shew mee, I beseech thee, where, and in what wholesome and divine pastures thou (like a good shepherd) feedest and restest thy flocks with comfortable refreshings, in the extremity of these hot persecutions: for how can it stand with thy glory, that I should, through thy neglect, thus suspiciously wander up and down amongst the congregations of them that both command and practise the worship of false gods?

CHRIST, to the Church.

7. If thou know not, O thou the fairest among women, get thee forth by the steps of the flock, and feed thy Kids above the tents of the shepherds.

IF thou know not, O thou my Church, whom I both esteem and have made most beautifull by my merits, and thy sanctification, stray not amongst these false worshippers, but follow the holy steps of those blessed Patriarks, Prophets, Apostles, which have been my true and ancient flock, who have both known my voyce, and followed me; and feed thou my weak and tender ones with this their spirituall food of life, farre above the carnall reach of those other false teachers.

8. I have compared thee, O my love, to the troops of horses in the chariots of Pharaoh.

Such is mine estimation of thee, O my Love, that so far as the choisest Ægyptian horses of Pharaoh, for comely shape, for honourable service, for strength and speed, exceed all other, so farre thou excellest all that may be compared with thee.

9. Thy cheeks are comely with rowes of stones, and thy neck with chaines.

Those parts of thee, which both are the seats of beauty, and most conspicuous to the eye, are gloriously adorned with the graces of my sanctification; which are for their worth as so many precious borders of the goodliest stones, or chaines of pearl.

10. We will make thee borders of gold, with studs of silver.

And though thou be already thus set forth; yet I and my Father have purposed a further ornament unto thee, in the more plentifull effusion of our Spirit upon thee: which shall be to thy former deckings, in stead of pure gold curiously wrought with specks of silver.

The Church.

11. While the King was at his repast, my spikenard gave the smell thereof.

BEhold (O yee daughters) even now, whiles my Lord and King seemes farre distant from me, and sits in the Throne of heaven amongst the companies of Angels (who attend around upon him) yet now doe I find him present with me in spirit: even now the sweet influence of his graces, like to some precious oyntment, spreads it selfe over my soule, and returnes a pleasant savour into his own nosthrils.

12. My welbeloved is as a bundle of myrrh unto me, lying between my brests.

And though I be thus delightfull to my Saviour, yet nothing so much as he is unto me: for loe, as some fragrant pomander of myrrh, laid between the brests, sends up a most most comfortable sent, so his love, laid close unto my heart, doth still give me continuall and unspeakable refreshings.

13. My well-beloved is as a cluster of Cypers unto me among the vines of Engedi.

Or if any thing can be of more excellent vertue, such smell as the cluster of Cypers berries, within the fruitfulst, pleasantst, and richest Vineyards and gardens of Judæa, yeeld unto the passengers; such and more delectable doe I find the savour of his grace to me.

CHRIST.

14. My Love, behold, thou art faire, thine eyes are like the Doves.

NEither doest thou on my part lose any of thy love, O my dear Church: for behold, in mine eies, thus clothed as thou art with my righteousnesse, oh how faire and glorious thou art! how above all comparison glorious and faire! Thine eyes, which are thy seers, (Prophets, Apostles, Ministers) and those inward eyes, whereby thou seest him that is invisible, are full of grace, chastity, simplicity.

The Church.

15. My well beloved, behold, thou art fair and pleasant: also our bed is green.

NAy then (O my sweet Saviour and Spouse) thou alone art that faire and pleasant one indeed, from whose fulnesse I confesse to have received all this little measure of my spirituall beauty: and behold, from this our mutuall delight, and heavenly conjunction, there ariseth a plentifull and flourishing increase of thy faithfull ones in all places, and through all times.

16. The beames of our house are Cedars, our galleries are of Firre.

And behold, the congregations of Saints, the places where we do sweetly converse and walk together, are both firme and during (like Cedars amongst the trees) not subject, through thy protecting grace, to utter corruption; and through thy favourable acceptation and word (like to galleries of sweet wood) full of pleasure and contentment.

CHAP. II.

CHRIST.

1. I am the Rose of the field, and the Lillie of the valleys.

THou hast not without just cause magnified me, O my Church: for, as the faiрest and sweetest of all flowers which the earth yeeldeth, the Rose and Lilly of the valleyes, excell for beauty, for pleasure, for use, the most base and odious weeds that grow: so doth my grace, to all them that have felt the sweetnes thereof, surpasse all worldly contentments.

2. Like a Lilly among the thornes, so is my Love among the daughters.

Neither is this my dignity alone: but thou, O my Spouse (that thou maist bee a fit match for me) art thus excellent above the world, that no Lilly can be more in goodly shew beyond the naked thorne, then thou in thy glory thou receivest from mee, overlookest all the assemblies of aliens and unregenerates.

The Church.

3. Like the Apple-tree among the trees of the forrest, so is my well-beloved among the sons of men: under his shadow had I delight, and sate downe; and his fruit was sweet unto my mouth.

AND (to return thine own praises) as some fruitfull and well-growne Apple-tree, in comparison of all the barren trees of the wilde forrest, so art thou (O my beloved Saviour) to me, in comparison of all men, and Angels; under thy comfortable shadow alone, have I ever wont to find safe shelter against all mine afflictions, all my tentations and infirmities, against all the curses of the Law, and dangers of judgement, and to coole my self after all the scorching beams of thy Fathers displeasure, and (besides) to feed and satisfie my soule with the soveraign fruit of thy holy Word, unto eternall life.

4. He brought me into the wine-cellar, and love was his banner over me.

Hee hath graciously led me by his Spirit, into the midst of the mysteries of godlinesse; and hath plentifully broached unto me the sweet wines of his Scriptures and Sacraments. And look how souldiers are drawn by their colours from place to place, and cleave fast to their ensigne: so his love, which he spred forth in my heart, was my onely banner, whereby I was both drawn to him, directed by him, and fastened upon him.

5. Stay me with flagons, and comfort me with apples: for I am sick of love.

And now, O ye faithfull Euangelists, Apostles, Teachers, apply unto me with all care and diligence, all the cordiall promises of the Gospell: these are the full Flagons of that spirituall wine, which onely can cheere up my soule; these are the Apples of that Tree of life, in the middest of the Garden, which can feed me to immortality. Oh come and apply these unto my heart: for I am even overcome with a longing expectation and desire of my delayed glory.

6. His left hand be under my head: and let his right hand embrace me.

And whiles I am thus spiritually languishing in this agony of desire, let my Saviour imploy both his hands to relieve mine infirmity: let him comfort my head and my heart, my judgement and affections, (which both complaine of weaknesse) with the lively heat of his gracious embracements: and so let us sweetly rest together.

7. I charge you, O daughters of Ierusalem, by the Roes, and by the Hinds of the field, that ye stirre not up, nor waken my Love, until he please.

In the mean time, I charge you (O all yee that professe any friendship or affinity with me) I charge you, by whatsoever is comely, deare and pleasant unto you, as you will avoid my uttermost censures, take heed how you vex and disquiet my mercifull Saviour, and grieve his Spirit, and wrong his name, with your vaine and lewd conversation; and doe not dare, by the least provocation of your sinne, to interrupt his peace.

8. It is the voyce of my well-beloved: behold, he commeth leaping by the mountains, and skipping by the hills.

Loe, I have no sooner called, but he heares and answers me with his loving voice: neither doth he onely speak to me afarre, but he comes to mee with much willingnesse and celerity; so willingly, that no humane resistance can hinder him, neither the hillocks of my lesser infirmities, nor the mountains of my grosser sinnes (once repented of) can stay his mercifull pase towards me.

9. My well beloved is like a Roe, or a young Hart: loe, he standeth behind our wal, looking forth of the windowes, shewing himselfe thorow the grates.

So swiftly, that no Roe or Hind can fully resemble him in this his speed and nimbleness: and loe, even now, before I can speak it, is he come neer unto me, close to the doore and wall of my heart. And though this wall of my flesh hinder my full fruition of him, yet loe, I see him by the eye of faith, looking upon me; I see him as in a glasse; I see him shining gloriously, thorow the grates and windowes of his Word and Sacraments, upon my soule.

10. My well beloved spake, and said unto mee, Arise, my love, my fair one, and come thy way.

And

A And now, me thinks, I heare him ſpeak to mee in a gracious invitation, and ſay, Ariſe (O my Church) riſe up, whether from thy ſecuritie, or fear: hide not thy head any longer, O my beautifull Spouſe, for danger of thine enemies, neither ſuffer thy ſelfe to be preſſed with the dulneſſe of thy nature, or the careleſſe ſleep of thy ſinnes; but come forth into the comfortable light of my preſence, and ſhew thy ſelf cheerfull in me.

11. For behold, winter is paſt, the rain is changed and gone away.

For behold, all the cloudie winter of thy afflictions is paſſed, all the tempeſts of tentations are blown over; the heaven is clear, and now there is nothing that may not give thee cauſe of delight.

B 12. The flowers appear in the earth: the time of the ſinging of birds is come, and the voyce of the Turtle is heard in our land.

Every thing now reſembles the face of a ſpirituall Spring; all the ſweet flowers and bloſſomes of holy profeſſion put forth, and ſhew themſelves in their opportunities: now is the time of that heavenly melodie, which the cheerfull Saints and Angels make in mine eares, while they ſing ſongs of deliverance, and praiſe me with their Allelujahs, and ſay, Glory to God on high, in earth peace, good will towards men.

13. The Fig-tree hath brought forth her young Figs, & the Vines with their ſmal Grapes have caſt a ſavour: ariſe, my love, my fair one, and come away.

C What ſpeak I of bloſſomes? behold, thoſe fruitfull Vines, and Fig-trees of my faithfull ones, whom my husbandrie hath carefully tendred and dreſſed, yeeld forth both pleaſant (though tender) fruits of obedience, and the wholeſome and comfortable ſavours of better deſires: wherefore now, O my dear Chriſt, ſhake off all that dull ſecuritie, wherewith thou haſt been held, and come forth and enjoy me.

14. My Dove, thou art in the holes of the rock, in the ſecret places of the cliffs: ſhew me thy ſight, let me hear thy voice: for thy voyce is ſweet, and thy ſight comely.

O my beautifull, pure and chaſt Spouſe, which like unto ſome ſolitary Dove, haſt long hid thine head in the ſecret and inacceſſible clifts of the rocks, out of the reach and knowledge of thy perſecutors; how-ever thou art concealed from others, ſhew
D thy ſelf in thy works and righteouſneſſe, unto me: and let me be ever plied with thy words of imploration, and thankſgiving: for thy voice (though it be in mourning) and thy face (though it be ſad and blubbered) are exceedingly pleaſing unto me.

15. Take us the Foxes, the little Foxes which deſtroy the Vines: for our Vines have ſmal grapes.

And in the mean time (O all ye that wiſh well to my name and Church) doe your utmoſt endevour to deliver her from her ſecret enemies (not ſparing the leaſt) who either by hereticall doctrine, or prophane converſation, hinder the courſe of the Goſpell, & pervert the faith of many, eſpecially of thoſe that have newly given up their names to me, and are but newly entred into the profeſſion of godlineſſe.

E 16. My Wel beloved is mine, and I am his: he feedeth among Lillies.

My beloved Saviour is mine, through my faith; and I am his through his love: and we both are one, by vertue of that bleſſed union on both parts, whereby we mutually enjoy each other with all ſufficient contentment. And how worthily is my love placed upon him, who leadeth me forth into pleaſant paſtures, and at whoſe right hand there is the fulneſſe of joy for evermore?

17. Vntill the day break, and the ſhadowes flee away, return, my Well-beloved, and be like a Roe or a young Hart upon the mountaines of Bether.

Come therefore (O my Saviour) and untill the day of thy glorious appearance ſhall ſhine forth to the world, wherein our ſpirituall marriage ſhall be conſummate, and untill all theſe ſhadowes of ignorance, of infidelity, of troubles of conſcience, and of outward tribulations be utterly diſperſed, and chaſed away, come and turne thee to me againe, thou which to the carnall eies of the world ſeemeſt abſent, come quickly, and delay not; but for the ſpeed of thy returne, be like unto ſome ſwift Roe, or Hinde, upon thoſe ſmooth hills of Gilead, which Iordan ſevers from the other part of Iury.

CHAP. III.

1. In my bed by night I ſought him whom my ſoul loved: I ſought him, but I found him not.

MY ſecurity told me that my Saviour was neer unto my ſoule, yea with it, and in it: but when by ſerious and ſilent meditation I ſearched my owne heart, I found that (for ought my own ſenſe could diſcern) he was farre off from me.

2. I will riſe therefore now, and goe about in the City by the ſtreets, and by the open places, and will ſeek him that my ſoule loveth: I ſought him, but I found him not.

Then thought I with my ſelf, Shall I lie ſtill contented with this want? No, I will ſtirre up my ſelfe; and the help I cannot finde in my ſelfe, I will ſeek in others: Of all that have been experienced in all kinde of difficulties, of all deep Philoſophers, of the wiſeſt and honeſteſt worldlings, I will diligently enquire for my Saviour: amongſt them I ſought him, yet could receive no anſwer to my ſatisfaction.

3. The Watchmen that went about the City, found me: to whom I ſaid, Have you ſeen him whom my ſoule loveth?

Miſſing him there, I ran to thoſe wiſe and carefull Teachers, whom God hath ſet as ſo many watch-men upon the wals of his Ieruſalem; who ſooner found me then I could ask after them; to whom I ſaid (as thinking no man could be ignorant of my Love) Can you give me no direction where I might find him whom my ſoul loveth?

4. When I had paſt a little from them, then I found him whom my ſoule loveth: I took hold on him, and left him not, til I had brought him unto my mothers houſe, into the chamber of her that conceived me.

Of whom when I had almoſt left hoping for comfort, that gracious Saviour who would not ſuffer me tempted above my meaſure, preſented himſelfe to my ſoule: Loe then, by a new act of faith, I laid faſt hold upon him, and will not let him any more part from my joyfull embracements, untill both I have brought him home fully into the ſeat of my conſcience, and have wonne him to a perpetuall cohabitation with me, and a full accompliſhment of my love, in that Ieruſalem which is above; which is the mother of us all.

CHRIST.

5. I charge yee O daughters of Ieruſalem, by the Roes, and by the Hinds of the field, that ye ſtirre not up nor waken my Love untill ſhe pleaſe.

NOw that my diſtreſſed Church hath been all the night long of my ſeeming abſence, toiled in ſeeking me, I charge you, (O all that profeſſe any friendſhip with me) I charge you by what ſoever is comely, dear and pleaſant unto you, that (as you will anſwer it) you trouble not her peace with any unjuſt or unſeaſonable ſuggeſtions, with uncharitable contentions, with any novelties of doctrine, but ſuffer her to reſt ſweetly in that divine truth, which ſhe hath received, and this true apprehenſion of me wherein ſhe rejoyceth.

6. Who is ſhe that commeth up out of the wilderneſſe, like pillars of ſmoak perfumed with Myrrh, and Incenſe, and with all the chief of ſpices?

Oh who is this? how admirable? how lovely? who but my Church, that aſcendeth thus

A thus glorioufly out of the wilderneſſe of the world, wherein ſhe hath thus long wandered into the bleſſed manſions of my Fathers houſe, all perfumed with the graces of perfect ſanctification, mounting right upward into her glory, like ſome ſtraight pillar of ſmoak, that ariſeth from the moſt rich and pleaſant compoſition of odours that can be deviſed.

The Church.

7. Behold his bed better then Salomons: threeſcore ſtrong men are round about it; of the valiant men of Iſrael.

I Am aſcended; and loe how glorious is this place where I ſhall eternally enjoy the preſence and love of my Saviour! how farre doth it exceed the earthly magnificence of Salomon? about his bed doe attend a Guard of threeſcore choiſeſt men B of Iſrael.

8. They all handle the ſword, and are expert in warre: every one hath his ſword upon his thigh, for the feare by night.

All ſtout Warriers, able and expert to handle the ſword; which for more readineſſe each of them weares hanging upon his thigh, ſo as it may be haſtily drawn upon any ſudden danger: but about this heavenly pavilion of my Saviour, attend millions of Angels, ſpiritnall Souldiers, mighty in power, ready to be commanded ſervice by him.

C 9. King Salomon made himſelfe a bed of the trees of Lebanon.

The Bride-bed that Salomon made (ſo much admired of the world) was but of the Cedars of Lebanon.

10. He made the pillars thereof of ſilver, and the ſted thereof of gold, the hangings thereof of purple, whoſe midſt was in-laid with the love of the daughters of Ieruſalem.

The Pillars but of ſilver, and the Bed-ſted of gold; the Teſter or Canopy, but of purple; The Coverlet wrought with the curious and painfull needle-work of the maids of Ieruſalem: but this celeſtiall reſting place of my God is not made with hands, nor of any corruptible metall, but is full of incomprehenſible light, ſhining evermore with the glorious preſence of God.

D 11. Come forth ye daughters of Sion, and behold the King Salomon with the crowne wherewith his mother crowned him in the day of his mariage, and in the day of the gladneſs of his heart.

And as the outward ſtate, ſo the majeſty of his perſon is above all compariſon. Come forth (O ye daughters of Sion) lay aſide all private and earthly affections, look upon King Salomon as he ſits ſolemnly crowned in the day of his greateſt royalty and triumph, and compare his higheſt pompe, with the divine magnificence of my Saviour, in that day when his bleſſed mariage ſhall be fully perfected above, to the eternall rejoycing of himſelf and his Church; and ſee whether there be any proportion betwixt them.

CHAP. IV.

CHRIST.

1. Behold thou art fair, my Love, behold thou art fair, thine eyes are like the Doves: within thy locks, thine hair is like a flock of Goats which look down from the mountains of Gilead.

OH how faire thou art and comely, my dear Spouſe! how inwardly faire with the gifts of my Spirit! how fair outwardly in thy comely adminiſtration and government! Thy ſpirituall eyes of underſtanding and judgement, are full of purity, chaſtity, ſimplicity; not wantonly caſt forth, but modeſtly ſhining amidst thy locks: all thy gracious profession, and all thy appendances, and ornaments of expedient ceremonies, are so comely to behold, as is to see a flock of well fed Goats grazing upon the fruitfull hills of Gilead. A

2. Thy teeth like a flock of sheep in good order, which goe up from the washing: which every one bring out twins, and none is barren among them.

Those that chew and prepare the heavenly food for thy soul, are both of gracious simplicity, and of sweet accordance one with another; having all one heart and one tongue: and both themselves are sanctified and purged from their uncleanesse, and are fruitfull in their holy labours unto others; so that their doctrine is never in vaine, but is still answered with plentifull increase of soules added to the Church.

3. Thy lips are like a thread of scarlet, and thy talk is comely: thy temples are within thy locks as a peece of Pomegranate. B

Thy speech (especially in the mouth of thy Teachers) is both gracious in it selfe, and such as administers grace to the hearers; full of zeale and fervent charity, full of gravity and discretion: and that part of thy countenance, which thou wilt have seen (though dimly and sparingly) is full of holy modesty and bashfulnesse; so blushing, that it seemeth like the colour of a broken peece of Pomegranate.

4. Thy neck is as the tower of David built for defence: a thousand shields hang therein, and all the targets of the strong men.

Those who by their holy authority sustaine thy government (which are as some streight and strong neck to beare up the head) are like unto Davids high Tower of defence, furnished with a rich armory; which affords infinite wayes of safe protection, and infinite monuments of victory. C

5. Thy two brests are as two young Kids that are twins, feeding among the Lillies.

Thy two Testaments (which are thy two full and fair brests, whereby thou nurseſt all thy faithfull children) are as two twins of Kids: twins, for their excellent and perfect agreement one with another, in all resemblances: of Kids, that are daintily fed among the sweet flowers, for the pleasant nourishment which they yeeld to all that suck thereof.

6. Vntill the day break, & the shadowes flie away, I will go into the mountains of Myrrh, and to the Mountains of Incense. D

Untill the day of my gracious appearance shall shine forth, and untill all these shadowes of ignorance, infidelity, afflictions, be utterly and suddenly dispersed, O my Spouse, I will retire my selfe (in regard of my bodily presence) into my delightfull and glorious rest of heaven.

7. Thou art all faire, my Love, and there is no spot in thee.

Thou art exceeding beautifull, O my Church, in all the parts of thee: for all thy sinnes are done away, and thine iniquity is covered; and loe, I present thee to my Father without spot, or wrinkle, or any such deformity.

8. Come with me from Lebanon, my Spouse, even with me from Lebanon, and look from the top of Amanah from the top of Shenir and Hermon, from the dens of the Lions, & from the mountains of the Leopards. E

And now (O thou which I professe to have maried to my selfe in truth and righteousnesse) thou shalt be gathered to me from all parts of the world; not onely from the confines of Judea, where I planted and found thee, but from the remotest and most savage places of the Nations; out of the company of Infidels, of cruell and bloudy persecutors, who like Lions and Leopards have tyrannized over thee, and mercilesly torn thee in peeces.

9. My

A 9. My ſiſter, my Spouſe, thou haſt wounded my heart with one of thine eyes: and with a chaine of thy neck.

Thou haſt utterly raviſht me from my ſelfe (O my ſiſter, my Spouſe; for ſo thou art, both joyned to me in that ſpirituall union, and coheire with me of the ſame inheritance and glory) thou haſt quite raviſht my heart with thy love: even one caſt of one of thine eyes of faith, and one of the ornaments of thy ſanctification wherewith thou art decked by my Spirit, have thus ſtricken me with love: how much more, whē I ſhall have a full ſight of thee, and all thy graces, ſhall I be affected towards thee!

B 13. My Siſter, my Spouſe, how faire is thy love! how much better is thy love then wine, and the ſavour of thine oyntments then all ſpices!

O how excellent, how precious, how delectable are thoſe loves of thine, O my ſiſter, my Spouſe! how farre ſurpaſſing all earthly delicates! and the ſavour of thoſe divine vertues, wherewith thou art endued, more pleaſing to my ſent, then all the perfumes in the world!

11. Thy lips, my Spouſe, drop as Honey-combs: Honey and milk are under thy tongue, and the ſavour of thy garments is as the ſavour of Lebanon.

Thy gracious ſpeeches that proceed from thee, are as ſo many drops of the Hony-combe that drop from thy lips: and whether thou exhort, or confeſſe, or pray, or comfort, thy words are both ſweet and nouriſhing; and the ſavour of thy good C works, and outward converſation, is to me as the ſmell of the wood of Lebanon to the ſenſe of man.

12. My Siſter, my Spouſe, is as a garden encloſed, as a Spring ſhut up, and a fountain ſealed up.

My ſiſter, my Spouſe, is as a Garden or Orchard full of all variety of the heavenly Trees and flowers of grace; not lying careleſly open, either to the love of ſtrangers, or to the rage of enemies, which like the wilde Boar out of the wood might root up and deſtroy her choice plants: but ſafely hedged and walled about, by my protection, and reſerved for my delight alone; ſhe is a Spring and Well of wholeſome waters, from whom flow forth the pure ſtreames of my Word; but, both encloſed and D ſealed up; partly, that ſhe may the better (by this cloſeneſſe) preſerve her own naturall taſte and vigour, from the corruptions of the world; and partly, that ſhe may not be defiled and mudded by the prophane feet of the wicked.

13. Thy plants are as an Orchard of Pomegranats with ſweet fruits: as Cypers, Spikenard, even Spikenard and Saffron, Calamus and Cinnamon, with all the trees of Incenſe, Myrrh and Aloes, with all the chief ſpices.

Thou art an Orchard, yea a Paradiſe, whoſe plants (which are thy faithfull children that grow up in thee) are as Pomegranate Trees; the Apples whereof are eſteemed for the largeneſſe, colour and taſte, above all other: or (if I would feed my other ſenſes) the plentifull fruits of thy holy obedience (which thou yeeldeſt unto me) are E for their ſmell, as ſome compoſition of Cypreſſe, Spikenard, Saffron, ſweet Cane, Cinnamon, Incenſe, Myrrh, Aloes, and whatſoever elſe may be deviſed, unto the moſt perfect ſent.

14. O fountain of the gardens, O Well of living waters, and the ſprings of Lebanon.

Thou art ſo a Spring in my Garden, that the ſtreams which are derived from thee, water all the gardens of my particular congregations, all the world over: thou art that Fountain, from whoſe pure head iſſue all thoſe living waters, which who ſo drinketh ſhall never thirſt again; even ſuch clear currents, as flow from the hill of Libanus, which like unto another Jordan, water all the Iſrael of God.

15. Ariſe, O North, and come, O South, and blow on my garden, that the ſpices thereof may flow out: let my Well-beloved come to his garden, and eat his pleaſant fruit.

IF I be a garden, as thou ſayeſt, (O my Saviour) then ariſe, O all yee ſoveraigne winds of the Spirit of God, and breath upon this garden of my ſoule, that the ſweet odours of theſe my plants may both be increaſed, and may alſo be diſperſed afarre, and carried into the noſtrils of my Well-beloved: and ſo let him come into his own garden (which his own hand hath digged, planted, watred) and accept of the fruit of that ſervice and praiſe, which he ſhall inable me to bring forth to his Name.

CHAP. V.

CHRIST.

1. I am come into my garden, my ſiſter, my Spouſe: I gathered my Myrrh with my ſpice; I ate my Hony with my Hony-combe, I dranke my wine with my milke: eat, O my friends: drinke, and make you merry, O Well-beloved.

BEhold, according to thy deſire, I am come into my garden, O my ſiſter, my Spouſe; I have received thoſe fruits of thine obedience which thou offeredſt unto me, with much joy and pleaſure. I have accepted not only of thy good works, but thy endevours and purpoſes of holineſſe, both which are as pleaſant to me, as the Hony and the Hony-combe. I have allowed of the cheerfulneſſe of thy ſervice, and the wholeſomneſſe of thy doctrine. And ye, O my friends, whether bleſſed Angels, or faithfull men, partake with me in this joy ariſing from the faithfulneſſe of my Church: cheer up and fill your ſelves O my beloved, with the ſame Spirituall dainties wherewith I am refreſhed.

The Church.

2. I ſleep, but my heart waketh: it is the voyce of my Well-beloved that knocketh, ſaying, Open unto me my ſiſter, my Love, my Dove, my undefiled: for mine head is full of dew, and my locks with the drops of the night.

WHen the world had caſt me into a ſecure ſleep, or ſlumber rather (for my heart was not utterly bereaved of a true faith in my Saviour) even in this darkneſſe of my minde, it pleaſed my gracious Redeemer not to neglect me; he came to me, and knocked oft, and called importunately at the door of my heart, by his word and chaſtiſements, and ſaid, Open the door of thy ſoule, O my ſiſter, my deare, chaſte, comely, unſpotted Church: let me come in, and lodge and dwell with thee, in my graces; ſhut out the world, and receive me with a more lively act, and renovation of thy faith. For loe, I have long waited patiently for this effect of thy love, and have endured all the injuries both of the night, and weather of thy provocations, that I might at laſt enjoy thee.

3. I have put off my coat: how ſhall I put it on? I have waſhed my feet: how ſhall I defile them?

I anſwered him again, pleading excuſes for my delay; Alas, Lord, I have now, ſince I left my forward profeſſion of thee, avoided a great number of cares and ſorrowes: muſt I take them up again to follow thee? I have lived clean from the ſoile of theſe evils: and ſhall I now thruſt my ſelfe into danger of them?

4. My Well-beloved put his hand from the hole of the door, and my bowels yearned toward him.

When my Saviour heard this unkind anſwer of delay, he let his hand fall from the key-hole, which he had thus before without ſucceſſe laboured about; and withdrew himſelf from ſoliciting me any more: whereupon my heart & bowels yearned within me for him, and for the remorſe of my ſo long foreſlowing his admittance unto me.

5. I

A 5. I roſe up to open to my Well-beloved, and my hands did drop down Myrrh, and my fingers pure Myrrh upon the handles of the Barres.

And now I rouzed up my drouſie heart (what I could) that I might in ſome cheerfull manner deſire to receive ſo gracious a Saviour: which when I but endeavoured, I found that he had left behinde him ſuch a plentifull bleſſing (as the monument of his late preſence) upon the firſt motions of my heart, as that with the very touch of them I was both exceedingly refreſhed, and moved to further indignation at my ſelfe for delaying him.

6. I opened to my Well-beloved: but my Well-beloved was gone and paſt; mine heart was gone when he did ſpeak: I ſought him, but I could not finde him; I called him, but he anſwered me not.

B I opened to my beloved Saviour: but my Saviour had now (in my feeling) withdrawn himſelfe, and hid his countenance from me, holding me ſhort of thoſe gracious offers and means which I had refuſed; and now I was almoſt paſt my ſelfe with deſpaire, to remember that ſweet invitation of his, which I neglected: I ſought him therefore in my thoughts, in the outward uſe of his ordinances, and of my earneſt praiers; but he would not as yet be found of me, or let me finde that I was heard of him.

7. The watchmen that went about the City found me, they ſmote me, and wounded me: the watchmen of the wals took away my vaile from me.

C Thoſe which ſhould have regarded me, and by their vigilancy have ſecured me from danger, proved mine adverſaries: in ſtead of comforting me, they fell upon me and wounded me with their falſe doctrines, drawing me on into further errours, ſpoiling me of that purity and ſincerity of profeſſion, wherewith, as with ſome rich and modeſt vaile, I was formerly adorned, and covered.

8. I charge you, O daughters of Ieruſalem, if you finde my Well-beloved, that you tell him I am ſick of love.

I adviſe you ſolemnly, O all ye that wiſh well to me (for I care not who knowes the vehemency of my paſſion) if you ſhall finde my Saviours preſence in your ſelves before me, pray for the recovery of his love to me; and bemoaning my eſtate to D him, tell him how I languiſh with the impatient deſire of his love and preſence to be reſtored unto me.

9. O the faireſt among women, what is thy Well-beloved more then another Well-beloved? what is thy Well-beloved more then another lover, that thou doſt ſo charge us?

O thou which art the moſt happy, moſt gracious, and moſt glorious of all creatures, the choſen of the living God; what is thy Well-beloved whom thou ſeekeſt, above all other the ſonnes of men? what ſuch eminency is there in him above all Saints and Angels, that thou art both ſo farre gone in affection to him? and doſt ſo vehemently adjure us to ſpeak unto him for thee?

E 10. My Well-beloved is white and ruddy, the Standard-bearer of ten thouſand.

My Well-beloved (if you know not) is of perfect beautie; in whoſe face is an exact mixture of the colours of the pureſt and healthfulleſt complexion of holineſſe: for he hath not received the ſpirit by meaſure, and in him the God-head dwels bodily; he is infinitely fairer then all the ſonnes of men; and for goodlineſſe of perſon may beare the Standard of comelineſſe and grace amongſt ten thouſand.

11. His head is as fine Gold, his locks curled, and black as a Raven.

The Deitie which dwelleth in him, is moſt pure and glorious: and that fulneſſe of grace which is communicated to his humane nature, is wondrouſly beautifull, and ſo ſets it forth, as the black curled locks doe a freſh and well favoured countenance.

12. His

12. His eyes are like Doves upon the rivers of waters, which are waſht with Milk, and remain in their fulneſſe.

His judgement of all things, and his reſpect to his Church (which are as his eies) are full of love, and full of piety, ſhining like unto Doves waſhed in water, yea, in Milk, ſo as there is no ſpot or blemiſh to be found in them: and they are withall ſo fully placed, as is both moſt comely and moſt expedient for the perfect ſight of the eſtate, and neceſſities of his ſervants.

13. His cheeks are as a bed of ſpices, and as ſweet Flowers, & his lips like Lillies dropping down pure Myrrh.

The manifeſtation of himſelfe to us in his Word, is ſweet to our ſpirituall feeling, as an heap of ſpice, or thoſe flowers that are uſed to make the beſt perfuming oyntments, are to the other ſenſes: his heavenly inſtructions and promiſes of his Goſpell are unſpeakably comfortable, and plenteous in the grace that is wrought by them.

14. His hands as Rings of gold ſet with the Chryſolite; his belly like white Ivory covered with Saphires.

His actions and his inſtruments (which are his hands) are ſet forth with much pomp and majeſtie, as ſome precious ſtone beautifies the Ring wherein it is ſet: the ſecret counſels of his breſt, and the myſteries of his will, are moſt pure and holy, and full of excellent glory.

15. His legs are as pillars of Marble, ſet upon ſockets of fine gold: his countenance, as Lebanon, excellent as the Cedars.

All his proceedings are firm and ſtable; and withall, as Pillars of Marble ſet in ſockets of tried gold; ſo as they are neither ſubject to wavering, nor to any danger of infirmitie and corruption: the ſhew and carriage of his whole perſon, whereby he makes himſelf known to his choſen, is exceeding goodly and upright, like to the ſtreight and lofty Cedars of Lebanon.

16. His mouth is as ſweet things, and he is wholly delectable: this is my Well beloved, and this is my Lover, O daughters of Ieruſalem.

His mouth, out of which proceedeth innumerable bleſſings & comfortable promiſes, is to my ſoul even ſweetneſſe it ſelf; yea (what ſpeak I of any one part?) as you have heard in theſe particulars; he is all ſweets: there is nothing but comfort in him; and there is no comfort but in him; and this (if he would know) is my Well-beloved; of ſo incomparable glory & worthineſſe, that ye may eaſily diſcern him from all others.

Forraine Congregations.

17. O the faireſt among women, whither is thy Well-beloved gone? Whither is thy Well-beloved turned aſide, that we might ſeek him with thee?

SInce thy (Well-beloved is ſo glorious and amiable, (O thou which art for thy beauty, worthy to bee the Spouſe of ſuch an husband) tell us (for thou onely knoweſt it; and to ſeek Chriſt without the Church, we know is vaine) tell us where this Saviour of thine is to be fought, that we (raviſhed alſo with the report of his beauty) may joyn with thee in the ſame holy ſtudy of ſeeking after him.

CHAP. VI.

1. My Well-beloved is gone down into his Garden to the beds of ſpices, to feed in the Gardens, and to gather Lillies.

MY Well-beloved Saviour (if you would know this alſo) is to be ſought and found in the particular aſſemblies of his people, which are his Garden of Pleaſure, wherein are varieties of all the beds of renued ſoules; which both he hath planted, and dreſſed by his continuall care, and wherein hee walketh for walketh for his delight; feeding and solacing himselfe with those fruits of righteousnesse and new obedience, which they are able to bring forth unto him.

2. I am my well-beloveds, and my well-beloved is mine, who feedeth among the Lillies.

And now loe, whatsoever hath hapned crosse to me, in my sensible fruition of him; in spight of all tentations, my beloved Saviour is mine through faith; and I am his through his love, and both of us are by an inseparable union knit together; whose conjunction and love is most sweet and happy, for all that are his he feedeth continually with heavenly repast.

CHRIST.

3. Thou art beautifull, my love, as Tirzah, comely as Ierusalem, terrible as an Army with Banners.

NOtwithstanding this thy late blemish of neglecting mee, O my Church: yet still in mine eies, through my grace, upon this thy repentance, thou art beautiful, like unto that neat and elegant City Tirzah, and that orderly building of Jerusalem, the glory of the world: and with this thy lovelinesse, thou art awfull unto thine adversaries, through the power of thy censures, and the majestie of him that dwelleth in thee.

4. Turn away thine eyes from me, for they overcome mee: thine haire is like a flock of Goats which look down from Gilead.

Yea, such beautie is in thee, that I am overcome with the vehemency of my affection to thee: turne away thine eies a while from beholding me; for the strength of that faith, whereby they are fixed upon me, ravisheth me from my self with joy. I doe therefore againe renew thy former praise; that thy gracious profession, and all thy appendances and ornaments of expedient ceremonies are so comely to behold, as it is to see a flock of well-fed Goats grazing upon the fruitfull hils of Gilead.

5. Thy teeth are like a flock of sheep which goe up from the washing, which every one bring out twins and none is barren among them.

Thy Teachers, that chew and prepare the heavenlie food of thy soule, are of sweet accordance one with another, having all one heart, and one tongue; and both themselves are sanctified and purged from their uncleanesse, and are fruitfull in their holy labours unto others: so that their doctrine is never in vaine, but is still answered with plentifull increase of soules to the Church.

6. Thy temples are within thy locks as a peece of a Pomegranate.

That part of thy countenance which thou wilt have seen; (though dimly and sparingly) is full of holy modesty and bashfulnesse: so blushing that it seemeth like the colour of a broken peece of Pomegranate.

7. There are threescore Queenes and fourscore Concubines, and of the Damsells without number.

Let there be never so great a number of People and nations, of Churches and assemblies, which challenge my Name and Love, and perhaps by their outward prosperity, may seem to plead much interest in me, and much worth in themselves.

8. But my Love is alone, and my undefiled, she is the only daughter of her mother, and she is deare to her that bare her: The Daughters have seen her and counted her blessed, even the Queens and Concubines, and they have praised her.

Yet thou onely art alone my true and chaste Spouse, pure and undefiled in the truth of thy doctrine, and the imputation of my holinesse: thou art she whom that Jerusalem which is above, (the mother of us all) acknowledgeth for her only true, and dear daughter. And this is not my commendation alone: but all those forraine assemblies,

assemblies, which might seem to be Rivals with thee of this praise, doe applaud and blesse thee in this thine estate, and say; Blessed is this people, whose God is the Lord.

9. Who is she that looketh forth as the morning, faire as the Moon, pure as the Sun, terrible as an army with banners?

And admiring thy goodlinesse, shall say; Who is this that lookes out so freshly as the morning new risen, which from these weak beginnings is growne to such high perfection, that now she is as bright, and glorious, as the Sun in his full strength, and the Moone in a cleare sky; and withall is so dreadfull through the majesty of her countenance, and power of her censures, as some terrible army, with ensignes displayed, is to a weak adversary?

10. I went down to the dressed Orchard, to see the fruits of the valley, to see if the Vine budded, and if the Pomegranates flourished.

Thou complainedst of my absence, (O my Church:) there was no cause; I meant not to forsake thee; I did but only walk down into the well dressed Orchard of thine assemblies, to recreate and joy my selfe with the view of their forwardnesse, to see the happy progresse of the humble in spirit, and the gracious beginnings of those tender soules, which are newly converted unto me.

11. I knew nothing, my soule set me as the chariots of my noble people.

So earnestly did I long to revisit thee, and to restore comfort unto thee, that I hasted I knew not which way: and with insensible speed I am come back, as it were upon the swiftest chariots, or the wings of the wind.

12. Returne, returne, O Shulamite: return, return, that I may behold thee: what shall you see in the Shulamite, but as the company of an army?

Now therefore returne (O my Spouse, the true daughter of Jerusalem) returne to me, return to thy selfe, and to thy former feeling of my grace: returne, that both my selfe and all the company of Angels, may see and rejoyce in thee: and what shall yee see (O all yee hosts of heaven) what shall ye see in my Church? Even such an awfull grace and majesty, as is in a well-marshalled army, ready to meet with the enemy.

CHAP. VII.

1. How beautiful are thy going with shooes, O Princes daughter? the compasse of thy hips like jewels: the work of the hand of a cunning workman.

HOw beautiful are thy feet, O daughter of the Highest, being shod with the preparation of the Gospell of peace, and readily addressed to run the way of the commandements of thy God! thou art compassed about thy loynes with the girdle of verity; which is both precious for the matter of it, and cunningly framed by the skill of the Spirit of truth.

2. Thy navell is as a round cup, that wanteth not liquor: thy belly is as an heape of wheat compassed about with Lillies.

The navell whereby all thy spirituall conceptions receive their nourishment, is full of all fruitfull supply, and never wants means of sustenance, to feed them in thy wombe: which also is so plenteous in thy blessed increase, that it is as an heap of wheat, consisting of infinite pure graines, which consort together with much sweetnesse and pleasure.

3. Thy two brests are as two young Kids that are twins.

Thy two Testaments (which are thy two full and comely brests, by whose wholesome milke thou nourisheſt all thy faithfull children, once borne into the light) are for their excellent and perfect agreement, and their amiable proportion, like two twins of Kids.

4. Thy neche is like a Tower of Ivory: thine eyes are like artificiall poles in a frequented gate: thy noſe is as the Tower of Lebanon, that looketh toward Damaſcus.

Thoſe, who by their holy authority ſupport thy government, (which are as ſome ſtreight and ſtrong neck to beare up thy head) are for their height and defence, like a Tower; for their order, potenceſſe and dignity, like a Tower of Ivory: thy Teachers and Miniſters (which are thine eyes) are like unto ſome cleare and artificiall ponds of water, in a place of greateſt reſort: wherin all commers may ſee the faces of their conſciences, & whence they may plentifully draw the Waters of life. Thy noſe, by which all ſpirituall ſents are conveyed to thee, is perfectly compoſed, and featured like ſome curious Turret of that goodly houſe in Lebanon; ſo as thy judgement, and power of diſcerning the ſpirits, is admirable for the order and excellencie thereof.

5. Thine head upon thee is as ſcarlet, and the buſh of thine head like purple: the King is tied in thy beames.

The whole tyre of thine head (which are the ceremonies uſed by thee) are very gracefull, and of high eſtimation and price to all the beholders: and as for me, I am ſo enamoured of thee, that I am even tied by my owne deſire, to a perpetuall preſence in thine holy aſſemblies.

6. How faire art thou, and how pleaſant art thou, O my Love, in pleaſures!

Oh how beautifull and lovely art thou therefore (O my Church) in all thy parts and ornaments! how ſweet and pleaſant art thou (O my Love) in whatſoever might give me true contentment!

7. This thy ſtature is like a Palme-tree; and thy breaſts like cluſters.

Thy whole frame is, for goodlineſſe and ſtreight growth, like unto ſome tall Palme-tree; which the more it is depreſſed by the violence of perſecutions, riſeth the more; and the two breſts of thy Teſtaments are like two full juycy cluſters, which yeeld comfortable and abundant refreſhing.

8. I ſaid, I will goe up into the Palme-tree, I will take hold of her boughes: thy breaſts ſhall now be like the cluſters of the Vines, and the ſavour of thy noſe like Apples.

Seeing then thou art my Palme-tree, I have reſolved in my ſelfe to adjoyne my ſelfe to thee; to enjoy thee, to gather thoſe ſweet fruits of thy graces, which thou yeeldeſt; and by my preſence alſo will cauſe thee to be more plentifull in all good workes, and doctrine; ſo as thou ſhalt afford abundance of heavenly liquor unto all the thirſty ſouls of thy children; and an acceptable verdure of holineſſe and obedience unto me.

9. And the roofe of thy mouth like good wine, which goeth ſtraight up to my Well-beloved, and cauſeth the lips of him that is aſleepe, to ſpeake.

And the delivery of my Word, by the mouthes of my Miniſters, ſhall be as ſome excellent wine, which ſparkleth right upward: being well accepted of that God in whoſe name it is taught, and looketh moſt pleaſantly in the glaſſe, being no leſſe highly eſteemed of the receivers: which is of ſuch wonderfull power, that it is able to put words both of repentance, and praiſe, into the lips of him that lies aſleepe in his ſins.

The Church.

10. I am my Well-beloveds, and his deſire is toward me.

BEhold, ſuch as I am, I am not mine owne; much leſſe am I any others: I am wholly my Saviours: and now I ſee, and feele, whatſoever I had deſerved, that he is mine alſo in all intire affection; who hath both choſen me, and given himſelfe for me.

11. Come, my Well-beloved, let us goe into the fields, let us lodge in the villages.

Come therefore, O my deare Saviour, let us joyne together in our naturall care: let thy Spirit and my ſervice be intent upon thy Congregations here below on earth: and let us ſtay in the place where our ſpirituall Husbandry lieth.

12. Let us goe up early in the morning to the Vines, and ſee if the Vine flouriſh, whether it hath diſcloſed the firſt Grapes, or whether the Pomegranats bloſſome: there will I give thee my love.

Let us with all haſte and cheerfulneſſe viſit the fruitfull vines of our beleeving children; and to our mutuall comfort, be witneſſes and partakers of all the ſignes and fruits of grace, of all thoſe good works; and thankſgivings, of thoſe holy endevours and worthy practices, which they yeeld forth unto us: let us judge of their forwardneſſe, and commend it: whereupon it will eaſily appeare, that the conſummation of our happy mariage draweth neare, in which there ſhall be a perfect union betwixt us.

13. The Mandrakes have given a ſmell, and in our gates, are all ſweet things new and old, my Well-beloved, I have kept them for thee.

Behold, thy godly ſervants which not only beare fruit themſelves, but are powerfull in the provocation of others, preſent their beſt ſervices unto thee; and even at our doores (not far to ſeeke, not hard to procure) is offer made unto thee, of all variety of fruit; whether from thy young Converts, or thy more ſetled Profeſſors: and all theſe I ſpend not laviſhly; but in my loving care, duly reſerve them for thee; and for the ſolemne day of our full mariage.

CHAP. VIII.

The Iewiſh Church.

1. Oh that thou wereſt as my brother that ſucked the breſt of my mother! I would find thee without; I would kiſſe thee, then they ſhould not deſpiſe me.

OH that I might ſee thee (my Saviour) clothed in fleſh! Oh that thou which art my everlaſting Husband, mighteſt alſo be my Brother, in partaking the ſame humane nature with me; that ſo I finding thee below upon earth, might familiarly entertaine thee, and converſe with thee, without reproach of the world; yea, might be exalted in thy glory!

2. I will lead thee, and bring thee into my mothers houſe; there thou ſhalt teach me: I will cauſe thee to drink ſpiced wine, and new of the Pomegranats.

Then would I (though I be now pent up in the limits of Judæa) bring thee forth into the light and knowledge of the univerſall Church, whoſe daughter I am: and then and there, thou ſhouldeſt teach me how perfectly to ſerve and worſhip thee, and I ſhall gladly entertaine thee with a royall feaſt of the beſt graces that are in my holieſt ſervants; which I know thou wilt account better cheere, then all the ſpiced cups, and Pomegranat wines in the world.

3. His left hand ſhall be under my head, and his right hand ſhall embrace me.

Then ſhall I attaine to a nearer communion with him; and both his hands ſhall be employed to ſuſtaine, and relieve me: yea, he ſhall comfort my head and my heart (my judgement, and affections) with the lively heat of his gracious embracements.

4. I charge you, O daughters of Ieruſalem, that you ſtirre not up, nor waken my Love, untill he pleaſe.

I charge you (O all ye that profeſſe any friendſhip to me) I charge you deeply, as ye will avoid my uttermoſt cenſures; take heed how ye vex and diſquiet my mercifull Saviour, and grieve his Spirit: and doe not dare, by the leaſt provocation of him, to interrupt his peace.

CHRIST.

CHRIST.

5. Who is this that commeth out of the Wilderneſſe, leaning upon her Well-beloved? I raiſed thee up under an Apple-tree: there thy mother conceived thee: there ſhe conceived that bare thee.

WHo is this, that from the comfortleſſe deſerts of ignorance, of infidelity, of tribulations, aſcendeth thus up into the glorious light and liberty of my choſen? relying her ſelfe wholly upon her Saviour, and ſolacing her ſelfe in him? Is it not my Church? It is ſhe, whom I have loved, and acknowledged of old: for even under the tree of offence, the forbidden fruit which thou taſtedſt to thy deſtruction, I raiſed thee up againe from death; Even there, thy firſt mother conceived thee; while by faith ſhe laid hold on that bleſſed promiſe of the Goſpell, whereby ſhe and her beleeving ſeed were reſtored.

The Iewiſh Church.

6. Set me as a ſeale on thy heart, and as a ſignet on thine arme: for love is ſtrong as death; Iealouſie is cruell as the Grave: the coales thereof are fiery coales, and a vehement flame.

AND ſo have thou me ſtill (O my Saviour) in a perpetuall and deare remembrance: keepe me ſure in thine heart, yea in thine armes, as that which thou holdeſt moſt precious: and let me never be removed from thy love; the leaſt ſhew and danger whereof I cannot endure: for this my ſpirituall love is exceeding powerfull, and can no more be reſiſted then death it ſelfe: and the jealous zeale which I have for thee and thy glory, conſumes me, even like the Grave, and burnes me up like unto the coales of ſome moſt vehement and extreme fire.

7. Much water cannot quench love, neither can the floods drowne it: if a man ſhould give all the ſubſtance of his houſe for love, they would greatly contemne it.

Yea, more then any fire; for any flame yet may be quenched with water: but all the water of afflictions and terrors (yea, whole ſtreames of perſecutions) cannot quench this love: and for all tempting offers of wealth, of pleaſures and honour, how eaſily are they all contemned for the love of my Saviour?

8. We have a little ſiſter, and ſhe hath no breſts: what ſhall we doe for our ſiſter when ſhe ſhall be ſpoken for?

We have a ſiſter (as thou knoweſt, O Saviour ordained through thy mercy, to the ſame grace with me: the uncalled Church of the Gentiles; ſmall (as yet) of growth through the rareneſſe of her Converts, and deſtitute of the help of any outward miniſtery, whereby ſhe might either beare, or nouriſh children unto thee: when ſhe growes unto her maturity; and the myſtery of calling her univerſally to thee, ſhall be revealed to the world, and her ſelfe: what courſe will it pleaſe thee to take with her?

CHRIST.

9. If ſhe be a wall, we will build upon her a ſilver Palace: and if ſhe be a doore, we will keep her in with boords of cedar.

IF ſhe ſhall continue firme and conſtant, in the expectation of her promiſes, and the profeſſion of that truth which ſhall be revealed; we will beautifie and ſtrengthen her with further grace, and make her a pure and coſtly Palace, fit to entertaine my Spirit: and if ſhe will give free paſſage and good entrance, to my word and grace, we will make her ſure and ſafe from corruption, and reſerve her to immortality.

The Iewiſh Church.

10. I am a Wall, and my breſts are towers: then was I in his eyes as one that findeth peace.

BEhold: that condition which thou requireſt in the Church of the Gentiles, thou findeſt in me; I am thus firme and conſtant in my expectation, in my profeſſion: and that want thou findeſt in her, of ability to nouriſh her Children, by the breſt of thy Word, is not in me; who have abundance both of nouriſhment and de- A fence: upon which my confeſſion and plea, I found grace and peace in the eyes of my Saviour; and received from him aſſurance of his everlaſting love to me.

CHRIST.

11. Salomon had a Vine in Baalhamon: he gave the Vineyard unto keepers: every one bringeth for the fruit thereof a thouſand pieces of ſilver.

MY Church is my Vine, and I am the Owner and Husbandman: our thrift and profit thereof farre exceedeth the good Husbandry of Salomon: he hath a rich Vineyard indeed in a moſt fruitfull ſoyle; but he lets it forth to the hands of others, as not being able to keepe and dreſſe it himſelfe: and therefore he is faine to B be content with the greateſt part of the increaſe, not expecting the whole.

12. But my Vineyard which is mine, is before me: to thee O Salomon appertaineth a thouſand pieces of ſilver, and two hundred to them that keepe the fruit thereof.

But my Vine is ever before me, I am with it to the end of the world, I reſerve it in mine owne hands, and dreſſe it with mine owne labour: and therefore if thou (O Salomon) canſt receive from thine, to the proportion of a thouſand, thy workmen and farmers will looke for the fift part to come unto their ſhare; whereas the gaine of my Vineyard ariſeth wholly, and only unto my ſelfe.

13. O thou that dwelleſt in the gardens, the companions harken unto thy voyce, cauſe me to heare it. C

Sith therefore ſuch is my care of thee, and joy in thee (O my Church, which conſiſteſt of the particular aſſemblies of men profeſſing my Name) ſee thou be diligent in declaring my will, and giving holy counſels to all my fellow-members: ſpeak forth my praiſe in the great congregations (which all attend willingly upon thee) and let me heare the voyce of thy conſtant and faithfull confeſſion of me before the world.

The Church.

14. Oh my Well-beloved, flee away and be like unto the Roe, or to the young Hart upon the Mountaine of ſpices. D

TO THE HIGH AND MIGHTY PRINCE HENRY, PRINCE OF GREAT BRITAINE, Sonne and Heire Apparant to our Soveraigne Lord, JAMES, King of GREAT BRITAINE, &c. All glory in either world.

Most Gracious Prince:

IT is not from any conceit of such worth in my labours, that they durst looke so high. A lower patronage would have served an higher work. It were well if ought of mine could be worthy of popular eyes; Or if I could wring ought from my selfe not unworthy of a judicious Reader. I know your Highnes wants neither presents, nor counsels: presents from strangers, counsels from your Teachers; neither of them matchable by my weaknesse: onely duty herein excuseth me from presumption. For, I thought it injustice to devote the fruit of my labours to any other hand beside my Masters: which also I knew to be as gracious, as mine is faithfull. Yet (since even good affections cannot warrant too much vilenesse in gifts to Princes) lest, while my modesty disparages my worke, I should hazard the acceptation; here shall your Grace find variety, not without profit. I hate a Divine that would but please; and withall, think it impossible for a man to profit, that pleaseth not. And if, while my stile fixeth it self upon others, any any ſpirituall profit ſhall reflect upon your Highneſſe, how happy am I! who ſhall ever thinke, I have lived to purpoſe, (if by the beſt of my ſtudies) I ſhall have done any good office to your ſoule. Further, (which theſe times account not the leaſt praiſe) your Grace ſhall herein perceive a new faſhion of diſcourſe, by Epiſtles; new to our language, uſuall to others: and (as Novelty is never without plea of uſe) more free, more familiar. Thus, we doe but talke with our friends by our pen, and expreſſe our ſelves no whit leſſe eaſily; ſomewhat more digeſtedly.

VVhatſoever it is, as it cannot be good enough to deſerve that countenance; ſo, the countenance of ſuch Patronage ſhall make it worthy of reſpect from others. The God of Princes protect your perſon, perfect your graces, and give you as much favour in Heaven as you have honour on earth.

Your Graces
humbly-devoted ſervant,
JOS: HALL.

Epist. I. Expostulating for his departure, and perswading his returne.

HOw unhappily is my stile changed! Alas, that to a friend, to a brother, I must write as to an Apostate, to an adversary! Doth this seem harsh? You have turned it, by being turned your selfe. Once the same wals held us in one loving Society; the same Dioceſſe, in one honorable function. Now, not one land, and (which I lament) not one Church. You are gone, we stand and wonder. For a sheep, to stray through simplicity, is both ordinary and lamentable: but, for a Shepherd is more rare, more scandalous. I dare not presume overmuch, upon an appeale to a blinded conscience. Those that are newly come from a bright candle into a dark roome, are so much more blinde, as their light was greater; and the pureſt Ivorie turneth with fire into the deepeſt black. Tell us yet by your old ingenuity, and by those sparks of good which yet (I hope) lie covered under your cold ashes, tell us, what divided you? Your motives shall once be scanned before an higher barre. Shame not to have the weake eyes of the world see that, which once your undeceivable Iudge shall see and censure. What saw you, what heard you anew, that might offer violence to a resolved mind, and make it either to alter, or suspend? If your reasons be invincible, informe us, that we may follow you: but if (as they are) slight and feeble, returne you to us: returne, and think it no shame to have erred, just shame to continue erring. What such goodly beauty saw you in that painted, but ill-favoured Strumpet, that should thus bewitch you, so to forget your selfe and contemne the chaste love of the Spouse of your Saviour? I saw her at the same time in her gayest dresse: Let my soule never prosper, if I could see any thing worthy to command affection. I saw, and scorned: you saw, and adored. Would God your adoration were as farre from superstition, as my scorne from impietie. That God judge betwixt us, whether herein erred: yea, let men judge, that are not drunk with those Babylonish dregs! How long might an indifferent eye looke upon the comicall and mimick actions in those your ministers that should be sacred, (your magicall exorcismes, your clericall shavings, your uncleanly unctions, your crossings, creepings, censings, sprinklings, your coozning miracles, garish processions, burning of noone-day, christning of bels, marting of pardons, toſſing of beads, your superstitious hallowing of candles, wax, ashes, palmes, chrisme, garments, roses, swords, water, salt, the Pontificall Solemnities of your great Master, and what ever your new mother hath, besides, plausible) before he should see ought, in all these, worthy of any other entertainement, then contempt! Who can but disdaine, that these things should procure any wise proselyte? Cannot your owne memory recount those truly religious spirits, which having sought Rome as resolved Papists, have left the world as holy Martyrs, dying for the detestation of that which they came to adore? Whence this? They heard and magnified that, which they now saw and abhorred. Their fire of zeale brought them to the flames of Martyrdome. Their innocent hopes promised them Religion: they found nothing but a pretence; promised devotion, and behold, idolatry; they saw, hated, suffered, and now reigne; whiles you wilfully and unbidden, will loſe your soule, where others meant to loſe, and have found it. Your zeale dies, where theirs began to live:

you

you like to live, where they would but die. They shall comfort us, for you: they shall once stand up against you: While they would rather die in the heat of that fire, then live in the darkenesse of their errors; you rather die in the Egyptian darkenesse of errors then live in the pleasant light of Truth: yea, I feare, rather in another fire, then this Light.

Alas! what shall we looke for of you? Too late repentance, or obstinate error? Both miserable. A Spira, or a Staphylus? Your friends, your selfe shall wish you rather unborne, then either.

O thou, which art the great Shepheard, great in power, great in mercy, which leavest the ninetie and nine to reduce one, fetch home, if thy will be, this thy forlorne charge: fetch him home, drive him home to thy Fold, though by shame, though by death. Let him once recover thy Church, thou him, it is enough. Our common Mother I know not whether more pities your losse, or disdains thus to be robb'd of a son not for the need of you, but her owne pietie, her own love. For, how many troops of better informed soules hath she every day returning into her lap; now breathing from their late Antichristianisme, and embracing her knees upon their owne? She lamens you, not for that she feares she shall misse you, but for that she knowes you shall want her. See you her teares, and doe but pitie your selfe, as much as she you. And from your Mother; to descend to your Nurse: Is this the fruit of such education? Was not your youth spent in a societie of comely order, strict government, wise lawes, religious care (it was ours; yet let me praise it, to your shame) as may justly challenge (after all brags) either Rhemes or Doway, or if your Jesuits have any other den more cleanly, and more worthy of ostentation? And could you come out, fresh and unseasoned, from the middest of those salt waves? Could all those heavenly showers fall besides you; while you, like a Gedeons fleece, want moisture? Shall none of those divine principles, which your youth seemed to drink in, check you in your new errors? Alas! how unlike are you to your selfe, to your name? Iacob wrestled with an Angell, and prevailed: you grapple but with a Jesuit, and yeeld. Iacob supplanted his brother: and Esau hath supplanted you. Iacob changed his name for a better by a valiant resistance: you by your cowardly yeelding, have lost your owne. Iacob strove with God, for a blessing: I feare to say it, you against him, for a curse; for, no common measure of hatred or ordinarie opposition, can serve a revolter. Either you must be desperately violent, or suspected. The mighty One of Israel (for he can doe it) raise you fallen, returne you wandred, and give you grace at last to shame the Devill, to forsake your stepmother, to acknowledge your true Parent, to satisfie the World, to save your owne soule. If otherwise, I will say of you, as Ieremy of his Israelites (if not rather with more indignation) My soule shall weepe in secret for your revolt, and mine eyes shall drop downe teares, because one of the Lords flock is carried away captive.

Emanuel Colledge in Cambridge.

EPIST. II. Of the contempt of the world.

MY Lord: my tongue, my pen, and my heart, are all your servants: when you cannot heare me through distance, you must see me in my Letters. You are now in the Senate of the Kingdome, or in the concourse of the citie, or perhaps (though more rarely) in the royall face of the Court. All of them, places fit for your place. From all these, let me call off your mind to her home above; and in the middest of businesse, shew your rest: If I may not rather commend, then admonish, and before-hand confesse my counsell superfluous, because your holy forwardnesse hath prevented it. You can afford these, but halfe of your selfe: The better part is better bestowed: Your soule is still retired, and reserved. You have learned to vouchsafe ſiteth ſe worldly things, uſe, without affection; and know to diſtinguiſh wiſely, betwixt a Stoicall dulneſſe, and a Chriſtian contempt: and have long made the world, not your God, but your ſlave. And in truth (that I may looſe my ſelfe into a bold and free diſcourſe) what other reſpect is it worthy of? I would adore it on my face, if I could ſee any Majeſtie that might command veneration. Perhaps it loves me not ſo much, as to ſhew me his beſt. I have ſought it enough: and have ſeene what others have doated on, and wondered at their madneſſe. So may I looke to ſee better things above, as I never could ſee ought here, but vanitie and vileneſſe.

What is fame, but ſmoake? and metall, but droſſe? and pleaſure, but a pill in ſugar? Let ſome Gallants condemne this, as the voice of a Malancholike Scholler: I ſpeake that which they ſhall feele, and ſhall confeſſe. Though I never was ſo, I have ſeene ſome as happy as the world could make them: and yet I never ſaw any more diſcontented. Their life hath been neither longer, nor ſweeter, nor their heart lighter, nor their meales heartier, nor their nights quieter, nor their cares fewer, nor their complaints. Yea, we have knowne ſome that have loſt their mirth when they have found wealth; and at once have ceaſed to be merry and poore. All theſe earthly delights, if they were ſound, yet how ſhort they are! and if they could be long, yet how unſound! If they were ſound, they are but as a good day betweene two agues, or a ſun-ſhine betwixt two tempeſts. And if they were long, their honey is exceeded by their gall. This ground beares none but maples, hollow and fruitleſſe; or, like the banks of the dead Sea, a faire apple, which under a red ſide containes nothing but duſt. Every flower in this garden either pricks or ſmels ill. If it be ſweet, it hath thornes: and if it have no thornes, it annoyes us with an ill ſent. Goe then, ye wiſe idolatrous Paraſites, and erect ſhrines, and offer ſacrifices to your God, the world, and ſeeke to pleaſe him with your baſe and ſervile devotions: it ſhall be long enough ere ſuch religion ſhall make you happy. You ſhall at laſt forſake thoſe altars, empty and ſorrowfull. How eaſy is it for us Chriſtians, thus to inſult over the worlding, that thinks himſelfe worthy of envie? How eaſie to turne off the world with a ſcornefull repulſe; and when it makes us the Devils proſer, All theſe will I give thee, to return Peters anſwer, Thy ſilver and thy gold periſh with thee? How eaſie to account none ſo miſerable, as thoſe that are rich with injurie, and grow great by being conſcious of ſecret evils? Wealth and honour, when it comes upon the beſt tearmes, is but vaine; but, when upon ill conditions, burdenſome. When they are at the beſt, they are ſcarce friends: but, when at the worſt, tormenters. Alas, how ill agrees a gay coat, and a feſtered heart? What availes an high title, with an hell in the ſoule? I admire the faith of Moſes: but, preſuppoſing his faith, I wonder not at his choice. He preferred the afflictions of Iſrael, to the pleaſures of Ægypt; and choſe rather to eat the Lamb, with ſowre herbs, then all their fleſh-pots: for how much better is it to be miſerable then guiltie? and what compariſon is there betwixt ſorrow and ſinne? If it were poſſible, let me rather be in hell without ſinne, then on earth wickedly glorious. But how much are ye bound to God, that allowes us earthly favours without this oppoſition! That God hath made you at once honourable and juſt, and your life pleaſant and holy, and hath given you an high eſtate with a good heart; are favours, that look for thanks. Theſe muſt be acknowledged, not reſted in: They are yet higher thoughts that muſt perfect your contentment.

What God hath given you, is nothing to that he meanes to give: He hath bin liberall; but he wil be munificent. This is not ſo much as the taſte of a full cup. Faſten your eyes upon your future glory, and ſee how meanly you ſhall eſteeme theſe earthly graces. Here you command but a little pittance of mould (great indeed, to us; little, to the whole:) there, whole heaven ſhall be yours. Here you command, but as a ſubject: there you ſhall raigne as a King. Here, you are obſerved; but ſometimes with your juſt diſtaſte: there ſhall you raigne with peace, and joy. Here, you are noble among men; there, glorious amongſt Angels. Here, you want not honour; but you want not croſſes: there, is nothing but felicitie. Here, you have ſome ſhort joyes: there, is nothing but eternitie. You are a ſtranger, here; there, at home. Here, Satan tempts you, and men vex you: there, Saints and Angels ſhall applaud you; and God ſhall fill you with himſelfe. In a word, you are onely bleſſed here, for that you ſhall be.

These are thoughts worthy of greatnesse: which if we suffer either imployments or pleasures to thrust out of our doores, we doe wilfully make our selves comfortlesse. Let these still season your mirth, and sweeten your sorrowes, and ever interpose themselves betwixt you and the world. These onely can make your life happie, and your death welcome.

To my Lord HAY, H. and P.

EPIST. III. Of true Honour.

MY Lord, it is safe to complaine of Nature where Grace is; and to magnifie Grace, where it is at once had, and affected. It is a fault of Nature, and not the least, that as she hath dimme eyes, so they are mis-placed. She lookes still, either forward or downeward, forward to the object she desires, or downeward to the meanes: never turnes her eye either backward, to see what she was; or upward, to the cause of her good: whence, it is just with God to with-hold what he would give, or to curse that which he bestowes; and to besot carnall minds with outward things, in their value, in their desire, in their use: whereas true wisedome hath cleare eyes, and right set; and therefore sees an invisible hand in all sensible events, effecting all things, directing all things to their due end; sees on whom to depend, whom to thank. Earth is too low and too base, to give bounds unto a spirituall sight. No man then can truly know what belongs to wealth, or honour, but the gracious; either how to compasse them, or how to prize them, or how to use them. I care not how many thousand waies there are to seeming-honour, besides this of vertue: they all (if more) still lead to shame: or what plots are devised to improve it; if they were as deepe as hell, yet their end is losse. As there is no counsell against God, so there is no honour without him. He inclines the hearts of Princes to favour; the hearts of inferiours to applause. Without him, the hand cannot move to successe; nor the tongue to praise: And what is honour without these? In vaine doth the world frowne upon the man, whom her meanes to honour; or smile, where he would disgrace. Let me then tell your Lordship, who are favourites in the Court of heaven; even whiles they wander on earth: yet, let the great King himselfe tell you, Those that honour me, I will honour. That men have the grace to give honour to God, is an high favour: but because men give honour to God, (as their dutie) that therefore God should give honour to men, is to give, because he hath given. It is a favour of God, that man is honoured of man like himselfe: but that God alloweth of our endeavours as honour to himselfe, is a greater favour then that wherewith he requites it.

This is the goodnesse of our God; The man that serves him, honours him; and whosoever honours him with his service, is crowned with honour. I challenge all times, places, persons: Who ever honoured God, and was neglected? Who hath wilfully dishonoured him, and prospered? Turne over all Records, and see how successe ever blessed the just, after many dangers, after many stormes of resistance, and left their conclusion glorious; how all godlesse plots, in their loose, have at once deceived, shamed, punished their Author. I goe no further: Your owne brest knowes, that your happy experience can herein justifie God. The world hath noted you, for a follower of vertue; and hath seene how fast Honour followed you: whiles you sought favour with the God of heaven, he hath given you favour with his Deputie on earth.

Gods former actions are patterns of his future: He teacheth you what he will doe, by what he hath done. Vnlesse your hand be weary of offering service, he cannot either pull in his hand from rewarding, or hold it out empty. Honour him still, and God pawnes his honour, on not failing you. You cannot distrust him, whom your proofe hath found faithfull. And, whiles you settle your heart in his right course of true glory, laugh, in secret scorne, at the idle endevours of those men, whose policies would out-reach God, and seize upon honour without his leave. (God laughes at them in heaven, it is a safe and holy laughter that followes his.) And pitie the prepostorous

A prepoſterous courſes of them, which make religion but a foot-ſtoole to the ſeat of advancement; which care for all things but heaven; which make the world their ſtanding marke, and doe not ſo much as rove at God. Many had ſped well, if they had begun well, and proceeded orderly.

A falſe method is the bane of many hopefull endevours. God bids us ſeeke firſt his Kingdome; and earthly things ſhall find us unſought. Fooliſh nature firſt ſeekes the world: and if ſhe light on God by the way, it is more then ſhe expects, deſires, cares for; and therefore failes of both, becauſe ſhe ſeeks neither aright. Many had beene great, if they had cared to be good; which now are croſſed in what they would, becauſe they willed not what they ought. If Salomon had made wealth his firſt ſuit, I doubt he had been both poore and fooliſh: now, he asked wiſedome, and gained
B greatneſſe: Becauſe he choſe well, he received what he asked not. O the bounty and fidelity of our God! becauſe we would have the beſt, he gives us all: Earth ſhall wait upon us, becauſe we attend upon heaven.

Goe on, my Lord, goe on happily, to love religion, to practiſe it: let God alone with the reſt. Be you a patterne of vertue; he ſhall make you a Precedent of glory. Never man loſt ought by giving it to God: that liberall hand returnes our gifts, with advantage. Let men, let God ſee that you honour him; and they ſhall heare him proclaime before you, Thus ſhall it be done to the man whom the King will honour.

EP. IV. Of Gratulation, for the hopes of our Prince; with an adviſing apprecation.

SIR, God hath called you to a great and happy charge; You have the cuſtody of our common Treaſure: Neither is there any ſervice comparable to this of yours; whether we regard God, or the world. Our labours oft-times beſtowed upon many, ſcarce profit one: yours, beſtowed upon one, redounds to the profit of many millions. This is a ſummarie way of obliging all the world to you. I encourage you not in your care: you have more comfort in the ſucceſſe of it, then all worlds can give you. The very ſubject of your pains would give an heart to him that hath none. I rather
D congratulate with you our common happineſſe, and the hopes of poſteritie, in that royall and bleſſed iſſue. You have beſt cauſe to be the witneſſe of the rare forwardnes of our gracious Maſter: and I have ſeen enough, to make me think I can never be enough thankfull to God for him. That Princes are fruitfull is a great bleſſing: but, that their children are fruitfull in grace, and not more eminent in place then vertue, is the greateſt favour God can doe to a State. The goodneſſe of a private man is his own; of a Prince, the whole worlds. Their words are Maximes, their actions examples, their examples rules. When I compare them with their royall Fathers, (as I do oft & chearfully) I cannot ſay whether he be more happy in himſelfe, or in them. I ſee both in him, and them; I ſee & wonder, that God diſtributes to naturall Princes gifts proportionable to their greatneſſe. The wiſe Moderator of the world knowes what uſe is of E their parts: he knowes that the head muſt have all the ſenſes that pertain to the whole body: and how neceſſary it is, that inferiours ſhould admire them no leſſe for the excellency of their graces, then for the ſway of their authority. Whereupon it is, that he gives heroicall qualities to Princes; and as he hath beſtowed upon them his owne name, ſo alſo he gives them ſpeciall ſtamps of his owne glorious Image. Amongſt all other verutes, what a comfort is it to ſee thoſe years, and thoſe ſpirits ſtoop ſo willingly to devotion? Religion is growne too ſevere a Miſtreſſe for young and high courages to attend. Very rare is that Nobilitie of blood, that doth not challenge liberty; and that liberty, that ends not in looſeneſſe. Loe, this example teacheth our Gallants, how wel even Majeſty can ſtand with homage; Majeſty to men, with homage to God.

Farre be it from me, to do that which my next clauſe ſhall condemne: but I think it ſafe to ſay, that ſeldom ever thoſe years have promiſed, ſeldome have performed ſo much. Only God keep two miſchiefes ever from within the ſmoak of his Court; Flattery and Treachery: The iniquitie of times may make us feare theſe; not his inclination. For, whether as Engliſh, or as men, it hath been ever familiar to us, to fawne upon Princes: Though, what do I beſtow two names upon one vice, but attired in two ſundry ſuits of evill? For, Flattery is no other then gilded treaſon; nothing elſe but poiſon in gold: This evill is more tame; not leſſe dagerous. It had been better for many great ones not to have been, then to have been in their conceits more then men. This, Flattery hath done; and what can it not? That other, Treachery, ſpils the bood; this, the vertues of Princes. That takes them from others: this bereaves them of themſelves. That, in ſpight of the actors, doth but change their Crowne: this ſteales it from them for ever. Who can but wonder, that reads of ſome not unwiſe Princes ſo bewitched with the inchantments of their Paraſites, that they have thought themſelves Gods immortall, and have ſuffered themſelves ſo ſtiled, ſo adored? Neither Temples nor Statues, nor Sacrifices have ſeemed too much glory to the greatneſſe of their ſelf-love. Now none of all their actions could be either evill, or unbeſeeming; nothing could proceed from them worthy of cenſure, unworthy of admiration: Their very ſpots have been beauty, their humours juſtice, their errours witty, their Paradoxes divine, their exceſſes heroicall. O the damnable ſervilitie of falſe minds! which perſwade others of that which themſelves laugh to ſee beleeved. O the dangerous credulitie of ſelfe-love! which entertaines all advantages if never ſo evill, never ſo impoſſible. How happy a ſervice ſhall you doe to this whole world of ours, if you ſhall ſtill ſettle in that Princely mind a true apprehenſion of himſelfe; and ſhall teach him to take his owne height aright; and even from his childhood to hate a Paraſite, as the worſt Traitor: To breake thoſe falſe glaſſes, that would preſent him a face, not his owne: To applaud plaine truth, and bend his browes upon exceſſive praiſes. Thus affected, he may bid vice doe her worſt. Thus ſhall he ſtrive with vertue, whether ſhall more honour each other. Thus ſincere and ſolid glory ſhall every where follow, and crown him. Thus, when he hath but his due, he ſhall have ſo much, that he ſhall ſcorne to borrow the falſe colours of adulation. Goe on happily in this worthy and noble employment. The work cannot but ſucceed, that is furthered with ſo many praiers.

To Sir THOMAS CHALLONER.

EPIST. V. A report of ſome Obſervations in my Travell.

SIR, beſides my hopes, not my deſires, I travelled of late; for knowledge partly, and partly for health. There was nothing that made not my journey pleaſant, ſave the labour of the way: which yet was ſo ſweetly deceived, by the ſocietie of Sir Edmund Bacon, (a Gentleman truly honourable, beyond all titles) that I found ſmall cauſe to complaine. The Sea brookt not me, nor I it; an unquiet element, made onely for wonder and uſe, not for pleaſure. Alighted once from that woodden conveyance, and uneven way, I bethought my ſelfe how fondly our life is committed to an unſteadie and reeling peece of wood, fickle winds, reſtleſſe waters; while we may ſet foot on ſtedfaſt and conſtant earth. Loe, then every thing taught me, every thing delighted me; ſo ready are we to be affected with thoſe forraine pleaſures, which at home we ſhould over-look. I ſaw much, as one might in ſuch a ſpan of earth, in ſo few moneths. The time favoured me: for, now newly had the key of peace opened thoſe parts which warre had before cloſed; cloſed (I ſay) to all Engliſh, ſave either fugitives or captives. All civill occurrences (as what faire Cities, what ſtrange faſhions, entertainments, dangers, delights we found) are fit for other eares, and winter evenings. What I noted, as a Divine within the ſphere of my profeſſion, my paper ſhall not ſpare in ſome part to report; and that to your ſelf, which have paſſed a longer way, with more happy fruit of obſervation. Even little ſtreames empty themſelves into great Rivers, and they againe into the Sea. Neither do I deſire to tell you what you know not: it ſhall be ſufficient that I relate ought which others ſhall think memorable.

Along

A long our way, how many Churches saw we demolished! Nothing left, but rude heapes, to tell the passenger, there hath been both devotion and hostility. O the miserable foot-steps of war, besides bloodshed, ruine, and desolation! Fury hath done that there, which Covetousnesse would do with us; would doe, but shall not. The truth within, shall save the walls without. And, to speak truly (what-ever the vulgar exclaime) Idolatry pull'd downe those walls; not rage. If there had beene no Hollander to raze them, they should have fallen alone, rather then hide so much impiety under their guilty roofe. These are spectacles, not so much of cruelty, as justice. Cruelty of man, Justice of God. But (which I wondred at) Churches fall, and Jesuites Colleges rise, every where. There is no City, where those are not either rearing or built. Whence commeth this? Is it, for that devotion is not so necessary as policy? Those men (as we say of the Fox) fare best, when they are most curst. None so much spighted of their own; none so hated of all; none so opposed by ours: and yet these ill weeds grow. Whosoever lives long, shall see them feared of their own, which now hate them; shall see these seven leane kine devoure all the fat beasts that feed on the medowes of Tyber. I prophecy as Pharaoh dreamed: The event shall justifie my confidence.

At Bruxelles I say some English-women professe themselves Vestals; with a thousand rites, I know not whether more ridiculous, or magicall. Poore soules! they could not be fooles enough at home. It would have made you to pity, laugh, disdaine (I know not which more) to see by what cunning sleights and faire pretences that weak sex was fetcht into a wilfull bondage; and (if those two can agree) willingly constrained to serve a master whom they must and cannot obey: whom they neither may forsake for their vow, nor can please for their frailty. What followes hence? Late sorrow, secret mischiefe, misery irremediable. Their forwardnesse, for will-worship, shall condemne our coldnesse for truth.

I talked there (in more boldnesse perhaps then wisdome) with Costerus a famous Jesuit; an old man, more teasty then subtile, and more able to wrangle then satisfie. Our discourse was long and roaving, and on his part full both of words and vehemency. He spake as at home; I as a stranger: yet so, as he saw me modestly peremptory. The particulars would swell my Letter too much: It is enough, that the Truth lost lesse then I gained. At Gaunt (a City that commands reverence for age, and wonder for the greatnesse) we fell upon a Cappucine novice, which wept bitterly, because he was not allowed to be miserable. His head had now felt the razor, his back the rod: all that Laconicall discipline pleased him well; which another, being condemned to, would justly account a torment. What hindred then? Piety to his mother, would not permit this which he thought piety to God: He could not be a willing begger, unlesse his mother must beg unwillingly. He was the only heir of his father, the only stay of his mother: the comfort of her widowhood depended on this her orphane; who now naked must enter into the world of the Cappucines, as he came first into this; leaving his goods to the division of the fraternity: the least part whereof should have been hers, whose he wished all. Hence those tears, that repulse. I pitied his ill bestowed zeale; and rather wished, then durst teach him more wisdome. These men for devout, the Jesuites for learned and pragmaticall, have ingrossed all opinion from other Orders. O hypocrisie! No Cappucine may take or touch silver: for these are (you know) the quintessence of Franciscan spirits. This metal is as very an Anathema to these, as the wedge of gold to Achan; at the offer whereof he starts back, as Moses from the Serpent: yet he carries a boy with him, that takes and caries it; & never complains of either metall or measure. I saw and laughed at it; & by this open trick of hypocrisie suspected more, more close. How could I chuse? while commonly the least appears of that which is; especially of that which is loathsom in appearance, much more in nature. At Namurs, on a pleasant & steep hill-top, we found one that was termed a maried Hermite; approving his wisdome above his fellows, that could make choice of so chearefull and sociable a solitarinesse. Whence, after a delightfull passage up the sweet River Mosa, we visited the populous & rich Clergy of Leodium. That great City might wel be dichotomized into Cloysters and Hospitals. If I might adventure, I could here play the Critick, after all the ruins of my neglected Philology. Old monuments, and after them our Lipsius, call this people Eburones: I doubt whether it should not rather be written Ebriones; yet without search of any other records, save my owne eyes: while yet I would those streets were more moist with wine, then with blood; wherein no day, no night is not dismall to some. No law, no Magistrate, laies hold on the known murderer, if himselfe list: for three dayes after his fact, the gates are open, and justice shut: private violence may pursue him, publike justice cannot: whence, some of more hot temper carve themselves of revenge; others take up with a small pecuniary satisfaction. O England, thought I, happie for justice, happie for securitie! There you shall find in every corner a Maumet; at every doore a begger; in every dish a Priest. From thence we passed to the Spa, a village famous for her medicinall and minerall waters, compounded of Iron and Copperice; the vertue whereof yet the simple inhabitant ascribes to their beneficiall Saint, whose heavy foot hath made an ill-shaped impression in a stone of his * Savenir: A water more wholesome then pleasant, and yet more famous then wholesome. The wilde deserts (on which it borders) are haunted with three kindes of ill cattell; Free-booters, Wolves, Witches: although these two last are oft-times one. For that savage Ardenna is reputed to yeeld many of those monsters, whom the Greekes call λυκανθρώπους; they, Lougarous; we (if you will) Witch-wolves; Witches that have put on the shape of those cruell beasts. We saw a boy there, whose halfe-face was devoured by one of them neere the village: yet so, as that the eare was rather cut then bitten off. Not many dayes before our comming, at Limburgh was executed one of those miscreants, who confessed on the wheele to have devoured two and forty children in that forme. It would aske a large volume, to scan this probleme of Lycanthropy. The reasons, wherewith their relation furnisht me on both parts, would make an Epistle tedious. This in short I resolved; a substantiall change, is above the reach of all infernall powers, proper to the same hand that created the substance of both: Herein the Devill playes the double Sophister; yea, the Sorcerer with Sorcerers. He both deludes the Witches conceit, and the beholders eyes.

One thing I may not omit, without sinfull over-sight; A short, but memorable Story, which the Grephier of that towne (though of different religion) reported to more eares then ours. When the last Inquisition tyrannized in those parts, and helpt to spend the Faggots of Ardenna; one of the rest, a confident Confessour, being led fame to his stake, sung Psalms along the way, in a heavenly courage and victorious triumph: the cruell Officer envying his last mirth, and grieving to see him merrier then his tormentors, commanded him silence: He sings still, as desirous to improve his last breath to the best. The view of his approaching glory, bred his joy; his joy breaks forth into a chearefull confession: The enraged Sheriffe causes his tongue, drawne forth to the length, to be cut off neer the roots. Bloody wretch! It had been good musicke to have heard his shreeks: but, to heare his musicke was torment. The poore Martyr dies in silence, rests in peace. Not many moneths after, our butcherly Officer hath a sonne borne with his tongue hanging downe upon his chinne, like a Deer after long chase; which never could be gathered up within the bounds of his lips. O the divine hand, full of justice, full of revenge! Goe now, Lipsius, and write the new miracles of thy Goddesse; and confirme superstition by strange events. Judge you that have seen, if ever the Chappell of Halle or Zichem have yeelded ought more notable. We meete every where Pilgrims to those his Ladies: two Ladies shall I call them, or one Lady in two shrines? If two, why doe they worship but one? If but one, why doth she that cure at Zichē, which at Halle she could not? O what pitie it is, that so high a wit should in the last act be subject to dotage! All the masculine brood of that braine we cherished, and (if need were) admired: but these his silly Virgins, the feeble issue of distempered age, who can abide? One of his darlings, at Lovan, told me from his owne mouth, that the elder of these two daughters was by him in ten dayes got, conceived, borne, christend. I beleeved, and wondred not. These acts of superstition have an invisible father, and mid-wife: besides that it is not for an Elephant to goe three yeares with a Mouse. It was told me in the shop of his Moretus, not without some indignation, that our King, when he had well viewed the booke, and read some passages, threw it to the ground, with this censure; Damnation to him that made it, and to him that beleeves it.

Whether a true ſtory, or one of their Legends, I enquire not: I am ſure, that ſentence did not ſo much diſcontent them, as it joyed me. Let me tell you yet, ere I take off my pen, two wonders more, which I ſaw in that wonder of Cities, Antwerp; one, a ſolemne Maſſe in a ſhambles, and that on Gods day; while the houſe was full of meat, of butchers, of buyers; ſome kneeling, others bargaining, moſt talking, all buſie. It was ſtrange to ſee one houſe ſacred to god, and the belly, and how thoſe two ſervices agreed: The Prieſt did eat fleſh, the butchers ſold fleſh, in one roofe, at one inſtant. The butcher killed, and ſold it by peeces; the Prieſt did ſacrifice, and orally devoure it whole: whether was the more butcher? The like we might have ſeene at Mulines. The other, an Engliſh-man, ſo madly devoute, that he had wilfully mur'd up himſelfe as an Anachoret; the worſt of all priſoners. There ſate he pent up, for his further merit, halfe hunger-ſtarved for the charitie of the citizens. It was worth ſeeing, how manly he could bite in his ſecret want, and diſſemble his over-late repentance. I cannot commend his mortification, if he wiſh to be in heaven, yea in purgatory, to be delivered from thence: I durſt not pitty him; becauſe his durance was willing, and (as he hoped) meritorious: but, ſuch incouragements as he had from me, ſuch thanke ſhall he have from God; who in ſtead of an Euge, which he looks for, ſhall angerly challenge him, with Who required this? I leave him now, in his owne fetters; you, to your worthy and honourable employments.

EPIST. VI. Concerning the Miracles of our time.

INdeed the world abounds with miracles. Theſe while the fill the mouthes of many ſway the faith of ſome, and make all men wonder. Our nature is greedy of newes; which it will rather faine then want. Certainly, ere long, miracles will be no wonders, for their frequence. I had thought, our age had had too many gray haires, and with time experience, and with experience craft, to have deſcried a Juggler: but now I ſee by the ſimplicitie, it declines to its ſecond childhood. The two Lipſian Ladies, the charmes of Bluniſtones boy, and Garnets ſtraw, what a noiſe have they made! I onely wonder how Faux and Catesby eſcaped the honour of Saints, and priviledge of miracles. Herein you aske my ſentence; more ſeaſonably then you hoped: For I meant to have wrote a juſt volume of this ſubject, and furniſht my ſelfe accordingly in that Region of wonders; but that I feared to ſurcharge the nice ſtomach of our time, with two much. Neither would my length have ought availed you; whoſe thoughts are ſo taken up with ſo high and ſerviceable cares, that they can give no leiſure to an over-long diſcourſe. May it pleaſe you therefore to receive in ſhort, what I have deliberately reſolved in my ſelfe, and think I can make good to others.

I have noted foure ranks of commonly-named miracles: from which, if you make a juſt ſubduction, how few of our wonders ſhall remaine either to beleefe or admiration? The firſt meerly reported, not ſeen to be done; the next ſeeming to be done, but counterfeited; the third, truly done, but not true miracles; the laſt, truly miraculous, but by Satan. The firſt of theſe are bred of lies, and nouriſhed by credulity: The mouth of fame is full of ſuch blaſts. For theſe, if I liſted a while to rake in the Legends and book of Conformities, an ingenuous Papiſt could not but bluſh, an indifferent Reader could not but lay his hand on his ſpleen, and wonder as much that any man could be ſo impudent to broach ſuch reports, or any ſo ſimple to beleeve them; as the credulous multitude wonders that any ſhould be ſo powerfull to effect them. But I ſeeke neither their ſhame, nor others laughter. I dare ſay, not the Talmud, not the Alcoran, hath more impoſſible tales, more ridiculous lies. Yea; to this head, Canus himſelfe (a famous Papiſt) dares referre many of thoſe ancient miracles reported and (by all likelihood) beleeved of Bede and Gregory. The next are bred of fraud and cozenage, nouriſhed nouriſhed by ſuperſtition. Who knows not, how the famous Kentiſh Idol moved her eyes, and hands, by thoſe ſecret gimmers, which now every Pupper-play can imitate? How Saint Wilfreds needle opened to the penitent, and cloſed it ſelfe to the guilty? How out Lady ſheds the teares of a bleeding Vine? and doth many of her daily feats, as Bel did of old eat up his banquet, or as Picens the Eremite faſted forty dayes. But theſe two every honeſt Papiſt will confeſſe, with voluntary ſhame and griefe, and grant that it may grow a diſputable queſtion whether Mountebanks or Prieſts are the greater cozeners. Vives, beyond his wont, vehemently, terms them execrable and Satanical impoſtors. The third are true works of God under a falſe title: God gives them their being, men their name: unjuſt, becauſe above their nature; wherein the Philoſopher and the ſuperſtitiouſly-ignorant, are contrarily extreme, while the one ſeeks out naturall cauſes of Gods immediate and metaphyſicall works; the other aſcribes ordinary effects to ſupernatural cauſes. If the violence of a diſeaſe ceaſe, after a vow made to our Lady; if a ſouldier, armed with this vow, ſcape gun-ſhot; a captive, priſon; a woman travelling, death; the vulgar (and I would they alone) cry out, A miracle. One Load-ſtone hath more wonder in it, then a thouſand ſuch events. Every thing draws a baſe mind to admiration. Franciſco del Campo (one of the Arch-Dukes Quiryes) told us not without importunate devotion, that in that fatall field of Newport, his vow to their Virgin helpt him to ſwim over a large water, when the oars of his arms had never before tried any waves. A dogge hath done more, without acknowledgement of any Saint. Feare gives ſudden inſtincts of skill, even without precept. Their own Coſterus durſt ſay, that the cure of a diſeaſe is no miracle: His reaſon, becauſe it may be done by the power of nature, albe in a longer time.* Yeeld this, and what have Lipſius his two Ladies done? wherefore ſeryes all this clamor, from the two hils? I aſſented not; neither will be herein thus much their enemie: For, as well the manner of doing, as the matter, makes a miracle. If Peters handkerchiefe, or ſhadow, heale a diſeaſe, it is miraculous, though it might have been done by a potion. Many of their recoveries (doubtleſſe) have been wrought through the ſtrength of Nature in the Patient, not of vertue in the Saint. How many ſick men have mended, with their phyſick in their pocket? Though many other alſo (I doubt not) of thoſe cures have fallen into the fourth head; which indeed is more knotty, and require a deeper diſcourſe. Wherein, if I ſhall evince theſe two things, I ſhall (I hope) ſatisfie my Reader, and cleare the Truth: One, that miracles are wrought by Satan; the other, that thoſe which the Romiſh Church boaſteth, are of this nature, of this author. I contend not of words: we take miracles in Auguſtines large ſenſe; wherein is little difference betwixt a thing marvellous and miraculous; ſuch as the Spirit of God in either Inſtrument cals δύναμιν and גבורות. Perhaps it would be more proper to ſay, that God works theſe miracles by Satan; for, as in the naturall and voluntary motions of wicked men; ſo in the ſupernaturall acts of evill ſpirits (as they are acts) there is more then a meer permiſſion. Satan, by his tempeſt, bereaves Iob of his children; yet Iob, looking higher, ſaith, The Lord hath taken. No ſophiſtry can elude this proofe of Moſes; that a Prophet or dreamer may give a true ſigne or wonder, and yet ſay, Let us goe after ſtrange gods: nor that of our Saviour, who foretels of falſe Chriſts, falſe Prophets that ſhall give σημεῖα μεγάλα καὶ τέρατα, ſigns and wonders, & thoſe great. There are ſome too great, I grant, for the hand of all infernall powers: by which, our Saviour invincibly proves the truth of his Deity: Theſe never graced falſehood, neither admit any precedent from our times: As to the reſt ſo frequent and common; for me, I could not beleeve the Church of Rome were Antichriſtian, if it had not boaſted of theſe wonders. All the knot lies then in the application of this to Rome, and our imaginary Lady: How ſhall it appear, that their miracles are of this kind? Ludovicus Vives gives ſix notes to diſtinguiſh Gods miracles from Satans: Lipſius three: Both of them too many, as might eaſily be diſcovered by diſcuſſing of particulars. It is not ſo much the greatneſſe of the work, nor the beleefe of witneſſes, nor the quality nor manner of the action, nor truth of eſſence, that can deſcry the immediate hand which worketh in our miracles. That alone is the true and golden rule, which Iuſtin Martyr (if at leaſt that book be his) preſcribes in his Queſtions and Anſwers; How ſhall it be known that our our miracles are better then the Heathens, although the event countenance both alike? Resp. Ex fide & cultu veri Dei: Miracles must be judged by the doctrine which they confirme; not the doctrine by the miracles. The Dreamer, or Prophet must be esteemed, not by the event of his wonder, but by the substance and scope of his teaching. The Romanists argue preposterously, while they would prove the truth of their Church by miracles; whereas they should prove their miracles by the truth. To say nothing of the fashion of their cures, that one is prescribed to come to our Lady rather on a Friday, as * Henry Loyez; another, to wash nine dayes in the water of Montagu, as Leonard Stocqueau; another to eat a peece of the Oake where the image stood, as * Magdaleine the widow of Bruxelles. All which, if they savour not strong of magicall receits, let the indifferent judge. Surely, either there is no sorcery, or this is it. All shall be plaine, if the doctrine confirmed by their miracles be once discussed: for, if that be divine truth, we doe unjustly impugne these works as diabolicall; if falshood, they doe blasphemously proclaime them for divine. These works tend all chiefly to this double doctrine; that the blessed Virgin is to be invoked, for her mediation; That God and Saints are to be adored in and by images; Positions that would require a volume, and such as are liberally disputed by others: whereof one is against scripture; the other (which in these cases values no lesse) besides it. One deifies the Virgin; the other a stock or stone. It matters not what subtill distinctions their learned Doctors make betwixt mediation of Redemption, and Intercession, Δουλία and Λατρεία, the Saint, and the Image: We know, their common people, whose devotion enriches those shrines (by confession of their owne Writers) climbe the hill of Zichem with this conceit, that Mary is their Savioresse; that the stocke is their Goddesse: which unlesse it be true, how doe their wonders teach them lies! and therefore how from God? But to take the first at best (for the second is so grosse, that were not the second Commandement by Papists purposely razed out of their Primiers, children and carters would condemne it) it cannot be denyed, that all the substance of prayer is in the heart; the vocall sound is but a complement, and as an outward case wherein our thoughts are sheathed. That power cannot know the prayer, which knowes not the heart: either then the Virgin is God, for that she knowes the heart; or to know the heart is not proper to God: or to know the heart, and so our prayers, is falsely ascribed to the Virgin: and therefore these wonders, which teach men thus to honour her, are Doctors of lies; so, not of God. There cannot be any discourse wherein it is more easie to be tedious. To end; if prayers were but in words, and Saints did meddle with all particularities of earthly things, yet blessed Mary should be a God, if she cou'd at once attend all her suters. One sollicites her at Halle, another at Scherpenheuuel, and other at Luca, at our alsinWgham another; one in Europe, another in Asia: or perhaps another is one of her new Clients in America. Ten thousand devout Suppliants are at once prostrate before her severall shrines. If she cannot heare all, why pray they? If she can, what can God doe more? Certainly (as the matter is used) there cannot be greater wrong offered to those heavenly Spirits, then by our importunate superstitions to be thrust into Gods Throne; and to have forced upon them the honours of their Maker. There is no contradiction in heaven: a Saint cannot allow that an Angell forbids, See thou doe it not, was the voyce of an Angell: if all the miraculous blocks in the world shall speak contrary, we know whom to beleeve. The old rule was, * Μαείαν μηδεὶς προσκυνείτω: Either that rule is Devilish, or this practice. And if this practice be ill, God deliver me from the immediate author of these miracles; Change but one Idoll for another, and what differ the wonders of Apollos Temples, from those of these Chappels? We reverence (as we ought) the memory of that holy and happy Virgin: We hate those that dishonour her; we hate those that deifie her. Curst be all honour that is stolne from God.

This short satisfaction I give, in a long question; such as I dare rest in; and resolve that all popish miracles are either falsly reported, or falsly done, or falsly miraculous, or falsly ascribed to heaven.

To Mr. VVILLIAM BEDELL, at Venice.

EP. VII. Lamenting the death of our late Divines, and exciting to their imitation.

VVE have heard, how full of trouble, and danger, the Alps were to you; and did at once both pity your difficulties, and rejoyce in your safety. Since your departure from us, Reynolds is departed from the world. Alas, how many worthy Lights have our eyes seene shining and extinguisht? How many losses have we lived to see the Church sustaine, and lament; of her children, of her pillars; our owne, and forraine; I speak not of those, which (being excellent) would needs be obscure: whom nothing but their owne secrecy deprived of the honour of our tears. There are, besides, too many whom the world noted and admired; even since the time that our common mother acknowledged us for her sonnes. Our Fulke led the way; that profound, ready, and resolute Doctor, the hammer of heretickes, the champion of truth; whom your younger times have heard oft disputing acutely and powerfully. Next him, followed that honour of our Schooles, and Angell of our Church, learned Whitakers; then whom our age saw nothing more memorable: what clearnesse of judgement, what sweetnesse of style, what gravitie of person, what grace of cariage was in that man? Who ever saw him without reverence? or heard him without wonder? Soone after, left the world that famous and illuminate Doctor, Francis Iunius, the glory of Leiden, the other hope of the Church, the Oracle of Textuall and Schoole-Divinitie, rich in languages, subtile in distinguishing, and in argument invincible: and his companion in labours, Lu. Trelcatius, would needs be his companion in joyes; who had doubled our sorrow and losse, but that he recompenced it with a sonne like himselfe. Soone after, fell old reverend Beza; a long fixed starre in this firmament of the Church: who, after many excellent monuments of learning and fidelity, lived to prove upon his adversaries, that he was not dead at their day. Neither may I without injury, omit that worthy payre of our late Divines, Greenham and Perkins: whereof the one excelled in experimentall divinitie, and knew well how to stay a weake conscience, how to raise a fallen, how to strike a remorselesse: The other, in a distinct judgement, and rare dexterity in clearing the obscure subtilties of the School, and easie explication of the most perplex discourses. Doctor Reynolds is the last not in worth, but in the time of his losse. He alone was a well furnisht librarie, full of all faculties, of all studies, of all learning: the memory, the reading of that man were neere to a miracle. These are gone, amongst many more, whom the Church mourns for in secret: would God her losse could be as easily supplied, as lamented. Her sorrow is for those that are past; her remainder of joy is in those that remaine; her hope in the next age. I pray God the causes of her hope, and joy, may be equivalent to those of her griefe.

What should this work in us, but an imitation, yea (that word is not too big for you) an emulation of their worthinesse? It is no pride, for a man to wish himselfe spiritually better then he dare hope to reach: nay, I am deceived, if it be not true humility. For what doth this argue him, but low in his conceit, high in his desires only? Or if so; happy is the ambition of grace, and power of sincere serviceablenes to God. Let us wish and affect this, while the world layes plots for greatnesse: Let me not prosper, if I bestow envy on them. He is great, that is good: and no man, me thinks, is happy on earth, to him that hath grace for substance, and learning for ornament. If you know it not, the Church (our mother) lookes for much at your hands: she knowes how rich our common father hath left you: she notes your graces, your opportunities, your imployments: she thinks you are gone so farre, like a good Merchant, for no small gaine; and lookes you shall come home well laded. And for vent of your present commodities (tho our chiefe hope of successe be cut off with that unhoped peace) yet what can hinder your private trafficke for God? I hope (and who doth not?) that this this blow will leave in your noble Venetians a perpetuall ſcarre, and that their late irreſolution ſhall make them ever capable of all better counſell; and have his worke (like ſome great Eclipſe) many years after. How happy were it for Venice, if as ſhe is every yeare married to the Sea, ſo ſhe were once throughly eſpouſed to Chriſt! In the meane time, let me perſwade you to gratifie us at home with the publication of that your exquiſite Polemicall diſcourſe; whereto our conference with M. Alablaſter gave ſo happy an occaſion: You ſhall hereby cleare many truths, and ſatisfie all Readers: yea, I doubt not, but an adverſary (not too perverſe) ſhall acknowledge the Truths victory and yours. It was wholeſome counſell of a father, that in the time of an hereſie every man ſhould write. Perhaps, you complaine of the inundations of Francford, how many have been diſcouraged from benefiting the world, by this conceit of multitude! Indeed we all write, and while we write, crie out of number. How well might many be ſpared, even of thoſe that complaine of too many? whoſe importunate babling cloyes the world, without uſe.

To my Lord, the Earle of Eſſex.

EPIST. VIII. Advice for his Travels.

MY Lord, both my duty and promiſe make my Letters your debt; and, if neither of theſe, my thirſt of your good. You ſhall never but need good counſell, moſt in travell: Then are both our dangers greater, and our hopes.

I need not to tell you the eyes of the world are much upon you, for your own ſake, for your fathers: only let your eyes be upon it againe, to obſerve it, to ſatisfie it, and in ſome caſes to contemne it. As your graces, ſo your weakneſſes, will be the ſooner ſpied, by how much you are more noted. The higher any building is, the more it requires exquiſit proportion: which in ſome low and rude piles, is needleſſe. If your vertues ſhall be eminent like your fathers, you cannot ſo hide your ſelfe, but the world will ſee you, and force upon you applauſe and admiration, in ſpite of modeſty: but if you ſhall come ſhort in theſe, your fathers perfection ſhall be your blemiſh. Thinke, now, that more eyes are upon you, then at home: of forrainers; of your owne: theirs to obſerve, ours to expect. For, now we account you in the Schoole of wiſedome: whence if you returne not better, you ſhall worſe; with the loſſe of your time, of our hopes. For, I know not how naturall it is to us to looke for alteration in travell; and, with the change of aire and land, to preſuppoſe a change in the perſon. Now you are (through both your yeares and travell) in the forge of your hopes. We all looke (not without deſire and apprecation) in what ſhape you will come forth. Think it not enough, that you ſee, or can ſay you have ſeen ſtrange things of nature, or event: it is a vaine and dead travell, that reſts in the eye, or the tongue. All is but loſt, unleſſe your buſie mind ſhall from the body that it ſees, draw forth ſome quinteſſence of obſervation, wherewith to informe, and inrich it ſelfe. There is nothing can quite the coſt and labour of travell, but the gaine of wiſdome. How many have we ſeene and pitied, which have brought nothing from forrain countries, but miſhapen clothes, or exoticall geſtures, or new games, or affected liſpings, or the diſeaſes of the place, or (which is worſt) the vices? Theſe men have at once wandered from their countrie, & from themſelves: and ſome of them (too eaſie to inſtance) have left God behind them; or perhaps, in ſtead of him, have after a looſe and filthy life brought home ſome idle Puppet in a box, whereon to ſpend their devotion. Let their wrack warne you: and let their follies be entertained by you, with more deteſtation then pitie. I know your honour too well to feare you: your young yeares have been ſo graciouſly prevented with ſoveraigne antidotes of truth and holy inſtruction, that this infection deſpaires of prevailing. Your very blood gives you argument of ſafety: yet good counſell is not unſeaſonable, even where danger is not ſuſpected. For Gods ſake, my Lord, whatſoever you gaine, loſe nothing of the truth; remit nothing of your love and piety to God; of your favour and zeale to religion. As ſure as there is a God, you were trained up in the true knowledge of him. If either Angell, or Devill, or Ieſuit ſhould ſuggeſt the contrary, contrary, ſend him away with defiance. There you ſee and heare every day, the true mother and the fained, ſtriving and pleading for the living child. The true Prince of peace hath paſt ſentence from heaven, on our ſide. Do not you ſtoop ſo much as to a doubt, or motion of irreſolution. Abandon thoſe from your table and ſalt, whom your owne and others experience ſhall deſcry dangerous: Thoſe Serpents are full of inſinuations: But, of all, thoſe of your owne country; which are ſo much the more pernicious, by how much they have more colour of priviledge of intireneſſe. Religion is the greateſt care: advices for cariage, and improvement of travell, challenge the next place. I need not counſell you to keepe your ſtate with affability; and ſo to manage your ſelfe, as that your curteſie may be more viſible then your greatneſſe. Nature hath taught you this; and hath ſecretly propagated it from your father: who by his ſweetneſſe of diſpoſition, wonne as many hearts, as by his valour and munificence. I rather tell you, that a good nature hath betrayed many; who looking for that in others, which they found in themſelves, have at laſt complained of their owne credulity, and others deceit. Truſt not ſtrangers too much, with your counſell, with your perſon: and in your greateſt familiarities, have an eye to their common diſpoſition, and infirmities. Thoſe natures wherewith you converſe, are ſubject to diſpleaſure, and violent in purſuit of ſmall indignities. Yeſterday heard I named, from no unfaithfull report, a French Courtier, that in ſingle combat hath ſent eighteene ſoules from the field to their place: yet he ever as the patient in the quarrell; and for this mentioned with more then excuſe: I cenſure not how juſtly. This is others care: Only hence I argue the rifeneſſe of unkindneſſe taken, and purſued. You ſhall ſee, that the ſoil is not ſo divers, as the inclination of perſons; who in all Climates, though they differ in particulars, yet ſtill agree too well in common faults. The Italian deep, cloſe, and craftie; the French raſh; the German dull. One not forward to offer wrongs, but apprehenſive of a ſmall wrong offered: another, prone either to take, or give them, but not uneaſie to remit: another, long in conceiving, long in retaining. What do I exemplifie? There are long Catalogues of peculiar vices, that haunt ſpeciall places; which, if they were not notoriouſly infamous, my charity would ſerve me to particularize. It were pity there ſhould be fewer vertues, locall and proper. There are good uſes to be made of others inormities; if no more, by them to correct our owne: who loaths vice in another, is in good forwardneſſe to leave it in himſelfe. The view of the publike calamities, and diſorders of other Churches, ſhall beſt teach you thankfulneſſe for the better ſtate of ours: But better uſe of their vertues; by how much it is more excellent to know what we ſhould doe, then what ſhould not. You muſt now looke upon all things, not with the eye of a ſtranger only, but of a Philoſopher, but of a Chriſtian; which accounts all loſſe, that is not reduced to practice. It is a great praiſe, that you are wiſer by the contemplation of forraine things; but much greater, that you are better.

That you have ſeene Cities, and Courts, and Alpes, and Rivers, can never yeeld you ſo ſound comfort, as that you have lookt ſeriouſly into your ſelfe. In vaine doe we affect all forraine knowledge, if we be not throughly acquainted at home. Think much, and ſay little, eſpecially in occaſions of diſpraiſe: wherein, both a little is enough, and oft-times any thing is too much. You cannot inquire too much: that which in us inferiours would be cenſured for dangerous curioſitie, in your Greatneſſe ſhall be conſtrued as a commendable deſire of knowledge. Aske ſtill after men of greateſt parts and reputation: and where you find Fame no lyer, note and reſpect them. Make choice of thoſe for converſation, which either in preſent, or in hope are eminent: and when you meet with excellencies in any facultie, leave not without ſome gaine of knowledge. What are other graces to you, if you onely admire them; not imitate, not appropriate them? Loe, your equals in time grow up happily in the Colledge (ſo I may terme it) of our young and hopefull Court, which you have left; and above all, that gracious preſident of worthineſſe and perfection: whom while in all other things you ſerve, you may without reproofe emulate for learning, vertue, pietie. My ſelfe am witneſſe of their progreſſe, which I doe joyfully gratulate to the ſucceeding age. Beware, leſt their diligence ſhall out-ſtrip you, and upbraide you with that ancient checke of going farre and faring worſe.

I am

I am bold and busie in counselling: you abound with better monitors; and the best you cary about, I hope, in your owne bosome. Though these should be needlesse, yet they argue my humble affection, and discharge my duty. My prayers are better then my counsells; both of them hearty and unfained for your good. God guide and returne you safe, from a journey not more happie and prosperous then I wish it.

To Sir Robert Drury, and his Lady.

Epist. IX. Concerning my removall from them.

WIth how unwilling a heart I leave you, he knowes that searches the heart: Neither durst I goe; but that I sensibly see his hand pulling me from you. Indeed, desire of competencie betrayed me, at first; and drew mine eyes to looke aside: but, when I bent them upon the place, and saw the number and the need of the people, together with their hunger and applause, meeting with the circumstances of Gods strange conveiance of this offer to me; I saw, that was but as the Fowlers feather, to make me stoope: and, contemning that respect of my selfe, I sincerely acknowledged higher motives of my yeelding; and resolved I might not resist. You are deare to me, as a charge to a Pastor; If my paines to you have not proved it, suspect me: Yet I leave you. God calls me to a greater worke: I must follow him: It were more ease to me, to live secretly hidden in that quiet obscurity, as Saul amongst the stuffe, then to be drawne out to the eye of the world, to act so high a part before a thousand witnesses. In this point, if I seeme to neglect you, blame me not; I must neglect and forget my selfe. I can but labour, whereseoever I am. God knowes how willingly I doe that; whether there or here. I shall digge, and delve, and plant, in what ground soever my Master sets me. If he take me to a larger field, complaine you not of losse, while the Church may gaine. But, you are mine owne Charge; No wise father neglects his owne, in compassion of the greater need of others: yet consider, that even carefull Parents, when the Prince commands, leave their families, and goe to warfare. What if God hath called me to heaven; would you have grudged my departure? Imagine I am there, where I shall be; although the case be not to you altogether so hopelesse: for, now I may heare of you, visit you, renue my holy counsels, and be mutually comforted from you; there, none of these. He, that will once transpose me from earth to heaven, hath now chosen to transpose me from one peece of earth to another: what is here worthy of your sorrow, worthy of complaint? That should be for my owne good: this shall be for the good of many. If your experience have taught you that my labours doe promise profit; obtaine of your selfe to deny your selfe so much, as to rejoyce that the losse of a few should be the advantage so many soules. Though, why doe I speake of losse? I speake that as your feare, not my owne: and your affection causeth that feare, rather then the occasion.

The God of the Harvest shall send you a Labourer, more able, as carefull: That is my prayer, and hope, and shall be my joy. I dare not leave but in this expectation, this assurance. What-ever become of me, it shall be my greatest comfort to heare you commend your change; and to see your happy progresse in those wayes I have both shewed you, and beaten. So shall we meet in the end, and never part.

EPIST. X. Against the feare of death.

YOu complaine, that you feare death: He is no man that doth not. Besides the paine, Nature shrinkes at the thought of parting. If you would learne the remedie, know the cause; for that she is ignorant and faithlesse. She would not be cowardly, if she were not foolish. Our feare is from doubt, and our doubt is from unbeleefe: and whence is our unbeleefe, but chiefly from ignorance? She knowes not what good is elsewhere: she beleeves not her part in it. Get once true knowledge and true faith, your feare shall vanish alone. Assurance of heavenly things, makes us willing to part with earthly. He cannot contemne this life, that knowes not the other. If you would despise earth therefore, thinke of heaven. If you would have death easie, thinke of that glorious life that followes it. Certainly, if we can endure paine, for health; much more should we abide a few pangs for glory.

Thinke how fondly we feare a vanquisht enemie. Loe, Christ hath triumpht over Death: he bleedeth and gaspeth under us: and yet we tremble. It is enough to us, that Christ died: neither would he have died, but that we might die with safetie and pleasure.

Thinke that death is necessarily annexed to nature: We are for a time, on condition that we shall not be; we receive life, but upon the termes of re-delivery. Necessity makes some things easie; as it usually makes easie things difficult. It is a fond injustice to embrace the covenant, and shrink at the condition.

Think, there is but one common rode to all flesh: There are no by-paths of any fairer or nearer way; no, not for Princes. Even company abateth miseries: and the commonnesse of an evill makes it lesse fearefull. What worlds of men are gone before us; yea, how many thousands out of one field? How many Crownes and Scepters lie piled up at the gates of Death, which their owners have left there, as spoiles to the conquerour? Have we beene at so many graves, and so oft seene our selves die in our friends; and doe we shrinke when our course commeth? Imagine you alone were exempted from the common law of mankind, or were condemned to Methuselahs age; assure your selfe, death is not now so fearefull, as your life would then be wearisome.

Thinke not so much what Death is, as from whom he comes, and for what. We receive even homely messengers from great persons; not without respect to their masters: And what matters it who he be, so he bring us good newes? What newes can be better then this, That God sends for you, to take possession of a Kingdome? Let them feare Death, which know him but as a pursuivant sent from hell; whom their conscience accuseth of a life wilfully filthy; and bindes-over secretly to condemnation: We know whither we are going, and whom we have beleeved: Let us passe on cheerefully, thorow these blacke gates unto our glory.

Lastly know that our improvidence only addes terrour unto death. Think of death, and you shall not feare it: Doe you not see, that even Beares and Tygres seeme not terrible to those that live with them? How have we seene their Keepers sport with them when the beholders durst scarce trust their chaine? Be acquainted with Death: though he looke grimme upon you at first, you shall find him (yea you shall make him) a good companion. Familiaritie cannot stand with fear. These are receits enow. Too much store doth rather over-whelme then satisfie. Take but these, and I dare promise you securitie.

EP. I. The estate of a true, but weake Christian.

IF you aske how I fare: Sometimes, no man better; and, if the fault were not mine owne, Alwaies. Not that I can command health, and bid the world smile when I list. How possible is it for a man to be happy without these; yea, in spight of them? These things can neither augment, nor impaire those comforts that come from above. What use, what sight is there of the stars, when the Sun shines? then only can I find my selfe happy, when (overlooking these earthly things) I can fetch my joy from heaven. I tell him that knowes it, the contentments that earth can afford her best favourites are weake, imperfect, changeable, momentany; and such, as ever end in complaint. We sorrow that we had them; and, while we have them, we dare not trust them: Those from above are full, and constant. What an heaven doe I feele in my selfe, when (after many traverses of meditation) I find in my heart a feeling possession of my God! When I can walke, and converse with the God of heaven, not without an openesse of heart and familiaritie: When my soule hath caught fast, and sensible hold of my Saviour; and either pulls him downe to it selfe, or rather lifts up it selfe to him; and can and dare secretly avouch, I know whom I have beleeved: When I can looke upon all this inferiour creation, with the eyes of a stranger; and am transported to my home in my thoughts; solacing my selfe in the view and meditation of my future glory, and that present of the Saints: When I see wherefore I was made, and my conscience tells me I have done that for which I came; done it, not so as I can boast, but so as it is accepted; while my weaknesses are pardoned, and my acts measured by my desires, and my desires by their sinceritie: Lastly, when I can find my selfe (upon holy resolution) made firme and square, fit to entertaine all events; the good with moderate regard, the evill with courage and patience, both with thankes; strongly setled to good purposes, constant and cheerfull in devotion; and in a word, ready for God, yea, full of God. Sometimes I can be thus, and pity the poore and miserable prosperity of the godlesse; and laugh at their monthes of vanity, and sorrow at my owne: But then againe (for why should I shame to confesse it?) the world thrusts it selfe betwixt me and heaven; and, by his darke and indigested parts, eclipseth that light which shined to my soule. Now, a senseleſſe dulnesse overtakes me, and besots me; my lust to devotion is little, my joy none at all: Gods face is hid and I am troubled. Then I begin to compare my selfe with others, and thinke, Are all men thus blockish and earthen? or am I alone worse then the rest, and singular in my wretchednesse? Now I carry my carcasse up and downe carelesly, and (as dead bodies rubbed, without heate) I doe in vaine force upon my selfe delights, which others laugh at: I endevour my wonted worke, but without an heart; there is nothing is not tedious to me, no not my selfe.

Thus I am, till I single my selfe out alone, to him that alone can revive me: I reason with my selfe, and conferre with him; I chide my selfe, and intreat him: and after some spirituall speeches interchanged, I renue my familiarity with him; and he the tokens of his love to me. Loe; then I live againe, and applaud my selfe in this happinesse, and wish it might ever continue, and thinke basely of the world in comparison of it. Thus I hold on, rising and falling; neither know, whether I should more praiſe God for thus much fruition of him, or blame my ſelfe for my inconſtancy in good; more rejoyce, that ſometimes I am well, or grieve that I am not ſo alwaies. I ſtrive, and wiſh, rather then hope, for better. This is our warfare; we may not looke to triumph alwaies; we muſt ſmart ſometimes, and complaine; and then againe rejoyce that we can complaine; and grieve that we can rejoyce no more, and that we can grieve no more. Our hope is, if we be patient, we ſhall once be conſtant.

To Sir EDMUND BACON.

EPIST. II. Of the benefit of retiredneſſe and ſecrecy.

SUſpect (if you can) that, becauſe now many cold winds blow betwixt us, my affection can be cooler to you. True love is like a ſtrong ſtreame, which the further it is from the head, runs with more violence. The thoughts of thoſe pleaſures I was wont to find in your preſence, were never ſo delightfull, as now when I am barred from renuing them. I wiſh me with you; yea (if I could or might wiſh to change) I ſhould wiſh me your ſelfe. To live hidden, was never but ſafe, and pleaſant; but now, ſo much better, as the world is worſe. It is a happineſſe, not to be a witneſſe of the miſchiefe of the time; which it is hard to ſee, and be guiltleſſe. Your philoſophicall Cell is a ſafe ſhelter from tumults, from vices, from diſcontentments.

Beſides that lively, honeſt, and manly pleaſure, which ariſes from the gaine of knowledge in the deepe myſteries of Nature; how eaſie is it in that place to live free from the common cares, from the infection of common evils! Whether the Spaniard gaine or ſave by his peace, and how he keepes it; and whether it were ſafer for the States to lay downe armes, and be at once ſtill and free; Whether the Emperors truce with the Turke were honourable and ſeaſonable; and whether Venice have won or loſt by her late jarres; are thoughts that dare not looke in at thoſe doores.

Who is envied, and who pitied at Court; Who buies hopes and kindneſſe deareſt, who laies ſecret mines to blow up another, that himſelfe may ſucceed, can never trouble you: Theſe cares dare not enter into that Sanctuary of peace. Thence you can ſee how all that live publike are toſſed in theſe waves, and pity them. For, great places have ſeldome ſafe and eaſie entrances: and (which is worſt) great charges can hardly be plauſibly weilded, without ſome indirect policies. Alas! their priviledges cannot countervaile their toile. Weary dayes and reſtleſſe nights, ſhort lifes and long cares, weake bodies and unquiet minds, attend lightly on greatneſſe. Either Clients breake their ſleepe in the morning, or the intention of their mind drives it off from the firſt watch. Either ſuits or complaints thruſt themſelves into their recreations; and packets of Letters interrupt their meales. It is ever Terme with them, without Vacation. Their buſineſſes admit no night, no holiday: Loe, your privacy frees you from all this, and what ever other glorious miſery. There you may ſleepe, and eat, and honeſtly diſport, and enjoy your ſelfe, and command both your praiſes and others. And whiles you are happy, you live out of the reach of envie; unleſſe my ſelfe ſend that gueſt thither: which I ſhould juſtly condemne as the fault of my love.

No man offers to undermine you, none to diſgrace you: you could not want theſe inconveniences abroad. Yea, let a man live in the open world, but as a looker on, he ſhall be ſure not to want abundance of vexations. An ill mind holds it an eaſie torment, to live in continuall ſight of evill; if not rather a pleaſure: but, to the well diſpoſed, it is next to Hell. Certainly, to live among Toads and Serpents, is a Paradiſe to this. One jeſts pleaſantly with his Maker: another makes himſelfe ſport with Scripture. One fills his mouth with oathes of found: another ſcoffes at the religious. One ſpeakes villany; another laughes at it; a third defends it. One makes himſelfe a Swine, another a Devill: Who (that is not all earth) can endure this? who cannot wiſh himſelfe rather a deſolate Hermite, or a cloſe priſoner? Every evill we ſee, doth either vex, or infect us. Your retiredneſſe avoids this; yet ſo, as it equal-

A ly escapes all the evills of solitarinesse. You are full of friends; whose society, intermixed with your closeneſſe, makes you to want little of publike. The Desert is too wilde, the Citie too populous: the Country is onely fit for rest. I know, there want not some obscure corners, so haunted with dulneſſe, that as they yeeld no outward unquietneſſe, so no inward contentment. Yours is none of those; but such as strives rather with the pleasure of it, to requite the solitarineſſe. The Court is for honour, the Citie for gaine, the Country for quietneſſe; a blessing that need not (in the judgement of the wiſest) yeeld to the other two. Yea, how many have we knowne, that having nothing but a coat of thatch to hide them from heaven, yet have pitied the carefull pompe of the mighty? how much more may those which have full hands and quiet hearts, pitie them both? I doe not so much praise you in this, as wonder at
B you. I know many upon whom the conscience of their wants forces a necessary obscurity; who if they can steale a vertue out of a necessity, it is well, but, I no where know so excellent parts shrouded in such willing secrecie. The world knowes you, and wants you; and yet you are voluntarily hid. Love your selfe still; and make much of this shadow, untill our common mother call you forth to her necessary service, and charge you to neglect your selfe, to pleasure her. Which once done, you know where to find peace. Whether others applaud you, I am sure, you shall your selfe: and I shall still magnifie you, and (what I can) imitate you.

I Know not whether this quarell be worthy of an answer, or rather of a silent scorne; or if an answer, whether merry or serious. I doe not willingly suffer my pen to wade into questions: yet this argument seemes shallow enough for an Epistle. If I free not this truth, let me be punished with a divorce. Some idle table-talke cals us to plead for our wives. Perhaps some Gallants grudge us one, who can be content to allow themselves more. If they thought wives curses, they would
D afford them us. Our mariage is censured (I speake boldly) of none but them which never knew to live chastly in mariage; who never knew that * Canonists true distinction of Virginity. What care we for their censure, where God approves? But some perhaps maintaine it out of judgement: Bid them make much of that which Paul tels them, is a doctrine of devils. Were it not for this opinion, the Church of Rome would want one evident brand of her Antichristianisme. Let their shavelings speake for themselves; upon whom their unlawfull Vow hath forced a wilfull and impossible necessitie. I leave them to scanne the old rule of In turpi voto muta decretum; if they had not rather, Cautè si non castè. Even moderate Papists will grant us free, because not bound by Vow; no, not so farre as those old Germans pro posse & nosse.
E Or what care we, if they grant it not? while we hold us firme to that sure rule of Basil the great; * He that forbids what God injoynes, or injoynes what God forbids, let him be accursed. I passe not what I heare men, or Angells say, while I heare God say, Let him be the husband of one wife. That one word shall confirme me against the barking of all impure mouthes. He that made mariage, sayes, it is honourable: what care we for the dishonour of those that corrupt it? yea, that which nature noteth with shame, God mentions with honour, [a] τίμιος ὁ γάμος; [b] Gregory with the title of opus castum; Paphnutius, of σωφροσύνη, chastitie. But if God should be Judge of this controversie, it were soone at an end; who in the time even of that legall strictneſſe, allowed wedlock to the Ministers of his Sanctuary. [d] Their marriage (saith he) is neither forbidden by Legall, nor Evangelicall, nor Apostolick authority.

God never imposed this law of Continence: who then? [e] The Church. As if a good spouse would gain-say what her husband willeth. But how welle heare O ye Papists, the judgement of your owne Cardinall, and confesse your mouthes stopped. [f] But I beleeve (saith he) it were for the good and safety of many soules, and would be an wholesome law, that those which would, might marry; for that, as experience teacheth us, a contrary effect followes upon the law of Continency; since at this day they live not spiritually, neither are cleane, but are defiled with unlawfull copulation, to their great sinne: whereas with their owne wife it might be chastity. Is this a Cardinall, think you, or a Huguenot? But if this red hat be not worthy of respect; let a Pope himself speak out of Peters chaire. Pius the second, as learned as hath sit in that roome this thousand yeares; [g] Marriage (saith he) [B] upon great reason was taken from the Clergie; but upon greater reason is to be restored. What need we other Judge? How just this law is, you see, see now how ancient: For some doctrines have nothing to plead for them, but Time. Age hath been an old refuge for falshood. Tertullians rule is true; That which is first, is truest. What the ancient Jewish Prelates did, Moses is cleare. What did the Apostles? Doth not [h] Paul tell us, that both the rest of the Apostles, and the brethren of the Lord and Cephas, had wives, and (which is more) carried them still along in their travels? For that childish elusion of [i] ἀδελφὴν γυναῖκα who can abide, but to laugh at? Doth not [k] Clemens of Alexandria (a Father not of more antiquitie, then credit) tell us, that Peter, Philip, and Paul himself, were married? And this last (though unlikeli-st) how is it confirmed by Ignatius, in his Epistle to the Philadelphians? Yea, their owne Cardinall, learned [l] Cajetane, doth [C] both avouch and evince it. This was their practise: what was their Constitution? Looke in these Canons which the Romish Church fathers upon the Apostles, and Franciscus Turrian their Jesuit sweats to defend it in a whole Volume: There you find, Canon. 5. enacted, that [m] no Bishop, Presbyter, Deacon, shall forsake his wife (γυναῖκα ἐπιλαθέσθαι) in pretense of Religion, upon paine of deposition. It would move laughter, to see how the Jesuits gnaw upon this bone, and sucke in nothing but the blood of their owne jawes; [n] while the sixt generall Councell averres and proclaimes this sense truly Apostolicall, in spight of all contradiction.

Follow the times now, and descend lower; What did the Ages succeeding? Search Records: What-ever some palpably-foisted Epistles of Popes insinuate, they married without scruple of any contrary injunction. Many of those Ancients admired Virginitie, but imposed it not. Amongst the rest, [o] Origen (though himself a wilfull Eunuch) is faine to perswade the sonnes of Clergy men, not to be proud of their parentage. After this, when the Fathers of the Nicene Councell went about to enact a law of Continency, Socrates the Historian expresses it thus: [p] It seemeth good (saith he) to the Bishops to bring in a new law into the Church. It was then new, and they but would have brought it in; therefore before, it was not: where we know how Paphnutius, himself a Virgin, famous for holinesse, famous for miracles rising (ἐκ νεκρῶν) [D] cryed aloud, that they ought not to lay this (βαρὺν ζυγὸν) heavie yoke, upon men of the Church. His argument wanne assent. He spake and prevailed. So this liberty was still continued and affirmed. If this be not plaine enough, [q] holy Athanasius, a witnesse past exception, shall serve for a thousand histories till his Age.

[r] Many Bishops, saith he, have not married; and contrarily Monks have been fathers of children: au contrarily, ye see Bishops the fathers of children, and Monks that have not sought posterity. Would you yet have instances of the former, and the next Age? Here [E]

you

you have [f] Numidicus the Martyr, a married Presbyter; [t] Cheremon of Nilus, a married Bishop; [u] Demetrianus Bishop of Antioch, whose sonne Domnus succeeded Paulus Samosatenus; Philoromus and Phileas B B. of the Thimnites; Gabinius brother of Eutichianus BB. of Rome; the father of Nazianzene, Basil, and the other [x] Gregory, Hillarius, and that good Spiridion Bishop of Cyprus, of whom Sozomen gives so direct testimony. To omit others, what should I speake of many Bishops of Rome, whose sonnes not spurious, as now-adayes, but (as Pope Vrban himselfe witnesses) [z] lawfully begot in wedlocke, followed their fathers in the Pontificiall chaire. [a] The reason whereof, that Pope himselfe ingenuously rendreth; for that marriage was every where lawfull to the Clergy before the prohibition (which must needs be late) and in the Easterne Church to this day is allowed. What neede we more testimonies, or more examples? What ever [b] Heliodorus, B. of Trica (a man fitter for a wanton love-story, then a Church Controversie) brought into the Church of Thessalia, Socrates thus flatly writes of those Bishops of his time: [c] For many of them in the place and function of Bishops, beget children of their lawfull wives. This was practised: See what was decreed in that sixt generall [d] Councell of Constantinople, to this purpose, to the confusion of all replyers. If any Protestant Church in Christendome can make a more peremptory, more full and absolute, more cautelous decree, for the marriage of Ecclesiasticall persons, let me be condemned as faithlesse: A place, I grant, miserably handled by our adversaries; and because they cannot blemish it enough, indignly torne out of the Councels. What dare not impudence doe? * Against all evidences of Greeke Copies, against their owne Gratian, against pleas of antiquity. This is the readiest way; Whom they cannot answer, to burne; what they cannot shift off, to blot out; and to cut the knot which they cannot untie. The Romanists of the next Age were somewhat more equall: who, seeing themselves pressed with so flat a Decree, confirmed by authority of Emperours, as would abide no deniall, began to distinguish upon the point; limiting this liberty onely to the Easterne Church, and granting that all the Clergie of the East might marry, not theirs. So Pope Steven the second, freely confesses: [e] The tradition (saith he) of the Easterne Churches is otherwise then that of the Romane Church. For, their Priests, Deacons, or Subdeacons are married; but in this Church of the Westerne, no one of the Clergie, from the Subdeacon to the Bishop, have leave to marry.

Liberally; but not enough: and if he yeeld this, why not more? Shall that be lawfull in the East, which in the West is not? Doe the Gospels, or lawes of equity alter according to the foure corners of the world? Doth God make difference betwixt Greece and England? If it be lawfull, why not every where? If unlawfull, why is it done any where? So when you see, we differ not from the Church in this; but from the Romish Church: But this sacred Councell doth not onely universally approve this practice (with pain of deposition to the gain-sayers) but avouches it for a Decree Apostolicall. Judge now whether this one authoritie be not enough to weigh downe an hundred petty conventicles, aud may legions (if there had beene many) of private contradictions. Thus, for seaven hundred yeares, you find nothing but open freedome: All the scuffling arose in the eight Age; wherein yet this violent imposition found many and learned Adversaries, and durst not be obtruded at once. Loe, even then, Gregory the third, writing to the Bishops of Bavaria, gives this disjunct charge; [f] Let none keepe an harlot or a concubine: but either let him live chastely, or marry a wife, whom it shall not be lawfull for him to forsake: According to that rule of Clerkes, cited from [g] Isidore, and renewed in the [h] Councell of Mentz, to the perpetuall shame of our jugling Adversaries. unjuſt expurgations. [i] Iſidore ſaith, Let them containe, or let them marry but one: They cite him, Let them containe; and leave out the reſt: ſomewhat worſe then the Devill cited Scripture. But, I might have ſpared all this labour of writing, could I perſwade whoſoever either doubts, or denies this, to read over that one Epiſtle which [k] Huldericus BB. of Auſpurge wrote learnedly, and vehemently, to Pope Nicholas the firſt, in this ſubject: which if it doe not anſwer all cavils, and ſatisfie all Readers, and convince all (not wilfull) adverſaries, let me be caſt, in ſo juſt a cauſe. There you ſhall ſee, how juſt, how expedient, how ancient this liberty is; together with the feeble and injurious grounds of forced Continency: Read it, and ſee whether you can deſire a better Advocate. After him (ſo ſtrongly did he plead, and ſo happily) for two hundred yeares more, this freedome ſtill bleſſed thoſe parts; yer, not without extreme oppoſition. Hiſtories are witneſſes of the buſie, and not unlearned combats of thoſe times, in this Argument. But now, when the body of Antichriſtianiſme began to be compleat, and to ſtand up in his abſolute ſhape, after a thouſand yeares from Chriſt; this liberty which before wavered under Nicholas 1. now by the hands of Leo 9. Nicholas 2. and that brand of hell, Gregory 7. was utterly ruined, wives debarred, ſingle life urged: [l] A good turne for whoremaſters (ſaith Aventine) who now for one wife might have ſix hundred Bedfellowes.

But, how approved of the better ſort appears (beſides that the Churches did ring of him each where for Antichriſt) in that at the [m] Councell of Wormes the French and German Biſhops depoſed this Gregory, in this name (amongſt other quarrels) for [n] ſeparating man and wife. Violence did this; not reaſon: neither was Gods will here queſtioned, but the Popes wilfulneſſe. What broiles hereon enſued, let [o] Aventine witneſſe.

The bickerings of our Engliſh Clergie, with their Dunſtanes, about this time, are memorable in our owne Hiſtories, which teach us how late, how repiningly, how unjuſtly, they ſtooped under this yoake. I had rather ſend my Reader to Bale and Fox, then abridge their Monuments, to enlarge mine owne.

I have (I hope) fetcht this truth farre enough; and deduced it low enough, through many Ages, to the midſt of the rage of Antichriſtian tyranny. There left our liberty; there began their bondage. Our liberty is happily renewed with the Goſpell: what God, what his Church hath ever allowed, we doe enjoy. Wherein we are not alone: The Greeke Church, as large for extent as the Roman (and, in ſome parts of it, better for their ſoundneſſe) doe thus; and thus have ever done.

Let Papiſts and Atheiſts ſay what they will: it is ſafe erring with God and his purer Church.

EPIST. IV. Of the ſorrow not to be repented of.

IT is ſeldome ſeene, that a ſilent griefe ſpeeds well: for either a man muſt have ſtrong hands of reſolution to ſtrangle it in his boſome; or elſe it drives him to ſome ſecret miſchiefe: whereas ſorrow revealed is halfe remedied, and ever abates in the uttering. Your griefe was wiſely diſcloſed; and ſhall be as ſtrangely anſwered. I am glad of your ſorrow; and ſhould weepe for you, if you did not thus mourne. Your ſorrow is, that you cannot enough grieve for your ſinnes. Let me tell you, that the Angels themſelves ſing at this lamentation; neither doth the earth afford any ſo ſweet muſicke in the eares of God. This heavineſſe is the way to joy. Worldly ſorrow is worthy of pitie, becauſe it leadeth to death: but this deſerves nothing but envie and gratulation. If thoſe teares were common, hell would not ſo enlarge it ſelfe. Never ſin, repented of, was puniſhed: and never any thus mourned, and repented not. Loe you have done that, which you grieve you have not done. That good God, whoſe act is his will, accounts of our will, as our deed. If he required ſorrow proportionable to the hainouſneſſe of our ſinnes, there were no end of mourning. Now his mercy regards not ſo much the meaſure, as the truth of it; and accounts us to have that which we complaine to want. I never knew any truly penitent, which in the depth of his remorſe, was afraid of ſorrowing too much; nor any unrepentant, which wiſht to ſorrow more. Yea, let me tell you, that this ſorrow is better and more then that deepe heavineſſe for ſin, which you deſire. Many have been vexed with an extreme remorſe for ſome ſin, from the gripes of a galled conſcience, which yet never came where true repentance grew; in whom the conſcience plaies at once the accuſer, witneſſe, Judge, tormentor: but an earneſt griefe, for the want of griefe, was never found in any but a gracious heart. You are happy, and complaine. Tell me, I beſeech you, This ſorrow which you mourne to want, is it a grace of the Spirit of God; or not? If not, why doe you ſorrow to want it? If it be, oh how happy is it to grieve for want of grace! The God of all truth and bleſſedneſſe hath ſaid, Bleſſed are thoſe that hunger and thirſt after righteouſneſſe; and with the ſame breath, Bleſſed are they that mourne, for they ſhall be comforted. You ſay, you mourne; Chriſt ſaith, you are bleſſed: you ſay, you mourne; Chriſt ſaith, you ſhall be comforted. Either now diſtruſt your Saviour, or elſe confeſſe your happineſſe, and with patience expect his promiſed conſolation. What doe you feare? you ſee others ſtand like ſtrong Oakes, unſhaken, unremoved: you are but a reed, a feeble plant, toſſed and bowed with every wind, and with much agitation bruiſed; Loe, you are in tender and favourable hands, that never brake any, whom their ſins bruiſed; never bruiſed any, whom temptations have bowed. You are but flax; and your beſt is not a flame, but an obſcure ſmoake of grace: Lo, here his ſpirit is as a ſoft wind, not as cold water; he will kindle, will never quench you. The ſorrow you want, is his gift: take heed leſt while you vex your ſelfe with diſlike of the meaſure, you grudge at the giver. Beggers may not chuſe. This portion he hath vouchſafed to give you; if you have any, it is more then he was bound to beſtow: yet you ſay, What no more? as if you tooke it unkindly, that he is no more liberall. Even theſe holy diſcontentments are dangerous. Deſire more (ſo much as you can) but repine not, when you doe not attaine. Deſire, but ſo as you be free from impatience, free from unthankfulneſſe: Thoſe that have tried, can ſay how difficult it is to complaine, with due reſervation of thanks. Neither know I whether is worſe, To long for good things impatiently, or not at all to deſire them. The fault of your ſorrow is rather in your conceit, then in it ſelfe. And, if indeed you mourne not enough, ſtay but Gods leiſure, and your eyes ſhall run over with teares. How many do you ſee ſport with their ſins, ye, brag of them? how many that ſhould die for want of paſtime, if they might not ſinne freely, and more freely talke of it? What a Saint are you to theſe, that can droop under the memory of the frailty of youth, and never think you have ſpent enow teares! Yet ſo I encourage you in what you have, as one that perſwades you not to deſiſt from ſuing for more. It is good to be covetous of grace, and to have our deſires herein enlarged with our receits. Weepe ſtill, and ſtill deſire to weepe: but let your teares be as the raine in the ſun-ſhine; comfortable and hopefull: and let not your longing ſavour of murmur, or diſtruſt. Theſe teares are reſerved; this hunger ſhall be ſatisfied; this ſorrow ſhal be comforted. There is nothing betwixt God and you, but time. Preſcribe not to his wiſedome: haſten not his mercy. His grace is enough for you: his glory ſhall be more then enough.

To M. Hugh Cholmley.

Ep. V. Concerning the Metaphraſe of the Pſalmes.

FEare not my immoderate ſtudies. I have a body that controls me enough in theſe courſes; my friends need not. There is nothing whereof I could ſooner ſurfet, if I durſt neglect my body to ſatisfie my mind: but whiles I affect knowledge, ledge, my weaknes checks me, and ſayes, Better a little learning then no health. I yeeld, A and patiently abide my ſelfe debarred of my choſen felicity. The little I can get, I am no niggard of: neither am I more deſirous to gather, then willing to impart. The full handed are commonly moſt ſparing. We veſſels, that have any empty roome, anſwer the leaſt knock, with a hollow noyſe: you, that are full, ſound not. If we pardon your cloſeneſſe, you may well beare with our profuſion. If there be any wrong, it is to our ſelves, that we utter what we ſhould lay up. It is a pardonable fault, to doe leſſe good to our ſelves, that we may doe more to others. Amongſt other endevours, I have boldly undertaken the holy Metres of David; how happily judge you by what you ſee. There is none of all my labours ſo open to all cenſures; none whereof I would ſo willingly heare the verdit of the wiſe and judicious. Perhaps ſome think the verſe harſh; whoſe nice eare regards roundneſſe more then ſenſe. I embrace ſmooth- B neſſe, but affect it not. This is the leaſt good quality of a verſe; that intends any thing but muſicall delight. Others may blame the difficulty of the tunes: whoſe humour cannot be pleaſed without a greater offence. For, to ſay truth; I never could ſee good verſe written in the wonted meaſures. I ever thought them moſt eaſie, and leaſt Poeticall. This fault (if any) will light upon the negligence of our people, which endure not to take paines for any fit variety. The French and Dutch have given us worthy examples of diligence, and exquiſitneſſe in this kind. Neither our eares nor voices are leſſe tunable. Here is nothing wanting, but will to learne. What is this, but to eat the corne out of the eare, becauſe we will not abide the labour to grind, and knead it? If the queſtion be, whether our verſe muſt deſcend to them; or they aſ-cend to it; wiſe moderation I think would determine it moſt equall, that each part C ſhould remit ſomewhat, and both meet in the midſt. Thus I have endevoured to doe, with ſincere intent of their good, rather then my owne applauſe. For it had beene eaſie to have reached to an higher ſtraine: but I durſt not; whether for the grave Ma-jeſtie of the ſubject, or benefit of the ſimpleſt Reader. You ſhall ſtill note, that I have laboured to keepe Davids entire ſenſe, with numbers neither loftie nor ſlubbered: which meane is ſo much more difficult to find, as the buſineſſe is more ſacred, and the liberty leſſe. Many great wits have undertaken this taske; which yet have either not effected it, or have ſmothered it in their private desks, and denied it the common light. Amongſt the reſt, were thoſe two rare ſpirits of the Sidneys; to whom Poeſie was as naturall as it is affected of others: and our worthy friend M. Silveſter, hath ſhewed me, how happily he hath ſometimes turned from his Bartas, to the ſweet D ſinger of Iſrael. It could not be, that in ſuch abundant plentie of Poeſie, this worke ſhould have paſt unattempted: would God I might live to ſee it perfected; either by my owne hand, or a better. In the meane time, let me expect your impartiall ſentence, both concerning the forme and ſenſe. Lay aſide your love, for a while; which too oft blinds judgment. And as it uſes to be done in moſt equall proceedings of juſtice, ſhut me out of dores while my verſe is diſcuſſed: yea, let me receive not your cenſure onely, but others by you: this once (as you love me) play both the Informer and the Judge. Whether you allow it, you ſhall incourage me; or correct, you ſhall amend me. Either your ſtarres, or your ſpits, (that I may uſe Origens notes) ſhall be welcome to my margent. It ſhall be happy for us, if God ſhall make our poore labours any way E ſerviceable to his Name and Church.

EPIST. VI. A Preface to his Relation of the Ruſſian affaires.

TRavell perfiteth wiſedome; and obſervation gives perfection to travell: without which a man may pleaſe his eyes, not feed his brain; and after much earth meaſured, ſhall returne with a weary body, and an empty mind. Home is more ſafe, more pleaſant, but leſſe fruitfull of experience: But to a mind not working and diſcurſive, all heavens, all earths are alike. And, as the end of travell is obſervation, ſo

A so the end of observation is the informing of others: for, what is our knowledge if smothered in our selves, so as it is not knowne to more? Such secret delight can content none but an envious nature. You have breathed many cold ayres, gone farre, seene much, heard more, observed all. These two yeares you have spent in imitation of Nebuchadnezzar's seven, conversing with such creatures as you sought with at Ephesus. Alas! what a race, yea what a back of a Church have you seene? what manners? what people? Amongst whom ignorant superstition thrives with close Atheisme, treachery with cruelty, one Divell with another; while Truth and Vertue doe not so much as give any challenge of resistance. Returning once to our England after this experience, I imagined you doubted whether you were on earth, or in heaven. Now then (if you will heare me, whom you have wont as you have observed what you have seene, and written what you have observed: so, publish

B what you have written: It shall be a grateful labour, to us, to posterity. I am deceived, if the fickleneſſe of the Russian state have not yeelded more memorable matter of history then any other in our age, or perhaps many centuries of our predecessors. How shall I thinke, but that God sent you thither before these broiles, to be the witnesse, the register of so famous mutations? He loves to have those just wrathes, which he doth in one part of the world, knowne to the whole, and those evils, which men doe in the night of their secrecy, brought forth into the Theater of the World; that the evill of mens sinne being compared with the evill of his punishment; may justifie his proceedings; and condemne theirs. Your worke shall thus honour him, besides your second service, in the benefit of the Church. For whiles you discourse of the open tyranny of that Russian Nero Ivan Basilius; the more secret, no lesse bloody plots of Boris; the ill successe of a stolne Crowne, though set upon the head of an harmeleſſe Sonne; the bold attempts and miserable end of a false pretending challenge; the perfidiousneſſe of a servile people, unworthy of better governors; the miscariage of wicked governors, unworthy of better subjects; the unjust usurpations of men, just (tho late) revenges of God, cruelty rewarded with blood, wrong claimes with overthrow, treachery with bondage; the Reader with some secret horror, shall draw-in delight, and with delight instruction: Neither know I any Relation whence he shall take out a more easie lesson of justice, of loyalty, of thankfulneſſe.

But above all, let the world see and commiserate the hard estate of that worthy and noble Secretary, Buchinski. Poore gentleman! his distresse recals ever to my thoughts Æsop's Storke, taken amongst the Cranes: He now nourishes his haire, under the displeasure of a forraine Prince; At once in durance and banishment. He served an ill

D master; but, with an honest heart, with cleane hands. The masters injustice doth no more infect a good servant, then the truth of the servant can justifie his ill master. A bad worke-man may use a good instrument: and oft-times a cleane napkin wipeth a foule mouth. It joyes me yet to think, that his piety, as it ever held friendship in heaven, so now it wins him friends in this our other world: Lo, even from our Iland unexpected deliverance takes a long flight; and blesseth him beyond hope; yea rather, from heaven, by us. That God, whom he serves, will be knowne to those rude and scarce humane Christians, for a protector of innocence, a favourer of truth, a rewarder of piety: The mercy of our gratious King, the compassion of an honourable Counsellor, the love of a true friend, and (which wrought all, and set all on worke)

E the grace of our good God, shall now loose those bonds, and give a glad welcome to his liberty, and a willing farewell to his distresse. He shall (I hope) live to acknowledge this; in the meane time, I doe for him. Those Russian affaires are not more worthy of your records, then your love to this friend is worthy of mine. For neither could this large sea drowne or quench it, nor time and absence (which are wont to breed a lingring consumption of friendship) abate the heate of that affection which his kindnesse bred, religion nourished. Both rareneſſe, and worth shall commend this true-love; which (to say true) hath beene now long out of fashion. Never times yeelded more love; but, not more subtle. For, every man loves himselfe in another, loves the estate in the person: Hope of advantage is the loadstone that drawes the iron hearts of men; not vertue, not desert. No age afforded more parasites, fewer friends? The most are friendly in sight, serviceable in expectation, hollow in love, trustlesse in experience. See now Buchinski, see and confesse, thou hast found one friend, which hath made the many, on whom while thou bestowedst much favour, thou hast lost none. I censure but thinke how welcome Liberty (which though late, yet now at last hath look't back upon him) shall be to the Cell of his affliction, when smiling upon him, she shall lead him by the hand, and (like another Angell) open the iron gates of his miserable captivity, and (from those hard Prestanes, and savage Christians) carry him by the haire of the head, into this paradise of God. In the meane time, I have written to him as I could, in a knowne language, with an unknown hand; that my poore Letters of gratulation might serve as humble attendants to greater.

For your work, I wish it but such glad entertainment, as the profit, yea the delight of it deserves, and feare nothing, but that this long delay of publication will make it seeme newes. We are all growne Athenians, and account a strange report like to a fish and a guest. Those eyes and hands staid it, which might doe it best. I cannot blame you, if you think it more honoured by the stay of his gracious perusall, then it could be by the early acceptation of the world. Even the cast garments of Princes are precious. Others have in part prevented you, whose labours to yours, are but as an Echo to a long period: by whom, we heare the last sound of these stirres, ignorant of the beginning. They give us but a taste in their hand: you lead us to the open fountaine. Let the Reader give you but as much thank, as you give him satisfaction; you shall desire no more.

Finally, God give us much good use, as knowledge of his judgements; the world, helpe of your labours; your selfe, incouragement; Buchinski, liberty.

To Stanislaus Buchinski, late Secretary to Demetrius Emp. of Russia.

EPIST. VII. Of the comfort of Imprisonment.

THe knowledge, that the eye gives of the face alone, is shallow, uncertaine, imperfect. For what is it, to see the utmost skin, or favour of the visage; changeable with disease, changeable with passion? The eare (me thinks) doth both most clearly disclose the minds of others, and knit them faster to ours: which, as it is the sense of discipline, so of friendship, commanding it even to the absent, and in the present cherishing it. This thing we have lately proved in your selfe, most noble Stanislaus: neerer examples we might have had; better we could not. How many, how excellent things have we heard of you, from our common friend, though most yours, which have easily won our beleefe, our affections! How oft, how honourable mention hath he made of your name! How frequently, how fervently have we wisht you both safety and liberty! And now, loe where she comes, as the Greeks say, ἀπὸ μηχανῆς, and visits her forlorne Client. Although I would not doubt to say, that this outward durance of the body hath seemed more harsh to the beholders, then to your selfe, a wise man, (which is more) a Christian; whose free soule, in the greatest straits of the outward man, flies over Seas and Lands whither it listeth; neither can, by any distance of place, nor swelling of waves, nor height of mountaines, nor violence of enemies, nor strong barres, nor walls, nor guards, be restrained from what place it selfe hath chosen. Loe, that enjoyes God, enjoyes it self and his friends; and so feeds it self with the pleasure of enjoying them, that it easily either forgets or contemnes all other things. It is no Paradox, to say, that A wise Christian cannot be imprisoned, cannot be banished: He is ever at home, ever free. For, both his liberty is within him, and his home is universall. And what is it, I beseech you (for you have tryed) that makes a prison? Is it straitnes of walls? Then you have as many fellowes, as there are men. For how is the soule of every man pent within these clay walls of the body, more close, more obscure! whence she may looke oft, thorow the grates of her busie thoughts,

but,

but, is never released in substance, till that God, who gave us our Minimum into this Gaole, give us our Delivery, with Entrance of Adam. Thus either all men are prisoners, or you are none. Is it restraint? How many (especially of that other sex in those your Easterne parts) chamber up themselves, for state; so as they neither see the Sunne, nor others them? How many superstitious men, for devotion; how many obscure Agelæ, for ease and carelesnesse, keep themselves in their owne cottage, in their owne village; and never walke forth so much as to the neighbour townes? And what is your Russia to all her inhabitants, but a large prison, a wide Galley? yea, what other is the world to us? How can he complaine of straitnesse, or restraint, that roves over all the world, and beyond it? Tyrannie may part the soule from the body; cannot confine it to the body. That which others doe for ease, devotion, state, you doe for necessity: why not as willingly, since you must doe it? Doe but imagine the other cause; and your case is the same with theirs which both have chosen, and delight to keepe close; yet hating the name of prisoners, while they embrace the condition. But, why doe I perswade you, not to mislike that, which I pray you may forsake? I had rather you should be no prisoner at all, then to be a cheerefull prisoner upon necessity. If the doores be open, my perswasion shall not hold you in. Rather our prayers shall open those doores, and fetch you forth into this common liberty of men; which also hath not a little (though an inferiour) contentment. For, how pleasant is it to these senses, by which we men are wont to be led, to see and be seene, to speake to our friends, and heare them speake to us, to touch and kisse the deare hands of our Parents, and with them at last to have our eyes closed? Either this shall befall you; or what hopes, what paines (I adde no more) hath this your carefull friend lost? and we, what wishes, what consultations? It shall be; I dare hope, yea beleeve it: Onely thou our good God give such end, as thou hast done entrance into this businesse; and so dispose of these likely endeavours, that whom we love and honour absent, we may at last in present see and embrace.

To my father in Law, M. G. Wenysse.

Epist. VIII. Exciting to Christian Cheerefulnesse.

YOu complaine of dulnesse, a common disease, and incident to the best minds, and such as can most contemne vanities. For, the true Worldling hunts after nothing but mirth; neither cares how lawlesse his sport be, so it be pleasant: he faines to himselfe false delights, when he wants: and if he can passe the time, and chase away Melancholie, he thinks his day spent happily. And thus it must needs be; while the world is his god, his devotion can be but his pleasure: whereas the mortified soule hath learned to scorne these frivolous and sinfull joyes, and affects either solid delights, or none; and had rather be dull for want of mirth, then transported with wanton pleasures. When the world, like an important Minstrell, thrusts it selfe into his chamber, and offers him musicke, unsought; if he vouchsafe it the hearing, it is the highest favour he dare, or can yeeld: He rewards it not, he commends it not: Yea, he secretly lothes those harsh and jarring notes, and rejects them. For, he finds a better consort within, betwixt God and himselfe, when he hath a little tuned his heart with meditation. To speake fully, the World is like an ill foole in a Play: the Christian is a judicious spectator, which thinks those jests too grosse to be laught at; and therefore entertaines that with scorne, which others with applause. Yet in truth, we sin, if we rejoyce not: there is not more error in false mirth, then in unjust heavinesse. If worldlings offend, that they laugh, when they should mourne; we shall offend no lesse, if we droope in cause of cheerefulnesse. Shall we envie, or scorne, to see one joy in red and white drosse, another in a vaine title; one in a dainty dish, another in a jest; one in a booke, another in a friend; one in a Kite, another in a Dogge; whiles we enjoy the God of Heaven, and are sorrowfull? What dull metall is this we are made of? We have the fountaine of joy, and yet complaine of heavines. Is there any joy, without God? Certainly, if joy be good, and all goodnesse be from him, whence should joy arise, but from him? And if he be the author of joy, how are we Christians, and rejoyce not? What doe we freeze in the fire, and starve at a feaste? Have we a good conscience, and yet pine and hang down the head? When God hath made us happy, doe we make our selves miserable? When I aske my heart Davids question, I know not whether I be more angry or ashamed at the answer; Why are thou sad my soule? My body, my purse, my fame, my friends; or perhaps none of these, onely I am sad, because I am. And what if all these? what if more? when I come to my better wits, Have I a father, an advocate, a comforter, a mansion in heaven? If both earth and hell conspired to afflict me, my sorrow cannot countervaile the causes of my joy. Now I can challenge all adversaries; and either defie all miseries, or bid all crosses, yea death it selfe, welcome. Yet God doth not abridge us of these earthly solaces, which dare weigh with our discontentments, and sometime depresse the balance. His greater light doth not extinguish the lesse. If God had not thought them blessings, he had not bestowed them: and how are they blessings, if they delight us not? Bookes, friends, wine, oyle, health, reputation, competencie, may give occasions, but not bo[illegible]s, to our rejoycings. We may not make them Gods rivalls, but his spokes-men. In themselves they are nothing, but in God worth our joy. These may be used; yet so as they may be absent without distraction. Let these goe, so God alone be present with us, it is enough. He were not God, if he were not All-sufficient. We have him, I speak boldly; We have him in feeling, in faith, in pledges, and earnest; yea, in possession. Why doe we not enjoy him? why doe we not shake-off that senselesse drowsinesse, which makes our lives unpleasant; and leave over all heavinesse to those that want God; to those that either know him not, or know him displeased?

To M. W. R. Dedic. to M. Thomas Burlz.

EPIST. IX. Consolations of immoderate griefe for the death of friends.

WHile the streame of sorrow runs full, I know how vaine it is to oppose counsell. Passions must have leasure to digest. Wisdome doth not more moderate them, than time. At first, it was best to mourne with you, and to mitigate your sorrow, by bearing part; wherein, would God my burden could be your ease. Every thing else is lesse, when it is divided; And then is best, after teares, to give counsell: yet, in these thoughts I am not a little straited. Before you have digested griefe, advice comes too early; too late, when you have digested it. Before, it was unseasonable; after, would be superfluous: Before, it could not benefit you; after, it may hurt you, by rubbing up a skinned sore afresh. It is as hard to choose the season for counsell, as to give it: and that season is, after the first digestion of sorrow; before the last. If my Letters then meet with the best opportunity, they shall please me, and profit you: If not, yet I deserve pardon, that I wished so. You had but two Jewels, which you held precious; a Wife, and a Sonne: One was your selfe divided, the other, your selfe multiplied: You have lost both, and well-neere at once. The losse of one caused the other, and both of them your just griefe. Such losses, when they come single, afflict us; but, when double, astonish us; and though they give advantage of respite, would almost over-whelme the best patient. Lo, now is the tryall of our man-hood, yea, of our Christianitie: You are now in the lists, set upon by two of Gods fierce afflictions; shew now what patience you have, what fortitude. Wherefore have you gathered, and laid up all this time, but for this brunt? Now bring forth all your holy store to light, and to use; and approve to us in this difficultie, that you have all this while beene a Christian in earnest. I know, these events have not surprised you on a sudden: you have suspected they might come; you have put cases if they should come. Things that are hazardous, may be doubted: but certaine things are, and must be expected. Providence abates griefe, and disconntenances a crosse. Or, if your affections were so strong, that you durst not fore-thinke your losse; take it equally but as it falls. A wise man and a Christian knowes death so fatall to Nature,

so

so ordinary in event, so gainfull in the issue, that I wonder he can for this either feare or grieve. Doth God onely lend us our mother, and doe we grudge when he calls for his owne? So I have seene ill debtors that borrow with prayers, keep with thanks, repay with enmitie. We mistake our tenure; we take that for gift, which God intends for loane; We are tenants at will, and thinke our selves owners. Your wife and child are dead: Well, they have done that for which they came.

If they could not have died, it had beene worthy of wonder; not at all, that they are dead. If this condition were proper onely to our families, and friends, or yet to our climate alone; how unhappy should we seeme to our neighbours, to our selves! Now it is common, let us mourne that we are men. Loe, all Princes and Monarchs daunce with us in the same ring: yea, what speake I of earth? The God of Nature, the Saviour of men, hath trod the same steps of death; and doe we thinke much to follow him? How many servants have we known, that have thrust themselves betwixt their Master and death, which have died, that their Master might not die? and shall we repine to die with ours? How truly may we say of this our David, Thou art worth ten thousand of us; yea, worth a world of Angels? yet he died, and died for us. Who would live, that knowes his Saviour died? who can be a Christian, and would not be like him? Who can be like him, that would not die after him? Thinke of this, and judge whether all the world can hire us not to die. I need not aske you whether you loved those whom you have lost: Could you not love them, and not wish they might be happy? could they be happy, and not die? In truth, nature knowes what she would have; We can neither abide our friends miserable in their stay, nor happy in their departure: We love our selves so well, that we cannot be content they should gaine by our losse. The excuse of your sorrow is, that you mourne for your selfe. True: but compare these two, and see whether your losse or their gaine be greater. For if their advantage exceed your losse; take heed, lest while you bewray your love in mourning for them, it appeare that you love but your selfe in them. They are gone to their preferment, and you lament: your love is injurious. If they were vanished to nothing, I could not blame you, tho you tooke up Rachels lamentation. But now, you know they are in surer hands than your owne: you know, that he hath taken them, which hath undertaken to keepe them, to bring them againe: You know it is but a sleepe, which is miscalled Death; and that they shall, they must awake, as sure as they lie downe; and wake more fresh, more glorious, than when you shut their eyes. What doe we with Christianity, if we beleeve not this? and if we doe beleeve it, why doe we mourne as the hopelesse? But the matter, perhaps, is not so heavy as the circumstance: Your crosses came sudden, and thicke; You could not breathe from your first losse, ere you felt a worse. As if he knew not this, that sent both: As if he did it not on purpose. His proceedings seeme harsh; are most wise, most just. It is our fault, that they seeme otherwise than they are. Doe we thinke, we could carve better for our selves? O the mad insolence of Nature, that dares controll, where she should wonder! Presumptuous clay! that will be checking the Potter. Is his wisdome, himselfe? Is he, in himselfe, infinite? Is his Decree out of his wisdome; and doe we murmur? Doe we, foolish wormes, turne againe when he treads upon us? What? doe you repine at that which was good for you, yea best? That is best for us which God seeth best: and that he seeth best, which he doth. This is Gods doing. Kisse his rod in silence, and give glory to the hand that rules it. His will is the rule of his actions; and his goodnesse, of his will. Things are good to us, because he wils them: He wils them, because they are good to himselfe. It is your glory that he intends, in your so great affliction. It is no praise to wade over a shallow Ford, but to cut the swelling waves of the Deepe, commends both our strength and skill. It is no victory, to conquer an easie and weake crosse. These maine evils have crownes answerable to their difficulty: Wrestle once and goe away with a blessing. Be patient in this losse, and you shall once triumph in your gaine. Let God have them with cheerefulnesse, and you shall enjoy God with them in glory.

To M. I. A. Merchant.

EPIST. X. Against sorrow for worldly losses.

IT is fitter for me to beginne with chiding, than with advice: what meanes this weake distrust? Goe on, and I shall doubt whether I write to a Christian. You have lost your heart, together with your wealth; How can I but feare, lest this Mammon was your God? Hence was Gods jealousie in removing it; and hence your immoderate teares for losing it. If thus; God had not loved you, if he had not made you poore. To some, it is an advantage to leese: you could not have been at once thus rich, and good. Now, heaven is open to you, which was shut before, and could never have given you entrance, with that load of iniquity. If you be wise in managing your affliction, you have changed the world for God, a little drosse for heaven. Let me ever lose thus, and smart when I complaine.

But you might have at once retained both. The stomack, that is purged, must be content to part with some good nourishment, that it may deliver it selfe of more evill humors: God saw (that knowes it) you could not hold him so strongly, while one of your hands was so fastned upon the world. You see, many make themselves wilfully poore: why cannot you be content God should impoverish you? If God had willed their povertie, he would have commanded it: if he had not willed yours, he would not have effected it. It is a shame for a Christian, to see an Heathen Philosopher laugh at his owne shipwracke; while himselfe howles out, as if all his felicitie were imbarked with his substance. How should we scorne, to think that an heathen man should laugh either at our ignorance, or impotence? ignorance, if we thought too highly of earthly things; impotence, if we over-loved them. The feare of some evils is worse than the sense. To speake ingenuously; I could never see, wherein poverty deserved so hard a conceit. It takes away the delicacie of fare, softnesse of lodging, gaynesse of attire, and perhaps brings with it contempt: this is the worst, and all. View it now on the better side: Loe, their quiet security, sound sleeps, sharp appetite, free meriment; no feares, no cares, no suspition, no distempers of excesse, no discontentment. If I were Judge, my tongue should be unjust, if poverty went away weeping. I cannot see, how the evills it brings, can compare with those which it removes; how the discommodities should match the blessings of a meane estate. What are those you have lost, but false friends, miserable comforters? Else they had not left you. Oh slight and fickle stay, that winds could bereave you of! If your care could goe with them, here were no damage: and, if it goe not with them, it is your fault. Grieve more for your fault, than for your losse. If your negligence, your riotous mis-pence had empaired your estate, then Satan had impoverisht you; now would I have added to your griefe, for your sinne, not for your affliction: but now, since winds and waters have done it as the officers of their Maker; why should you not say with me, as I with Iob, The Lord hath taken? Use your losse well, and you shall find that God hath crossed you with a blessing. And if it were worse than the world esteemes it, yet thinke not what you feele, but what you deserve: You are a stranger to your selfe, if you confesse not that God favours you in this whip. If he had stripped you of better things, and scourged you with worse, you should still have acknowledged a mercifull justice: if you now repine at a easie correction, you are worthy of severity. Beware the next, if you grudge and swell at this. It is next to nothing which you suffer: what can be further from us, than these goods of outward estate? You need not abate either health, or mirth for their sakes. If you doe now draw the affliction neerer than he which sent it, and make a forren evill domesticall; if while God visits your estate, you fetch it home, to your body, to your mind; thanke your selfe that you will needs be miserable: But if you love not to fare ill; take crosses as they are sent, and goe lightly away with an easie burden.

THE THIRD DECAD.

To M. Smith, and M. Rob. Ring-leaders of the late Separation at Amsterdam.

EPIST. I. Setting forth their injury done to the Church, the injustice of their cause, and fearefulnesse of their offence: Censuring and advising them.

WE heare of your separation, and mourne; yet not so much for you, as for your wrong: you could not doe a greater injury to your Mother, then to flie from her. Say she were poore, ragged, weake; say she were deformed; yet she is not infectious: Or if she were, yet she is yours. This were cause enough for you, to lament her, to pray for her, to labour for her redresse, not to avoid her: This unnaturalnesse is shamefull; and more hainous in you, who are reported not parties in this evill, but authors. Your flight is not so much, as your mis-guidance. Plead not: this fault is past excuse. If we all should follow you, this were the way, of a Church (as you plead) imperfect, to make no Church; and of a remedie, to make a disease. Still the fruit of our charity to you, is, besides our griefe, pitie. Your zeale of truth hath misled you, and you others: A zeale, if honest, yet blind-folded, and led by selfe-will. O that you loved Peace, but halfe so well as Truth: then, this breach had never beene: and you that are yet brethren, had beene still companions. Goe out of Babylon, you say; The voice not of Schisme, but of holinesse. Know you where you are? Looke about you, I beseech you, looke behind you; and see if we have not left it upon our backs. Shee herselfe feels, and sees that she is abandoned: and complaines to all the world, that we have not onely forsaken, but spoiled her; and yet you say, Come out of Babylon. And except you will be willingly blind, you may see the heaps of her Altars, the ashes of her Idols, the ruines of her monuments, the condemnation of her errours, the revenge of her abominations. And are we yet in Babylon? Is Babylon yet amongst us? Where are the maine buildings of that accursed City, those high and proud Towers of their universall Hierarchie, infallible judgement, dispensation with the Lawes of God, and sinnes of men; disposition of Kingdomes, deposition of Princes, parting stakes with God in our conversion, through freedome of will; in our salvation, through the merit of our works? Where are those rotten heaps (rotten, not through age, but corruption) of transubstantiating of bread, adoring of Images, multitude of Sacraments, power of Indulgences, necessitie of Confessions, profit of Pilgrimages, constrained and approved Ignorance, unknowne Devotions? Where are those deepe vaults (if not mynes) of Penances and Purgatories, and whatsoever hath beene devised by those Popelings, whether profitable or glorious, against the Lord and his Christ? Are they not all raised, and buried in the dust? Hath not the Majesty of her Gods, like as was done to Mithra, and Serapis, been long agone offered red to the publique laughter of the vulgar? What is this but to goe, yea to run (if not to flie) out of Babylon? But (as [illegible] and it is a desperate cause that hath [illegible] ceremonies, and say still we tarry in the [illegible]. Christian, [illegible] as an enemie can make them, or can pretend [illegible]. You [illegible] walls of Babylon stand upon Ceremonies. Substantiall [illegible] foundation, and frame. These rituall obstructions are [illegible] ed, rather like to some Fane upon the [illegible]; for ordinance, [illegible] but not necessary appendances. If you take the [illegible], you wrong the Church; if thus, and yet depart, you wrong [illegible] if you would have perswaded righteous Lot not to stay in Zoar, [illegible]. I feare, if you had seene the money-changers in the Temple, how ever you would have prayed, or taught there: Christ did it, not forsaking the place, but scourging the offenders: And this is the valour of Christian teachers: To oppose abuses, not to runne away from them: Where shall you not thus find Babylon? Would you have run away from Geneva, because of her wafers? Or from Corinth, for her disordered love-feasts? Either run out of the world, or your flight is in vaine. If experience of change teach you not, that you shall find your Babylon every where, returne not. Compare the place you have left, with that you have chosen, let not feare of seeming to repent oversoone, make you partiall. Loe, there is a common harbour of all opinions, of all heresies; if not a mixture. Here you drew in the free and cleare aire of the Gospell, without that odious composition of Iudaisme, Arrianisme, Anabaptisme: There you live in the stench of these and more. You are unworthy of pitie, if you will approve your misery. Say if you can, that the Church of England (if she were not yours) is not as heaven to Amsterdam. How is it then, that our gnats are harder to swallow, then their camels? and that whiles all Christendome magnifies our happinesse, and applauds it, your handfull alone, so detests our enormities, that you despise our graces? See whether in this you make not God a loser. The thank of all his favours is lost, because you want more: and in the meane time, who gaines by this sequestration, but Rome and Hell? How doe they insult in this advantage, that our mothers owne children condemne her for uncleane, that we are daily weakned by our divisions, that the rude multitude hath so palpable a motive to distrust us? Sure, you intended it not: but, if you had beene their hired Agent, you could not have done our enemies greater service. The God of heaven open your eyes, that you may see the injustice of that zeale which hath transported you; and turne your heart to an endeavour of all Christian satisfaction: otherwise, your soules shall find too late, that it had beene a thousand times better to swallow a Ceremonie, then to rend a Church: yea, that even whoredomes and murders shall abide an easier answer then separation. I have done, if onely I have advised you of that fearefull threatning of the Wiseman: The eye that mocketh his father, and despiseth the government of his mother, the Ravens of the valley shall picke it out, and the young Eagles eat it.

To Sir Andrew Asteley.

Ep. II. A discourse of our due preparation for death, and the meanes to sweeten it to us.

SInce I saw you, I saw my father die: How boldly and merrily did he passe throw the gates of death, as if they had had no terror, but much pleasure! Oh that I could as easily imitate, as not forget him! We know we must tread the same way; how happy, if with the same mind? Our life, as it gives way to death, so must make way for it: it will be, though we will not: it will not be happie, without our will, without our preparation. It is the best and longest lesson, to learne how to die; and of surest use: which alone if we take not out, it were better not to have lived. Oh vaine studies of men, how to walke thorough Rome streets all day in the shade, how to

A to ſquare circles, how to ſalve up the celeſtiall motions, how to correct miſ-written copies, to fetch up old words from forgetfulneſſe, and a thouſand other like points of idle skill; whiles the maine care of life and death is neglected! There is an Art of this, infallible, eternall both in truth, and uſe: for though the meanes be divers, yet the laſt act is ſtill the ſame, and the diſpoſition of the ſoule need not be other: it is all one whether a fever bring it, or a ſword; wherein yet, after long profeſſion of other ſciences, I am ſtill (why ſhould I ſhame to confeſſe?) a learner; and ſhall be (I hope) whileſt I am: yet it ſhall not repent us, as diligent Schollers repeat their parts unto each other, to be more perfect; ſo mutually to recall ſome of our rules of well-dying: The firſt whereof is a conſcionable life: The next a right apprehenſion of life, and death: I tread in the beaten path; doe you follow me. To live holily, is the way to die ſafely, happily. If death be terrible, yet innocence is bold, and will neither feare it ſelfe, nor let us feare; where contrariwiſe wickedneſſe is cowardly, and cannot abide either any glimpſe of light, or ſhew of danger. Hope doth not more draw our eies forward, then conſcience turnes them backward, and forces us to looke behind us; affrighting us even with our paſt evils. Beſides the paine of death, every ſin is a new Fury to torment the ſoule, and to make it loth to part. How can it chuſe, when it ſees on the one ſide, what evill it hath done; on the other, what evill it muſt ſuffer? It was a cleare heart (what elſe could doe it?) that gave ſo bold a forehead to that holy Biſhop, who durſt on his death-bed profeſſe, I have ſo lived, as I neither feare to die, nor ſhame to live. What care we when we be found, if wel-doing? What care we how ſuddenly, when our preparation is perpetuall? What care we how violently, when C ſo many inward friends (ſuch are our good actions) give us ſecret comfort? There is no good Steward, but is glad of his Audit; his ſtraitgh accounts deſire nothing more then a diſcharge: onely the doubtfull and untruſty feares of his reckoning. Neither only doth the want of integrity make us timorous, but of wiſdome, in that our ignorance cannot equally value, either the life which we leave, or the death we expect. We have long converſed with this life, and yet are unacquainted: how ſhould we then know that death we never ſaw; or that life which followes that death?

These cottages have beene ruinous, and we have not thought of their fall: our way hath beene deepe, and we have not looked for our reſt. Shew me ever any man that knew what life was; and was loth to leave it. I will ſhew you a priſoner that would dwell in his Goale, a ſlave that likes to be chained to his Galley. What is there here, D but darkneſſe of ignorance, diſcomfort of events, impotency of body, vexation of conſcience, diſtemper of paſſions, complaint of eſtate, feares and ſenſe of evill, hopes and doubts of good, ambitious rackings, covetous toyles, envious underminings, irkſome diſappointments, weary ſocieties, reſtleſſe deſires, and many worlds of diſcontentments in this one? What wonder is it that we would live? We laugh at their choice that are in love with the deformed; and what a face is this we dote upon? See if ſinnes, and cares, and croſſes, have not (like a filthy Morphew) overſpead it, and made it loathſome to all judicious eyes. I marvell then, that any wiſemen could be other but Stoicks; and could have any conceit of life, but contemptuous; not more for the miſery of it, while it laſteth, then for the not laſting: we may love it, we cannot hold it. What a ſhadow of a ſmoake, what a dreame of a ſhaE dow is this, we affect? Wiſe Salomon ſayes, there is a time to be borne, and a time to die: you doe not heare him ſay, a time to live. What is more flitting then time? Yet life is not long enough to be worthy of the title of time. Death borders upon our birth, and our cradle ſtands in our grave. We lament the loſſe of our parents: how ſoone ſhall our ſonnes bewaile ours? Loe, I that write this, and you that reade it, how long are we here? It were well, if the world were as our tent, yea as our Inne; if not to lodge, yet to bait in: but now it is onely our thorowfare, one generation paſſeth, another commeth; none ſtayeth. If this earth were a Paradiſe, and this which we call our life were ſweet as the joyes above, yet how ſhould this fickleneſſe of it coole our delight? Grant it abſolute, who can eſteeme a vaniſhing pleaſure? How much more now, when the drammes of our honey are loſt in pounds of gall; when our contentments are as far from ſincerity as continuance? Yet the true apprehenſion of life (though joyned with contempt) is not enough to ſettle us, if either we be ignorant of death, or ill perſwaded: for if life have not worth enough to allure us, yet death hath horror enough to affright us. He that would die chearefully, muſt know death his friend: what is he but the faithfull officer of our Maker, who ever ſmiles or frownes with his Maſter; neither can either ſhew or nouriſh enmitie, where God favours: when he comes fiercely, and puls a man by the throat, and ſummons him to Hell, who can but tremble? The meſſenger is terrible; but the meſſage worſe: hence have riſen the miſerable deſpaires, and furious ravings of the ill conſcience, that finds no peace within, leſſe without. But when he comes ſweetly, not as an executioner, but as a guide to glory, and profers his ſervice, and ſhewes our happineſſe, and opens the doore to our heaven; how worthy is he of entertainment? how worthy of gratulation? But his ſalutation is painfull, if courteous, what then? The Phyſitian heales us, not without paine, and yet we reward him. It is unthankfulneſſe to complaine, where the anſwer of profit is exceſſive. Death paineth: how long? how much? with what proportion to the ſequell of joy? O Death, if thy pangs be grievous; yet thy reſt is ſweet. The conſtant expectation that hath poſſeſſed that reſt, hath already ſwallowed thoſe pangs, and makes the Chriſtian at once wholly dead to his paine, wholly alive to his glory. The ſoule hath not leiſure to care for her ſuffering, that beholds her crowne; which if ſhe were conjoyned to fetch thorow the flames of Hell, her faith would not ſtick at the condition. Thus in briefe, he that lives Chriſtianly, ſhall die boldly; he that finds his life ſhort and miſerable, ſhall die willingly; he that knowes death, and foreſees glory, ſhall die cheerfully and deſirouſly.

To M. Samuel Burton, Arch-deacon of Gloceſter.

EP. III. A diſcourſe of the tryall and choice of the true Religion.

Sir: This diſcourſe injoyned by you, I ſend to your cenſure, to your diſpoſing; but to the uſe of others. Vpon your charge I have written it for the wavering. If it ſeeme worthy, communicate it; elſe it is but a daſh of your pen. I feare onely the brevity: a Volumne were too little for this Subject. It is not more yours then the Author. Farewell.

WE doe not more affect varietie in all other things, then we abhorre it in Religion. Even thoſe which have held the greateſt falſhoods, hold that there is but one truth. I never read of more then one Heretick, that held all Hereſies true; neither did his opinion ſeeme more incredible, then the relation of it. God can neither be multiplied, nor Chriſt divided: if his coat might be parted, his body was intire. For that then all ſides challenge truth, and but one can poſſeſſe it; let us ſee who have found it, who enjoy it.

There are not many Religions that ſtrive for it, tho many opinions. Every Hereſie, albeit fundamentall, makes not a Religion. We ſay not, The Religion of Arrians, Neſtorians, Sabellians, Macedonians, but the ſect or hereſie. No opinion challenges this name in our uſuall ſpeech, (for I diſcuſſe not the proprietie) but that which, ariſing from many differences, hath ſetled it ſelfe in the world, upon her owne principles, not without an univerſall diviſion. Such may ſoone be counted. Though it is true, there are by ſo much too many, as there are more then one. Five religions then there are by this rule, upon earth, which ſtand in competition for truth; Iewiſh, Turkiſh, Greekiſh, Papiſh, Reformed; whereof each pleads for it ſelfe, with diſgrace of the other. The plaine Reader doubts, how he may ſit Judge in ſo high a plea; God hath put this perſon upon him; while he chargeth him to trie the Spirits; to retaine the good, reject the evill: If ſtill he plead with Moſes, inſufficiency; let him but attend: God ſhall decide the caſe in his ſilence, without difficulty. The Jew hath little to ſay for himſelfe, but impudent denials of our Chriſt, of their Prophecies: whoſe very refuſall of him, more

ſtrongly

A strongly proves him the true Messias; neither could he be justified to be that Saviour, if they rejected him not; since the Prophets fore-saw and fore-told, not their repelling of him only, but their reviling. If there were no more arguments, God hath so mightily confuted them from heaven, by the voice of his judgement, that all the world hisseth at their conviction. Loe their very sinne is capitally written in their desolation, and contempt. One of their owne late Doctors seriously expostulates in a relenting Letter to another of his fellow Rabbins, what might be the cause of so long and desperate a ruine of their Israel; and comparing their former captivities with their former sins, argues (and yet feares to conclude) that this continuing punishment must needs be sent for some sinne so much greater then Idolatry, Oppression, Sabbath-breaking; by how much this plague is more grievous then all the
B other: Which, his feare tels him (and he may beleeve it) can be no other, but the murder and refusall of their true Messias. Let now all the Doctors of those obstinate Synagogues, answer this doubt of their owne objecting: But how, past all contradiction, is the ancient witnesse of all the holy Prophets, answered and confirmed by their events? whose foresayings verified in all particular issues, are more then demonstrative. No art can describe a thing past, with more exactnesse, then they did this Christ to come. What circumstance is there, that hath not his prediction? Have they not fore-written who should be his mother, a Virgin: Of what Tribe, of Iudah: Of what house, of David: What place, Bethlem: What time, when the scepter should be taken from Iudah: Or after sixty nine weeks: What name, Iesus, Immanuel: What habitation,
C Nazareth: What harbinger, Iohn, the second Elias: What his businesse, to preach, save, deliver: What entertainment, rejection: What death, the Crosse: What manner, piercing the body, not breaking the bones: What company, amidst two wicked ones: Where, at Ierusalem: Where abouts, without the Gates: With what words, of imploration: what draught, of Vinegar and Gall: Who was his Traitor, and with what successe? If all the Synagogues of the Circumcision, all the Gates of Hell, can obscure these evidences, let me be a Proselyte. My labour herein is so much lesse, as there is lesse danger of Judaisme. Our Church is well rid of that accursed Nation, whom yet
D Rome harbours, and, in a fashion, graces: whiles in stead of spitting at, or that their Neapolitan correction whereof Gratian speakes, the Pope solemnly receives at their hands, that Bible, which they at once approve, and overthrow. But would God there were no more Iewes then appeare. Even in this sense also he is a Iew, that is one within: plainly, whose heart doth not sincerely confesse his Redeemer. Though a Christian Iew is no other then an Atheist; and therefore must be scourged elsewhere. The Iew thus answered: The Turke stands out for his Mahomet, that cousening Arabian,
E whose Religion (if it deserve that name) stands upon nothing but rude ignorance and palpable Imposture. Yet loe here a subtill Devill in a grosse religion: For when he saw that he could not by single twists of heresie pull downe the well built walls of the Church; he windes them all up in one Cable, to see if his cord of so many folds might happily prevaile: raising up wicked Mahomet, to deny with Sabellius the distinction of persons, with Arrius Christs divinity, with Macedonius the Deitie of the Holy Ghost, with Sergius two wills in Christ, with Marcion Christs suffering: And these policies seconded with violence, how have they wasted Christendome? O damnable mixture, miserably successefull! which yet could not have beene, but that it meets with sottish Clients, and soothes up nature, and debarres both all knowledge, and contraction. What is their Alcoran, but a fardle of fooliſh impossibilities? Whosoever shall heare me relate the stories of Angell Adriels death, Seraphuels trumpet, Gabriels bridge, Horroth and Marroths hanging, the Moones descending into Mahomets sleeve, the Litter wherein he saw God carried by eight Angels, their ridiculous and swinish Paradise, and thousands of the same bran; would say, that Mahomet hoped to meet either with beasts, or mad-men. Beside these barbarous fictions, behold their lawes, full of licence, full of impietie: in which, revenge is encouraged, multitude of wives allowed, theft tolerated; and the frame of their opinions such, as well bewrayes their whole religion to be but the mungrell issue of an Arrian, Iew, Nestorian, and Arabian: A monster of many ſeeds, and all accurſed; In both which regards, Nature her ſelfe, in whoſe breſt God hath written his royall Law (though in part, by her defaced) hath light enough to condemne a Turke, as the worſt Pagan. Let no man look for further diſproofe. Theſe follies, a wiſe Chriſtian will ſcorne to confute, and ſcarce vouchſafe to langh at.

The Greekiſh Church (ſo the Ruſſes tearme themſelves) put in the next claime, but with no better ſucceſſe, whoſe infinite Clergie affords not a man that can give either reaſon or account of their owne Doctrine. Theſe are the baſeſt dregs of all Chriſtians, ſo we favourably tearme them; tho they perhaps in more ſimplicity then wilfulneſſe, would admit none of all the other Chriſtian world to their font, but thoſe, who in a ſolemne renunciation, ſpit at, & abjure their former God, Religion, Baptiſme; yet peradventure we might more juſtly tearme them Nicholaitans, for that obſcure Saint (if a Saint, if honeſt) by an unequall diviſion, finds more hõmage from them then his maſter. Theſe are as ignorant as Turks, as idolatrous as Heathens, as obſtinate as Jewes, and more ſuperſtitious then Papiſts. To ſpeak ingenuouſly from that I have heard and read; if the worſt of the Romiſh religion, and the beſt of the Muſcovitiſh be compared, the choice will be hard whether ſhould be leſſe ill. I labour the leſſe in all theſe, whoſe remoteneſſe and abſurditie ſecure us from infection, and whoſe onely name is their confutation. I deſcend to that maine rivall of Truth, which creeps into her boſome, and is not leſſe neere then ſubtile, the religion (if not rather the faction) of Papiſme, whoſe plea is importunate, and ſo much more dangerous, as it caries fairer probability. Since then of all religions the Chriſtian obtaineth, let us ſee of thoſe that are called Chriſtians, which ſhould command aſſent & profeſſion. Every religion beares in her lineaments the image of her parent: the true Religion therefore is ſpirituall, and looks like God in her puritie: all falſe religions are carnall, and carie the face of Nature, their mother, and of him whoſe illuſion begot them, Satan. In ſumme, Nature never conceived any which did not favour her, nor the Spirit any which did not oppugne her. Let this then be the Lydian ſtone of this triall; we need no more. Whether religion ſoever doth more plauſibly content Nature, is falſe, whether gives more ſincere glory to God, is his Truth. Lay aſide prejudice: Whither I beſeech you tendeth all popery, but to make Nature either vainly proud, or careleſſy wanton? What can more advance her pride, then to tell her, that ſhe hath in her own hands freedome enough of will (with a little prevention) to prepare her ſelfe to her juſtification; that ſhe hath (whereof to rejoyce) ſomewhat, which ſhe hath not received, that if God pleaſe but to unfetter her, ſhe can walke alone? She is inſolent enough of her ſelfe; this flattery is enough to make her mad of conceit. After this; That if God will but beare halfe the charges by his cooperation, ſhe may undertake to merit her owne glory, and brave God in the proofe of his moſt accurate judgement; to fulfill the whole royall Law; and that from the ſuperfluity of her owne ſatisfactions, ſhe may be abundantly beneficiall to her neighbours; that naturally without faith a man may do ſome good workes; that we may repoſe confidence in our merits. Neither is our good only by this flattery extolled, but our ill alſo diminiſhed; our evills are our ſinnes; ſome of them (they ſay) are in their nature veniall, and not worthy of death: more, that our originall ſinne is but the want of our firſt juſtice; no guilt of our firſt fathers offence; no inherent ill diſpoſition; and that by Baptiſmall water is taken away what ever hath the nature of ſinne; that a meere man (let me not wrong Saint Peters ſucceſſor, in ſo tearming him) hath power to remit both puniſhment and ſinne, paſt and future; that many have ſuffered more then their ſinnes have required: that the ſufferings of the Saints added to Chriſts paſſions, make up the treaſure of the Church, that ſpirituall Exchequer; whereof their Biſhop muſt keepe the key, and make his friends. In all theſe the gaine of Nature (who ſees not?) is Gods loſſe: all her bravery is ſtolne from above: beſides thoſe other direct derogations from him; that his Scriptures are not ſufficient; that their originall fountaines are corrupted, and the ſtreames runne clearer; that there is a multitude (if a finite number) of Mediators. Turne your eyes now to us, and ſee contrarily how we abaſe Nature, how we knead her in the duſt; ſpoiling her of her proud rags, loading her with reproches; and giving glory to him, that ſayes, he will not give it to another; whiles we teach, that we neither have

A have good, nor can doe good of our selves; that we are not sicke or fettered, but dead in our sin; that we cannot move to good, more then we are moved; that our best actions are faulty; our satisfactions debts, our deserts damnation; that all our merit is his mercy that saves us; that every of our sinnes is deadly; every of our natures originally depraved, and corrupted; that nowater can entirely wash away the filthinesse of our concupiscence; that none but the blood of him that was God, can clense us; that all our possible sufferings are below our offences; that Gods written word is all-sufficient to informe us, to make us both wise and perfect; that Christs mediation is more then sufficent to save us, his sufferings to redeeme us, his obedience to inrich us. You have seene how Papistry makes Nature proud: now see how it makes her lawlesse and wanton: while it teacheth (yet this one, not so universally) that Christ died
B effectually for all; that in true contrition an expresse purpose of new life is not necessary; that wicked men are true members of the Church; that a lewd-miscreant or infidell in the bussinesse of the Altar partakes of the true body and blood of Christ, yea (which I shame to tell) a brute creature; that men may save the labour of searching, for that it is both easie and safe (with that Catholike Collier) to beleeve with the Church, at a venture: more then so, that devotion is the seed of ignorance; that there is infallibilitie annexed to a particular place and person; that the bare act of the Sacraments confers grace without faith; that the meer signe of the Crosse made by a Jew or Infidell, is of force to drive away Devils; that the sacrifice of the Masse in the very worke wrought, availes to obtaine pardon of our sinnes, not in our life onely,
C but when we lie frying in purgatory; that we need not pray in faith to be heard, or in understanding, that almes given, merit heaven, dispose to justification, satisfie God for sinne; that abstinence from some meates and drinkes is meritorious; that Indulgences may be granted to dispence with all the penance of sin afterward to be committed; that these by a living man may be applied to the dead; that one man may deliver anothers soule out of his purging torments; and therefore, that he whosoeuer hath not either money or friends, need not feare the smart of his sinnes. O religion worst to the wealthy, to the needy desperate! who will now care hereafter how sound his devotions be, how lewd his life, how heinous his sin, that knowes these refuges? On the contrary, we curbe Nature, we restraine, we discourage, we fight with her, teaching her not to rest in implicit faith, or generall intention, or external acts of D pietie, or presumptuous dispensations of men: but to strive unto sincere faith, without which we have no part in Christ, in his Church, no benefit by sacraments, prayers, fastings, beneficences: to set the heart on worke in all our devotions, without which the hand and tongue are but hypocrites: to set the hands on worke in good actions, without which the presuming heart is but an hypocrite: to expect no pardon for sin before we commit it, and from Christ alone when we have committed it, & to repent before we expect it: to hope for no chastening, no welcome of our sinfull state hereafter, no contrary change of estate after dissolution: that life is the time of mercy, death of retribution. Now let me appeale to your soule, and to the judgement of all the world, whether of these two religions is framed to the liberties of sinne, yea let the E know what action Popery requires of any of her followers, reliefe under. Nature hath not done, cannot doe so much, I have chosen to bear them mis-reliefe of those with they think we have so much injured, for what wrath hath he not powred downe against us, then this of ease and liberty, yea licence given and taken by our disciplines together with the upbraidings of their owne strict and rigorous and expensive. Where are our penall works, our fastings, scourges, hairecloth, watchings, pilgrimages, bleeding confessions, solemne vowes of willing beggery and perpetuall continency? and for them right, we yeeld, in all the hard straits of will-worship they goe beyond us, but (lest they should insult in the victory) not so much as the Priests of Baal were duly and them. I see their whips, shew me their knives. Where did ever any of them cut lance and carve his flesh in devotion? The Israelites did it, and yet even they were ever the holier. Either therefore this rule is not to them, or their other devotions make them not better then we, or it makes the Israelites better then they: take your choyce. Alas, these difficulties are but a colour to avoid greater: no, no, we are stubborne stubborne wills to subjection, to draw this untoward flesh to a sincere cheerfulnesse in Gods service: to reach unto a sound beleefe in the Lord Jesus, to pray with a true heart, without distraction, without diffidence, without self-conceit: to keepe the heart in continuall awe of God: These are the hard tasks of a Christian, worthy of our sweat, worthy of our rejoycing: all which that Babylonish religion shifteth off with a careless fashionablenesse, as if it had not to doe with the soule. Give us obedience: let them take sacrifice. Doe you yet looke for more evidence? look into particulars, and satisfie your selfe in Gods decision, as Ozias advised of old. Since the goods of our fathers are in question, whither should we goe but to his Will and Testament? My soule beare the danger of this bold assertion. If we erre, we erre with Christ and his Apostles. In a word, against all staggering, our Saviours rule is sure and eternall: If any man will doe my Fathers will, he shall know of the doctrine whether it be of God.

To M. Edmund Sleigh.

EP. IV. A discourse of the hardnesse of Christianity, and the abundant recompence of the pleasures and commodities of that profession.

HOw hard a thing it is (deare Uncle) to be a Christian! perhaps others are lesse dull and more quiet, more waxen to the impressions of grace, and lesse troublesome to themselves, I accuse none, but whom I dare, my selfe. Even easie businesses are hard to the weake: let others boast, I must complaine. To keep our station is hard; harder to move forward. One while I scarce restrain my unruly desires, from evill: after, can find no lust to good. My heart will be either vaine or fallen: when I am wrought with much sweat to detest sin, and distaste the world, yet who shall raise up this drosse to a spirituall joy? Sometimes I purpose well, and if those thoughts (not mine) begin to lift me from my earth, loe, he that rules in the aire, stoops upon me with powerfull suggestion, or the world pulls me downe with a sweet violence, so as I know not whether I be forced, or perswaded to yeeld: I find much weaknesse in my selfe, but more treachery. How willing am I to be deceived! How loth to be reformed! Good duties seem harsh, and can scarcely escape the repulse, or delay of excuses, and not, without much strife grow to any relish of pleasure; and when they are at best, cannot avoid the mixture of many infirmities: which do at once disquiet, and discourage the mind, not suffering it to rest in what it would have done, and could not. And if after many sighs and teares, I have attained to doe well, and resolve better, yet this good estate is far from constant, & easily inclining to change. And whiles I strive, in spight of my naturall feeblenesse, to hold my owne with some progresse and gaine, what difficulty doe I find, what opposition? O God, what adversaries hast thou provided for us weake men! what incounters! Malicious and subtill spirits, an alluring world, a perpetuall and stubborn nature. Force and fraud do their worst to us; sometimes by the first, they meet spirituall enemies, I see them not, and complain to feele them too much: Other whiles my spirituall eies see them with amazement, and I (like a cowardly Souldier) am ready to flee, and plead their measure, for my feare: Who is able to stand before the sons of Anak? Some other times I stand still, and (as I can) weakly resist, but am edified with indignation, and shame. Then againe I rise up, not without trembling and sweat: and with more hearty resistance prevaile, and triumph, when suddenly, ere I am aware, with a sudden and unlooked assault, I am caried away captive, whither I would not: and mourning for my discomfiture, study for a feeble revenge: My quarrell is good, but my strength maintaines it not; It is now long ere I can recover my late overthrow, and find my selfe whole of these wounds. Besides Suggestions, Corruptions, Delays, and workes of a frail distemper in a mind sure and unfeigned, whose two chiefe parts (Understanding and Will) are then most troubled, when they are most renewed, I finde my selfe exercised with fears: fainteth evils, or my unruly passions raise clamors within me, which breed much trouble, whether in satisfying or suppressing: not to speak, that sinne is attended, besides unquietnesse, with terror?

Now

Now you say; Alas! Christianity is hard. I grant it: but gainefull and happy. I contemne the difficulty, when I respect the advantage. The greatest labours that have answerable requitals, are lesse than the least that have no regard. Believe me, when I looke to the reward, I would not have the worke easier. It is a good Master whom we serve, who not only rates, but gives, not after the proportion of our earnings, but of his owne mercy. If every paine that we suffer were a death, and every crosse an hell, we have amends enough. It were injurious to complain of the measure, when we acknowledge the recompence. Away with these weake dislikes: though I should buy it dearer, I would be a Christian. Any thing may make me out of love with my selfe, nothing with my profession: I were unworthy of his favour if I could repent to have endured herein alone I am safe, herein I am blessed. I may be all other things, and yet with that dying Emperour complaine, with my last breath, That I am no-whit the better: let me be a Christian, I am privileged from miseries, hell cannot touch me, death cannot hurt me. No evill can arrest me, while I am under the protection of him, which over-rules all good and evill: yea so soone as it touches me, it turns good, and being sent and suborned by my spirituall adversaries to betray me, now in an happy change it fights for me, & is driven rather to rebell, then wrong me. It is a bold and strange word: No price could buy of me the gaine of my stones: That which while I repented, I would have expiated with blood, now after my repentance I forgoe not for a world, the fruit of having sinned (if not rather of having repented.) Besides my freedome, how large is my possession? All good things are mine, to challenge, to enjoy. I cannot looke beyond my owne, not besides it, and the things that I cannot see, I dare claime no lesse. The heaven that rowles so gloriously above my head is mine, by this right: yea, those celestiall spirits, the better part of that high creation, watch me in my bed, guard me in my wayes, helpe me in my dangers, comfort me in my troubles, and are ready to receive that soule which they have kept. What speake I of creatures? The God of spirits is mine; and by a sweet and secret union, I am become an heire of his glory, yea (as it were) a limbe of him selfe. O blessed Jesu! worthy of difficulty, worthy of paine. What thou wilt, Lord, so may it be mine, what thou wilt. When I have done all, when I have suffered all, thou exceedst more then I want. Follow me then, deare Uncle, or (if you will) lead me rather (as you have done) in these steps, and from the rough way, looke to the end. Overlooke these trifling grievances, and fasten your eyes upon the happy recompence; and see if you cannot scorne to complaine. Pitie those that take not your paines, and perfist with courage till you feele the weight of your Crowne.

To M. W. L.

Perswading the cause of his unfeelingnesse in religion, which is pleaded to be our dissensions; shewing the insufficiencie of that Motive, and comparing the state of our Church herein, with the Romish.

I Would I know where to find you, then I could tell how to direct aime, whereas now I must rove and conjecture. To day you are in the center of the Romanists, to morrow in ours, the next day between both, against both. Old adherents think you ours, wethers, your conscience finds you with both, and neither: I flatter you not: this of yours is the worst of all tempers: heat and cold have their uses; luke-warmnesse is good for nothing, but to trouble the stomach. Those that are spiritually hot, find acceptation; those that are starke cold, have a better choosing: but a mean between both, is so much worse, as it comes nearer to good, and attaines it not. How long will you halt in this indifference? Resolve and say, and know at last what you doe hold, what you should. Cast off either your wings or your teeth, and (hating this Bat-like nature) be either a Bird or a beast. To die wavering and uncertain of your selfe will grant fearefull. If I must loose, when begin you? If you will begin, why not now? It is dangerous deferring that, whose want is deadly, and whose opportunity is doubtfull. God cryeth with Iehu, Who is on my side, Who? Look at last out of your window to him, and in a resolute courage cast down this Iezabel that hath bewitched you. Is there any impediment, which delay will abate? is there any which a just answer cannot remove? If you had rather waver, who can settle you? But if you love not inconstancy, tell us why you stagger. Be plaine, or else you will never be firme: What hinders you? Is it our divisions? I see you shake your head at this, and by your silent gesture bewray this the cause of your distaste: Would God I could either deny this with truth, or amend it with teares: But I grant it, with no lesse sorrow, then you with offence. This earth hath nothing more lamentable, then the civill jarres of one faith. What then? Must you defie your mother, because you see your brethren fighting? Their dissension is her griefe: Must she lose some sonnes, because some others quarrell? Doe not so wrong your selfe in afflicting her. Will you love Christ the lesse, because his coat is divided? Yea, let me boldly say; The hemme is torne a little, the garment is whole; or rather it is fretted a little, not torne; or rather the fringe, not the hemme. Behold, here is one Christ, one Creed, one Baptisme, one heaven, one way to it, in summe, one religion, one foundation, and (take away the tumultuous spirits of some rigorous Lutherans) one heart: our differences are those of Paul and Barnabas; not those of Peter and Magus: if they be some, it is well they are no more; if many, that they are not capitall. Shew me that Church, that hath not complained of distraction: yea that familie, yea that fraternitie, yea that man, that alwaies agrees with himselfe. See if the Spouse of Christ, in that heavenly mariage song, doe not call him, a young Hart in the mountaines of division. Tell me then, whither will you goe for truth, if you will allow no truth, but where there is no division? To Rome perhaps, famous for unitie, famous for peace. See now how happily you have chosen, how well you have sped: Loe, there Cardinall Bellarmine himselfe, a witnesse above exception, under his owne hand acknowledgeth to the world, & reckons up a 37. contrarieties of doctrine among the Romish Divines. What need we more evidence? O the perfect accordance of Peters See! worthy to be recorded for a badge of truth. Let now all our adversaries scrape together so many contradictions of opinions amongst us, as they confesse amongst themselves, and be you theirs. No, they are not more peaceable, but more subtle; they have not lesse dissension, but more smothered. They fight closely within doors, without noise, all our fraies are in the field: would God we had as much of their cunning, as they want of our peace, and no more of their policie, then they want of our truth. Our strife is in ceremonies, theirs in substance; ours in one or two points, theirs in all. Take it boldly from him that dares avouch it, there is not one point in all Divinity (except those wherein we accord with them) wherein they all speake the same. If our Church displease you for differences, theirs much more; unlesse you will be either wilfully incredulous, or wilfully partiall: unlesse you dislike a mischiefe the lesse for the secrecie. What will you doe then? Will you be a Church alone? Alas, how full are you of contradictions to your selfe! how full of contrary purposes! how oft doe you chide with your selfe! how oft doe you fight with your selfe! I appeale to that bosome which is privie to those secret combats: beleeve me not, if ever you find perfect unitie any where but above: either goe thither and seeke it amongst those that triumph, or be content with what estate you find in this warfaring number. Truth is in differences, as gold in drosse, wheat in chaffe; will you cast away the best metall, the best graine, because it is mingled with this Offall? Will you rather be poore and hungry, then bestow labour on the fanne, or the furnace? Is there nothing worth your respect, but peace? I have heard that the interlacing of discords graces the best musick; and I know not whether the very evill spirits agree not with themselves. If the body be sound, what though the coat be torne? or if the garment be whole, what if the lace be unripe? Take you peace: let me have truth, I cannot have both. To conclude: Embrace those truths that we all hold; and it greatly matters not what you hold in those wherein we differ: and if you love your safety, seeke rather grounds whereon to rest, then excuses for your unrest. If ever you looke to gaine by the truth, you must both chuse it, and cleave to it: Meere resolution is not enough; except you will rather lose your selfe then it.

EPIST. VII. Discoursing of the different degrees of heavenly glory, and of our mutuall knowledge of each other above.

AS those which never were at home, now after much here-say travelling toward it, aske in the way, What manner of house it is, what seat, what frame, what soile; so do we in the passage to our glory: we are all pilgrims thither; yet so as that some have lookt into it afar thorow the open windows of the Scripture. Go to then: whiles others are inquiring about worldly dignities, and earthly pleasures, let us two sweetly consult of the estate of our future happinesse, yet without presumption, without curiosity. Amongst this infinite choice of thoughts, it hath pleased you to limit our discourse to two heads. You aske first, if the joyes of the glorified Saints shall differ in degrees. I feare not to affirme it. There is one life of all, one felicity; but divers measures. Our heaven begins here, and here varies in degrees. One Christian enjoyes God above another, according as his grace, as his faith is more: and heaven is still like it selfe, not other above from that beneath. As our grace begins our glory, so it proportions it: Blessednesse stands in the perfect operation of the best faculties, about the perfectest object; that is, in the vision, in the fruition of God. All his Saints see him, but some more clearly; as the same Sunne is seene of all eyes, not with equall strength. Such as the eye of our faith was to see him that is invisible, such is the eye of our present apprehension to see as we are seene. Who sees not, that our rewards are according to our works? not for them, as on merit (woe be to that soule which hath but what it earneth) but after them, as their rule of proportion: and these, how sensibly unequall? One gives but a cup of cold water to a disciple, another gives his blood for the Master. Different works have different wages, not of desert, but of mercy. Five talents well imployed, carry away more recompence then two; yet both approved, both rewarded with their Masters joy. Who can stick at this, that knows those heavenly spirits (to whom we shall be like) are marshalled by their Maker into severall ranks? He that was rapt into their element, and saw their blessed orders, as from his owne knowledge, hath stiled them, Thrones, Principalities, Powers, Dominions. If in one part of this Celestiall Family, the great Housholder hath thus ordered it, why not in the other? yea even in this he hath instanced; You shall sit on twelve Thrones, and judge the twelve Tribes of Israel. If he mean not some preheminence to his Apostles, how doth he answer, how doth he satisfie them? Yet more: Lazarus is in Abrahams bosome: therfore Abraham is more honoured then Lazarus. I shall need no more proofes, if from heaven you shall look downe into the great Gulf, and there see diversity of torments according to the value of sinnes. Equality of offences, you acknowledge an idle Paradox of the Stoicks: to hold unequall sins equally punished, were more absurd, and more injurious to Gods justice: There is but one fire, which yet otherwise burns the straw, otherwise wood and yron. He that made and commands this dungeon, these tortures, tells us that the wilfully disobedient shall smart with moe stripes; the ignorant with fewer. Yet so conceive of these heavenly degrees, that the least is glorious. So doe these vessels differ, that all are full: there is no want in any, no envy. Let us strive for a place, not strive for the order: how can we wish to be more then happy?

Your other question is of our mutuall knowledge above; the hope whereof (you think) would give much contentment to the necessity of out parture: for both we are loth not to know those whom we love, and we are glad to thinke we shall know them happy: whereof (if it may comfort you) I am no lesse confident. If I may not goe so farre, as with the best of the Fathers, to say we shall know one anothers thoughts, I dare say, our persons we shall; our knowledge, our memory, are not there lost, but perfected: yea, I feare not to say we shall know both our miseries past, and the present sufferings of the damned. It makes our happinesse not a little the sweeter, to know that we were miserable, to know that others are and must be miserable: wee ſhall know them; not feele them. Take heed, that you clearly diſtinguiſh betwixt ſpeculation and experience. We are then farre out of the reach of evils. We may ſee them to comfort us, not to afflict us. Who doubts that theſe eyes ſhall ſee, and know the glorious manhood of our bleſſed Saviour, advanced above all the powers of heaven? And if one body, why not more? And if our elder brother, why no more of our ſpirituall fraternity? Yea if the twelve thrones of thoſe Judges of Iſrael ſhall be conſpicuous; how ſhall we not acknowledge them? And if theſe, who ſhall reſtraine us from more? You will eaſily grant, that our love can never faile: Faith and hope give place to ſight, to preſent fruition, for theſe are of things not ſeen: but love is perpetuall, not of God onely, but his Saints: For nothing ceaſes, but our earthly parts, nothing but what ſavours of corruption. Chriſtian love is a grace, & may well challenge a place in heaven: and what love is there, of what we know not? More plainly; if the three Diſciples in Tabor knew Moſes and Elias, how much more ſhall we know them in Gods Sion? Laſtly, (for it is a letter, not a volume, that I intended in this not neceſſary, but likely diſcourſe) that famous parable can tell you, that thoſe which are in hell, may know ſingular and ſeverall perſons, though diſtant in place. The rich Glutton knows Lazarus and Abraham. I heare what you ſay; It is but a parable: neither will I preſſe you with the contrary authoritie of Ambroſe, Tertullian, Gregory, Hieromie, or any Father; nor with that univerſall rule of Chryſoſtome, that thoſe onely are parables, where examples are expreſſed, and names concealed: I yeeld it; yet all holy parables have their truths, at leaſt their probabilities. Deny this, and you diſable their uſe, wrong their Author. Our Saviour never ſaid ought was done, that cannot be: and ſhall then the damned retaine ought, which the glorified loſe? No man ever held that the ſoule was advantaged by torment. Comfort you therefore in this, you ſhall know and be knowne. But farre be from hence all carnall and earthly thoughts; as if your affections ſhould be (as below) doubled to your wife or childe. Nature hath no place in glory: here is no reſpect of blood, none of mariage. This groſſer acquaintance and pleaſure is for the Paradiſe of Turkes, not the Heaven of Chriſtians. Here is, as no mariage, (ſave betwixt the Lambe and his Spouſe the Church) ſo no matrimoniall affections. You ſhall rejoyce in your glorified childe; not as your child, but as glorified. In briefe, let us ſo enquire of our company, that above all things we ſtrive to be there our ſelves, where we are ſure, if we have not what we imagined, we ſhall have more then we could imagine.

To M. T. L.

EPIST. VII. Concerning the matter of Divorce in caſe of apparent adultery, adviſing the innocent partie of the fitteſt courſe in that behalfe.

ALL intermedling is attended with danger; and ever ſo much more, as the band of the parties contending, is nearer and ſtraiter: how can it then want perill, to judge betwixt thoſe which are, or ſhould be one fleſh? yet great neceſſities require hazard. My profeſſion would juſtly check me, if I preferred not your conſcience to my own love. I pity and lament, that your own boſome is falſe to you; that your ſelfe with ſhame, and with ſinne, are pulled from your ſelfe, and given to whom you would not: An injury that cannot be paralleled upon earth; and ſuch as may without our wonder, diſtract you: ſleight croſſes are digeſted with ſtudy, and reſolution; greater with time, the greateſt, not without ſtudy, time, counſell. There is no extreme evill, whoſe evaſions are not perplexed. I ſee here miſchiefe on either hand: I ſee you beſet, not with griefes only, but dangers. No man ever more truly held a Wolfe by the eare; which he can neither ſtay, nor let goe with ſafety. Gods ancient Law would have made a quick diſpatch, and have determined the caſe, by the death of the offender, and the liberty of the innocent; and not it alone. How many heathen Law-givers have ſubſcribed to Moſes, Arabians, Grecians, Romans? yea very Gothes, the dregs of Barbariſme, have thought this wrong not expiable, but by blood. With us, the

A the easinesse of revenge, as it yeelds frequence of offences, so multitude of doubts: Whether the wronged husband should conceale, or complaine: complaining, whether he should retaine or dismisse: dismissing, whether he may marry, or must continue single: not continuing single, whether he may receive his owne, or chuse another: but your inquiries shall be my bonds. The fact (you say) is too evident. Let me aske you; To your selfe, or to the world. This point alone must vary our proceedings. Publike notice requires publike discharge; Private wrongs are in our owne power: Publike, in the hands of authority; the thoughts of our owne brests, while they smother themselves within us, are at our command, whether for suppressing, or expressing; but if they once have vented themselves by words, unto others eares, now (as common strayes) they must stand to the hazard of censure: such are our actions. Neither the sword, nor the Keyes meddle within doores, and what but they without?
B If fame have laid hold on the wrong, prosecute it, cleer your name, cleer your house, yea Gods. Else you shall be reputed a Pandar to your owne bed: and the second shame shall surpasse the first, so much as your own fault can more blemish you, then anothers. If there were no more; he is cruelly mercifull, that neglects his owne fame. But what if the sin were shrouded in secrecy? The loathsomnes of vice consists not in common knowledge. It is no lesse hainous, if lesse talked of. Reports gives but shame. God and the good soule detest close evils. Yet then I aske not of the offence, but of the offender, not of her crime, but her repentance. She hath sinned against heaven & you. But hath she washed your polluted bed with her teares? Hath her true sorrow beene no lesse apparent then her sin? Hath she peeced her old vow with new protestations of
C fidelity? Doe you find her at once humbled and changed? Why should that eare be deaf to her praiers, that was open to her accusation? why is there not yet place for mercy? Why do we Christians live as under Martiall law, wherein we sin but once? Plead not authority: Civilians have been too rigorous: the mercifull sentence of Divinity shall sweetly temper humane severenesse. How many have we known the better for their sinne? That Magdalen (her predecessour in filthinesse) had never loved so much, if she had not so much sinned. How oft hath Gods Spouse deserved a divorce? which yet still her confessions, her teares have reversed. How oft hath that scroll been written, and signed; and yet againe cancelled, and torne, upon submission? His actions, not his words onely, are our precepts: Why is man cruell, where God relents? The D wrong is ours onely, for his sake; without whose law, were no sinne. If the Creditor please to remit the debt, do standers-by complaine? But if she be at once filthy, and obstinate, flie from her bed, as contagious. Now your benevolence is adultery; you impart your body to her, she her sinne to you: A dangerous exchange; An honest body for an harlots sinne: Herein you are in cause that she hath more then one adulterer. I applaud the rigour of those ancient Canons, which have still roughly censured even this cloak of vice: As there is necessity of charity in the former, so of justice in this. If you can so love your wife, that you detest not her sinne, you are a better husband then a Christian, a better bawd then an husband. I dare say no more upon so generall a relation; good Physitians in dangerous diseases dare not prescribe on bare sight of urine, or uncertaine report; but will feele the pulse and see the symptomes, ere they resolve on the receit. You see how no niggard I am of my counsels:
E would God I could as easily asswage your griefe, as satisfie your doubts.

To M. Robert Hay.

Epist. VIII. A discourse of the continuall exercise of a Christian, how he may keep his heart from hardnesse, and his wayes from error.

TO keep the heart in ure with God, is the highest task of a Christian. Good motions are not frequent: but the constancy of good disposition is rare and hard. This work must be continuall, or else speedeth not: like as the body from a setled and habituall distemper must be recovered by long diets; and so much the rather for that we cannot intermit here without relapses. If this field be not tilled every day, it will run out into thistles. The evening is fittest for this work: when retired into our selves, ſelves, we muſt cheerefully, and conſtantly, both look up to God, and into our hearts; as we have to doe with both: to God in thankſgiving firſt, then in requeſt. It ſhall be therefore expedient for the ſoule, duely to recount to it ſelf all the ſpecialities of Gods favours: a confuſed thanks ſavours of careleſneſſe, and neither doth affect us, nor win acceptance above. Bethink your ſelfe then of all theſe externall, inferiour, earthly graces: that your being, breathing, life, motion, reaſon, is from him; that he hath given you a more noble nature, then the reſt of the creatures, excellent faculties of the mind, perfection of ſenſes, ſoundneſſe of body, competency of eſtate, ſeemelineſſe of condition, fitneſſe of calling, preſervation from dangers, reſcue out of miſeries, kindneſſe of friends, carefulneſſe of education, honeſty of reputation, libertie of recreations, quietneſſe of life, opportunity of well-doing, protection of Angels. Then riſe higher to his ſpirituall favours, though here on earth, and ſtrive to raiſe your affections with your thoughts: Bleſſe God that you were borne in the light of the Goſpell, for your profeſſion of the truth, for the honour of your vocation, for your incorporating into the Church, for the privilege of the Sacraments, the free uſe of the Scriptures, the communion of Saints, the benefit of their prayers, the aid of their counſels, the pleaſure of their converſation; for the beginnings of regeneration, any foot-ſteps of faith, hope, love, zeale, patience, peace, joy, conſcionableneſſe, for any deſire of more. Then let your ſoule mount higheſt of all, into her heaven; and acknowledge thoſe celeſtiall graces of her election to glory, redemption from ſhame and death, of the interceſſion of her Saviour, of the preparation of her place; and there let her ſtay a while upon the meditation of her future joyes. This done, the way is made for your requeſt; Sue now to your God; as for grace to anſwer theſe mercies, ſo to ſee wherein you have not anſwered them: From him therefore caſt your eyes downe upon your ſelfe: and as ſome carefull Juſticer doth a ſuſpected felon, ſo doe you ſtrictly examine your heart, of what you have done that day; of what you ſhould have done; enquire whether your thoughts have beene ſequeſtred to God, ſtrangers from the world, fixed on heaven; whether juſt, charitable, lowly, pure, Chriſtian; whether your ſenſes have beene holily guided, neither to let in temptations, nor to let out ſinnes; whether your ſpeeches have not beene offenſive, vaine, raſh, indiſcreet, unſavoury, unedifying; whether your actions have been warrantable, expedient, comely, profitable. Thence, ſee if you have been negligent in watching your heart, expence of your time, exerciſes of devotion, performance of good workes, reſiſtance of temptations, good uſe of good examples: and compare your preſent eſtate with the former: looke jealouſly, whether your ſoule hath gained or loſt; loſt ought of the heat of her love, tenderneſſe of conſcience, feare to offend; ſtrength of vertue; gained, more increaſe of grace, more aſſurance of glory. And when you find (alas! who can but find?) either holineſſe decayed, or evill done, or good omitted, caſt down your eyes; ſtrike your breſts, humble your ſoule, and ſigh to him whom you have offended; ſue for pardon as for life, heartily, yearningly: injoyne your ſelfe carefull amendment, redouble your holy reſolutions, ſtrike hands with God in a new covenant: my ſoule for your ſafety. Much of this good counſell I confeſſe to have learned from the Table of an unknowne Author, at Antwerp. It contented me: and therefore I have thus made it (by many alterations) my owne for forme, and yours for the uſe: Our practice ſhall both commend it, and make us happy.

To M. I. F. one of the Company of the Turkiſh Merchants.

EPIST. IX. Diſcourſing of the lawfulneſſe of converſation and trade with Infidels and Hereticks, and ſhewing how farre and wherein it is allowable.

IN matter of ſin I dare not diſcommend much feare. Looſeneſſe is both a more ordinary fault, and more dangerous, then exceſſe of care: yet herein the mind may be unjuſtly tortured, and ſuffer without gaine. It is good to know our bounds, and keepe them; that ſo we may neither be careleſly offenſive, nor needleſly afflicted.

How

A How farre we may travell to, and converse with Infidels, with Heretikes, is a long demand, and cannot be answered at once. I see extremes on both hands, and a part of truth betwixt both, of no small latitude. First, I commend not this course to you; it is well, if I allow it. The earth is large, and truth hath ample Dominions; and those not incommodious, not unpleasant. To neglect the maine blessings with competency of the inferiour, for abundance of the inferiour, without the maine, were a choice unwise and unequall. While we are free, who would take ought but the best? Whither goe you? Have we not as temperate a Sunne, as faire a Heaven, as fertile an Earth, as rich a Sea, as sweet Companions? What stand I on equality? a firmer peace, a freer Gospell, and happier government then the world can shew you? yet you must goe: I give you allowance; but limited, and full of cautions: like an inquisitive Officer, you must let me aske, who, how, when, whither, why, how long, and accordingly determine. To communicate with them in their false services, who will not spit at, as impious? We speake of conversing with men, not with idolatries: civilly, not in Religion: not in works of darknesse, but businesse of commerce and common indifferencies. Fie on those Rimmonites, that plead an upright soule in a prostrate body: Hypocrites, that pretend a Nathanael in the skin of a Nicodemus. God hates their secret halting, & will revenge it. Let goe their vices, and speak of their persons: Those may be conversed with; not with familiarity, not with intirenesse; as men qualified, not as friends. Traffique is here allowed, not amity, not friendship, but peace. Paul will allow you to feast at their table, not to frequent it; yet not this to all. Christianity hath all statures in it, all strengths: children, and men, weaklings, Giants. For a B feeble ungrounded Christian, this very company is dangerous, safe for the strong and instructed. Turne a child loose into an Apothecaries shop, or an Idiot, that gally-pot which looks faireſt, shall have his first hand, tho full of poysonous drugs: where the judicious would chuse the wholesomest, led not by sense, but skill. Seelednesse in the truth will cause us to hate & scorne ridiculous impiety; and that hate will settle us the more; where the unstaied may grow to lesse dislike, and indanger his owne infection. He had need be a resolute Caleb that should goe to see the land of Canaan; yet not such a one, upon every occasion: meere pleasure or curiosity I dare not allow in this adventure. The command of authority, or necessity of traffique, I cannot reject: Or if after sufficient prevention, desire to informe our selves thorowly in a foraine Religion or state (especially for publike use) carry us abroad, I censure not. In all matter of danger, a calling is a good warrant; and it cannot want perill to goe unsent. Neither C is there small weight in the quality of the place, and continuance of the time. It is one case where the profession of our Religion is free, another where restrained; perhaps not without constraint to idolatry: where we have meanes for our soules, and allowed Ministery, the cause must needs differ from a place of necessary blindnesse, of peevish superstition. To passe thorow an infected place is one thing, to dwell in it another: Each of these give a new state to the cause, and looke for a diverse answer. But as in all these outward actions, so here, most force (I confesse) lies in the intention, which is able to give not toleration only, to other travell, but praise. To converse with them without, but to a purpose of their conversion, and with endevour to fetch them in, can be no other then an holy course: wherein that the Jesuits have been D (by their owne saying) more serviceable in their Indies & China; let them thank (after their number and leisure) their shelter of Spaine, the opportunity of whose patronage hath preferred them to us; not their more forward desires. In short, companying with infidels may not be simply condemned: who can hold so, that sees Lot in Sodom, Israel with the Ægyptians, Abraham and Isaac with their Abimelechs, Roses among thornes, and pearles among mucke and mud, and so all, Christ among Publicans & Sinners? so we neither be infected by them, nor they further infected by our confirmations nor the weake Christian by us infected with offence, nor the Gospell infected with E reproch, what danger can there be? If neither we, nor they, nor the weake, nor (which is highest) the name of God be wronged, who can complaine? You have mine opinion; dispose now of your selfe as you dare: The earth is the Lords, and you are his, whersoever he shall find you, be sure you shall find him every where.

To the Gentlemen of his Highneſſe Court.

EP. X. A deſcription of a good and faithfull Courtier.

WHiles I adventured other Characters into the light, I reſerved one for you; whom I account no ſmall part of my joy; The Character of what you are, of what you ſhould be: Not that I arrogate to my ſelfe, more then ordinary skill in theſe high points: I deſire not to deſcribe a Courtier; How ſhould I, that have but ſeene and ſaluted the ſeat of Princes? Or why ſhould I, whoſe thoughts are ſequeſtred to the Court of heaven? But if I would decypher a good Courtier, who can herein controll my endevour? Goodneſſe in all formes is but the juſt ſubject of our profeſſion: what my obſervation could not, no leſſe certaine rule ſhall afford me. Our diſcourſe hath this freedome, that it may reach beyond our eyes with beleefe. If your experience agree not with my ſpeculation, diſtruſt me. I care not for their barking, which condemne me, at firſt, of incongruity: as if theſe two tearmes were ſo diſſonant, that one ſentence could not hold them. The Poets ſlanders, that abandons all good men from Courts. Who knowes not that the Ægyptian Court had a Moſes; the Court of Samaria, an Obadiah; of Ieruſalem an Ebed-melech; of Damaſcus a Naaman; of Babylon a Daniel; of Æthiopia a good Treaſurer; and very Nero's Court in Pauls time, his Saints? That I may not tell, how the Courts of Chriſtian Princes have been likened by our eccleſiaſticall Hiſtorians, to ſome royall Colleges for their order, gravity, goodneſſe mixed with their Majeſty; and that I may willingly forbeare to compare (as, but for envy, I durſt) yours with theirs; I ſpeake boldly, the Court is as nigh to heaven as the Cell, and doth no leſſe require and admit ſtrict holineſſe. I baniſh therefore hence all impiety, and dare preſage his ruine, whoſe foundation is not laid in goodneſſe. Our Courtier is no other then vertuous, and ſerves the God of heaven as his firſt Maker, and from him derives his duty to theſe earthen gods; as one that knowes the thrones of heaven and earth are not contrary, but ſubordinate, and that beſt obedience ſprings from devotion: his ability and will have both conſpired to make him perfectly ſerviceable, and his diligence waits but for an opportunity. In the factions of ſome great rivals of honour, he holds himſelfe in a free neutrality, accounting it ſafer in unjuſt frayes to looke on, then to ſtrike; and if neceſſity of occaſion will needs winde him into the quarrell, he chuſes not the ſtronger part, but the better; reſolving rather to fall with innocence and truth, then to ſtand with powerfull injuſtice. In the changes of favours and frownes he changeth not; his ſincere honeſty beares him thorow all alterations, with wiſe boldneſſe, if not with ſucceſſe: and when he ſpies clouds in the eyes of his Prince, (which of long he will not ſeeme to ſee) his cleere heart gives him a cleere face; and if he may be admitted, his loyall breath ſhall ſoone diſpell thoſe vapors of ill ſuggeſtion: but if after all attempts of wind and Sun he ſee them ſetled, and the might of his accuſers will not let him ſeeme as he is; he gives way in ſilence, without ſtomach, and waites upon time. He is not over-haſtily intent upon his owne promotion; as one that ſeekes his Prince, not himſelfe; and ſtudies more to deſerve then riſe, ſcorning either to grow great by his owne bribes, or rich by the bribes of others. His officious ſilence craves more then others words; and if that language be not heard, nor underſtood, he opens his mouth, yet late and ſparingly; without baſhfulneſſe, without importunity; caring onely to motion, not caring to plead. He is affable and courteous; not vainly popular, abaſing his Princes favour to wooe the worthleſſe applauſe of the vulgar; approving by his actions that he ſeekes one, not many; if not rather one in many. His Alphabet is his Princes diſpoſition; which once learned, he plies with diligent ſervice, not with flattery; not commending every action as good, nor the beſt too much, and in preſence. When he finds an apparent growth of favour, hee dares not glory in it to others, leſt he ſhould ſolicite their envy, and hazard the ſhame of his owne

owne fall; but enjoyes it in quiet thankfulneſſe: not neglecting it, nor drawing it on too faſt: Over-much forwardneſſe argues no perpetuity. How oft have we known the weake beginnings of a likely fire ſcattered with over-ſtrong a blaſt? And if another riſe higher, he envieth not; onely emulating that mans merit, and ſuſpecting his owne. Neither the name of the Court, nor the grace of a Prince, nor applauſe of his inferiors, can lift him above himſelfe, or lead him to affect any other then a wiſe mediocrity. His owne ſincerity cannot make him over-credulous. They are few and well tried, whom he dares uſe; or perhaps obliged by his owne favours: ſo in all employments of friendſhip he is wary without ſuſpition, and without credulity charitable. He is as free of heart, ſo of tongue, to ſpeake what he ought, not what he might: never but (what Princes eares are not alwayes inured to) meere Truth: yet that, tempered for the meaſure, and time, with honeſt diſcretion. But if he meet with ought that might be beneficiall to his Maſter, or the State, or whoſe concealment might prove prejudiciall to either, neither feare nor gaine can ſtop his mouth. He is not baſely querulous, not forward to ſpend his complaints on the diſgraced, not abiding to build his owne favours upon the unjuſt ruines of an oppreſſed fortune. The errors of his fellowes he reports with favour; their vertues with advantage. He is a good husband of his houres; equally deteſting idleneſſe and baſe diſports; and placing all his free time upon ingenuous ſtudies, or generous delights; ſuch as may make either his body or mind, more fit for noble ſervice. He liſteth not to come to counſell uncalled, nor unbidden to intermeddle with ſecrets, whether of perſon, or ſtate; which yet once impoſed, he manageth with ſuch fidelity and wiſdome, as well argue him to have refrained, not out of feare, but judgement. He knowes how to repay an injury with thanks, and a benefit with uſury; the one out of a wiſe patience without malicious cloſeneſſe; the other out of a bounteous thankfulneſſe. His life is his owne willing ſervant, and his Princes free vaſſall; which he accounts lent to him, that he may give it for his Maſter: the intercepting of whoſe harmes, he holds both his duty, and honour: and whether he be uſed as his ſword, or his ſhield, he doth both with cheerefulneſſe. He can ſo demean himſelfe in his officious attendance, that he equally avoids ſatiety and oblivion; not needleſſly laviſh of himſelfe, to ſet out and ſhew his parts alwayes at the higheſt; nor wilfully concealed in great occaſions. He loves to deſerve and to have friends, but to truſt rather to his owne vertue. Reaſon and honeſty (next under religion) are his Counſellers: which he followes without care of the event, not without foreſight. In a judgement of unkindneſſe and envy, he never caſts the firſt ſtone, and hates to pick thanks by detraction. He undertakes none but worthy ſutes, ſuch as are free from baſeneſſe and injuſtice; ſuch as is neither ſhame to aske, nor diſhonour to grant; not ſuffering private affections to over-weigh publike equitie or convenience; and better brooking a friends want, then an ill preſident; and thoſe which he yeeldeth to accept, he loves not to linger in an afflicting hope: a preſent anſwer ſhall diſpatch the feares or deſires of his expecting client. His breſt is not a ciſterne to retaine, but as a conduit-pipe, to vent the reaſonable and honeſt petitions of his friend. Finally, he ſo lives, as one that accounts not Princes favours hereditary; as one that will deſerve their perpetuity, but doubt their change; as one that knowes there is a wide world beſide the Court, and above this world an Heaven.

To Mr. VValter Fitzwilliams.

Ep. I. A discourse of the true and lawfull use of pleasures; how we may moderate them, how we may enjoy them with safety.

INdeed; wherein stands the use of wisdome, if not in tempering our pleasures and sorrowes? and so disposing our selves in spight of all occurrents, that the world may not blow upon us with an unequall gale, neither tearing our sailes, nor slackning them. Events will varie; If we continue the same, it matters not: nothing can overturne him, that hath power over himselfe. Of these two, I confesse it harder to manage prosperity, and to avoid hurt from good: strong and cold winds doe but make us gather up our cloake more round, more close: but to keepe it about us in a hot Sun-shine, to run and not sweat; to sweat and not faint; how difficult it is! I see some that avoid pleasures for their danger, and which dare not but abandon lawfull delights for feare of sinne; who seeme to me like some ignorant Metallists, which cast away the precious Ore, because they cannot separate the gold from the drosse; or some simple Jew, that condemnes the pure streames of Iordan, because it fals into the dead Sea. Why doe not these men refuse to eate, because meat hath made many gluttons? Or how dare they cover themselves, that know there is pride in rags? These hard Tutors, if not Tyrants, to themselves, whiles they pretend a mortified strictnesse, are injurious to their owne liberty, to the liberality of their Maker: Wherefore hath he created and given the choice commodities of this earth, if not for use? or why placed he Man in a Paradise, not in a Desart? How can we more displease a liberall friend, then to depart from his delicate feast wilfully hungry? They are deceived that call this holinesse; it is the disease of a minde sullen, distrustfull, impotent: There is nothing but evill, which is not from heaven; and he is none of Gods friends, that rejects his gifts for his owne abuse. Heare me therefore, and true Philosophy; There is a nearer way then this, and a fairer; if you will be a wise Christian, tread in it. Learne first by a just survey, to know the due and lawfull bounds of pleasure; and then beware, either to goe beyond a knowne Mere, or in the licence of your owne desires to remove it. That God, that hath curb'd in the fury of that unquiet and foaming element, and said of old, Here shalt thou stay thy proud waves, hath done no lesse for the rage of our appetite. Behold our limits are not obscure; which if we once passe, our inundation is perillous and sinfull. No just delight wanteth either his warrant, or his tearmes. More plainly be acquainted both with the quality of pleasures, and the measure: Many a soule hath lost it selfe in a lawfull delight, through excesse: and not fewer have perished in those, whose nature is vicious, without respect of immoderation. Your care must avoid both. The taste of the one is deadly; of the other, a full carouse:

carouse: and in truth, it is easier for a Christian, not to taste of that, then not to be drunke with this: The ill is more easily avoided, then the indifferent moderated. Pleasure is of a winding and serpentine nature; admit the head, the body will aske no leave: and sooner may you stop the entrance, then stay the proceeding. Withall, her insinuations are so cunning, that you shall not perceive your excesse, till you be sicke of a surfet. A little hony is sweet; much, fulsome. For the attaining of this temper then, settle in your selfe a right estimation of that wherein you delight: resolve every thing into his first matter, and there will be more danger of contempt, then over-joying. What are the goodly sumptuous buildings we admire, but a little burnt and hardned earth? What is the stately and wondrous building of this humane body, whose beauty we doat upon, but the same earth we tread on, better tempered; but worse, when it wants his guest? What are those precious metals whom we worship, but veines of earth better coloured? What are costly robes, but such as are given of wormes, and consumed of moths? Then, from their beginning, looke to their end, and see laughter conclude in teares; see death in this sweet pot. Thy conscience scourges thee with a long smart for a short liberty; and for an imperfect delight, gives thee perfect torment: Alas, what an hard peny-worth; so little pleasure for so much repentance! Enjoy it, if thou canst: but if while the sword hangs over thee in an horses haire, still threatning his fall and thine, thou canst be securely jocund; I wonder, but envie not. Now I heare you recall me, and after all my discourse (as no whit yet wiser) inquire by what rule our pleasures shall be judged immoderate? We are all friends to our selves, and our indulgence will hardly call any favour too much. I send you not (though I might) to your body, to your calling, for this triall; while your delights exclude not the presence, the fruition of God, you are safe: the love of the medicine is no hinderance to the love of health; let all your pleasures have reference to the highest good, and you cannot exceed. You see the Angels sent about Gods messages to this earth; yet never out of their heaven, never without the vision of their Maker. These earthly things cause not distraction, if we rest not in them, if we can looke throtow them, to their giver. The mind that desires them for their owne sakes, and suffers it selfe taken up with their sweetnesse as his maine end, is already drunken. It is not the use of pleasure that offends, but the affectation. How many great Kings have beene Saints? they could not have beene Kings without choice of earthly delights; they could not have beene Saints, with earthly affections. If God have mixed you a sweet cup, drinke it cheerfully; commend the taste, and be thankfull; but rejoyce in it as his. Use pleasures without dotage; as in God, from God, to God; you are all as free from errour, as misery.

EP. II. A discourse of the bloody use of single combats; the injustice of all pretences of their lawfulnesse; setting forth the danger and sinfulnesse of this false and unchristian manhood.

YOu have received a proud challenge, and now hold your selfe bound upon tearmes of honour, to accept it. Heare first the answer of a friend, before you give an answer to your enemie; receive the counsell of love, ere you enter those courses of revenge: Thinke not you may reject me, because my profession is peace; I speake from him, which is not onely the Prince of Peace, but the God of Hosts; of whom if you will not learne to manage your hand and your sword, I shall grieve to see, that courage hath made you rebellious. Grant once that you are a Christian, and this victory is mine. I overcome, and you fight not? would God the fury of mens passions could be as easily conquered, as their judgements convinced; how many thousands had beene free from blood! This conceit of false fortitude hath cost well-neere as many lives, as lawfull warre, or as opinion of heresie. Let me tell you with you with confidence, that all duels or ſingle combats are murderous: blanch them over (how you liſt) with names of honour, and honeſt pretences; their uſe is ſinfull, and their nature deviliſh.

Let us two, if you pleaſe, (before hand) enter into theſe liſts of words. Let reaſon (which is a more harmeleſſe fight) conflict with reaſon: Take whom you will with you into this field; of all the Philoſophers, Civilians, Canoniſts; for Divines (I hope) you ſhall find none; and let the right of this truth be tried upon a juſt induction.

I onely premiſe this caution, (leſt we quarrell about the cauſe of this quarrell) that neceſſity muſt be excluded from theſe unlawfull fights; which ever alters their quality, and removes their evill: The defence of our life, the injunction of a Magiſtrate, are ever excepted: voluntary combats are only queſtioned; or whoſe neceſſity we doe not find, but make. There are not many cauſes that can draw us forth ſingle into the field, with colour of equity. Let the firſt be the triall of ſome hidden right; whether of innocence upon a falſe accuſation, or of title to inheritance, not determinable by courſe of Lawes; A proceeding not tolerable among Chriſtians, becauſe it wants both warrant and certainty. Where ever did God bid thee hazzard thy life for thy name? Where did he promiſe to ſecond thee? When thou art without thy commandement, without his promiſe, thou art without thy protection. He takes charge of thee, but when thou art in thy wayes; yea in his. If this be Gods way, where did he chalke it out? If thou want his Word, looke not for his aid. Miſerable is that man, which in dangerous actions is left to his owne keeping; yea how plainly doth the event ſhew Gods diſlike? How oft hath innocence lien bleeding in theſe combats, and guiltineſſe inſulted in the conqueſt? Thoſe very decretals (whom we oft cite not, often truſt not) report the inequality of this iſſue. Two men are brought to the barre, one accuſes the other of theft, without further evidence, either to cleare or convince: The ſword is called for, both witneſſe, and Judge: They meet and combat: The innocent party is ſlaine: The ſtollen goods are found after in other hands, and confeſſed. O the injuſtice of humane ſentences! O wretched eſtate of the party miſcarried! his good name is loſt with his life, which he would have redeemed with his valour: he both dies and ſinnes, while he ſtrives to ſeeme cleare of a ſinne. Therefore men ſay he is guilty, becauſe he is dead, while the others wickedneſſe is rewarded with glory. I am deceived, if in this caſe there were not three murderers; the Judge, the adverſary, himſelfe. Let no man challenge God for neglect of innocence, but rather magnifie him for revenge of preſumption. What he enjoynes, that he undertakes, he maintaines: Who art thou, O vaine man, that dareſt expect him a party in thine owne brawls? But there is no other way of triall. Better none then this. Innocency or land is queſtioned; and now we ſend two men into the liſts, to try whether is the better Fencer: what is the ſtrength or skill of the Champions, to the juſtice of the cauſe? Wherefore ſerve our owne oathes? whereto witneſſe, records, lotteries, and other purgations? Or why put we not men as well to the old Saxon, or Livonian, Ordalian trials of hot irons, or ſcalding liquors? It is farre better ſome truths ſhould be unknown, then unlawfully ſearched. Another cauſe ſeemingly warrantable may be the determining of warre, prevention of common bloodſhed: Two armies are ready to joyne battell, the field is ſure to be bloody on both ſides; either part chuſes a champion; they two fight for all: the life of one ſhall ranſome a thouſand. Our Philoſophers, our Lawyers ſhout for applauſe of this Monomachy, as a way neere, eaſie, ſafe: I dare not. Either the warre is juſt, or unjuſt: if unjuſt, the hazzard of one is too much; if juſt, too little. The cauſe of a juſt warre muſt be, beſides true, important; the title common, wherein ſtill a whole ſtate is intereſſed; therefore may not, without raſhneſſe and tentation of God, be caſt upon two hands. The holy ſtory never records any, but a barborus Philiſtine, to make this offer, and that in the preſumption of his unmatchableneſſe. Profane monuments report many, and ſome on this ground wiſely rejected. Tullus challenged Albanus, that the right of the two Hoſts might be decided by the two Captaines; he returned a grave reply, (which I never read noted of cowardize) That this honour ſtood not in them two, but in the two Cities of Alba and Rome.

All

All causes of publike right are Gods: when we put to our hand in Gods cause, then we may look for his. In vaine we hope for successe, if we doe not our utmost; wherefore either warre must be determined without swords, or with many: why should all the heads of the Common-wealth stand upon the neck and shoulders of one champion? If he miscarry, it is injury to lose her; if he prevaile, yet it is injury to hazard her: yet respecting the parties themselves, I cannot but grant it neareſt to equity, and the best of combats, that some blood should be hazarded, that more might be our of hazard. I descend to your case, which is further from likelihood or approofe; for what can you plead but your credit? others opinion? You fight, not so much against anothers life, as your owne reproach: you are wronged, and now if you challenge not; or you are challenged, and if you accept not, the world condemnes you for a coward: who would not rather hazard his life, then blemish his reputation? It were well, if this resolution were as wise as gallant. If I speake to a Christian, this courage must be rectified. Tell me, what world is this, whose censure you feare? Is it not that which God hath branded long a goe with Positus in maligno? Is it not that which hath ever misconstrued, discouraged, disgraced, persecuted goodnesse? that which reproached, condemned your Saviour? What doe you under these colours; if you regard the favour of that, whose amity is enmity with God? What care you for the censure of him, whom you should both scorne and vanquish? Did ever wise Christians, did ever your Master, allow either this Manhood, or this feare? Was there ever any thing more strictly, more fearefully forbidden of him, then revenge in the challenge; then in the answer, paiment of evill; and murder in both? It is pity, that ever the water of Baptisme was spilt upon his face, that cares more to discontent the world, then to wrong God: He saith, Vengeance is mine; and you steale it from him in a glorious theft, hazarding your soule more then your body. You are weary of your selfe, while you thrust one part upon the sword of an enemy; the other, on Gods. Yet perhaps I have yeelded too much. Let goe Christians; The wiser world of men (and who else are worth respect) will not passe this odious verdict upon your refusall: valiant men have rejected challenges, with their honours untainted. Augustus, when he received a defiance, and brave appointment of combat from Antony, could answer him, That if Antony were weary of living, there were wayes enow besides to death. And that Scythian King returned no other reply to Iohn the Emperour of Constantinople. And Metellus challenged by Sertorius, durst answer scornfully, with his pen, not with his sword; That it was not for a Captaine to die a Souldiers death. It was not dishonourable for these wise and noble Heathens to turne off these desperate offers. What law hath made it so with us? Shall I seriously tell you? Nothing but the meere opinion of some humorous Gallants, that have more heart then braine; confirmed by a more idle custome: Worthy grounds, whereon to spend both life and soule; whereon to neglect God, himselfe, posterity! Goe now and take up that sword, of whose sharpnesse you have boasted, and hasten to the field; whether you die or kill, you have murdered. If you survive, you are haunted with the conscience of blood; if you die, with the torments; and if neither of these, yet it is murder, that you would have killed. See whether the fame of a brave fight can yeeld you a countervaileable redresse of these mischiefes: how much more happily valiant had it beene to master your selfe, to feare sinne more then shame, to contemne the world, to pardon wrong, to preferre true Christianity before idle man-hood, to live and to doe well?

To M. Mat. Milward.

Ep. III. A discourse of the pleasure of study and contemplation, with the varieties of scholarlike imployments, not without incitation of others thereunto; and a censure of their neglect.

I Can wonder at nothing more, then how a man can be idle; but of all other, a Scholar; in so many improvements of reason, in such sweetnesse of knowledge, in such variety of studies, in such importunity of thoughts. Other Artizans doe but practise;

A we ſtill learne; others run ſtill in the ſame gyre, to wearineſſe, to ſatiety; our choyce is infinite: other labours require recreations, our very labour recreates our ſports: we can never want; either ſomewhat to do, or ſomewhat that we would doe. How numberleſſe are thoſe volumes which men have written of Arts, of Tongues! How endleſſe is that volume which God hath written of the world! wherein every creature is a Letter, every day a new page: who can be weary of either of theſe? To find wit in Poetry, in philoſophy profoundneſſe, in Mathematicks acuteneſſe, in Hiſtory wonder of events, in Oratory ſweet eloquence, in Divinity ſupernaturall light and holy devotion; as ſo many rich metals in their proper mynes, whom would it not raviſh with delight? After all theſe, let us but open our eyes, we cannot looke beſide a leſſon, in this univerſall Book of our Maker worth our ſtudy, worth taking out. What creature hath not his miracle? what event doth not challenge his obſervation? And if
B weary of forraine imployment, we liſt looke home into our ſelves, there we find a more private world of thoughts, which ſet us on worke anew, more buſily, not leſſe profitably; now, our ſilence is vocall, our ſolitarineſſe popular, and we are ſhut up to doe good unto many. And if once we be cloyed with our owne company, the doore of conference is open; here enterchange of diſcourſe (beſides pleaſure) benefits us: and he is a weake companion, from whom we returne not wiſer. I could envy, if I could beleeve that Anachoret, who ſecluded from the world, and pent up in his voluntary priſon-wals, denied that he thought the day long, whileſt yet he wanted learning to vary his thoughts. Not to be cloyed with the ſame conceit, is difficult above humane ſtrength; but to a man ſo furniſhed with all ſorts of knowledge, that according to his diſpoſitions he can change his ſtudies, I would wonder, that ever the Sun
C ſhould ſeeme to paſſe ſlowly. How many buſie tongues chaſe away good houres in pleaſant chat, and complaine of the haſte of night! What ingenuous mind can be ſooner weary of talking with learned Authors, the moſt harmeleſſe and ſweeteſt of companions? What an heaven lives a Scholar in, that at once in one cloſe roome can daily converſe with all the glorious Martyrs and Fathers? that can ſingle out, at pleaſure, either ſententious Tertullian, or grave Cyprian, or reſolute Hierome, or flowing Chryſoſtome, or divine Ambroſe, or devoute Bernard, or (who alone is all theſe) heavenly Auguſtine, and talk with them, and heare their wiſe and holy counſels, verdicts, reſolutions: yea (to riſe higher) with courtly Eſay, with learned Paul; with all their fellow-Prophets, Apoſtles: yet more, like another Moſes, with God himſelfe, in D them both? Let the world contemne us: while we have theſe delights, we cannot envy them; we cannot wiſh our ſelves other then we are. Beſides, the way to all other contentments is troubleſome; the onely recompence is in the end. To delve in the mynes, to ſcorch in the fire for the getting, for the fining of gold, is a ſlaviſh toyle; the comfort is in the wedge, to the owner, not the labourers; where our very ſearch of knowledge is delightſome. Study it ſelfe, is our life: from which we would not be barred for a world. How much ſweeter then is the fruit of ſtudy, the conſcience of knowledge? In compariſon whereof, the ſoule that hath once taſted it, eaſily contemns all humane comforts. Goe now ye worldlings, and inſult over our paleneſſe, our needineſſe, our neglect. Ye could not be ſo jocund, if you were not ignorant: if you did not want knowledge, you could not over-looke him that hath it: For me, I E am ſo farre from emulating you, that I profeſſe, I had as leive be a brute beaſt, as an ignorant rich man. How is it then that thoſe Gallants which have priviledge of blood and birth, and better education, doe ſo ſcornfully turne off theſe moſt manly, reaſonable, noble exerciſes of ſcholarſhip? An hawke becomes their fiſt better then a booke: No dog but is a better companion: Any thing, or nothing, rather then what we ought. O minds brutiſhly ſenſuall! Doe they thinke that God made them for diſport? who even in his Paradiſe would not allow pleaſure, without worke. And if for buſineſſe; either of body, or mind: Thoſe of the body are commonly ſervile, like it ſelfe. The mind therefore, the mind onely, that honourable and divine part, is fitteſt to be imployed of thoſe which would reach to the higheſt perfection of men, and would be more then the moſt. And what worke is there of the mind, but the trade of a ſcholar, ſtudy? Let me therefore faſten this probleme on our Schoole-gates, and challenge all commers, in the defence of it; that, No Scholar cannot be truly noble. And if I make it not good, let me never be admitted further then to the ſubject of our queſtion. Thus we doe well to congratulate, to our ſelves, our owne happineſſe: if others will come to us, it ſhall be our comfort, but more theirs; if not, it is enough that we can joy in our ſelves, and in him, in whom we are that we are.

To Mr. I. P.

Ep. IV. A diſcourſe of the increaſe of Popery; of the Oath of Allegeance, and the juſt ſufferings of thoſe which have refuſed it.

YOu ſay, your religion daily winneth. Brag not of your gaine: you neither need, not can, if you conſider how it gets, and whom: How, but by cunning ſleights, falſe ſuggeſtions, impudent untruths? Who cannot thus prevaile againſt a quiet and innocent adverſary? Whom, but ſilly women, or men notoriouſly debauched? A ſpoyle fit for ſuch a conqueſt, for ſuch Victors. We are the fewer, not the worſe: if all our licentious hypocrites were yours, we ſhould not complaine: and you might be the prouder, not the better. Glory you in this triumph, free from our envy, who know we have loſt none, but (by whom you ſave nothing) either looſe or ſimple. It were pity that you ſhould not forgoe ſome in a better exchange. The ſea never incroacheth upon our ſhore, but it loſeth elſewhere: ſome we have happily fetcht into the fold of our Church, out of your waſts; ſome others (though few, and ſcarce a number) we have ſent into their heaven. Among theſe, your late ſecond Garnet liv'd to proclaime himſelfe a Martyr; and by dying, perſwaded. Poore man, how happy were he, if he might be his owne Judge! That which gave him confidence, would give him glory: you beleeve, and well-neere adore him. That fatall cord of his was too little for reliques, though divided into Mathematick quantities. Whither cannot conceit lead us? whether for his reſolution, or your credulity? His death was feareleſſe: I commend his ſtomach, not his mind. How many malefactors have we knowne that have laughed upon their executioner, and jeſted away their laſt winde? You might know. It is not long ſince our Norfolke Arrian leapt at his ſtake. How oft have you learned in martyrdome to regard not the death, but the cauſe? Elſe there ſhould be no difference in guilt and innocence, error and truth. What then? Died he for Religion? This had beene but your owne meaſure: we endured your flames which theſe gibbets could not acquit. But dare impudency it ſelfe affirme it? Not for meere ſhame, againſt the evidence of ſo many tongues, eares, records. Your Proſperity, your numbers argue enough, that a man may be a Papiſt in Britaine, and live. If treaſon be your Religion, who will wonder that it is capitall? Defie that Devill which hath mockt you with this mad opinion, that treachery is holineſſe, devotion cruelty and diſobedience. I fore-ſee your evaſion: Alas, it is eaſie for a ſpightfull conſtruction to fetch Religion within this compaſſe; and to ſay the ſwelling of the Foxes fore-head is a horne. Nay then, let us fetch ſome honeſt Heathen to be Judge betwixt us: Meere nature in him ſhall ſpeake unpartially of both. To hold and perſwade, that a Chriſtian King may, yea muſt at the Popes will be dethroned, and murdered; is it the voyce of treaſon, or Religion? And if traiterous, whether flatly, or by miſ-inferring? Beſides his practiſes, for this he died; witneſſe your owne Catholikes. O God, if this be religion, what can be villany? Who ever died a Malefactor, if this be martyrdome? If this poſition be meritorious of heaven, hell is feared in vaine. O holy Sylla, Marii, Catilines, Cades, Lopezes, Gowries, Fawxes, and who ever have conſpired againſt lawfull Majeſty! All Martyrs of Rome, all Saints of Beckets heaven. How well doe thoſe palmes of celeſtiall triumph become hands red with the ſacred blood of Gods anointed? I am aſhamed to thinke, that humanity ſhould nouriſh ſuch Monſters, whether of men, or opinions. But you defie this ſavage factiouſneſſe, this devotion of Devils; and honeſtly wiſh both God and Cæſar his owne. I praiſe your moderation: but if you be true, let me yet ſearch you: Can

A a man be perfect Papist, without his opinion against it? If he may, then your Garnet and Drury died not for religion: if he may not, then Popery is treason. Chuse now whether you will leave your Martyrs, or your Religion. What you hold of merit, free-will, transubstantiation, invocation of Saints, false adoration, supremacy of Rome, no man presses, no man inquires: your present inquisition, your former examples would teach us; mercy will not let us learne. The only question is, Whether our King may live and rule; whether you may refraine from his blood, and not sinne: Would you have a man deny this and not die? Would you have a man thus dying honoured? Dare you approve that religion, which defends the fact, canonizes the person? I heare your answer, from that your great Champion, which not many daies since, with one blow hath driven out three (not slight) wedges: That not Civill obedience is stood upon, but Positive doctrine: That you are ready to sweare for the King's safety, not against the Popes authority: King Iames must live and raigne; but Paulus Quintus must rule and be obeyed: and better were it for you to die, then your sworne allegeance should prejudice the Sea Apostolike. An elusion fit for children. What is to dally, if not this? As if he said, The King shall live, unlesse the Pope will not; That he shall not be discrowned, deposed, massacred by your hands, unlesse your holy Father should command. But (I aske, as who should not?) What if he do command? What if your Paulus Quintus should breath out (like his predecessors) not threatnings, but strong bellowings of Excommunications, of deposition of Gods anointed? What if he shall command (after that French fashion) the throats of all Heretikes to bleed in a night? Pardon you in this: Now it is growne a point of doctrinall Divinitie, to determine how far the power of Peters successor may extend: You may neither sweare, nor say your hands shall not be steep't in the blood of your true Soveraigne; and to die rather then sweare it, is martyrdome. But what if heaven fall, say you? His Holinesse (as you hope) will take none such courses. Woe were us; if our safety depended upon your hopes, or his mercies. Blessed be that God, which malgre hath made and kept us happy, and hath lift us above our enemies. But what hope is there, that he who chargeth subjects not to sweare allegeance will never discharge them from allegeance; that those who clamorously and shamelesly complaine to the world of our cruelty, will forbeare to solicite others cruelty to us? Your hopes to you, to us our securities. Is this the Religion you father upon those Christian Patriarchs of the Primitive Age? O blessed Ireney, Clemens, Cyprian, Basil, Chrysostome, Augustine, Ierome, and thou the severest exactor of just censures, holy Ambrose! how would you have spet at such a rebellious assertion! What speak I of Fathers? whose very mention in such a cause were injury, were impiety. Which of those cursed heresies of ancient times (for to them I hold it fitter to appeale) have ever beene so desperately shamelesse, as to breed, to maintaine a conceit so palpably unnaturall; unlesse perhaps those old Antitaßa may upon generall termes be compelled to patronize it, while they held it pietie to break the laws of their Maker? For you, if you professe not to love willing errors, by this suspect, and judge the rest: you see this defended with equall resolution, and with no lesse cheerfull expence of blood. In the body, where you see one monstrous deformitie, you cannot affect; if you can doe so in your religion, yet how dare you? since the greater halfe of it stands on no other ground. Onely God make you E wise and honest, you shall shake hands with this faction of Popery; and I with you, to give you a cheerefull welcome into the bosome of the Church.

B The judgement of a Catholike English-man banished, &c. concerning the Apology of the Oath of Allegeance, intituled Triplici nodo, &c.

To my brother M. SA. HALL.

Epp. V. A discourse of the great charge of the ministeriall function; together with particular directions for due preparation thereunto, and carriage therein.

IT is a great & holy purpose (deare Brother) that you have entertained, of serving God in his Church: for what higher, or more worthy imploiment can there be, then to doe these divine duties, to such a master, and such a mother? wherein yet

I ſhould little rejoyce, if any neceſſity had caſt you upon this refuge: for I hate and A grieve to think that any deſperate mind ſhould make Divinity but a ſhift, and diſho nour this Miſtreſſe by being forſaken of the world. This hath beene the drift of your education: to this you were borne, and dedicated in a direct courſe. I doe willingly incourage you, but not without many cautions. Enter not into ſo great a ſervice, without much fore-ſight. When your hand is at the plough, it is too late to looke back. Bethinke your ſelf ſeriouſly of the weight of this charge: and let your holy de-ſire be allayed, with ſome trembling. It is a fooliſh raſhneſſe of young heads, when they are in Gods chaire, to wonder how they came thither, and to forget the awfulneſſe of that place, in the confidence of their owne ſtrength; which is ever ſo much leſſe, as it is more eſteemed. I commend not the way-ward excuſes of Moſes, nor the peremptory unwillingneſſe of Ammonius, and Frier Thomas, who maimed themſelves B that they might be wilfully uncapable. Betwixt both theſe there is humble modeſty, & religious fearfulnes, eaſily to be noted in thoſe whom the Church honors with the name of her Fathers, worthy your imitation, wherein yet you ſhall need no preſidents if you well conſider what worth of parts, what ſtrictneſſe of carriage, what weight of offices, God expects in this vocation. Know firſt, that in this place there will be more holineſſe required of you, then in the ordinary ſtation of a Chriſtian: for whereas before you were but as a common line, now God ſets you for a coppy of ſanctifica-tion unto others, wherein every fault is both notable, and dangerous. Here is looked for a ſetled acquaintance with God, and experience both of the proceedings of grace and of the offers and repulſes of tentations; which in vaine we ſhall hope to manage in other hearts, if we have not found in our owne. To ſpeake by aime, or rote of repentance, of contrition, of the degrees of regeneration, and faith, is both harſh, and C ſeldome when not unprofitable. We truſt thoſe Phyſitians beſt, which have tried the vertue of their drugs, eſteeming not of thoſe which have onely borrowed of their bookes. Here will be expected a free and abſolute government of affections, that you can ſo ſteere your owne veſſell, as not to be tranſported with fury, with ſelfe-love, with immoderation of pleaſures, of cares, of deſires, with exceſſe of paſſions; in all which, ſo muſt you demeane your ſelfe, as one that thinks he is no man of the world but of God; as one too good (by his double calling) for that, which is either the felicity, or impotency of beaſts. Here muſt be continuall and inward exerciſe of mortification, and ſevere Chriſtianity, whereby the heart is held in due awe, and the weake flames of the ſpirit quickned, the aſhes of our dulneſſe blowne off; a practice neceſ- D ſary in him, whoſe devotion muſt ſet many hearts on fire: Here muſt be wiſdome, and inoffenſiveneſſe of carriage, as of one that goes ever under monitors, and that knowes other mens indifferencies are his evils. No man had ſuch need to keep a ſtrict meane. Setting aſide contempt, even in obſervation, behold, wee are made a gazing flocke to the world, to Angels, to men. The very faile of your eſtate muſt bee moderated; which if it beare too high (as ſeldome) it incurres the cenſure of profuſion and Epicuriſme; if too low, of a baſe and unbeſeeming earthlineſſe; your hand may not be too cloſe for others need, nor too open for your owne; your converſation may not be rough and ſullen, nor over-familiar and fawning; whereof the one breeds a conceit of pride, and ſtrangeneſſe; the other, contempt; not looſely merry, nor Cyni-cally unſociable; not contentious in ſmall injuries; in great, not hurtfully patient, to E the Church: your attire (for whither doe not cenſures reach?) not youthfully wanton; not, in theſe yeares affectedly ancient, but grave and comely, like the mind, like the behaviour of the wearer; your geſture like your habit, neither ſavoring of giddie lightneſſe, nor overly inſolence, nor wantonneſſe, nor dull neglect of your ſelfe; but ſuch as may beſeeme a mortified mind, full of worthy ſpirits: your ſpeech like your geſture, not ſcurrilous, not detracting, not idle, not boaſting, not rotten, not peremptorie; but honeſt, milde, fruitfull, ſavourie, and ſuch as may both argue and worke grace: your deliberations mature; your reſolutions well grounded; your devices ſage and holy. Wherein let me adviſe you, to walke ever in the beaten road of the Church; not to run out into ſingle paradoxes. And if you meet at any time with private con-ceits that ſeeme more probable, ſuſpect them and your ſelfe; and if they can win you

to

to assent, yet smother them in your breſt, and do not dare to vent them out, either by your hand or tongue, to trouble the common peace. It is a miserable praiſe, to be a witty disturber. Neither will it serve you to be thus good alone, but if God shall give you the honour of this estate, the world will look, you should be the grave guide of a well-ordered family: for this is proper to us, that the vices of our charge reflect upon us; the sinnes of others are our reproach. If another mans children miscarry, the Parent is pittied; if a Ministers, censured; yea, not our servant is faulty without our blemish. In all these occasions (a misery incident to us alone) our griefe is our shame. To descend neerer unto the sacred affaires of this heavenly trade; in a Minister Gods Church is accounted both his house to dwell in, and his field to worke in; wherein (upon the penalty of a curse) he faithfully, wisely, diligently, devoutly, deales with God for his people, with his people, for and from God. Whether he instruct, he must doe it with evidence of the spirit; or whether he reprove, with courage and zeale; or whether he exhort, with meeknesse, and yet with power; or whether he confute, with demonstration of truth; not with rage and personall maliciousnesse, not with a wilfull heat of contradiction; or whether he admonish, with long suffering, and love without prejudice, and partiality: in a word, all these he so doth, as he that desires nothing but to honour God, and save men. His wisdome must discerne betwixt his sheepe and wolves; in his sheepe, betwixt the wholesome and unsound; in the unsound, betwixt the weak and tainted; in the tainted, betwixt the natures, qualities, degrees of the disease and infection; and to all these he must know to administer a word in season. He hath Antidotes for all tentations, counsels for all doubts, evictions for all errors, for all languishings incouragements. No occasion from any altered estate of the soule may find him unfurnished; he must ascend to Gods Altar with much awe, with sincere and cheerefull devotion; so taking, celebrating, distributing his Saviour, as thinking himselfe at table in heaven with the blessed Angels. In the meane time, as he wants not a thankfull regard to the Master of the feast, so not care of the guests. The greatnesse of an offender may not make him sacrilegiously partiall, nor the obscurity negligent. I have said little of any of our duties; and of some, nothing: yet enough, I think, to make you (if not timorous) carefull. Neither would I have you here upon to hide your selfe from this calling, but to prepare your selfe for it. These times call for them that are faithfull: and if they may spare some learning; conscience they cannot. Goe on happily: it argues a mind Christianly noble, to be incouraged with the need of his labours, with the difficulties.

To Mr. A. P.

Epist. VI. A discourse of the signes and proofes of a true faith.

THere is no comfort in a secret felicity. To be happy, and not know it, is little above miserable. Such is your state: only herein better then the common case of the most; that the Well of life lies open before you: but your eyes (like Agars) are not open to see it; whiles they have neither water, nor eyes. We doe not much more want that which we have not, then that which we do not know we have. Let me sell you some of that spirituall eye-salve which the Spirit commends to his Laodiceans; that you may cleerely see how well you are. There is nothing but those scales betwixt you and happinesse. Thinke not much that I espy in you what your selfe sees not. Too much neerenesse oft-times hindreth sight: and if for the spots of our owne faces we trust others eyes, why not for our perfections? You are in heaven, and know it not: He that beleeves, is already passed from death to life: You beleeve, whiles you complaine of unbeleefe. If you complained not, I should misdoubt you more, then you doe your selfe, because you complaine. Secure and insolent presumption hath killed many, that breathes nothing but confidence and safety; and abandons all doubts, and condemnes them. That man never beleeved, that never doubted. This liquor of faith is never pure in these vessels of clay, without these lees of distrust.

What then? Think not that I incourage you to douht more; but perſwade you not to be diſcouraged with doubting. All uncertainty is comfortleſſe: thoſe that teach men to conjecture and forbid to reſolve, reade lectures of miſery. Thoſe doubts are but to make way for aſſurance; as the oft ſhaking of the tree, faſtens it more at the root. You are ſure of God, but you are afraide of your ſelfe. The doubt is not in his promiſe, but your application. Looke into your owne heart. How know you that you know any thing, that you beleeve, that you will, that you approve, that you affect any thing? If a man, like your ſelfe, promiſe you ought, you know whether you truſt him, whether you relye your ſelfe on his fidelity. Why can you not know it in him that is God and man? The difference is not in the act, but the object. But if theſe habits (becauſe of their inward and ambiguous nature) ſeeme hard to be deſcried; turne your eyes to thoſe open marks that cannot beguile you. How many have bragged of their Faith, when they have embraced nothing but a vaine cloud of preſumption? Every man repeats his Creed, few feele it, few practiſe it. Take two boughs in the dead of winter; how like is one wood to another? how hardly diſcerned? Afterwards, By their fruit you ſhall know them. That faith, whoſe nature was obſcure, is evident in his effects. What is faith, but the hand of the ſoule? What is the duty of the hand, but either to hold or worke? This hand then holds Chriſt, works obedience and holineſſe: and if this act of apprehenſion be as ſecret, as the cauſe; ſince the cloſed hand hideth ſtill what it holdeth; ſee the hand of faith open; ſee what it worketh, and compare it with your own proofe. Deny if you can (yet I had rather appeale to any Judge, then your prejudiced ſelfe) that in all your needs you can ſtep boldly to the Throne of Heaven, and freely powre out your enlarged heart to your God, and crave of him, whether to receive what you want, or that you may want what you have, and would not. Be aſſured from God, this can be done by no power, but (that you feare to miſſe) of faith. God, as he is not, ſo he is not called a father without this. In vaine doth he pray, that cannot call God Father: No father without the ſpirit of adoption; no ſpirit, without faith: without this you may babble, you cannot pray. Aſſume you that you can pray, I dare conclude upon my ſoule, You beleeve. As little as you love your ſelfe, deny if you can that you love God. Say that your Saviour from heaven ſhould aske you Peters queſtion, could your ſoule returne any other anſwer, then Lord thou knoweſt I love thee? Why are you elſe in ſuch awe to offend, that a world cannot bribe you to ſin? Why in ſuch deep griefe when you have ſinned, that no mirth can refreſh you? Why in ſuch fervent deſire of enjoying his preſence? Why in ſuch agony when you enjoy it not? neither doth God love you, neither can you love God without faith. Yet more: doe you willingly nouriſh any one ſin in your breſt; doe you not repent of all? Doe you not hate all, though you cannot leave all? Doe you not complaine that you hate them no more? Doe you not, as for life, wiſh for holineſſe, and endeavour it? Nothing but faith can thus cleanſe the heart; that, like a good houſe-wife, ſweeps all the ſoule corners of the ſoule, and will not leave ſo much as one web in this roomy houſe. Truſt to it, you cannot hate ſin for it owne ſake, and forſake it for Gods ſake, without faith; the faithleſſe hath had ſome remorſe and feares, never repentance. Laſtly, doe you not love a good man for goodneſſe, and delight in Gods Saints? Doth not your love lead you to compaſſion; your compaſſion to releeſe? An heart truly faithfull cannot but have an hand chriſtianly bountifull: Charity and Faith make up one perfect paire of Compaſſes, that can take the true latitude of a Chriſtian heart: Faith is the one foot, pitcht in the centre unmoveably, while Charity walks about in a perfect circle of beneficence: theſe two never did, neither can goe aſunder: Warrant you your love, I dare warrant your faith: What need I ſay more? This heat of our affections, and this light of your workes, will evince againſt all the gates of hell, that you have the fire of Faith: let your ſoule then warme it ſelfe with theſe ſweet and cordiall flames, againſt all thoſe cold deſpaires, whereto you are tempted: ſay, Lord, I beleeve; and I will give you leave ſtill to adde, Help my unbeleefe.

Ep. VII. A direction how to conceive of God in our devotions and meditations.

YOu have choſen and judged well: How to conceive of the Deity in our prayers, in our meditations, is both the deepeſt point of all Chriſtianity, and the moſt neceſſary: ſo deepe, that if we wade into it, we may eaſily drowne, never find the bottome: ſo neceſſary, that without it, our ſelves, our ſervices, are profane, irreligious: we are all borne Idolaters; naturally prone to faſhion God to ſome forme of our owne, whether of an humane body, or of an admirable light; or if our mind have any other more likely, and pleaſing image. Firſt then, away with all theſe wicked thoughts, theſe groſſe devotions; and with Iacob bury all our ſtrange gods under the oake of Shechem, ere you offer to ſet up Gods Altar at Bethel: and without all mentall repreſentations, conceive of your God purely, ſimply, ſpiritually; as of an abſolute being, without forme, without matter, without compoſition; yea, an infinite, without all limit of thoughts. Let your heart adore a ſpirituall Majeſty, which it cannot comprehend, yet knowes to be; and as it were, loſe it ſelfe in his infiniteneſſe: Thinke of him, as not to be thought of; as one, whoſe wiſdome is his juſtice, whoſe juſtice is his power, whoſe power is his mercy; and whoſe wiſdome, juſtice, power, mercy, is himſelfe; as without quality good, great without quantity, everlaſting without time, preſent every where without place, containing all things without extent: and when your thoughts are come to the higheſt, ſtay there, and be content to wonder, in ſilence: and if you cannot reach to conceive of him as he is, yet take heed you conceive not of him as he is not. Neither will it ſuffice your Chriſtian mind, to have this awfull and confuſed apprehenſion of the Deity, without a more ſpeciall and inward conceit of three in this one, three perſons in this one eſſence, not divided, but diſtinguiſhed; and not more mingled then divided. There is nothing, wherein the want of words can wrong and grieve us, but in this: Here alone, as we can adore, and not conceive, ſo we can conceive, and not utter; yea, utter our ſelves, and not be conceived; yet as we may, Thinke here of one ſubſtance in three ſubſiſtences; one eſſence in three relations; one Jehovah begetting, begotten, proceeding; Father, Son, Spirit: yet ſo, as the Son is no other thing from the Father, but another perſon: or the Spirit, from the Son. Let your thoughts here walke warily, the path is narrow: the conceit either of three ſubſtances or but one ſubſiſtence, is damnable. Let me lead you yet higher, and further, in this intricate way, towards the Throne of grace: All this will not availe you, if you take not your Mediator with you: if you apprehend not a true manhood, gloriouſly united to the God-head, without change of either nature, without mixture of both; whoſe preſence, whoſe merits muſt give paſſage, acceptance, vigour to your prayers.

Here muſt be therefore (as you ſee) thoughts holily mixed: of a Godhead and humanity: one perſon in two natures: of the ſame Deity, in divers perſons, and one nature: wherein (if ever) heavenly wiſdome muſt beſtir it ſelfe, in directing us, ſo to ſever theſe apprehenſions, that none be neglected; ſo to conjoyne them, that they be not confounded. O the depth of divine myſteries; more then can be wondered at! O the neceſſity of this high knowledge, which who attaines not, may babble, but prayeth not. Still you doubt, and aske if you may not direct your praiers to one perſon of three. Why not? Safely, and with comfort. What need we feare, while we have our Saviour for our patterne: O my Father (if poſſible) let this Cup paſſe: and Paul every where both in thanks and requeſts; but with due care of worſhipping all in one. Exclude the other, while you fix your heart upon one, your praier is ſin; retaine all, and mention one, you offend not. None of them doth ought for us, without all. It is a true rule of Divines: All their externall works are common: To ſollicit one therefore, and not all, were injurious. And if you ſtay your thoughts upon the ſacred humanity of Chriſt, with inſeparable adoration of the God-head united, and thence climb up to the holy conceit of that bleſſed and dreadfull Trinity, I dare not cenſure, I dare not but commend your divine method. Thus ſhould Chriſtians aſcend from earth to heaven, from one heaven to another. If I have given your devotions any light, it is well: the leaſt glimpſe of this knowledge is worth all the full gleames of humane & earthly skill. But I miſtake, if your own heart wrought upon with ſerious meditations (under that ſpirit of illumination) will not prove your beſt Maſter. After this weake direction, ſtudy to conceive aright, that you may pray aright; and pray that you may conceive; and meditate that you may doe both: and the God of heaven direct you, inable you, that you may doe all.

To M. Thomas James of Oxford.

Ep. VIII. A diſcourſe of the grounds of the Papiſts confidence in appealing to the Fathers: applauding his worthy offers and endevours of diſcovering the falſifications and depravations of antiquity.

SIR, I know no man ſo like as you to make poſterity his debtor. I doe heartily congratulate unto you ſo worthy labours, ſo noble a project. Our adverſaries knowing of themſelves (that which Tertullian ſaith of all hereſies) that if appeale be made to the ſacred bench of Prophets and Apoſtles, they cannot ſtand; remove the ſuit of Religion craftily, into the Court of the Fathers: A reverend triall as any under heaven; where it cannot be ſpoken, how confidently they triumph ere the conflict. Give us the Fathers for our Judges (ſay Campian and Poſſevine) the day is ours. And whence is this courage? Is antiquity our enemy, their advocate? Certainly it cannot be truth that is new: We would renounce our Religion, if it could be over-looke for time. Let goe equity, the older take both. There be two things then, that give them heart in this provocation: One, the baſtardy of falſe Fathers; the other, the corruption of the true. What a flouriſh doe they make with uſurped names? Whom would it not amaze to ſee the frequent citations of the Apoſtles owne Canons, Conſtitutions, Liturgies, Maſſes: of Clemens, Denys the Areopagite, Linus, Hippolitus, Martiall of Burdeaux, Egeſippus: Donations of Conſtantine the great, and Lewis the godly: Of 50. Canons of Nice: of Dorotheus, Damaſus his Pontificall: Epiſtles decretall of Clemens, Euariſtus, Teleſphorus, and an hundred other Biſhops holy and ancient; of Euſebius, Anaſtaſius, Simeon Metaphraſtes, and more yet then a number moe; moſt whereof have crept out of the Vatican or Cloyſters; and all carry in them manifeſt brands of falſhood, and ſuppoſition: that I may ſay nothing of thoſe infinite writings, which either ignorance, or wilfulnes, hath fathered upon every of the Fathers, not without ſhameleſſe importunity, and groſſe impoſſibilities: all which (as ſhe ſaid of Peter) their ſpeech bewrayeth; or (as Auſtin ſaid of Cyprians ſtile) their face. This fraud is more eaſily avoided: For as in notorious burglaries, oft-times there is either an hat, or a glove, or a weapon left behind, which deſcrieth the authors; ſo the God of truth hath beſotted theſe impoſtors to let fall ſome palpable error, (though but of falſe calculation) whereby, if not their names, yet their ages might appeare, to their conviction. Moſt danger is in the ſecret corruption of the true and acknowledged iſſue of thoſe gracious parents; whom through cloſe and crafty handling, they have induced to belye thoſe that begot them; and to betray their Fathers, either with ſilence, or falſe evidence. Plainly, how are the honoured Volumes of faithfull antiquity, blurred, interlined, altered, depraved by ſubtile treachery, and made to ſpeak what they meant not? Fie on this, not ſo much injuſtice, as impiety, to raze the awfull monuments of the dead, and partially to blot and change the originall Will of the deceaſed, inſert our owne Legacies. This is done by our guilty adverſaries, to the injury not more of theſe Authors, then of the preſent and ſucceeding times. Hence thoſe Fathers are ſome-where not ours: What wonder? while they are not themſelves. Your induſtry hath offered (and that motion is lively and heroicall) to challenge all their learned and elegant pages, from injury of corruption; to reſtore them to themſelves, and to us: that which all the learned of our time have but deſired to ſee done, you proffer to effect:

effect: your assay in Cyprian and Augustine is happy and justly applauded. All our Libraries, whom your diligent hand hath ransackt, offer their aid, in such abundance of manuscripts, as all Europe would envy to see met in one Hand. After all this, for that the most spightfull imputation to our Truth is novelty, you offer to deduce her pedegree from those primitive times, through the successions of all ages; and to bring into the light of the world, many (as yet obscure) but no lesse certaine and authenticall Patrons, in a continuall line of defence. You have given proofe enough, that these are no glorious vaunts, but the zealous challenges of an able Champion. What wanteth then? Let me say for you: Not an heart, not an head, not an hands; but (which I almost scorn to name in such a cause) a purse. If this continue your hinderance, it will not be more our losse then shame. Heare me a little, ye great and wealthy: Hath God loaded you with so much substance; and will you not lend him a little of his owne? Shall your riot be fed with excesse; whiles Gods cause shall starve for want? Shall our adversaries so insultingly out-bid us; and in the zeale of our profusion laugh at our heartlesse and cold niggardlinesse? Shall heavenly truth lie in the dust for want of a little stamped earth to raise her? How can you so much any way honour God, yea your selves, deserve of posterity, pleasure the Church, & make you so good friends of your Mammon? Let not the next Age say, that she had so unkind predecessors. Fetch forth of your superfluous store, and cast in your rich gifts into this treasury of the Temple. The Lord and his Church have need. For you, it angers me to see how that flattering Possevinus smoothly intices you from us with golden offers, upon the advantage of our neglect; as if he (measuring your mind by his owne) thought an Omnia dabo would bring you with himselfe on your knees to worship the devill, the beast, the image of both: as if we were not as able to encourage, to reward deserts. Hath Vertue no Patrons on this side the Alpes? Are those hils onely the thresholds of honour? I plead not, because I cannot feare you: But who sees not how munificently our Church scattereth her bountifull favours upon lesse merit? If your day be not yet come, expect it; God and the Church owe you a benefit; if their payment be long, it is sure. Only goe you on with courage, in those your high endevours; and in the meane time, thinke it great recompence to have deserved.

To M. E. A.

Ep. IX. A discourse of fleeing or stay in the time of pestilence; whether lawfull for Minister or people.

HOw many hath a seduced conscience led untimely to the grave? I speake of this sad occasion of Pestilence. The Angell of God followes you, and you doubt whether you shall flye. If a Lion out of the forest should pursue you, you would make no question: yet could he not doe it unsent. What is the difference? Both instruments of divine revenge; both threaten death, one by spilling the blood, the other by infecting it. Who knowes whether he hath not appointed your Zoar out of the lists of this destruction? You say it is Gods visitation. What evill is not? If war have wasted the confines of your Country, you save your throats by flight: Why are you more favourable to Gods immediate sword of pestilence? Very leprosie, by Gods law, requires a separation; yet no mortall sickenesse. When you see a spotted Leper proclaime his uncleannesse in the street, will you embrace him for his sake that hath stricken him, or avoyd him for his sake that hath forbidden you? If you honour his rod, much more will you regard his precept. If you mislike not the affliction because he sends it, then love the life which you have of his sending; feare the judgement which he will send, if you love it not. He that bids us flee when we are persecuted, hath neither excepted Angell nor man, whether-soever, I feare our unkindnesse, if wilfully we flee not. But whither shall we flee from God? say you: where shall he not both finde and lead us? whither shall not our destiny follow us? Vaine men, we may run from our home, not from our grave; Death is subtile, our time is set; we cannot, God will not alter it. Alas, how wise we are to wrong our selves! Because Death will over-take us, shall we run and meet him? Because Gods decree is sure, shall we be desperate? Shall we presume, because God changeth not? Why doe we not try every knife and cord, since our time is neither capable of prevention nor delay: our end is set, not without our meanes. In matter of danger where the end is not knowne, the meanes must be suspected; in matter of hope where the end is not knowne, meanes must be used. Use then freely the meanes of your flight, suspect the danger of your stay; and since there is no particular necessity of your presence, know that God bids you depart and live. You urge the instance of your Minister: How unequally? There is not more lawfulnesse in your flight, then sinne in ours: you are your owne; we our peoples: you are charged with a body which you may not willingly leese, not hazard by staying; we with all their soules: which to hazard by absence, is to lose our owne: we must love our lives; but not when they are rivals with our soules, or with others. How much better is it to be dead, then negligent, then faithlesse! If some bodies be contagiously sick, shall all soules be wilfully neglected? There can be no time wherein good counsell is so seasonable, so needfull. Every threatning finds impression, where the mind is prepared by sensible judgements. When will the iron hearts of men bow, if not when they are heat in the flame of Gods affliction? now then to run away from a necessary and publike good, to avoyd a doubtfull and private evill, is to run into a worse evill then we would avoyd. He that will thus run from Ninive to Tharsis, shall find a tempest, and a whale in his way. Not that I dare be an author to any, of the private visitation of infected beds: I dare not without better warrant. Who ever said we were bound to close up the dying eies of every departing Christian? and upon whatever conditions, to heare their last grones; If we had a word, I would not debate of the successe. Then that were cowardlinesse, which now is wisdome. Is it no service, that we publikely teach and exhort? that we privately prepare men for death, and arme them against it? that our comfortable letters and messages stir up their fainting hearts? that our loud voices pierce their eares afarre; unlesse we feele their pulses, and leane upon their pillowes, and whisper in their eares? Daniel is in the lions den; Is it nothing that Darius speakes comfort to him thorow the grate, unlesse he goe in to salute him among those fierce companions? A good Minister is the Common goods: he cannot make his life peculiar to one, without injury to many. In the common cause of the Church, he must be no niggard of his life; in the private cause of a neighbours bodily sicknesse, he may soone be prodigall. A good father may not spend his substance on one child, and leave the rest beggers. If any man be resolute in the contrary, I had rather praise his courage, then imitate his practice. I confesse, I feare; not so much death, as want of warrant for death.

To M. R. B.

EP. X. A complaint of the iniquity of the Times; with a prescription of the meanes to redresse it.

WHiles I accused the Times, you undertook their patronage. I commend your charity, not your cause. It is true: There was never any Age not complained of; never any that was not censured, as worst. What is, we see; what was, we neither enquire nor care. That which is out of sight and use, is soone out of mind, and ere long out of memory. Yet the iniquity of others, cannot excuse ours. And if you will be but as just as charitable, you shall confesse, that both some times exceed others in evill; and these, all. This earthly Moone the Church hath her fuls and wanings, and sometimes her eclipses; whiles the shadow of this sinfull mass hides her beauty from the world. So long as she wadeth in this planetary world, it should be vaine to expect better: it is enough when she is fixed above, to be free from all change. This you yeeld: but nothing can perswade you, that she is not now in the full of her glory. True: or else she were not subject to this darkning. There was never

A more light of knowledge; never more darkneſſe of impiety: and there could not be ſuch darkneſſe, if there were not ſuch light. Goodneſſe repulſed, gives height to ſin: therefore are we worſe then our predeceſſors, becauſe we might be better. By how much our meanes are greater, by ſo much are our defects. Turne over all records, and parallel ſuch helps, ſuch care, ſuch coſt, ſuch expectation, with ſuch fruit, I yeald: We ſee but our owne times: There was never but one Noah (whom the Heathen celebrate under another name) that with two faces ſaw both before and behind him: But loe, that Ancient of dayes, to whom all times are preſent, hath told us, that theſe laſt ſhall be worſt: Our experience juſtifies him, with all but the wilfull. This cenſure (leſt you ſhould condemne my rigour, as unnaturally partiall) is not confined to our ſeas; but, free and common, hath the ſame bounds with the earth. I joy not in this large ſo-
B ciety. Would God we were evill alone. How few are thoſe, whoſe cariage doth not ſay, that profeſſion of any conſcience is puſillanimity? How few that care ſo much, as to ſhew well? And yet of thoſe few, how many care only to ſeeme? whoſe words diſagree from their actions, and their hearts from their words? Where ſhall a man mew up himſelfe, that he may not be a witneſſe of what he would not? What can he ſee, or heare, and not be either ſad or guilty? Oathes ſtrive for number with words, ſcoffes with oathes, vaine ſpeeches with both. They are rare hands, that are free either from C aſperſions of blood, or ſpots of filthineſſe. Let me be at once (as I uſe) bold and plaine: Wanton exceſſe, exceſſive pride, cloſe Atheiſme, impudent profaneneſſe, unmercifull oppreſſion, over-mercifull connivence, greedy covetouſneſſe, looſe prodigality, Simoniacall ſacrilege, unbridled luxury, beaſtly drunkenneſſe, bloody treachery, cunning fraud, ſlanderous detraction, envious underminings, ſecret idolatry, hypocriticall faſhionableneſſe, have ſpread themſelves all over the world. The Sunne of peace looking upon our uncleane heaps, hath bred theſe monſters, and hath given light to this brood of darkneſſe. Looke about you, and ſee if three great Idols, Honour, Pleaſure, Gaine, have not ſhared the earth amongſt them, and left him leaſt, whoſe all is. Your deniall drives me to particulars. I urge no further. If any adverſary inſult in my confeſſion, tell him, that I account them the greateſt part of this evill; neither could thus complaine, if they were not. Who knowes not, that as the earth is the dregs of the world, ſo Italy is the dregs of the earth, Rome of Italy? It is no wonder to find Satan in his Hell; but to find him in Paradiſe, is uncouth and grievous.
D Let them alone that will dye and hate to be cured. For us: O that remedies were as eaſie as complaints! That we could be as ſoone cleered, as convinced! That the taking of the medicine were but ſo difficult as the preſcription! And yet nothing hinders us from health, but our will: neither Goſpell, nor Grace, nor Glory, are ſhut up; only our hearts are not open. Let me turne my ſtile from you, to the ſecure, to the perverſe; though why doe I hope they will heare me, that are deafe to God? they will regard words, that care not for judgements? Let me tell them yet (if in vaine) they muſt breake, if they bow not: That if mercy may be refuſed, yet vengeance cannot be reſiſted: that God can ſerve himſelfe of them perforce, neither to their thank nor eaſe: that the preſent plagues doe but threaten worſe. Laſtly, that if they E relent not, hell was not made for nothing. What ſhould be done then? Except we would faine ſmart, each man amend one, & we all live. How commonly do men complaine, and yet adde to this heape? Redreſſe ſtands not in words. Let every man pull but one brand out of this fire, and the flame will goe out alone. What is a multitude, but an heap of unities? The more we deduce, the fewer we leave. O how happy were it then, if every man would begin at home, and take his owne heart to task, and at once be his owne Accuſer, and Judge; to condemne his private errors, yea to mulct them with death! Till then alas, what availes it to talke? While every man cenſures, and no man amends, what is it but buſie trifling? But though our care muſt begin at our ſelves, it may not end there. Who but a Caine is not his brothers keeper? Publike perſons are not ſo much their owne, as others are theirs. Who ſits at the common ſtern, cannot diſtinguiſh betwixt the care of his owne ſafety, and his veſſels: both drown at once, or at once ſalute the haven. Ye magiſtrates (for in you ſtand all our lower hopes) whom God hath on purpoſe, in a wiſe ſurrogation, ſet upon earth to correct her diſorders,

disorders, take to your selves firme fore-heads, couragious hearts, hands busie, and not partiall; to discountenance shameless wickednesse, to resist the violent sway of evils, to execute wholsome lawes, with strictnesse, with resolution. The sword of the spirit meets with such iron hearts, that it both enters not, and is rebated. Loe, it appeales to your arme, to your aid. An earthen edge can best pierce this hardned earth: If iniquity die not by your hands, we perish. And ye sonnes of Levi gather to your Moses in the gate of the Campe; consecrate your hands to God in this holy slaughter of vice: Let your voyce be both a trumpet to incite, and a two-edged sword to wound and kill. Cry downe sinne in earnest, and thunder out of that sacred chaire of Moses: and let your lives speak yet louder. Neither may the common Christian sit still and look on in silence: I am deceived, if in this cause God allow any man for private. Here must be all actors, no witnesses. His discreet admonitions, seasonable reproofes, and prayers never unseasonable, besides the power of honest example, are expected as his due tribute to the common health: What if we cannot turne the streame? Yet we must swim against it: even without conquest, it is glorious to have resisted: in this alone they are enemies, that doe nothing. Thus, as one that delights more in amendment, then excuse, I have both censured and directed. The favour of your sentence proceeds (I know) from your owne innocent uprightnesse: So judge of my severe taxation. It shall be happy for us, if we can at once excuse and diminish; accuse and redresse iniquity. Let but the endevour be ours, the successe to God.

Moſt Gracious Prince:

LEt me not (whiles I deſire to be dutiful) ſeeme importunate, in my dedications. I now bring to your Highneſſe theſe my laſt, and perhaps moſt materiall Letters: wherein, if I miſtake not, (as, how eaſily are we deceived in our owne?) the pleaſure of the varietie ſhal ſtrive with the importance of matter. There is no worldly thing, I confeſſe, whereof I am more ambitious, then of your Highneſſes contentment; which that you place in goodneſſe, is not more your glory, then our joy. Doe ſo ſtill, and heaven and earth ſhall agree to bleſſe you, and us in you. For me, after this my officious boldneſſe, I ſhall betake my ſelf in ſilence, to ſome greater worke, wherein I may approve my ſervice to the Church, and to your Highneſſe, as her ſecond joy and care. My heart ſhall be alwaies, and upon all opportunities, my tongue and pen ſhall no leſſe gladly be devoted to my gracious Maſter, as one

THE FIFT DECAD.

To my Lord Bishop of BATHE and VVELLS.

EPIST. I. Discoursing of the causes and meanes of the increase of Poperie.

Y what meanes the Romish Religion hath in these latter times prevailed so much over the world, (Right Reverend and Honourable) is a consideration both weighty and usefull; for hence may we frame our selves either to prevent, or imitate them: to imitate them in what we may; or prevent them in what they should not. I meddle not with the meanes of their first risings: the munificence of Christian Princes, the honest devotions of well-meaning Contributers, the division of the Christian world, the busie endeavours of forward Princes, for the recovery of the Holy-land, with neglect of their owne; the ambitious insinuations of that Sea, the fame and large dominion of those seven hils, the compacted indulgence and connivence of some treacherous, of other timorous Rulers; the shamelesse flattery of Parasites; the rude ignorance of Times; or if there be any other of this kinde: My thoughts and words shall be spent upon the present, and latest Age. All the world knowes, how that pretended Chaire of Peter tottered, and cracked, some threescore yeares agoe, threatning a speedy ruine to her fearefull usurper: How is it that still it stands, and seemes now to boast of some setlednesse? Certainly, if Hell had not conceived a new support, the Angell had long since said, It is fallen, it is fallen; and the Merchants, Alas, alas, the great Citie. The brood of that lame Loyola shall have this miserable honour, without our envie; that if they had not beene, Rome had not beene. By what meanes, it rests now to enquire.

It is not so much their zeale for falshood, which yet we acknowledge, and admire not. If Satan were not more busie then they, we had lost nothing. Their desperate attempts, bold intrusions, importunate sollicitations, have not returned empty; yet their policy hath done more then their force. That Popish world was then soule, and debauched, as in doctrine, so in life; and now began to be ashamed of it selfe. When these holy Fathers, as some Saints drope out of heaven, suddenly professed an unusuall strictnesse, sad pietie, resolved mortification; and so drew the eyes and hearts of men after them, that poore soules began to thinke, it could not be other then divine, which they taught; other then holy, which they touched. The very times (not seldome) give as great advantage, as our owne best strength: and the vices of others give glory to those which either are, or appeare vertuous. They saw how ready the world was to bite at the bait, and now followed their successe, with new helps. Plenty of pretended miracles must blesse, on all sides, the endeavours of this new Sect, and cals for both approbation, and wonder. Those things by the report of their own pens (other witnesses I see none) have beene done by the ten Patriarkes of the Jesuitish Religion, both alive and dead, which can hardly be matched of him, whose name they have usurped. And now the vulgar can say, If these men were not of God, they could doe nothing. How can a man that is a sinner doe such miracles? not distrusting either the fame, or the worke; but applauding the Authors, for what was said to be done. But now lest the envie of the fact should surpasse the wonder, they have learned to cast this glory upon their woodden Ladies, and to communicate the gaine unto the whole Religion: Two blocks at Hale and Scherpenheuvell, have said and done more for Poperie, then all Priers, ever since Francis wore his breeches on his head. But because that praise is sweet, which arises from the disgrace of a rivall; therefore this holy Societie hath, besides, ever wont to honour itselfe by the brokage of shamelesse untruths against the adverse part; not caring how probable any report is, but how odious. A just volume would not containe those willing lies, wherewith they have purposely loaded Religion, and us; that the multitude might first hate us, and then inquire: and these courses are held not tolerable, but meritorious. So the end may be attained, all meanes are just, all waies straight. Whom we may, we satisfie: but wounds once given are hardly healed without some scarres; and commonly accusations are vocall, Apologies dumbe. How easie is it to make any cause good, if we may take liberty of tongue and conscience? Yet lest some glimpse of our truth and innocence should perhaps lighten the eyes of some more inquisitive Reader, they have by strict prohibitions, whether of books, or conference, restrained all possibility of true informations: Yea their owne writings, wherein our opinions are reported with confutation, are not allowed to the common view; lest if it should appeare what we hold, our meer opinion should prevaile more then their subtilest answer. But above all, the restraint of Gods booke hath gained them most: If that might be in the hands of men, their religion could not be in their hearts. now, the concealment of Scriptures breeds ignorance, and ignorance superstition. But because forbiddance doth but whet desire, and worke a conceit of some secret excellence in things denied; therefore have they devised to affright this dangerous curiositie, with that cruell, butcherly, hellish Inquisition, wherein yet there is not lesse craft then violence. For since they have perceived the blood of Martyrs to be but the seed of the Church, and that their persones are more dispersed with beating; they have now learned to murder without noise, and to bring forth (if at least they list sometimes to make the people privy to some examples of terrour) not men, but carcasses. Behold, the constant confessions of the dying Saints, have made them weary of publike executions: none but bare walls shall now testifie the courage and faith of our happy Martyrs. A disguised corpse is onely brought forth to the multitude, either for laughter, or feare. Yet because the very dead speake for truth in a loud silence, these spectacles are rare; and the graves of heretikes are become as close as their death.

Yet lest (since neither living mouthes, nor faithfull pens may be suffered to insinuate any truth) these speeches should perhaps be received from the Ancients, which to us were hereticall; the monuments of unpartiall antiquitie must be depraved; all witnesses that might speake against them must be corrupted, with a fraudulent violence; and some of them purged to the death. So while those are debarred, and the Antients altered, posterity shall acknowledge no adversary.

What should I speak of those plausible devices, which they have invented, to make superstitious and foolish Proselytes? Their proud vaunts of antiquity, universalitie, succession, and the name of their fore-fathers, do not onely perswade, but amaze and befot an ignorant heart. The glorious shewes of their processions, the gaudy ornaments of their Altars, the pompe and magnificence of the places, and maner of their Services, the triumphs of their great Festivals, are enough to bewitch any childish, simple, or vaine beholders. Who knowes not that nature is most led by sense? Sure, children and fooles (such as are all naturall men) cannot be of any other Religion.

Besides all these, their personall understandings, what for cunning, what for boldnesse, could promise nothing but successe, they can transforme themselves into all shapes, and in these false formes thrust themselves into all Courts, and companies, not ofter changing their habit, then their name. They can take the best opportunities to worke upon those which are either most unable to resist, or most like to befriend them. That I may not speake of the wrongs of unseasonable travell; wherein many unsetled heads have met dangers, and sollicited errors, who like fond and idle Dinahs, going abroad to gaze, have beene ravished ere their returne. Never was any bird so laid for by the nets and cals of the fowler, as the great heire of some noble family, or some fiery wit, is by these impostors. They know that greatnesse is both lawlesse and commanding, if not by precept, yet by example: their very silence is perswasory, and imperious. But alas for that other sex: Still the Devill begins with

A Eves, ſtill his aſſault is ſtrongeſt where is weakeſt reſiſtance, Simon Magus had his Helena, Nicholas the Deacon had his chores faminees, (as Hierome cals them) Marcion had his Factoreſſe at Rome, Appelles his Philumena, Montanus his Priſca and Maximilla, Arrius his Conſtantines ſiſter, Donatus his Lucilla, Elpidius his Agape, Priſcillianus his Galla: and our Jeſuites have their painted Ladies (not dead, but living) both for objects, and inſtruments. When they ſaw they could not blow up religion with French powder into Heaven, they now try by this Moabitiſh plot to ſinke it downe to Hell. Thoſe ſilly women, which are laden with ſins, and divers luſts, muſt now be the ſtales of their ſpirituall fornications: But for that theſe enterpriſes want not danger, that both parts may ſecurely ſucceed, behold publique liberty of diſpenſations, whether for diſſembled religion, or not unprofitable filthineſſe. Theſe meanes are (like the
B Authors) diſhoneſt, and godleſſe. Adde (if you pleaſe) hereto, thoſe which pretend more innocent policie: their common dependances upon one Commander, their intelligences given, their charges received, their rewards and honours (perhaps of the Calender, perhaps of a red Hat) duly conferred. Neither may the leaſt helpe be aſcribed to the conference of ſtudies; (the conjoyned labours of whole Societies directed to one end, and ſhrowded under the title of one Author) to large maintenances, raiſed from the death-beds of ſome guilty benefactors: from whence flow both infinite numbers, and incomparable helps, of Students. Under which head, for the time paſt, not a few are moved by the remembrance of the bounteous hoſpitality of the religious; who having ingroſſed the world to themſelves, ſeemed liberall in giving ſome thing; like unto ſome vain-glorious theeves, which having robbed wealC thy Merchants, beſtow ſome pence upon beggers. Further, the ſmothering, if not compoſing of their frequent ſtrifes, and confining of brawles within their owne threſholds, with the nice managing of their knowne oppoſitions, hath won many ignorant friends. Laſtly, the excellent correſpondence of their doctrines unto nature, hath been their beſt ſollicitor. We have examined particulars in a former Epiſtle: wherein we have made it evident, that Popery affects nothing but to make Nature either proud, or wanton: it offers difficulties, but carnall; and ſuch as the greateſt lover of himſelfe would eaſily embrace for an advantage. That we may therefore ſumme up all; I need not accuſe our careleſnes, indifferency, idleneſſe, looſe carriage; in all which, would God we had not aided them, and wronged our ſelves; nor yet their zeale and forwardnes, worſe meanes are guilty of their gaine. In ſhort, the faire outſide which
D they ſet upon Religion, which ſure is the beſt they have, if not all; their pretended miracles, wilfull untruths, ſtrait prohibitions, bloody and ſecret inquiſitions, depravations of ancient witneſſes, expurgation of their owne, gay and gariſh ſights, glorious titles, crafty changes of names, ſhapes, habits, conditions; inſinuations to the great, oppugnation of the weaker ſex; falſhood of anſwers, and oathes, diſpenſations for ſinnes, uniting of forces, concealing of differences, largeneſſe of contributions, multitude of actors, and meanes, accordances to mens naturall diſpoſitions: Where we on the contrary care not to ſeeme, but to be, diſclaime miracles, dare not ſave the life of Religion with a lie, give free ſcope to all pens, to all tongues, to all eyes: ſhed no blood for Religion: ſuffer all Writers to ſpeake like themſelves; ſhew nothing but poore ſimplicitie in our devotions; goe ever, and looke, as we are; teach the E truth right-downe in an honeſt plainneſſe, take no vantage of imbecillitie; ſweare true, though we die; give no hope of indulgence for evill; ſtudy each retired to himſelfe, and the Muſes; publiſh our quarrels, and aggravate them; anger nature and conquer it. Such gaine ſhall be gravell in their throats: ſuch loſſes to us (in our not daring to ſinne) ſhall be happy and victorious; in all other regards are both blame-worthy, and recoverable. What dulneſſe is this? Have we ſuch a King, as in theſe liſts of controverſie, may dare to grapple with that great infallible Vicar, for his triple Crowne; ſuch Biſhops, as may juſtly challenge the whole Conſiſtory of Rome; ſo many learned Doctors, and Divines, as no Nation under heaven, more; ſo flouriſhing Univerſities, as Chriſtendome hath none; ſuch bleſſed opportunities, ſuch incouragements; and now when we want nothing elſe, ſhall we be wanting to our ſelves? Yea, above all theſe, the God of heaven favours us; and doe we languiſh? The cauſe is his, and in ſpight of the gates of hell ſhall ſucceed, though we were not: our neglect may ſlacken the paſe of truth, cannot ſtay the paſſage. Why are we not as buſie, as ſubtill, more reſolute? Such ſpirits, and ſuch hands as yours (Reverend Lord) muſt put life into the cold breaſts of this frozen generation, and raiſe them up to ſuch thoughts and endeavours, as may make the emulation of our adverſaries equall to their enmitie.

To my Lord Biſhop of Worceſter.

EP. II. Shewing the difference of the preſent Church from the Apoſtolicall; and needleſſe of our conformitie thereto in all things.

IFeare not to ſay, thoſe men are but ſuperſtitiouſly curious (Right Reverend, and Honourable) which would call backe all circumſtances to their firſt patterns. The Spouſe of Chriſt hath beene ever clothed with her owne rites: and as apparell, ſo Religion hath her faſhions, variable according to ages and places. To reduce us to the ſame obſervations which were in Apoſtolicall uſe, were no better then to tie us to the ſandals of the Diſciples, or ſeameleſſe coat of our Saviour. In theſe caſes, they did what we need not; and we may, what they did not: God meant us no bondage in their example: their Canons bind us, whether for manners, or doctrine, not their Ceremonies. Neither Chriſt, nor his Apoſtles, did all things for imitation: I ſpeake not of miraculous acts. We need not be ſilent before a Judge, as Chriſt was; we need not take a towel, and gird our ſelves, and waſh our ſervants feet, as Chriſt did; we need not make tents for our living, as Paul; nor goe armed, as Peter; nor carry about our wives, as he, and the other Apoſtles. I acknowledge the ground, not onely of ſeparation, but Anabaptiſme, and wonder that theſe conceits doe not anſwer themſelves. Who can chuſe but ſee a manifeſt difference betwixt thoſe Lawes, which Chriſt and his great Ambaſſadors made for eternall uſe, and thoſe rituall matters, which were confined to place and time? Every Nation, every perſon ſinnes that obſerves not thoſe; Theſe for the moſt part, are not kept of the moſt; and are as well left without ſinne by us, as uſed without preſcription or neceſſity by the Authors. Some of them we cannot doe: others we need not: Which of us caſt out devils by command? Who can cure the ſicke by ointment, and impoſition of hands? The Diſciples did it. All thoſe acts which proceeded from ſupernaturall priviledge, ceaſed with their cauſe: who now dare undertake to continue them? Unleſſe perhaps ſome bold Papiſts, who have brought in groſſe Magicke, in ſtead of miraculous authoritie; and dawbe very carcaſſes in ſtead of healing diſeaſes. There be more yet which we need not doe. What need we to chuſe Miniſters by lot? what need we to diſclaime all peculiaritie in goods? What need we to Chriſten in rivers; or to meet upon their banks? What need we to receive Gods Supper after our owne? What to leane in each others boſome while we receive it? What to abhorre leaven in that holy Bread? What to celebrate love-feaſts upon the receit? What to abſtaine from all ſtrangled and bloud? What to depend upon a maintenance arbitrarie, and uncertaine? What to ſpend our dayes in a perpetuall pererration, as not onely the Apoſtles, but the Prophets and Evangeliſts ſome ages after Chriſt? Whoſoever would impoſe all theſe on us, he ſhould ſurely make us, not the ſonnes, but the ſlaves of the Apoſtles. Gods Church never her ſelfe in ſuch ſervile tearmes; yea Chriſt himſelfe gave at firſt ſome precepts of this nature, which he reverſed ere long: when he ſent the Diſciples to preach, he charges: Take not gold, nor ſilver, nor money in your girdles; afterwards Iudas carried the bagge. He charges, not to take ſo much as a ſtaffe; yet after behold two ſwords: ſhould the Diſciples have held their Maſter to his owne rule? Is it neceſſary, that what he once commanded, ſhould be obſerved alwayes? The very next Age to theſe Chriſtian Patriarks, neither would nor durſt have ſo much varied her rites, or augmented them; if it had found it ſelfe tied either to number, or kind: As yet it was pure, chaſte, and (which was ground of all) perſecuted.

A ted. The Church of Rome distributed the sacramentall Bread: the Church of Alexandria permitted the people to take it: the Churches of Africke and Rome, mixed their holy Wine with water; other colder Regions dranke it pure. Some kneeled in their praiers, other fell prostrate, and some lifted up eyes, hands, feet towards heaven: some kept their Easter according to the Iewish use, the fourteenth of March; the French (as Nicephorus) the eight of the Calends of Aprill, in a set solemnitie: the Church of Rome the Sunday after the fourteenth Moone; which yet (as Socrates truly writes) was never restrained by any Gospell, by any Apostle. That Romish Victor overcame the other world in this point, with too much rigour; whose censure therefore of the Asian Churches was justly censured by Irenæus. What should I speake of their difference of fasts? There can scarce be more varietie in dayes, or meats. It hath ever beene thus seene, according to our Anselmes rule, that the multitude of different
B ceremonies in all Churches, hath justly commended their unitie in faith. The French Divines preach covered, (upon the same rule which required the Corinthians to bee uncovered) we bare: The Dutch sit at the Sacrament, we kneele; Genua useth wafers, we leavened bread; they common vestures in Divine Service, we peculiar: each is free: no one doth either blame, or over-rule others. I cannot but commend those very Novatian Bishops (though it is a wonder any precedent of peace should fall from Schismaticks) who meeting in Councell together, enacted that Canon of indifferencie, when the Church was distracted with the differences of her Paschal solemnities; concluding, how insufficient this cause was to disquiet the Church of Christ. Their owne issue (our Separatists) will needs be unlike them in good; and strive to a fur-
C ther distance from peace: whiles in a conceit not lesse idle, then scrupulous, they presse us to an uniforme conformitie in our fashions to the Apostles. Their owne practice condemnes them: they call for some, and yet keepe not all: yet the same reason inforces all, that pleads for some: and that which warrants the forbearance of some, holds for all. Those tooles which serve for the foundation, are not of use for the roofe. Yea the great maister-builder chose those workmen for the first stones, which he meant not to imploy in the walls. Doe we not see all Christs first agents extraordinary; Apostles, Evangelists, Prophets, Propheteſſes? See we not fiery and cloven tongues descending? What Church ever since boasted of such founders, of such meanes? Why would God begin with those which he meant not to continue; but to shew us we may not alwaies look for one face of things? The nurse feeds and tends D her child at first; afterward he is undertaken by the discipline of a Tutor: must he be alwayes under the spoone, and ferule, because he began so? If he have good breeding, it matters not by whose hands. Who can denie, that we have the substance of all those royall lawes, which Christ and his Apostles left to his Church; What doe we now thus importunately catching at shadowes? If there had beene a necessity of having what we want, or wanting what we have, let us not so farre wrong the wisdome and perfection of the Law-giver, as to thinke he would not have injoyned that, and forbidden this. His silence in both argues his indifferencie, and calls for ours; which while it is not peaceably entertained, there is clamour without profit, malice without cause, and strife without end.

To my Lady MARY DENNY.

EP. III. Containing the description of a Christian, and his differences from the worldling.

MADAM:

IT is true, that worldly eyes can see no difference betwixt a Christian and another man; the out-side of both is made of one clay, and cast in one mould; both are inspired with one common breath: Outward events distinguish them not; those God never made for evidences of love or hatred. So the senses can perceive no difference betwixt the reasonable soule, and that which informes the beast, yet the soule knowes there is much more, then betwixt their bodies. The same holds in this: Faith sees more inward difference, then the eye sees outward resemblance. This point is not not more high then materiall: which that it may appeare, let me ſhew what it is to be a Chriſtian: You that have felt it, can ſecond me with your experience; and ſupply the defects of my diſcourſe. He is the living temple of the living God, where the Deitie is both reſident and worſhipped. The higheſt thing in a man is his owne ſpirit: but in a Chriſtian the Spirit of God, which is the God of ſpirits. No grace is wanting in him; and thoſe which there are, want not ſtirring up. Both his heart and his hands are cleane: All his outward purity flowes from within; neither doth he frame his ſoule to counterfeit good actions; but out of his holy diſpoſition commands and produces them, in the light of God. Let us begin with his beginning, and fetch the Chriſtian out of this nature, as another Abraham from his Chaldea; whiles the worldling lives and dies, in nature, out of God. The true convert therefore, after his wilde and ſecure courſes, puts himſelfe (through the motions of Gods Spirit) to ſchoole unto the Law; there he learnes what he ſhould have done, what he could not do, what he hath done, what he hath deſerved. Theſe leſſons coſt him many a ſtripe, & many a teare, and not more griefe then terror: for this ſharpe maſter makes him feele what ſin is, and what Hell is, and in regard of both, what himſelfe is. When he hath well ſmarted under the whip of this ſevere Uſher, and is made vile enough in himſelfe, then is he led up into the higher ſchoole of Chriſt, and there taught the comfortable leſſons of grace; there he learnes what belongs to a Saviour, what one he is, what he hath done, and for whom, how he became ours, we his: and now finding himſelfe in a true ſtate of danger, of humility, of need, of deſire, of fitneſſe for Chriſt, he brings home to himſelfe all that he learnes, and what he knowes, he applies. His former Tutor he feared, this he loveth; that ſhewed him his wounds, yea, made them; this binds and heales them: that killed him; this ſhewes him life, and leads him to it. Now at once he hates himſelfe, defies Satan, truſts to Chriſt, makes account both of pardon and glory. This is his moſt precious faith, whereby he appropriates, yea ingroſſes Chriſt Jeſus to himſefe: whence he is juſtified from his ſinnes, purified from his corruptions, eſtabliſhed in his reſolutions, comforted in his doubts, defended againſt temptations, overcomes all his enemies. Which vertue, as it is moſt imployed, and moſt oppoſed, ſo carries the moſt care from the Chriſtian heart, that it be ſound, lively, growing: ſound, not rotten, not hollow, not preſumptuous: ſound in the act; not a ſuperficiall conceit, but a true, deepe, and ſenſible apprehenſion: an apprehenſion, not of the braine, but of the heart; and of the heart, not approving, or aſſenting, but truſting and repoſing. Sound in the object, none but Chriſt: he knowes, that no friendſhip in heaven can doe him good, without this; The Angels cannot; God will not: Ye beleeve in the Father, beleeve alſo in me.

Lively; for it cannot give life, unleſſe it have life; the faith that is not faithfull, is dead: the fruits of faith are good works; whether inward, whithin the roofe of the heart, as love, awe, ſorrow, pietie, zeal, joy, and the reſt; or outward towards God, or our brethren: obedience and ſervice to the one; to the other reliefe and beneficence: Theſe he beares in his time; ſometimes all, but alwayes ſome.

Growing: true faith cannot ſtand ſtill; but as it is fruitfull in works, ſo it increaſeth in degrees: from a little ſeed it proves a large plant, reaching from earth to heaven, and from one heaven to another: every ſhower and every Sun addes ſomething to it. Neither is this grace ever ſolitary, but alwayes attended royally: for he that beleeves what a Saviour he hath, cannot but love him; and he that loves him, cannnot but hate whatſoever may diſpleaſe him; cannot but rejoyce in him, and hope to enjoy him, and deſire to enjoy his hope, and contemne all thoſe vanities which he once deſired and enjoyed. His mind now ſcorneth to grovell upon earth, but ſoareth up to the things above, where Chriſt ſits at the right hand of God; and after it hath ſeene what is done in heaven, lookes ſtrangely upon all worldly things. He dare truſt his faith above his reaſon, and ſenſe: and hath learned to weane his appetite from craving much. He ſtands in awe of his owne conſcience, and dare no more offend it, then not diſpleaſe himſelfe. He feares not his enemies, yet neglects them not; equally avoiding ſecurity, and timorouſneſſe. He ſees him that is inviſible; and walks with him awfully, familiarly. He knowes what he is borne to, and therefore digeſts the miſeries of his wardſhip,

A wardship, with patience: he findes more comfort in his afflictions, then any worlding in pleasures. And as he hath these graces to comfort him within, so hath he the Angels to attend him without, spirits better then his owne; more powerfull, more glorious: These beare him in their armes, wake by his bed, keepe his soule while he hath it, and receive it when it leaves him. These are some present differences: the greatest are future; which could not be so great, if themselves were not witnesse; no lesse then betwixt heaven and hell, torment and glory, an incorruptible crowne, and fire unquenchable. Whether Infidels beleeve these things or no, we know them: so shall they, but too late. What remaines but that we applaud our selves in this happinesse, and walke on cheerily in this heavenly profession; acknowledging that God could not doe more for us, and that we cannot doe enough for him. Let others boast (as your Ladiship might with others) of ancient and Noble Houses, large patrimonies, or B dowries, honorable commands, others of famous names, high and envied honours, or the favours of the greatest, others of valour or beauty, or some perhaps of eminent learning and wit; it shall be our pride that we are Christians.

To my Lady HONORIA HAY.

EPI. IV. Discoursing of the necessity of Baptisme, and the estate of those which necessarily want it.

MADAM:

C ME thinks children are like teeth, troublesome both in the breeding, and losing, and oftentimes painfull while they stand: yet such, as we neither would, nor can well be without. I goe not about to comfort you thus late, for your losse, I rather congratulate your wise moderation and Christian care of these first spirituall privileges; desiring onely to satisfie you in what you heard as a witnesse; not in what you needed as a mother. Children are the blessings of Parents, and Baptisme is the blessing of children, and parents: wherein there is not onely use, but necessity; necessity, not in respect so much of the end, as of the precept: God hath enjoyned it, to the comfort of parents, and behoofe of children: which therefore, as it may not be superstitiously hastened, so not negligently deferred. That the contempt of baptisme damneth, is past all doubt; but that the constrained absence thereof, should send
D infants to hell, is a cruell rashnesse. It is not their sinne to die early: death is a punishment, not an offence; an effect of sinne, not a cause of torment; they want nothing but time; which they could not command. Because they could not live a while longer, that therefore they should die everlastingly, is the hard sentence of a bloody religion. I am onely sorry, that so harsh an opinion should be graced with the name of a Father, so reverend, so divine: whose sentence yet let no man plead by halves. He who held it impossible for a child to be saved unlesse the baptismall water were powred on his face, held it also as impossible, for the same Infant, unlesse the sacramentall bread were received into his mouth. There is the same ground for both, the same error in both, a weaknesse fit for forgetfulnesse; see yet how ignorant, or ill-meaning
E posterity, could single out one halfe of the opinion for truth, and condemne the other of falshood. In spight of whom, one part shall easily convince the other; yea, without all force: since both cannot stand, both will fall together for company. The same mouth, which said, Unlesse ye be borne againe of water, and the Holy Ghost, said also, Except ye eat the flesh of the Sonne of Man, and drinke his blood: an equall necessity of both. And lest any should plead different interpretations, the same S. Austin averres this latter opinion also, concerning the necessary communicating of children, to have beene once the common judgement of the Church of Rome; A sentence so displeasing, that you shall find the memory of it noted with a blacke coale, and wip't out in that infamous bill of Expurgations. Had the ancient Church held this desperate sequele, what strange, and yet wilfull cruelty had it beene in them, to deferre baptisme a whole year long: till Easter, or that Sunday, which hath his name (I thinke) from the white robes of the baptized?

Yea

Yea what an adventure was it in ſome, to adjourne it till their age (with Conſtantine) if being unſure of their life, they had beene ſure the prevention of death would have inferred damnation? Looke unto that legall Sacrament of circumciſion, which (contrary to the fancies of our Anabaptiſts) directly anſwers this Evangelicall. Before the eighth day, they could not be circumciſed: before the eighth day they might die. If dying the ſeventh day, they were neceſſarily condemned: either the want of a day is a ſin, or God ſometimes condemneth not for ſin: Neither of them poſſible, neither according with the juſtice of the Law-giver. Or if from this parallel, you pleaſe to looke either to reaſon or example, the caſe is cleere Reaſon; no man that hath faith, can be condemned, for Chriſt dwels in our hearts by faith: and he in whom Chriſt dwels, cannot be a reprobate. Now it is poſſible a man may have a ſaving faith, before baptiſme: Abraham firſt beleeved to juſtification: then after received the ſigne of circumciſion, as a ſeale of the righteouſneſſe of that faith, which he had when he was uncircumciſed: Therefore ſome dying before their baptiſme, may, yea muſt be ſaved. Neither was Abrahams caſe ſingular; he was the Father of all them alſo, which beleeve, not being circumciſed: theſe, as they are his Sons in faith, ſo in righteouſneſſe, ſo in ſalvation: uncircumciſion cannot hinder, where faith admitteth; Theſe following his ſteps of beleefe before the Sacrament, ſhall doubtleſſe reſt in his boſome, without the Sacrament; without it, as fatally abſent, not as willingly neglected. It is not the water, but the faith: not the putting away the filth of the fleſh, (ſaith S. Peter) but the ſtipulation of a good conſcience; for who takes Baptiſme without a full faith (ſaith Hierom) takes the water, takes not the ſpirit; Whence is this ſo great vertue of the water, that it ſhould touch the body, and cleanſe the heart, (ſaith Auſtin) unleſſe by the power of the Word, not ſpoken but beleeved? Thou ſeeſt water (ſaith Ambroſe,) every water heales not, that water onely heales which hath the grace of God annexed; And if there be any grace in the water (ſaith Baſil) it is not of the nature of the water, but of the preſence of the Spirit. Baptiſme is indeed, as Saint Ambroſe ſtiles it, the pawne and image of our reſurrection; yea (as Baſil) the power of God to reſurrection: but (as Ignatius expounds this phraſe aright) beleeving in his death, we are by baptiſme made partakers of his reſurrection. Baptiſme therefore without faith cannot ſave a man, and by faith doth ſave him: and faith without baptiſme (where it cannot be had; not where it may be had, and is contemned) may ſave him: That ſpirit which works by meanes, will not be tied to meanes.

Examples. Caſt your eyes upon that good theefe; good in his death, though in his life abominable: he was never waſhed in Jordan, yet is received into Paradiſe: his ſoule was ſoule with rapines, and injuſtice, yea bloody with murders; and yet being ſcoured only with the blood of his Saviour, not with water of baptiſm, it is preſented glorious to God. I ſay nothing of the ſoules of Trajan, and Falconilla, meere heathens, living and dying without Chriſt, without baptiſme: which yet their honeſt Legend repents to be delivered from hell, tranſported to heaven, not ſo much as ſcorched in Purgatory: The one by the prayers of Gregory, the other of Tecla. What partiality is this, to deny that to the children of Chriſtians, which they grant to knowne Infidels? The promiſe is made to us, and our ſeed: not to thoſe that are without the pale of the Church. Thoſe innocents which were maſſacred for Chriſt, are by them canonized for Saints, and make one day in their Kalendar (each yeare) both holy, and diſmall; whereof yet ſcarce any lived to know water, none to know baptiſme. Yea, all Martyrs are here priviledged, who are Chriſtened in their owne blood, in ſtead of water: but where hath God ſaid, All that die without baptiſme, ſhall die for ever, except Martyrs; why not, except beleevers? It is faith that gives life to Martyrs; which if they ſhould want, their firſt death could not avoid the ſecond. Ambroſe doubted not to ſay, his Valentinian was baptized becauſe he deſired it; not becauſe he had it: he knew the mind of God, who accounts us to have what we unfainedly wiſh. Children cannot live to deſire baptiſme: if their Parents deſire it for them, why may not the deſire of others be theirs, as well as (according to Auſtins opinion) the faith of others beleeving, and the mouth of others confeſſing? In theſe caſes therefore, of any ſoules but our owne, it is fafeſt to ſuſpend, and dangerous to paſſe judgement. Secret things to God: He that made all ſoules,

A soules, knowes what to doe with them, neither will make us of counsell: But if we define either way, the errors of charitie are inoffensive. We must honor good means, and use them, and in their necessary want depend upon him, who can work, beyond, without, against meanes.

Thus have I endevoured your Ladiships satisfaction in what you heard, not without some scruple. If any man shall blame my choice in troubling you with a thorny and scholasticall discourse, let him know that I have learned this fashion of Saint Hierome the Oracle of Antiquity, who was wont to entertaine his Paula and Eustochium, Marcella, Principia, Hedibia, and other devout Ladies, with learned canvases of the deep points of Divinitie. This is not so perplexed, that it need to offend: nor so unnecessary, that it may be unknowne.

To Sir RICHARD LEA, since deceased.

EPIST. V. Discoursing of the comfortable remedies of all afflictions.

WIse men seek remedies before their disease: sensible patients, when they begin to complaine: fools, too late. Afflictions are the common maladies of Christians: These you feel, and upon the first groanes seeke for ease. Wherefore serves the tongue of learned, but to speake words in season? I am a Schollar of those that can comfort you: If you shall, with me, take out my lessons, neither of us shall repent it. You smart and complaine: take heed lest too much. There is no affliction not grievous: the bone that was dis-joynted, cannot be set right without paine. No potion can cure us, if it worke not: it works not, except it make us sicke: we are contented with that sickenesse, which is the way to health. There is a vexation without hurt: such is this: We are afflicted, not over-pressed; needy, not desperate; persecuted, not forsaken; cast downe, but perish not. How should we, when all the evill in a Citie comes from the providence of a good God; which can neither be impotent, nor unmercifull? It is the Lord: let him doe what he will. Woe were us if evils could come by chance; or were let loose to alight where they list: now they are over-ruled, we are safe. The destiny of our sorrowes is written in heaven by a wise and eternall decree: Behold, he that hath ordained, moderates them. A faithfull God, that gives an issue with the tentation: An issue, both of their end, and their succesſe. He chides not alwayes, much lesse striketh. Our light afflictions are but for a moment: not so long, in respect of our vacancy, and rest. If we weepe sometimes, our teares are precious; As they shall never be dry in his bottle, so they shall soone be dry upon our cheekes. He that wrings them from us, shall wipe them off: how sweetly doth he interchange our sorrowes, and joyes, that we may neither be vaine, nor miserable? It is true; To be strooke, once in anger, is fearfull: his displeasure is more then his blow: In both, our God is a consuming fire. Feare not, these stripes are the tokens of his love: he is no Son, that is not beaten; yea till he smart, and cry; if not till he bleed: no Parent corrects anothers child; and he is no good Parent that corrects not his owne. Oh rod worthy to be kissed, that assures us of his love, of our adoption! What speake I of no hurt? short praises doe but discommend; I say more, these evils are good: looke to their effects. What is good, if not patience? affliction is the mother of it; tribulation bringeth forth patience. What can earth or heaven yeeld, better then the assurance of Gods Spirit? Afflictions argue, yea seale this to us. Wherein stands perfect happinesse, if not in our neere resemblance of Christ? Why was man created happy, but because in Gods image? The glory of Paradise, the beauty of his body, the duty of the creatures, could not give him felicity, without the likenesse to his Creator. Behold, what we lost in our height, we recover in our miserie; a conformitie to the image of the Son of God: he that is not like his elder brother, shall never be coheire with him. Loe, his side, temples, hands, feet, all bleeding: his face blubbred, ghastly, and spitted on: his skin all pearled with a bloody sweat; his head drouping, his soule heavie to the death: see you the worldling merry, soft, delicate, perfumed, never wrinkled with sorrow, never humbled with afflictions? What resemblance is here, yea what what contrariety? Eafe ſlayeth the foole; it hath made him reſty, and leaves him miſerable. Be not deceived; no man can follow Chriſt without his Croſſe, much leſſe reach him; and if none ſhall raigne with Chriſt, but thoſe that ſuffer with him; what ſhall become of theſe jolly ones? Goe now thou dainty worldling, and pleaſe thy ſelfe in thy happineſſe, laugh alwayes, and be ever applauded; it is a wofull felicitie that thou ſhalt find in oppoſition to thy Redeemer: He hath ſaid, Woe to them that laugh; Beleeveſt thou, and doſt not weep at thy laughter? and with Salomon, condemne it of madneſſe? And againe, with the ſame breath, Bleſſed are ye that weep: who can beleeve this, and not rejoyce in his owne teares, and not pitie the faint ſmiles of the godleſſe? Why bleſſed? for ye ſhall laugh: Behold, we that weepe on earth, ſhall laugh in heaven: we that now weepe with men, ſhall laugh with Angels; while the ſleering worldling ſhall be gnaſhing, and howling with Devils: wee that weepe for a time, ſhall laugh for ever: who would not be content to deferre his joy a little, that it may be perpetuall, and infinite? What madman would purchaſe this crackling of thornes (ſuch is the worldlings joy) with eternall ſhrieking and torment? He that is the doore and the way, hath taught us, that through many afflictions we muſt enter into heaven. There is but one paſſage, and that a ſtraight one: If with much preſſure we can get through, and leave but our ſuperfluous rags as torne from us in the crowd, we are happy. He that made heaven, hath on purpoſe thus framed it; wide, when we are entred, and glorious: narrow and hard in the entrance; that after our pain our glory might be ſweeter. And if before-hand you can climb up thither in your thoughts, looke about you, you ſhall ſee no more Palmes, then croſſes: you ſhall ſee none crowned, but thoſe that have wreſtled with croſſes and ſorrowes, to ſweat, yea to blood, and have overcome. All runnes here to the over-commer: and overcomming implies both fighting and ſucceſſe. Gird up your loynes therefore, and ſtrengthen your weak knees: reſolve to fight for heaven, to ſuffer fighting, to perſiſt in ſuffering; ſo perſiſting you ſhall overcome, and overcomming, you ſhall be crowned. Oh reward truly great, above deſert, yea above conceit! A crowne for a few groans: An eternall crown of life and glory, for a ſhort and momentany ſuffering: How juſt is S. Pauls account, that the afflictions of this preſent life are not worthy of the glory which ſhall be ſhewed unto us? O Lord let me ſmart that I may raigne; uphold thou me in ſmarting, that thou mayeſt hold me worthy of raigning. It is no matter how vile I be, ſo I may be glorious. What ſay you? would you not be afflicted? Whether had you rather mourne for a while, or for ever? One muſt be choſen: the election is eaſie: Whether had you rather rejoyce for one fit, or alwayes? You would doe both. Pardon me, it is a fond covetouſneſſe, and idle ſingularity to affect it. What? that you alone may fare better then all Gods Saints? That God ſhould ſtrew Carpets for your nice feet only, to walke into your heaven, and make that way ſmooth for you, which all Patriarkes, Prophets, Evangeliſts, Confeſſors, Chriſt himſelfe, have found rugged and bloody? Away with this ſelfe-love; and come downe you ambitious ſons of Zebedee: and ere you think of ſitting neere the Throne, be content to be called unto the Cup. Now is your triall: Let your Saviour ſee how much of his bitter potion you can pledge; then ſhall you ſee how much of his glory he can afford you. Be content to drinke of his vinegar and gall, and you ſhall drinke new wine with him in his kingdome.

To M. PETER MOULIN, Preacher of the Church at PARIS.

EPIST. VI. Diſcourſing of the late French occurrents, and what uſe God expects to be made of them.

SInce your travels here with us, we have not forgotten you; but ſince that, your witty and learned travels in the common affaires of Religion, have made your memory both freſh & bleſſed. Behold, whiles your hand was happily buſie in the defence of our King, the heads and hands of traitors were buſie in the maſſacring of your

A your own. God doth no memorable and publike act, which he would not have talked of, read, construed of all the world. How much more of neighbors, whom scarce a sea severeth from each other? how much yet more of brethren, whom neither land, nor sea, can sever? Your dangers, and feares, and griefes have beene ours: All the salt water that runs betwixt us, cannot wash off our interest in all your common causes: The deadly blow of that miscreant, (whose name is justly sentenced to forgetfulnesse) pierced even our sides. Who hath not bled within himselfe, to think that he, which had so victoriously out-lived the swords of enemies, should fall by the knife of a villaine? and that he should die in the peaceable streets, whom no fields could kill? that all those honourable and happy triumphs should end in so base a violence? But oh our idlenesse and impietie, if we see not a divine hand from above, striking with
B this hand of disloyalty! Sparrowes fall not to the ground without him, much lesse Kings. One dies by a tile-sheard, another by the splinters of a Launce, one by lice, another by a Fly, one by poyson, another by a knife; What are all these but the executioners of that great God, which hath said, Ye are Gods, but yee shall die like men? Perhaps God saw (that we may guesse modestly at the reasons of his acts) you reposed too much in this arme of flesh; or perhaps he saw this scourge would have beene too early, to those enemies, whose sin, though great, yet was not full: or perhaps he saw, that if that great spirit had beene deliberately yeelded in his bed, you should not have slept in yours: Or perhaps the ancient connivence at those streames of blood, from your too common Duels, was now called to reckoning; or, it may be, that weak revolt from the truth. He whose the rod was, knows why he stroke: yet may it not passe
C without a note, that he fell by that religion, to which he fell. How many Ages might that great Monarch have lived (whatsoever the ripe head of your more then mellow Cotten could imagine) ere his least finger should have bled, by the hand of an Huguenot? All religions may have some monsters: but blessed be the God of heaven, ours shall never yeeld that good Jesuit, either a Mariana to teach treason, or a Ravillac to act it. But what is that we heare? it is no marvell: that holy society is a fit Gardian for the hearts of Kings: I dare say, none more loves to see them: none takes more care to purchase them. How happy were that Chappell (think they) if it were full of such shrines? I hope all Christian Princes have long, and well learned (so great is the courtesie of these good Fathers) that they shall never (by their wils) need be troubled with the charge of their owne hearts. An heart of a King in a Jesuites hand, is as proper, as D a wafer in a Priests. Justly was it written of old, under the picture of Ignatius Loyola, Cavete vobis Principes; Be wise O ye Princes, and learne to be the keepers of your owne hearts. Yea rather, O thou keeper of Israel, that neither slumbrest nor sleepest, keepe thou the hearts of all Christian Kings, whether alive or dead, from the keeping of this traiterous generation; whose very religion is holy rebellion, and whose merits bloody. Doubtlesse, that murderer hoped to have stabbed thousands with that blow, and to have let out the life of religion, at the side of her collapsed Patron: God did at once laugh and frowne at his project; and suffered him to live to see himselfe no lesse a foole then a villain. O the infinite goodnesse of the wise and holy governour of the world! Who could have looked for such a calme in the middest of a tempest? who would have thought that violence could beget peace? Who durst
E have conceived that King Henry should die alone? and that Religion should lose nothing but his person? This is the Lords doing, and it is marvellous in our eyes. You have now parallel'd us: Out of both out feares God hath fetched security: Oh that out of our security we could as easily fetch feare: not so much of evill, as of the Author of good; and yet trust him in our feare; and in both magnifie him. Yea, you have by this act gained some converts, against the hope of the agents: neither can I without many joyfull congratulations, thinke of the estate of your Church; which every day honours with the accesse of new clients; whose teares and sad confessions make the Angels to rejoyce in heaven, and the Saints on earth. We should give you example, if our peace were as plentifull of goodnesse as of pleasure. But how seldome hath the Church gained by ease? or lost by restraint? Blesse you God for our prosperity; and we shall praise him for your progresse.

To M. Thomas Sutton.

Ep. VII. Exciting him, and (in him) all others to early and chearefull beneficence: shewing the neceſsity and benefit of good works.

SIR, I trouble you not with reaſons of my writing, or with excuſes: If I doe ill, no plea can warrant me; If well, I cannot be diſcouraged with any cenſures. I crave not your pardon, but your acceptation. It is no preſumption to give good counſell; & preſents of love feare not to be ill taken of ſtrangers. My pen & your ſubſtance are both given us for one end, to doe good: Theſe are our talents; how happy are we, if we can improve them well! ſuffer me to doe you good with the one, that with the other you may doe good to many, and moſt to your ſelfe. You cannot but know, that your full hand and worthy purpoſes, have poſſeſſed the world with much expectation: what ſpeake I of the world? whoſe honeſt and reaſonable claimes yet, cannot be contemned with honour, nor diſappointed with diſhonour. The God of heaven, which hath lent you this abundance, and given you theſe gracious thoughts of charity, of pietie, looks long for the iſſue of both; and will eaſily complaine either of too little, or too late. Your wealth and your will are both good: but the firſt is only made good by the ſecond. For if your hand were full, and your heart empty, we who now applaud you, ſhould juſtly pity you; you might have riches, not goods, not bleſſings: your burthen ſhould be greater then your eſtate; and you ſhould be richer in ſorrowes, then in metalls. For (if we looke to no other world) what gaine is it to be the keeper of the beſt earth? That which is the common cofer of all the rich mines, we do but tread upon; and account it vile, becauſe it doth but hold, and hide thoſe treaſures: Whereas the skilfull metalliſt, that findeth, and refineth thoſe precious veines, for publike uſe, is rewarded, is honoured. The very baſeſt Element yeelds gold; the ſavage Indian gets it, the ſervile prentiſe works it, the very Midianitiſh Camell may weare it, the miſerable worldling admires it, the covetous Jew ſwallowes it, the unthrifty Ruffian ſpends it: what are all theſe the better for it? Only good uſe gives praiſe to earthly poſſeſſions. Herein therefore you owe more to God, that he hath given you an heart to doe good; a will to be as rich in good works, as great in riches. To be a friend to this Mammon, is to be an enemie to God: but to make friends with it, is royall, and Chriſtian. His enemies may be wealthy: none but his friends, can either be good, or do good. Da & accipe, ſaith the wiſeman. The Chriſtian, which muſt imitate the high paterne of his Creator, knowes his beſt riches to be bounty; God that hath all, gives all, reſerves nothing. And for himſelfe; he well conſiders, that God hath not made him an owner, but a ſervant: and of ſervants, a ſervant not of his goods, but of the Giver; not a Treaſurer, but a Steward: whoſe praiſe is more to lay out well, then to have received much. The greateſt gaine therefore that he affects, is an even reckoning, a cleare diſcharge: which ſince it is obtained by diſpoſing, not by keeping, he counts reſervation loſſe, & juſt expence his trade, & joy; he knows, that Well done faithfull ſervant is a thouſand times more ſweet a note, then Soul take thine eaſe; for that is the voice of the maſter recompencing, this of the carnall heart preſuming: & what followes to the one, but his maſters joy? what to the other, but the loſſe of his ſoule? Bleſſed be that God which hath given you an heart to fore-think this; and in this dry and dead Age, a will to honour him with his own; and to credit his Goſpell, with your beneficence; Loe, we are upbraided with barrenneſſe; your name hath been publikely oppoſed to theſe challenges; as in whom it ſhall be ſeen, that the truth hath friends that can give. I neither diſtruſt nor perſwade you; whoſe reſolutions are happily fixed on purpoſes of good; only give me leave to haſten your paſe a little, and to excite your Chriſtian forwardneſſe, to begin ſpeedily, what you have long & conſtantly vowed. You would not but doe good; why not now? I ſpeak boldly, The more ſpeed, the more comfort: Neither the times are in our diſpoſing, nor our ſelves: if God had ſet us a day, and made our wealth unſeparable, there were no danger in delaying; now our uncertainty either muſt quicken

A quicken us, or may deceive us. How many have meant well, and done nothing, and loſt their crowne with lingring? whoſe deſtinies have prevented their deſires, and have made their good motions the wards of their executors, not without miſerable ſucceſſe: to whom, that they would have done good, is not ſo great a praiſe, as it is diſhonour that they might have done it: their wrackes are our warnings, we are equally mortall, equally fickle. Why have you this reſpite of living, but to prevent the imperious neceſſity of death? it is a wofull and remedileſſe complaint that the end of our daies hath over-run the beginning of our good works. Early beneficence hath no danger, many joyes: for the conſcience of good done, the prayers and bleſſings of the releeved, the gratulation of the Saints, are as ſo many perpetuall comforters, which can make our life pleaſant, and our death happy, our evill daies good, and our good better.
B All theſe are loſt with delay: few and cold are the praiers for him that may give: and in lieu, our good purpoſes fore-ſlowed are become our tormentors upon our death-bed. Little difference is betwixt good deferred, and evill done: Good was meant; who hindred it, will our conſcience ſay? there was time enough, meanes enough, need enough, what hindred? Did feare of envy, diſtruſt of want? Alas, what bugs are theſe to fright men from heaven? As if the envy of keeping, were leſſe then of beſtowing: As if God were not as good a debtor as a giver: he that gives to the poore, lends to God, ſaith wiſe Salomon. If he freely give us what we may lend, and grace to give; will he not much more pay us what we have lent; and give us becauſe we have given? That is his bounty, this his juſtice. O happy is that man that may be a creditor to his maker! Heaven and earth ſhalbe empty before he ſhall want a royall paiment. If we dare not truſt
C God whiles we live, how dare we truſt men when we are dead? men that are ſtill deceitfull, and light upon the balance, light of truth, heavy of ſelf-love. How many Executors have proved the executioners of honeſt Wils? how many have our eies ſeene, that after moſt carefull choice of truſty guardians, have had their children and goods ſo diſpoſed, as if the Parents ſoule could return to ſee it, I doubt whether it could be happy. How rare is that man that prefers not himſelf to his dead friend? profit to truth? that will take no vantage of the impoſſibility of account? What-ever therefore men either ſhew or promiſe, happy is that man that may be his own auditor, ſupervi-viſor, executor. As you love God & your ſelf, be not afraid of being happy too ſoone. I am not worthy to give ſo bold advice; let the wiſe man of Syrach ſpeak for me: Doe good before thou die, and according to thine ability ſtretch out thine hands, and give:
D Defraud not thy ſelf of thy good day; & let not the portion of thy good deſires overpaſſe thee: ſhalt thou not leave thy travels to another, and thy labours to them that will divide thine heritage? Or let a wiſer then he, Salomon: Say not to morrow, I will give, if now thou have it: for thou knoweſt not what a day will bring forth. It hath bin an old rule of liberality, He gives twice that gives quickly; whereas ſlow benefits argue uncheerfulnes, and loſe their worth. Who lingers his receits, is condemned as unthrifty: he that knoweth both, ſaith, It is better to give then to receive. If we be of the ſame ſpirit, why are we haſty in the worſe, and ſlack in the better? Suffer you your ſelf therfore, good Sir, for Gods ſake, for the goſpels ſake, for the Churches ſake, for your ſoules ſake, to be ſtirred up by theſe poore lines, to a reſolute & ſpeedy performing of your worthy intentions: & take this as a loving invitation ſent from heaven, by an un-E worthy meſſenger. You cannot deliberate long of fit objects for your beneficence, except it be more for multitude, then want: the ſtreets, yea the world is full; How doth Lazarus lie at every doore? how many ſons of the Prophets in their meanly-provided Colleges may ſay, not, Mors in olla, but fames? how many Churches may juſtly plead that which our Saviour bad his Diſciples, The Lord hath need? And if this infinite ſtore hath made your choice doubtfull, how eaſie were it to ſhew you, wherein you might oblige the whole Church of God to you, and make your memoriall both eternall and bleſſed; or, if you had rather, the whole Common-wealth? But now I find my ſelfe too bold and too buſie, in thus looking to particularities: God ſhall direct you; and if you follow him, ſhall crowne you: howſoever, if good be done, and that betimes; he hath what he deſired, and your ſoule ſhall have more then you can deſire. The ſucceſſe of my weake, yet hearty counſell, ſhall make me as rich, as God hath made you with all your abundance. That God bleſſe it to you, and make both our recknings cheerefull in the day of our common Audit.

EPIST. VIII. Remedies againſt dulneſſe and heartleſneſſe in our callings, and incouragements to cheerefulneſſe in labour.

IT falls out not ſeldome (if we may meaſure all by one) that the mind over-layed with worke, growes dull and heavy: and now doth nothing, becauſe it hath done too much; over-laviſh expence of ſpirits hath left it heartleſſe: as the beſt veſſell with much motion and vent, becomes flat, and dreggiſh. And not fewer (of more weak temper) diſcourage themſelves with the difficulty of what they muſt doe: ſome Travellers have more ſhrunk at the Map, then at the way. Betwixt both, how many ſit ſtill with their hands folded, and wiſh they knew how to be rid of time? If this evill be not cured, we become miſerable loſers, both of good houres and of good parts. In theſe mentall diſeaſes, Empiricks are the beſt Phyſitians. I preſcribe you nothing but out of feeling: If you will avoid the firſt, moderate your owne vehemencie; ſuffer not your ſelfe to doe all you could doe: Riſe ever from your deske, not without an appetite. The beſt horſe will tire ſooneſt, if the raines lie ever looſe in his necke: Reſtraints in theſe caſes are encouragements: obtaine therefore of your ſelfe to deferre, and take new dayes. How much better is it to refreſh your ſelfe with many competent meales, then to buy one daies gluttony, with the faſt of many? And if it be hard to call off the mind in the midſt of a faire and likely flight; know that all our eaſe and ſafety begins at the command of our ſelves; he can never taske himſelfe well, that cannot favour himſelfe. Perſwade your heart, that perfection comes by leiſure, and no excellent thing is done at once: the riſing and ſetting of many Sonnes (which you thinke ſlackens your work) in truth ripens it. That gourd which came up in a night, withered in a day; whereas thoſe plants which abide age, riſe ſlowly. Indeed, where the heart is unwilling, prorogation hinders: what I liſt not to doe this day, I loath the next; but where is no want of deſire, delay doth but ſharpen the ſtomack. That which we doe unwillingly leave, we long to undertake: and the more our affection is, the greater our intention, and the better our performance. To take occaſion by the foretop, is no ſmall point of wiſdome; but to make time (which is wilde and fugitive) tame and pliable to our purpoſes, is the greateſt improvement of a man: All times ſerve him, which hath the rule of himſelfe.

If the ſecond, think ſeriouſly of the condition of your being: It is that we were made for; the Bird to flie, and Man to labour. What doe we here, if we repine at our worke? We had not beene, but that we might be ſtill buſie; if not in this taske we diſlike, yet in ſome other of no leſſe toyle: there is no act that hath not his labour, which varies in meaſure, according to the will of the doer. This which you complaine of, hath beene undertaken by others, not with facility onely, but with pleaſure; and what you chuſe for eaſe, hath beene abhorred of others, as tedious. All difficulty is not ſo much in the worke, as in the Agent. To ſet the mind on the racke of a long meditation (you ſay) is a torment: to follow the ſwift foot of your hound all day long, hath no wearineſſe: what would you ſay of him, that finds better game in his ſtudy, then you in the field, and would account your diſport his puniſhment? Such there are, though you doubt and wonder, never think to detract from your buſineſſe, but adde to your will. It is the policie of our great enemie, to drive us with theſe feares, from that he fore-ſees would grow profitable: like as ſome inhoſpitall Savages make feareful deluſions by ſorcery upon the ſhore, to fright ſtrangers from landing. Where you find therefore motions of reſiſtance, awaken your courage the more, and know there is ſome good that appeares not; vaine endeavours find no oppoſition. All croſſes imply a ſecret commodity: reſolve then to will, becauſe you begin not to will: and either oppoſe your ſelfe, as Satan oppoſes you, or elſe you doe nothing. We pay no price to God for any good thing, but labour; if we higgle in that, we are worthy to loſe our bargaine. It is an invaluable gaine, that we may make in this traffique: for God is bountifull, as well as juſt; and when he ſees true endevour, doth not only

ſell

A sell, but give: whereas idleneſſe neither gets nor ſaves; nothing is either more fruitleſſe of good, or more fruitfull of evill; for we doe ill whiles we doe nothing, and loſe whiles we gaine not. The ſluggard is ſenſeleſſe; and ſo much more deſperate, becauſe he cannot complaine: but (though he feele it not) nothing is more precious then time, or that ſhall abide a reckning more ſtrict and fearefull: yea this is the meaſure of all our actions, which if it were not abuſed, our accounts could not be but even with God: ſo God eſteemes it (what ever our price be) that he plagues the loſſe of a ſhort time, with a revenge beyond all times. Houres have wings, and every moment flie up to the Author of time, and carry newes of our uſage; All our prayers cannot intreat one of them either to returne, or ſlacken his pace: the miſ-ſpence of every minute is a new record againſt us in heaven. Sure, if we thought thus, we would diſmiſſe them with better reports, and not ſuffer them either to goe away empty, or B laden with dangerous intelligence: how happy is it that every houre ſhould convey up, not onely the meſſage, but the fruits of good, and ſtay with the Ancient of dayes, to ſpeake for us before his glorious throne? Know this, and I ſhall take no care for your paines, nor you for paſtime. None of our profitable labours ſhall be tranſient; but even when we have forgotten them, ſhall welcome us into Joy: we think we have left them behinde us; but they are forwarder then our ſoules, and expect us where we ſhould be. And if there were no crowne for theſe toiles, yet without future reſpects there is a tediouſneſſe in doing nothing. To man eſpecially, motion is naturall: there is neither mind, nor eye, nor joynt which moveth not: and as company makes a way ſhort, houres never goe away ſo merrily, as in the fellowſhip of worke. How C did that induſtrious Heathen draw out water by night, and knowledge by day, and thought both ſhort; ever labouring, only that he might labour? Certainely if idlenes were enacted by authority, there would not want ſome, which would pay their mulct, that they might worke: and thoſe ſpirits are likeſt to heaven, which move alwayes, and the freeſt from thoſe corruptions which are incident to nature. The running ſtreame cleanſeth it ſelfe, whereas ſtanding ponds breed weeds, and mud. Theſe meditations muſt hearten us to that we muſt doe: whiles we are cheerefull, our labours ſhall ſtrive whether to yeeld us more comfort, or others more profit.

To Sir John Harrington.

D EPIST. IX. Diſcuſſing this queſtion:

Whether a man and wife after ſome yeares mutuall & loving fruition of each other, may upon conſent, whether for ſecular, or religious cauſes, vow and performe a perpetuall ſeparation from each others bed, and abſolutely renounce all carnall knowledge of each other for ever.

I Wiſh not my ſelfe any other advocate, nor you any other adverſary, then S. Paul, who never gave (I ſpeake boldly) a direct precept, if not in this: his expreſſe charge whereupon I inſiſted, is, Defraud not one another, except with conſent for a time, that you may give your ſelves to faſting and prayer; and then againe come together, that Satan tempt you not for your incontinencie. Every word, (if you weigh it well) oppoſes your part, and pleads for mine. By conſent of all Divines, ancient and moderne [defrauding] is refraining from matrimoniall converſation: E ſee what a word the Spirit of God hath choſen for this abſtinence; never but taken in ill part. But there is no fraud in conſent, as Chryſoſtome, Athanaſius, Theophylact, expound it: true; therefore S. Paul addes (unleſſe with conſent) that I may omit to ſay, that in ſaying (unleſſe with conſent) he implies, both that there may be a defrauding without it, and with conſent a defrauding but not unlawfull: but ſee what he addes, (for a time) conſent cannot make this defrauding lawfull, except it be temporary: No defrauding without conſent, no conſent for a perpetuity. How long then, and wherefore? Not for every cauſe, not for any length of time, but onely for a while and for devotion (ut vacetis, &c.) Not that you may pray only, (as Chryſoſtome notes juſtly) but that you might (give your ſelves to prayer.) In our mariage ſociety (ſaith he, againſt that paradox of Hierom) we may pray, and woe to us if we doe not; but we cannot (vacare orationi.) But we are bidden to pray continually: Yet not I hope, ever to fast and pray. Marke how the Apostle addes, (that you may give your selves A to fasting and prayer.) It is solemne exercise, which the Apostle here intends, such as is joyned with fasting and externall humiliation; wherein all earthly comforts must be forborne; but what if a man list to taske himselfe continually, and will be alwaies painfully devote? may he then ever abstaine? No: Let them meet together againe, saith the Apostle; not as a toleration, but as a charge. But what if they both can live safely thus severed? This is more then they can undertake: there is danger, saith our Apostle, in this abstinence (lest Satan tempt you for your incontinencie) what can be more plaine? Neither may the maried refraine this conversation without consent, neither may they without consent refraine it for ever. What can you now urge us with, but the examples and sentences of some Ancients? Let this stand evicted for the true and necessary sense of the Apostle; and what is this but to lay men in the balance with God? I see and confesse how much some of the Fathers admired Virgi- B nity; so farre, that there wanted not some, which both detested mariage as vicious, and would force a single life upon mariage, as commendable: whose authority should move me, if I saw not some of them opposite to others, and others no lesse to S. Paul himselfe. How oft doth S. Austin redouble that rule, and importunately urge it to his Edicia, in that serious Epistle, that without consent the continence of the maried cannot be warantable; teaching her (from these words of S. Paul, which he charges her, in the contrary practice, not to have read, heard, or marked) that if her husband should containe, and she would not, he were bound to pay her the debt of mariage benevolence; and that God would impute it to him for continence notwithstanding.

Hom. in 1 Cor. 7. Hence is that of Chrysostome, that the wife is both the servant and the mistris of her C husband; a servant to yeeld her body, a mistris to have power of his: who also in the same place determines it forbidden fraud, for the husband, or wife, to containe alone: according to that of the Paraphrast; Let either both containe, or neither. Hierome contrarily, defines thus: But if one of the two (saith he) considering the reward of chastity, will containe, he ought not to assent to the other which containes not, &c.
because lust ought rather to come to continencie, then continencie decline to lust:
concluding that a brother or a sister is not subject in such a case, and that God hath not called us to uncleanneesse, but to holinesse. A strange glosse to fall from the pen of a Father which yet I durst not say, if it were more boldnesse for me to dissent from him, then for him to dissent from all others. He that censures S. Paul to argue grosly to his Galatians, may as well tax him of an unfit direction to his Corinthians: It D shall be no presumption to say, that in this point all his writings bewray more zeale then truth: whether the conscience of his former slip caused him to abhorre that sex; or his admiration of Virginity transported him to a contempt of mariage. Antiquity will afford you many examples of holy men voluntarily sequestred from their wives: Precepts must be our guides, and not patternes. You may tell me of Sozomens Ammon, that famous Monke, who having perswaded his bride the first day to continuance of Virginity, lived with her 18. yeares in a severall bed, and in a severall habitation, upon the mountaine Nitria, 22. yeares: you may tell me of Ieromes Malchus, Austins Edicia, and ten thousand others: I care not for their number, and suspect their example: Doe but reconcile their practice with S. Pauls rule, I shall both magnifie and imitate them. I professe before God and men, nothing should hinder me but E this law of the Apostle: whereto consider, I beseech you, what can be more opposite then this opinion, then this course of life.

The Apostle sayes, Refraine not but with consent for a time: your words, and their practice saith, Refraine with consent for ever: he saith (meet together againe) you say never more; he saith (meet lest you be tempted) you say, meet not though you be tempted. I willingly grant with Athanasius, that for some set time, especially (as Anselme interprets it) for some holy time, we may, and (in this latter case) we must forbeare all matrimoniall acts, and thoughts: not for that they are sinfull, but unseasonable. As mariage must be alwaies used chastly, and moderately: so sometimes it must be forgotten. How many are drunke with their owne vines, and surfet of their owne fruits? either immodesty, or immoderation in man or wife, is adulterous. If yet

I

I shall further yeeld, that they may conditionally agree, to refraine from each other so long till they be perplexed with temptations on either part: I shall goe as farre as the reach of my warrant, at least; perhaps beyond it: since the Apostle chargeth, Meet again, lest you be tempted; not, meet when you are tempted: But to say absolutely, and for ever renounce (by consent) the conversation of each other, what temptation so ever assault you, is directly, not beyond, but against Pauls divinitie, no lesse then my assertion is against yours. The ground of all these errors, in this head of Matrimony, is an unworthy conceit of some unchristian filthinesse in the mariage-bed: Every man will not utter, but too many hold that conclusion of Hierome: It is good for a man not to touch a woman, therefore to touch her, is evill; whom I doubt not, but S. Austin meant to oppose, while he writes, Bonum inquam sunt nuptiæ, & contra omnes calumnias possunt sana ratione defendi: Mariage (I say) is a good thing, and may by sound proofe be defended against all slanders: well may man say, that it is good, which God saith is honourable; and both good and honourable must that needs be, which was instituted by the honourable author of goodnesse, in the state of mans perfect goodnesse: Let us take heed of casting shame upon the ordinance of our Maker. But there was no carnall knowledge in Paradise. But againe, in Paradise God said, Increase and multiply: there should have beene, if there were not. Those that were naked without shame, should have beene conjoyned without shame, because without sinne. Meats and drinks, and acts of mariage (saith Austin) for these he compares both in lawfulnesse, and necessity) are, as they are used, either lawfull, veniall, or damnable. Meats are for the preservation of man: mariage acts for the preservation of mankind: neither of them without some carnall delight: which yet, if by the bridle of temperance it be held to the proper and naturall use, cannot be tearmed lust. There is no ordinance of God which either is of more excellent use, or hath suffered more abuse in all times: the fault is in men, not in mariage: let them rectifie themselves, their bed shall be blessed. Here need no separation from each other, but rather a separation of brutishnesse and close corruption from the soule; which whosoever hath learned to remove, shall find the crowne of matrimoniall chastity, no lesse glorious then that of single continence.

EPIST. X. Incouraging him to persist in the holy calling of the Ministery; which upon conceit of his insufficiencie, and want of affection, he seemed inclining to forsake and change.

I Am not more glad to heare from you, then sorry to heare of your discontentment: whereof, as the cause is from your selfe, so must the remedy. We Schollers are the apest of all others to make our selves miserable: you might be your own best counsellor, were you but indifferent to your selfe. If I could but cure your prejudice, your thoughts would heale you: and indeed the same hand that wounded you, were fittest for this service. I need not tell you, that your calling is honourable; if you did not think so, you had not complained. It is your unworthinesse that troubles you. Let me boldly tell you, I know you in this case better then your selfe: you are never the more unsufficient, because you thinke so; if we will be rigorous, Pauls question (Who is sufficient?) will appose us all; but according to the graciousin dulgence of him that calls things which are not as if they were, we are that we are; yea, that we ought; and must be thankfull for our any thing. There are none more fearefull then the able; none more bold then the unworthy. How many have you seene and heard, of weaker graces, (your own heart shall be the Judge) which have fare without paleneſſe, or trembling, in that holy chaire, and spoken as if the words had beene their owne, satisfying themselves, if not the hearers? And doe you (whose gifts many have envied) stand quaking upon the lowest staire? hath God given you that unusuall variety of tongues, stile of Arts, a stile worth emulation, and (which is worth all) a faithfull and honest heart; and doe you now shrinke backe, and say, Send him by whom thou shouldest send?

ſend? Give God but what you have; he expects no more: This is enough to honour him, and crowne you. Take heed while you complaine of want, leſt pride ſhroud it ſelfe under the skirts of modeſty: How many are thankfull for leſſe? You have more then the moſt; yet this contents you not; it is nothing unleſſe you may equall the beſt, if not exceed; yea, I feare how this may ſatisfie you, unleſſe you may thinke your ſelfe ſuch as you would be. What is this but to grudge at the beſtower of graces? I tell you without flattery, God hath great gaines by fewer talents: ſet your heart to imploy theſe, and your advantage ſhall be more then your maſters. Neither doe now repent you of the unadviſedneſſe of your entrance; God called you to it upon an eternall deliberation, and meant to make uſe of your ſuddenneſſe, as a meanes to fetch you into this worke, whom more leiſure would have found refractary: Full little did the one Saul thinke of a kingdome, when he went to ſeeke his fathers ſtrayes in the land of Shaliſhah; or the other Saul of an Apoſtleſhip, when he went with his Commiſſion to Damaſcus: God thought of both; and effected what they meant not. Thus hath he done to you, acknowledge this hand, and follow it. He found and gave both facultie and opportunity to enter: find you but a will to proceed, I dare promiſe you abundance of comfort. How many of the Ancients, after a forcible ordination, became not profitable only, but famous in the Church? But, as if you ſought ſhifts to diſcourage your ſelfe, when you ſee you cannot maintaine this hold of inſufficiency, you flie to alienation of affection; in the truth whereof, none can controll you but your owne heart; in the juſtice of it, we both may, and muſt. This plea is not for Chriſtians; we muſt affect what we ought, in ſpight of our ſelves: wherefore ſerves religion, if not to make us Lords of our owne affections? If we muſt be ruled by our ſlaves, what good ſhould we doe? Can you more diſlike your ſtation, then we all naturally diſtaſt goodneſſe? Shall we neglect the purſuit of vertue, becauſe it pleaſes not; or rather diſpleaſe, and neglect our ſelves, till it may pleaſe us? Let me not aske whether your affections be eſtranged, but wherefore? Divinity is a miſtreſſe worthy your ſervice: All other Arts are but drudges to her alone: Fooles may contemne her; who cannot judge of true intellectuall beauty: but if they had our eyes, they could not but be raviſhed with admiration: You have learned (I hope) to contemne their contempt, and to pity injurious ignorance. She hath choſen you as a worthy client, yea a favourite; and hath honoured you with her commands, and her acceptations; who but you would plead ſtrangeneſſe of affection? How many thouſands ſue to her; and cannot be lookt upon? You are happy in her favours, and yet complaine; yea ſo farre, as that you have not ſtucke to thinke of a change. No word could have fallen from you more unwelcome. This is Satans policie, to make us out of love with our callings, that our labours may be unprofitable, and our ſtanding tedious. He knowes that all changes are fruitleſſe, and that while we affect to be other, we muſt needs be weary of what we are: That there is no ſucceſſe in any endeavour without pleaſure; that there can be no pleaſure, where the mind longs after alterations. If you eſpie not this craft of the common enemie, you are not acquainted with your ſelfe. Under what forme ſoever it come, repell it; and abhorre the firſt motion of it, as you love your peace, as you hope for your reward. It is the miſery of the moſt men, that they cannot ſee when they are happy; and while they ſee but the out-ſide of others conditions, preferre that which their experience teaches them afterwards to condemne, not without loſſe and teares. Far be this unſtableneſſe from you, which have beene ſo long taught of God. All vocations have their inconveniences; which if they cannot be avoided, muſt be digeſted. The more difficulties, the greater glory: Stand faſt therefore, and reſolve that this calling is the beſt, both in it ſelfe, and for you: and know that it cannot ſtand with your Chriſtian courage to run away from theſe incident evils, but to encounter them. Your hand is at the plough: if you meet with ſome tough clods, that will not eaſily yeeld to the ſhare, lay on more ſtrength rather; ſeeke not remedy in your feet by flight, but in your hands by a conſtant endeavour. Away with this weake timorouſneſſe, and wrongfull humility. Be cheerefull and couragious in this great worke of God; the end ſhall be glorious, your ſelfe happy and many in you.

THE SIXT DECAD.

To my Lord DENNY.

EPIST. I. A particular account how our dayes are, or ſhould be ſpent, both common and holy.

EVery day is a little life; and our whole life is but a day repeated: whence it is that old Iacob numbers his life by daies, and Moſes deſires to be taught this point of holy Arithmeticke, To number not his yeares, but his dayes: Thoſe therefore that dare loſe a day, are dangerouſly prodigall; thoſe that dare miſ-ſpend it, deſperate. We can beſt teach others by our ſelves: let be tell your Lordſhip, how I would paſſe my dayes, whether common or ſacred; that you (or whoſoever others, over-hearing me) may either approve my thriftineſſe, or correct my errors: To whom is the account of my houres either more due, or more knowne? All daies are his, who gave time a beginning, and continuance; yet ſome he hath made ours, not to command, but to uſe. In none may we forget him: in ſome we muſt forget all, beſides him. Firſt therefore, I deſire to awake at thoſe houres, not when I will, but when I muſt; pleaſure is not a fit rule for reſt, but health; neither doth I conſult ſo much with the Sunne, as mine owne neceſſity, whether of body, or in that, of the mind. If this vaſſall could well ſerve me waking, it ſhould never ſleep: but now, it muſt be pleaſed, that it may be ſerviceable. Now, when ſleep is rather driven away, then leaves me; I would ever awake with God; my firſt thoughts are for him, who hath made the night for reſt, and the day for travell: and as he gives, ſo bleſſes both. If my heart be early ſeaſoned with his preſence, it will favour of him all day after. While my body is dreſſing, not with an effeminate curioſity, nor yet with rude neglect; my mind addreſſes it ſelfe to her enſuing taske; bethinking what is to be done, and in what order; and marſhalling (as it may) my houres with my work: That done, after ſome whiles meditation, I walk up to my maſters and companions, my books; and ſitting downe amongſt them, with the beſt contentment, I dare not reach forth my hand to ſalute any of them, till I have firſt looked up to heaven, and craved favour of him to whom all my ſtudies are duly referred: without whom, I can neither profit, nor labour. After this, out of no over-great variety, I call forth thoſe, which may beſt fit my occaſions; wherein, I am not too ſcrupulous of age: Sometimes I put my ſelfe to ſchoole, to one of thoſe Ancients, whom the Church hath honoured with the name of Fathers; whoſe Volumes, I confeſſe not to open, without a ſecret reverence of their holines, and gravity: Sometimes to thoſe later Doctors, which want nothing but age to make them claſſicall: alwaies, to Gods Booke. That day is loſt, whereof ſome houres are not improved in thoſe Divine Monuments: others I turne over out of choice; theſe out of duty. Ere I can have ſate unto wearineſſe, my family, having now overcome all houſhold houſhold diſtractions, invites me to our common devotions: not without ſome ſhort preparation. Theſe heartily performed, ſend me up, with a more ſtrong and cheerefull appetite to my former worke, which I find made eaſie to me by intermiſſion, and varietie: Now therefore can I deceive the houres with change of pleaſures, that is, of labours. One while mine eies are buſied, another while my hand, and ſometimes my mind takes the burden from them both: Wherein, I would imitate the skilfulleſt Cooks, which make the beſt diſhes with manifold mixtures: one houre is ſpent in Textuall Divinity, another in Controverſie: Hiſtories releeve them both. Now, when the mind is weary of other labours, it begins to undertake her owne: ſometimes it meditates and winds up for future uſe; ſometimes it layes forth her conceits into preſent diſcourſe; ſometimes for it ſelfe, ofter for others. Neither know I whether it works or playes in theſe thoughts: I am ſure no ſport hath more pleaſure, no worke more uſe: Onely the decay of a weake body, makes me think theſe delights inſenſibly laborious. Thus could I all day (as Ringers uſe) make my ſelfe Muſicke with changes, and complaine ſooner of the day for ſhortneſſe, then of the buſineſſe for toyle; were it not that this faint monitor interrupts me ſtill in the midſt of my buſie pleaſures, and inforces me both to reſpite and repaſt: I muſt yeeld to both; while my body and mind are joyned together in theſe unequall couples, the better muſt follow the weaker. Before my meales therefore, and after, I let my ſelfe looſe from all thoughts; and now, would forget that I ever ſtudied: A full mind takes away the bodies appetite, no leſſe then a full body makes a dull and unweildy mind: Company, diſcourſe, recreations, are now ſeaſonable and welcome; Theſe prepare me for a diet, not gluttonous, but medicinall; The palate may not be pleaſed, but the ſtomack, nor that for it owne ſake: Neither would I think any of theſe comforts worth reſpect in themſelves, but in their uſe, in their end; ſo farre, as they may inable me to better things. If I ſee any diſh to tempt my palate, I feare a Serpent in that Apple, and would pleaſe my ſelf in a wilfull deniall: I riſe capable of more, not deſirous: not now immediately from my trencher, to my booke; but after ſome intermiſſion. Moderate ſpeed is a ſure help to all proceedings; where thoſe things which are proſecuted with violence of endeavour, or deſire, either ſucceed not, or continue not.

After my latter meale, my thoughts are ſlight: only my memory may be charged with her taske, of recalling what was committed to her cuſtody in the day; and my heart is buſie in examining my hands and mouth, and all other ſenſes, of that dayes behaviour: and now the evening is come, no tradeſ-man doth more carefully take in his wares, cleare his ſhop-board, and ſhut his Windowes, then I would ſhut up my thoughts and cleare my mind. That Student ſhall live miſerably, which like a Camell lies down under his burden. All this done, calling together my family, we end the day with God. Thus do we rather drive away the time before us, then follow it. I grant, neither is my practice worthy to be exemplary, neither are our callings proportionable. The lives of a Nobleman, of a Courtier, of a Scholler, of a Citizen, of a Countryman, differ no leſſe then their diſpoſitions: yet muſt all conſpire in honeſt labour. Sweat is the deſtiny of all trades, whether of the brows, or of the mind. God never allowed any man to doe nothing. How miſerable is the condition of thoſe men, which ſpend the time as if it were given them, and not lent? as if hours were waſte creatures, and ſuch as ſhould never be accounted for: as if God would take this for a good bill of reckoning; Item, ſpent upon my pleaſures forty yeares. Theſe men ſhall once find, that no blood can priviledge idleneſſe; and that nothing is more precious to God, then that which they deſire to caſt away; Time. Such are my common dayes: but Gods day cals for another reſpect. The ſame Sun ariſes on this day, and enlightens it; yet becauſe that Sun of righteouſnes aroſe upon it, and gave a new life unto the world in it, and drew the ſtrength of Gods morall precept unto it, therfore juſtly doe we ſing with the Pſalmiſt; This is the day which the Lord hath made. Now I forget the world, and in a ſort my ſelfe; and deale with my wonted thoughts, as great men uſe, who at ſome times of their privacie, forbid the acceſſe of all ſuters. Prayer, meditation, reading, hearing, preaching, ſinging, good conference, are the buſineſſes of this day; which I dare not beſtow on any work, or pleaſure, but heavenly. I hate ſuperſtition on the one ſide,

and looseneſſe on the other; but I find it hard to offend in too much devotion, eaſie in prophanenes. The whole week is ſanctified by this day: and according to my care of this, is my bleſſing on the reſt. I ſhew your Lordſhip what I would doe, and what I ought: I commit my deſires to the imitation of the weak; my actions to the cenſures of the Wiſe and holy; my weakneſſes to the pardon and redreſſe of my merciſull God.

Ep. II. Diſcourſing how we may uſe the world without danger.

HOw to live out of the danger of the World, is both a great and good care, and that which troubles too few. Some, that the world may not hurt them, run from it; and baniſh themſelves to the tops of ſolitary mountains: changing the Cities for Deſarts, houſe for Caves, and the ſocietie of men for beaſts; and leſt their enemie might inſinuate himſelfe into their ſecrecie, have abridged themſelves of dyet, cloathing, lodging, harbour, fit for reaſonable creatures; ſeeming to have left of themſelves, no leſſe than companions.

As if the world were not every where; as if we could hide our ſelves from the Devill; as if ſolitarineſſe were priviledged from Temptations: as if we did not more violently affect reſtrained delights; as if theſe Jeromes did not finde Rome in their heart, when they had nothing but rocks and trees in their eye. Hence, theſe places of retirednesſe, founded at firſt upon neceſſity mixt with devotion, have proved infamouſly unclean; Cels of luſt, not of pietie. This courſe is prepoſterous; if I were worthy to teach you a better way, learn to be an Hermite at home: Begin with your own heart, eſtrange and wean it from the love, not from the uſe of the world: Chriſtianity hath taught us nothing, if we have not learned this diſtinction; It is a great weakneſſe not to ſee, but we muſt be enamoured: Eliſha ſaw the ſecret ſtate of the Syrian Court, yet as an enemie: The bleſſed Angels ſee our earthly affaries, but as ſtrangers: Moſes his body was in the Court of Pharaoh, amongſt the delicate Egyptians, his heart was ſuffering with the afflicted Iſraelites: Lot took part of the faire meadows of Sodom, not of their ſins. Our bleſſed Saviour ſaw the glory of all Kingdomes, and contemned them: and cannot the world look upon us Chriſtians, but we are bewitched? We ſee the Sunne daily, and warme us at his beames, yet make not an Idoll of it; doth any man hide his face, leſt he ſhould adore it? All our ſafety or danger therefore is from within. In vain is the body an Anachoret, if the heart be a Ruffian: And if that be retired in affections, the body is but a Cipher: Lo then the eies will look carelesly & ſtrangely on what they ſee, and the tongue will ſometimes anſwer to that was not aſked. We eat and recreate, becauſe we muſt, not becauſe we would: and when we are pleaſed, we are ſuſpicious: Lawfull delights, we neither refuſe nor doate upon, and all contentments goe and come like ſtrangers. That all this may be done, take up your heart with better thoughts, be ſure it will not be empty: if heaven have fully ſtalled all the rooms, the world is diſappointed, and either dares not offer, or is repulſed. Fix your ſelfe upon the glory of that eternity, which abides you after this ſhort pilgrimage. You cannot but contemn what you finde in compariſon of what you expect. Leave not till you attaine to this, that you are willing to live, becauſe you cannot as yet be diſſolved: Be but one half upon earth, let your better part converſe above whence it is and enjoy that whereto it was ordained. Thinke how little the World can doe for you, and what it doth, how deceitfully: what ſtings there are with this honey, what Farewell ſucceeds this Welcome.

When this Iael brings you milke in the one hand, know ſhe hath a naile in the other. Aſke your heart what it is the better, what the merrier, for all thoſe pleaſures wherewith it hath befriended you: let your own tryall teach you contempt; Thinke how ſincere, how glorious thoſe joyes are, which abide you elſ-where, and a thouſand times more certaine (though future) than preſent.

And let not theſe thoughts be flying, but fixed: In vain doe we meditate, if we reſolve not: when your heart is once thus ſetled, it ſhall command all things to advantage. The world ſhall not betray, but ſerve it; and that ſhall be fulfilled which God promiſes by his Salomon; When the wayes of a man pleaſe the Lord, he will make his enemies alſo at peace with him.

Sir, this advice my poverty afforded long ſince to a weak friend; I wri e it not to you any otherwiſe, than as Schollers are wont to ſay their part to their Maſters. The world hath long and juſtly both noted and honoured you for eminence in wiſdome and learning, and I above the moſt; I am ready with the awe of a Learner, to embrace all precepts from you: you ſhall expect nothing from me, but Teſtimonies of reſpect and thankfulneſſe.

To Sir GEORGE FLEETWOOD.

EP. III. Of the remedies of ſinne, and motives to avoyd it.

THere is none, either more common or more troubleſome gueſt, than Sin. Troubleſome, both in the ſolicitation of it, and in the remorſe. Before the act, it wearies with a wicked importunity; after the act, it torments us with fears, and the painfull gnawings of an accuſing Conſcience: Neither is it more irkſom to men, than odious to God; who indeed never hated any thing but it; and for it any thing. How happy were we, if we could be rid of it? This muſt be our deſire, but cannot be our hope, ſo long as we carry this body of ſin and death about us: yet (which is our comfort) it ſhall not carry us, though we carry it: It will dwell with us, but with no command; yea, with no peace: We grudge to give it houſe-roome; but we hate to give it ſervice. This our Hagar will abide many ſtrokes, ere ſhe be turned out of doores: ſhe ſhall goe at laſt; and the ſeed of promiſe ſhall inherit alone. There is no unquietneſſe good, but this: and in this caſe, quietneſſe cannot ſtand with ſafety: neither did ever warre more truly beget peace, than in this ſtrife of the ſoule.

Reſiſtance is the way to victory; and that, to an eternall peace and happines. It is a bleſſed care then, how to reſiſt ſin, how to avoid it: and ſuch as I am glad to reach and learne. As there are two grounds of all ſinne, ſo of the avoidance of ſinne; Love and Feare: Theſe if they be placed amiſſe, cauſe us to offend: if right, are the remedies of evill. The love muſt be of God; Feare, of judgement.

As he loves much, to whom much is forgiven: ſo he that loves much, will not dare to doe that which may need forgiveneſſe. The heart that hath felt the ſweetneſſe of Gods mercies, will not abide the bitter relliſh of ſin: This is both a ſtronger motive than Feare, and more Noble; None but a good heart is capable of this grace: which who ſo hath received, thus powerfully repels tentations.

Have I found my God ſo gracious to me, that he hath denied me nothing, either in earth or heaven: and ſhall not I ſo much as deny my own will for his ſake? Hath my deare Saviour bought my ſoule at ſuch a price, and ſhall he not have it? Was he crucified for my ſinnes, and ſhall I by my ſinnes crucifie him againe? Am I his in ſo many bonds, and ſhall I ſerve the Devill? O God! is this the fruit of thy beneficence to me, that I ſhould wilfully diſhonor thee? Was thy blood ſo little worth, that I ſhould tread it under my feet? Doth this become him that ſhall be once glorious with thee? Haſt thou prepared heaven for me, and doe I thus prepare my ſelfe for heaven? Shall I thus recompence thy love, in doing that which thou hateſt? Satan hath no Dart (I ſpeake confidently) that can pierce this ſhield: Chriſtians are indeed too oft ſurprized, ere they can hold it out: there is no ſmall policy in the ſuddenneſſe of temptation: but if they have once ſetled it before their breſt, they are ſafe, and their enemy hopeleſſe. Under this head therefore, there is ſure remedy againſt ſin, by looking upwards, backwards, into our ſelves, forwards. Upwards, at the glorious Majeſtie, and infinite goodneſſe of that God whom our ſinne would offend, and in whoſe face we ſin: whoſe mercies, and whoſe holineſſe is ſuch, that if there were no hell, we would not offend.

Backwards

A the Lord, as the minister of his favours, which they are obliged to obedience. In our (Christian) calling, honourable vocation, wherewith he hath graced this holy profession and vocation of his calling, and grant, that all men may avoid and forsake whereby we have confirmed our profession, the gracious beginnings of the Spirit in us, which is given by our Saviour, yea, whatsoever hath been wrought, or begun, which will follow upon us to the end, that perfect consummation, and happy expectation of glory, comparable with the miseries of this present life, and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ. All these, out of Peace, and what time, and necessary, and the things we have, are to be wondered, and let [illegible] and full and all other things. But enough is enough to do it: Evil is the only object of the mercies, we must remember our [illegible] which is the [illegible], that if the passion, the horror of the sin is very commendable piece of godly reaction. Of [illegible] something but now we are about to lose God, we shall have all the comforts and hopes as the world, no sin have given of all the blood we have, we enjoy the thus this spirit out of doors, [illegible] and well within the doors stench of sin,) to shut the doors of their daughters. Offend, That thus we give Satan a right in us, power over us, advantage against us: That we make God to frown upon us in heaven: That we are at his good creatures against us on earth: That we do as it were take God's hand in ours, and scourge ourselves with all temporal plagues, and forge his curses upon us, and pains: That we wound our own consciences with sinners, that they may wound us with terrifying torments: That we die both in sin and hell in our breasts before death, and upon the gates of that bottomless pit, torment us at their wards: That we do now but trim one in to the fire, and that we should fall of ourselves, make our selves ready for it. These, and what other terrors of this kind must be laid to the soul, which, if they be thoroughly urged to an heart, but altogether indeed to slay, well may a man affect himself, how he can sinned. But if neither this fear of mercies, nor the impetuous wonder, [illegible] judge neither can make him cast off [illegible] double of wicked deeds, he must be [illegible] with confusion, as with a double, according to the Psalmist [illegible] [illegible] able to think how many live, as if they were not to be holden to God, nor a fraid of him, neither in his debt, nor danger. As if their happiness and all were both upon earth, sinning not only without shame, but not without malice: It is their last life to do evil. Behold they speak for it, plead in behalf of it, in force to it, as if they would defend challenge into heaven, and make [illegible] their [illegible]. Their lewd-ness calls for our sorrow, and zealous obedience, that our God may have as true servants, as enemies. And as we see natural qualities increased with the resistance of their contraries, so must our grace with those sinners to which we shall redeem somewhat of God's dishonour by sin, if we shall thereto grow [illegible]

To Mr. Doctor [illegible]

Pet. IV. Discovering how false, and how vain Popery destroyeth the foundation.

[illegible] He neither is all things is not more safe than hard, whether to hold or keep:
and as in all other morality, so [illegible] a narrow compass most in the matter of our censure, especially concerning Religion; wherein we are wont to be either credulous or too peremptory. How far, and wherein Popery hazards the foundation, is worth our inquiry: In case not [illegible] upon words to [illegible] foundation, were can be [illegible] grounds of Christian faith. This [illegible] Papistry defaces, by laying a new, by casting down the old. In their case, addition doth not [illegible]: he that obtrudes a new word, no less overthrows the Scripture, than he that denies the old; yea this way obtrusion denies: he that sets up a new Christ, rejects Christ. Two foundations cannot stand at once, the Ark and Dagon. Now Papistry lays a double new foundation: the one, a new rule of faith, that is, a new word: the other, a new Author, or guide of faith, that is, a new head besides Christ. God never laid other foundation, than in the Prophets and Apostles: upon their divine writing, he meant to build his Church; which he therefore inspired, that they might be (like himselfe) perfect and eternall: Popery builds upon an unwritten word; the voice of old (but dumbe) Traditions; the voice of the present Church, that is, as they interpret it, theirs, with no lesse confidence and presumption of certainty, than any thing ever written by the finger of God: If this be not a new foundation, the old was none. God never taught this holy Spouse to know any other husband, than Christ; to acknowledge any other head, to follow any other Shepherd, to obey any other King: he alone may be enjoyed without jealousie, safely trusted without danger, without error believed, served without scruple: Popery offers to impose on Gods Church a King, Shepherd, Head, Husband, besides her own: A man, a man of sinne. His must know all things, can erre in nothing; direct, inform, assure, absolve, both in earth and Purgatorie; expound Scriptures, canonize Saints, forgive sinnes, create new Articles of Faith, and in all these, is absolute and infallible as his Maker: who sees not, that if to attribute these things to the Son of God, be to make him the foundation of the Church; then to ascribe them to another, is to contradict him that said, Other foundation can no man lay, then that which is laid, which is Jesus Christ? To lay a new foundation, doth necessarily subvert the old: yet see this further actually done in particulars, wherein yet this distinction may clear the way: The foundation is overthrown two wayes; either in fundamentalls; when a main principle of faith is absolutely denied, as the deity and consubstantiality of the Son by Arrius, the Trinity of persons by Sabellius and Servetus, the resurrection of the body by Hymenæus & Philetus, the last judgment by S. Peters mockers: Or secondly, by consequent, when any opinion is maintained, which by just sequell overturneth the truth of that principle, which the defendant professes to hold, yet so, as he will not grant the necessity of that deduction. So the ancient Minei, of whom Jerome speaketh, while they urged Circumcision, by consequent; according to Paules rule, rejected Christ: So the Pelagians, while they defended a full perfection of our righteousnesse in ourselves, overthrew Christs justification; and in effect said, I believe in Christ, and in my selfe: So some Ubiquitaries, while they hold the possibility of conversion and salvation of reprobates, overthrow the Doctrine of Gods eternall Decree, & immutabilitie. Popery comes in this latter rank, and may justly be tained Heresie, by direct consequent: though not in their grant, yet in necessary proofe & inference. Thus it overthrowes the truth of Christs humanitie, while it holds his whole humane body locally circumscribed in heaven, and at once (the same instant) wholly present in ten thousand places on earth, without circumscription: That whole Christ is in the formes of bread, with all his dimensions, every part having his owne place & figure, and yet so, as that he is wholly in every part of the bread. Our justification, while it ascribes it to our own works: The all-sufficiency of Christs own sacrifice, while they reiterate it daily by the hands of a Priest. Of his satisfaction, while they hold a paiment of our utmost farthings, in a devised Purgatory. Of his mediation, while they implore others to aid them, not only by their intercession, but their merits; suing not only for their prayers, but their gifts: The value of the Scriptures, whiles they hold them insufficient, obscure, in points essentiall to salvation, and bind them to an uncertain dependance upon the Church. Besides hundreds of this kinde, there are Heresies in actions, contrary to those fundamentall practices which God requires of his: as prohibitions of Scriptures to the Laitie, Prescriptions of devotion in unknowne tongues; Tying the effect of Sacraments and Prayers to the externall work; Adoration of Angels, Saints, Bread, Reliques, Crosses, Images: All which, are so many reall underminings of the sacred foundation, which is no lesse active, than vocall. By this the simplest may see, what we must hold of Papists; neither as no Heretickes, nor yet so palpable as the worst. If any man aske for their conviction: In the simpler sort, I grant this excuse fair & tolerable; poor soules, they cannot be any otherwise informed, much lesse perswaded: Whiles in truth of heart, they hold the maine principles w^ch they know, doubtlesse the mercy of God may passe over their ignorant weaknes, in what they cannot know. For the other, I fear not to say, that many of their errors are wilful. The light of truth hath shined out of heaven to them, and they love darknes more than light. In this state of the Church, he shall speak & hope idly, that

shall

A shall call for a publique and universall eviction: How can that be, when they pretend to be Judges in their own cause? Unlesse they will not be adversaries to themselves, or judge of us, this course is but impossible. As the Devill, so Antichrist, will not yeeld: both shall be subdued; neither will treat of peace: what remains, but that the Lord shall consume that wicked man (which is now clearly revealed) with the breath of his mouth, and abolish him with the brightnesse of his comming. Even so, Lord Jesus come quickly. This briefly is my conceit of Popery; which I willingly refer to your cleare and deep judgement; being not more desirous to teach the ignorant what I know, than to learn of you what I should teach, and know not: The Lord direct all our thoughts to his glory, and the behoofe of his Church.

Written long since to Mr. J.W.

EPIST. V. Dissuading from separation, and shortly oppugning the grounds of that error.

IN my former Epistle (I confesse) I touched the late separation with a light hand: only setting down the injury of it (at the best) not discussing the grounds in common: now your danger draws me on to this discourse: it is not much lesse thankworthy to prevent a disease, than to cure it: you confesse that you doubt; I mislike it not; doubting is not more the way to error, than to satisfaction; lay down first all C pride and prejudice, and I cannot feare you: I never yet knew any man of this way, which hath not bewraid himselfe far gone with over-weening: and therefore it hath been just with God, to punish their self-love with error; an humble spirit is a fit subject for truth: prepare you your heart, and let me then answer, or rather God for me; you doubt whether the notorious sin of one unreformed, uncensured, defile not me; whole congregation; so as we may not without sinne communicate therewith: and why not the whole Church? woe were us, if we should thus live in the danger of all men: have we not sinnes enough of our own, but we must borrow of others? Each man shall beare his own burden: is ours so light that we call for more weight, and undertake what God never imposed? It was enough for him that is God and Man, to beare others iniquities; it is no taske for us, which shrinke under the least of our own. But it is made ours, you say (though anothers) by our toleration and connivence: in- D deed, if we consent to them, incourage them, imitate, or accompany them in the same excesse of ryot; yet more, the publike person that forbears a known sin, sinneth; but if each mans known sinne, be every mans, what difference is betwixt the root and the branches? Adams sin spred it selfe to us, because we were in him, stood or fell in him; our case is not such. Doe but see how God scorneth that unjust Proverb of the Jewes, That the Fathers have eaten sowre grapes, and the childrens teeth are set on edge? How much lesse are strangers? Is any bond so neere as this of blood? Shall not the child smart for the Parent? and shall we (even spiritually) for others? You object Achans stealth, and Israels punishment: an unlike case, and extraordinay: for see how direct Gods charge is. Be ye ware of the execrable thing, lest ye make your selves execrable; and in taking of the execrable thing, make also the Hoast of Israel execrable and trouble it. Now every man is made a party, by a peculiar injunction: and not only all Israel is as one man; but every Israelite is a publike person in this act, you cannot shew the like E in every one, no not in any: it was a law for the present, not intended for perpetuitie: you may as well challenge the Trumpets of Rams-horns, and seven dayes walk unto every siege. Look else-where: The Church of Thyatira suffers the woman Jezabel to teach and deceive. A great sinne. Yet to you (saith the Spirit) the rest of Thyatira, as many as have not this learning, I will put upon you none other burden, but that which you have, hold fast: He saith not, Leave your Church, but Hold fast your own. Locke into the practice of the Prophets, ransack their burdens, and see if you find this there; yea, behold our best pattern, the Sonne of God. The Jewish Rulers in Christs time were notoriously covetous, proud, oppressing, cruell, superstitious: our Saviour feared not polluting, in joyning with them; and was so farre from separating himselfe, that hee called and sent others to them. But a little Leaven leavens the whole lumpe: it is true; by the infection of it, sin, where it is unpunished, spreadeth; it sowreth all those whose hands are in it, not others. If we dislike it, detest, desist, reprove, & mourne for it, we cannot be tainted: the Corinthian love-feasts had grosse and sinfull disorder: yet you heare not Paul say, Abstain from the Sacrament till these be reformed; Rather he enjoynes the act, and controules the abuse: God hath bidden you heare and receive: shew me, where he hath said, except others be sinfull. Their uncleanesse can no more defile you, than your holinesse can excuse them. But while I communicate (you say) I consent; God forbid. It is sinne, not to cast out the deserving: but not yours; who made you a Ruler and a Judge? The uncleane must be separated; not by the people: Would you have no distinction betwixt private and publike persons? What strange confusion is this? And what other than the old note of Corah and his company, Yee take too much upon you, seeing all the Congregation is holy, every one of them, and the Lord is among them: wherefore then lift ye up your selves above the Congregation of the Lord? What is (if this be not) to make a Monster of Christs body? he is the head, his Church the body, consisting of divers limbs. All have their severall faculties and imployments; not every one, all; who would imagine any man so absurd, as to say, that this body should be all tongue, or all hands; every man a Teacher, every man a Ruler? As Christ had said to every man, Goe teach, and whose sinnes yee remit: How senseleſse are these two extreams? Of the Papists, that one man hath the keyes: Of the Brownists, that every man hath them. But these priviledges and charges are given to the Church: True; to be executed by her Governours: the faculty of speech is given to the whole man, but the use of it to the proper instrument. Man speaketh, but by his tongue; if a voice should be heard from his hand, eare, foot, it were unnaturall: Now if the tongue speake not when it ought, shall we be so foolish as to blame the hand? But you say; if the tongue speak not, or speake ill, the whole man smarteth; the man sinneth: I grant it, but you shal set the natural body on too hard a rack, if you straine it in all things, to the likenesse of the spirituall, or civill. The members of that being quickned by the same soule; have charge of each other; and therefore either stand or fall together: It is not so in these. If then notwithstanding unpunished sins, we may joyn with the true Chruch: Whether is ours such? You doubt, and your solicitors deny: surely, if we have many enormities, yet none worse than rash and cruell judgement; let them make this a colour to depart from themselves: there is no lesse woe to them that call good evill. To judge one man is bold and dangerous. Judge then what is it to condemne a whole Church; God knows, as much without cause, as without shame. Vaine men may libell against the Spouse of Christ: her husband never divorced her: No, his love is still above their hatred, his blessings above their censures: Doe but aske them, were we ever the true Church of God? If they deny it; Who then were so? Had God never Church upon earth, since the Apostles time, till Barrow and Greenwood arose? And even then scarce a number? nay, when or where was ever any man in the world (except in the schooles perhaps of Donatus or Novatus) that taught their doctrine; & now still hath he none, but in a blind lane at Amsterdam? Can you think this probable? If they affirme it, when ceased we? Are not the points controverted still the same? The same government, the same doctrine? Their minds are changed, not our estate: Who hath admonished, evinced, excommunicated us; & when? All these must be done. Will it not be a shame to say; that Francis Johnson, as he tooke power to excommunicate his brother, and Father; so had power to excommunicate his Mother, the Church? How base and idle are these conceits? Are we then Hereticks condemned in our selves? Wherein overthrow we the foundation? what other God, Saviour, Scriptures, Justification, Sacraments, heaven, do they teach besides us? Can all the Masters of Separation, yea can all the Churches in Christendome, set forth a more exquisite and worthy confession of faith, than is contained in the Articles of the Church of England? Who can hold these and be hereticall? Or, from which of these are we revolted? But to make this good, they have taught you to say.

A ſay, that every truth in Scripture is fundamentall; ſo fruitfull is errour of abſurdities; Whereof ſtill one breeds another more deformed than it ſelfe. That Trophimus was left at Miletum ſick, that Pauls Cloake was left at Troas, that Gaius, Pauls hoaſt, ſaluted the Romanes, that Nabal was drunke, or that Thomar baked Cakes, and a thouſand of this nature are fundamentall: how large is the Separatiſts Creed, that hath all theſe Articles? If they ſay all Scripture is of the ſame Author, of the ſame authority; ſo ſay we, but not of the ſame uſe: is it as neceſſary for a Chriſtian to know that Peter hoſted with one Simon a Tanner in Joppa, as that Jeſus Chriſt the Sonne of God was borne of the Virgin Mary? What a monſter is this of an opinion, that all truths are equall? that this ſpirituall houſe ſhould be all foundation, no wals, no roofe? Can no man be ſaved but he that knows every thing in Scripture? Then both they and we are excluded: heaven would not have ſo many, as their Parlor at Amſterdam. Can any
B man be ſaved that knows nothing in Scripture? It is farre from them to be ſo over-charitable to affirme it: you ſee then that both all truths muſt not of neceſſity be known, and ſome muſt; and theſe we juſtly call fundamentall: which who ſo holdeth, all his hay and ſtubble (through the mercy of God) condemne him not: ſtill he hath right to the Church on earth, and hope in heaven: but whether every truth be fundamentall, or neceſſary? diſcipline (you ſay) is ſo: indeed neceſſary to the well-being of a Church, no more: it may be true without it, not perfect. Chriſt compares his Spouſe to an Army with banners: as order is to an Army, ſo is diſcipline to the Church: if the troops be not well marſhalled in their ſeverall rankes, and move not forward according to the diſcipline of warre, it is an Army ſtill: confuſion may hinder their ſucceſſe, it cannot bereave them of their name: it is, as beautifull proportion to the body, an
C hedge to a vineyard, a wall to a city, an hem to a garment, ſeeling to an houſe. It may be a body, vineyard, city, garment, houſe, without them: it cannot be well and perfect: yet which of our Adverſaries will ſay we have no diſcipline? Some they grant, but not the right: as if they ſaid; Your City hath a Brick wall indeed, but it ſhould have one of hewn ſtone; your Vineyard is hedged, but it ſhould be paled and ditched: while they cavill at what we want, we thank God for what we have; and ſo much we have, in ſpight of all detraction, as makes us both a true Church, and a worthy one.

But the main quarrell is againſt our Miniſtery, and forme of worſhip: let theſe be examined; this is the circle of their cenſure. No Church, therefore no Miniſtery: and no Miniſtery, therefore no Church: unnaturall ſons, that ſpit in the face of thoſe ſpirituall Fathers that begot them, and the Mother that bore them. What would they
D have? Have we not competent gifts from above, for ſo great a function? Are we all unlearned, unſufficient? Not a man that knows to divide the word aright? As Paul to the Corinths, Is it ſo that there is not one wiſe man amongſt us? No man will affirme it: ſome of them have cenſured our exceſſe in ſome knowledge; none, our defect in all: What then? Have we not a true deſire to doe faithfull ſervice to God and his Church? No zeale for Gods glory? Who hath been in our hearts to ſee this? Who dare uſurpe upon God, and condemne our thoughts? Yea, we appeale to that onely Judge of hearts, whether he hath not given us a ſincere longing for the good of his Sion: he ſhall make the thoughts of all hearts manifeſt: and then ſhall every man have praiſe of God. If then we have both ability and will to publike good: our inward calling (which is the main point) is good and perfect; for the outward, what want we? Are we not firſt (after good triall) preſented and approved by the learned, in our Colledges, examined by our Church-governors, ordain'd by impoſition of hands of the Elderſhip, allowed by the Congregations we are ſet over? Doe we not labour in E word and doctrine? doe we not carefully adminiſter the Sacraments of the Lord Jeſus? have we not by our publique means wonne many ſoules to God? what ſhould we have and doe more? All this, and yet no true Miniſters? we paſſe very little to be judged of them, or of mans day: but our Ordainers (you ſay) are Antichriſtian: ſurely our cenſurers are unchriſtian: tho we ſhould grant it, ſome of us were baptized by Hereticks: is the Sacrament annihilated, and muſt it be redoubled? How much leſſe Ordination, which is but an outward admiſſion to preach the Goſpell? God forbid that we ſhould thus condemn the innocent: more hands were laid upon us, than one and of them, for the principall, except but their perpetuall honour, and some few immateriall Rites, let an enemy say what they differ from Super-intendents; and can their double honour make them no Elders? If they have any personall faults, why is their calling scourged? Look into our Saviours times: what corruptions were in the very Priest-hood? It was now made annuall, which was before fixed and singular. Christ saw these abuses, and was silent: here was much dislike and no clamour: we, for lesse, exclaime and separate: even personall offences are fetcht into the condemnation of lawfull courses. God give both pardon and redresse to this foule uncharitableness. Alas, how ready are we to tosse the fore-part of our Waller, whiles our own faults are ready to break our necks behind us: all the world sees and condemns their Ordination to be faulty, yea none at all: yet they cry out first on us, craftily (I think) lest we should complaine. That Church-governors should ordaine Ministers, hath been the constant practice of the Church, from Christs time, to this houre. I except onely, in an extreme desolation, meerly for the first course: that the people should make their Ministers, was unheard of in all ages and Churches, till Bolton, Browne and Barrow; and hath neither colour nor example: Doth not this comparison seeme strange and harsh? Their tradesmen may make true Ministers, our Ministers cannot: who but they would not be ashamed of such a position? Or who but you would not think the time mis-pent in answering it? No lesse frivolous are those exceptions that are taken against our worship of God, condemned for false and idolatrous, whereof Volumes of Apologies are written by others: we meet together, pray, read, heare, preach, sing, administer, and receive Sacraments; wherein offend we? How many Gods doe we pray to? or to whom but the true God? In what words but holy? whom doe we preach but the same Christ with them? what point of faith, not theirs? what Sacraments but those they dare not but allow? where lyes our Idolatry, that we may let it out? In the manner of performing: in set prayers, Antichristian Ceremonies of crossing, kneeling, &c. For the former: what sin is this? The originall and truth of prayer is in the heart, the voice is but as accidentall; if the heart may often conceive the same thought, the tongue her servant may often utter it, in the same words: and if daily to repeat the same speeches be amisse, then to entertaine the same spirituall desires, is sinfull: to speak once without the heart is hypocriticall: but to speak often the same request with the heart, never offendeth. What intolerable boldnesse is this; to condemn that in us which is recorded to have been the continuall practice of Gods Church in all succession? Of the Jewes, in the time of Moses, David, Solomon, Jehosophat, Ezekiah, Jeremy. Of the ancient Christian assemblies, both Greek and Latine, and now at this day of all reformed Churches in Christendome; yea, which our Saviour himself so directly allowed, and in a manner prescribed, and the blessed Apostles Paul and Peter in all their formall salutations (which were no other than set prayers) so commonly practised: for the other, (lest I exceed a Letter) though we yeeld them such as you imagine (worse they cannot be) they are but Ceremonious appendances, the body and substance is sound. Blessed be God that we can have his true Sacraments at so easie a rate, at the payment (if they were such) of a few circumstantiall inconveniences: how many deare children of God in all ages, even neer the golden times of the Apostles, have gladly purchased them much dearer, and not complained: but see how our Church imposes them: not as to bind the conscience, other wise than by the common bond of obedience; not as actions, wherein Gods worship essentially consisteth, but as themselves, Ceremonies: comely or convenient, not necessary; whatsoever: is this a sufficient ground of separation? How many moderate and wiser spirits have we, that cannot approve the Ceremonies, yet dare not forsake the Church? & that hold your departure farre more evill, than the cause. You are invited to a feast: if but a Napkin or Trencher be mis-placed, or a dish ill carved; doe you run from the Table, and not stay to thank the Hoast? Either be lesse curious, or more charitable. Would God both you and all other, which either favour the Separation, or professe it, could but reade over the ancient stories of the Church to see the true state of things and times; the beginnings, proceedings, increases, encounters, yeeldings, restaurations of the Gospell, what the the holy Fathers of those first times were glad to swallow for peace; what they held, practised, found, left: whosoever knowes but these things, cannot separate; and shall not be contented onely, but thankfull. God shall give you still more light: in the meane time, upon the peril of my soule, stay, and take the blessed offers of your God, in peace: And since Christ saith by my hand, Will you also go away? Answer him with that worthy Disciple, Master, whether shall I goe from thee? thou hast the words of eternall life.

To Mr. I. B.

Ep. VI. A complaint of the mis-education of our Gentry.

I Confesse, I cannot honour blood without good qualities; nor spare it, with ill. There is nothing that I more desire to be taught, than what is true Nobility: What thank is it to you, that you are born well? If you could have lost this privilege of Nature, I feare you had not been thus far Noble: that you may not plead defect, you had this before you were, long ere you could either know or prevent it; you are deceived if you think this any other than the body of Gentility: the life and soul of it is in noble & vertuous disposition, in gallantnes of spirit without haughtines, without insolence, without scornfull overlightnesse: thirdly, in generous qualities, carriage, actions. See your error, and know that this demeanor doth not answer an honest birth: If you can follow all fashions, drink all healths, wear favours & good cloaths, consort with Ruffianly companions, sweare the biggest oathes, quarrell easily, fight desperately, game in every inordinate Ordinary, spend your patrimony ere it fall, looke on every man betwixt scorne and anger, use gracefully some gestures of apish complement, talk irreligiously, dally with a Mistris, or (which terme is plainer) hunt after Harlots, take smoke at a Play-house, and live as if you were made all for sport, you thinke you have done enough, to merit both of your blood, and others opinions. Certainly, the world hath no baseneſſe, if this be generosity: well-fare the honest and civill rudeneſſe of the obscure sons of the earth, if such be the graces of the eminent: The shame whereof (me thinks) is not so proper to the wildneſſe of youth, as to the careleſneſſe or vanity of Parents: I speak it boldly; our Land hath no blemish comparable to the mis-education of our Gentry: Infancy and youth are the seed-times of all hopes; if those passe unseasonably, no fruit can be expected from our age, but shame & sorrow: who should improve these, but they which may command them? I cannot altogether complaine of our first yeares. How like are we to children, in the training up of our children! Give a child some painted Babe; he joyes in it at first sight, and for some dayes will not abide it out of his hand or bosome; but when he hath satisfied himselfe with the new pleasure of that guest, he now (after a while) casts it into corners, forgets it, and can look upon it, with no care: Thus doe we by ours. Their first times find us not more fond, than carefull; we doe not more follow them with our love, than ply them with instruction: When this delight begins to grow stale, we begin to grow negligent. Nothing that I know can be faulted in the ordering of childhood, but indulgence. Foolish Mothers admit of Tutors, but debar rods. These, while they desire their children may learne, but not smart, as is said of Apes, kill their young ones with love; for what can worke upon that age, but feare? And what feare without correction? Now at last, with what measure of Learning their own will would vouchsafe to receive, they are too early sent to the common Nurseries of Knowledge; There (unleſſe they fall under carefull tuition) they study in jest, and play in earnest. In such universall means of Learning, all cannot fall besides them; what their company, what their recreation would either instill or permit, they bring home to their glad Parents. Thence are they transplanted to the Collegiate Innes of our common Laws: and there too many learn to be lawleſſe, & to forget their former little: Paules is their Westminster, their Study, an Ordinary, or Play-house, or Dancing-schoole, and some Lambert their Ployden. And now after they have (not without much expence) learned fashions & licentiousneſſe, they return home, full of welcomes and gratulations.

gratulations. By this time some blossomes of youth appearing in their face, admonish their Parents to seeke them some seasonable matche. Wherein the father inquires for wealth, the Son for beauty, perhaps the Mother for Parentage, scarce any for Vertue, for Religion. Thus settled, What is their care, their discourse, yea, their Trade, but either an Hound, or an Hawke? And it is well, if no worse: And now they so live, as if they had forgotten that there were bookes: Learning is for Priests and Pedants, for Gentlemen, pleasure. Oh! that either wealth or wit should be cast away thus basely: That ever reason should grow so detested a quality, as to be counted any thing worthy than knowledge. With what shame and emulation may we looke upon other Nations (whose apish fashions we can take up in the channels, neglecting their imitable examples) and with what scorne do they looke upon us? They have their solemn Academies for all those qualities, which may accomplish Gentility: from which they returne richly furnished, both for action, and speculation. They account knowledge and ability of discourse as essentiall to greatnesse, as blood: neither are they more above the yoong in birth, than in understanding: They travell with judgement, and returne with experience: so doe they follow the exercises of the body, that they neglect not the culture of the mind. From hence growes civility, and power to manage affaires, either of Iustice, or State: from hence encouragement to learning, and reverence from inferiors. For those only can esteeme knowledge, which have it, and the common sort frame either obseruance, or contempt, but of the example of their Leaders. Amongst them, the Sonnes of Nobles scorne not either Merchandize, or learned professions: and hate nothing so much as to doe nothing. I shame and hate to think, that our Gallants hold, there can be no disparagement, but in honest calling.

Thus perhaps I have abated the envy of this reproofe, by communicating it to more; which I had not done, but that the generality of evill importunes redresse. I well see that either good or evill descends: In vaine shall we hope for the reformation of the many, while the better are disordered. Whom to solicite herein, I know not, but all: How glad should I be to spend my light to the snuffe, for the effecting of this! I can but perswade and pray; these I will not faile of: The rest to him that both can amend and punish.

To M. Jonas Reigesbergius in Zeland.

Ep. VII. Written some while since, concerning some new opinions then broached in the Churches of Holland; and under the name of Arminius (then living) perswading all great wits to a study and care of the common peace of the Church, dissuading from all affectation of singularitie.

I Received lately a short relation of some new Paradoxes from your Leiden: you would know what we think: I feare not to be censured, as medling: your truth is ours: The Sea cannot divide those Churches whom one faith unites. I know not how it comes to passe, that most men, while they too much affect civility, turne flatterers, and plaine truth is most-where counted rudenesse. He that tels a sick friend he looks ill, or termes an angry tumour the Gout, or a watrish swelling Dropsie, is thought unmannerly. For my part, I am glad that I was not born to feed humors. However you take your own evils, I must tell you, we pity you, and think you have just cause of dejection, and we for you: not for any private cares, but (which touch a Christian neerest) the Common-wealth of God. Behold, after all those hils of carkasses, and streames of blood, your civill sword is sheathed, wherein we neither congratulate, nor feare your peace; lo now, in stead of that, another while, the spirituall sword is drawn & shaken, and it is well, if no more. Now the politick State sits still, the Church quarrels: Oh! the insatiable hostility of our great enemy, w^th^ what change of mischiefes

A chiefes doth he afflict miserable man? No sooner did the Christian world begin to breathe from persecution, but it was more punished with Arrianisme: when the red Dragon cannot devoure the childe, he tries to drown the Mother; and when the waters faile, he raises warre. Your famous Iustus had nothing more admirable than his love of peace: when our busie Separatists appealed him, with what a sweet calmnesse did he reject them, and with a grave importunity call'd them to moderation! How it would have vexed his holy soule (now out of the danger of passions) to have foreseen his chaire troublesome. God forbid that the Church should finde a Challenger, in stead of a Champion: Who would thinke but you should have been raught the benefit of peace, by the long want? But if your temporall state (besides either hope, or beliefe) hath grown wealthy with warre, like those Fowles which fatten with hard weather: yet be too sure, that these spirituall broyles cannot but impoverish the Church; yea, affamish it. It were pitty that your Holland should be still the Amphi-
B theatre of the world, on whose Scaffolds all other Nations should sit, and see variety of bloody shews, not without pity, and horror. If I might challenge ought in that yodracute and learned Arminius; I would thus solicite and conjure him: Alas that so wise a man should not know the worth of peace; that so noble a sonne of the Church should not be brought to light, without ripping the wombe of his mother! What mean these subtill Novelties? if they make thee famous, and the Church miserable, who shall gaine by them? Is singularity so precious, that it should cost no lesse, than the safety and quiet of our common mother? If it be truth thou affectest; what alone? Could never any eyes (till thine) be blessed with this object? Where hath that sacred verity hid her selfe thus long from all her carefull Inquisitors, that shee
C now first shews her head to thee unsought? Hath the Gospell shined thus long, and bright, and left some corners unseen? Away with all new truths; faire and plausible they may be, sound they cannot: some may admire thee for them; none shall blesse thee. But grant that some of these are no lesse true, than nice points: what doe these unseasonable crochets and quavers trouble the harmonious plain-songs of our peace? Some quiet errour may be better than some unruly truth. Who bindes us to speake all we thinke? So the Church may be still, would God thou wert wise alone. Did not our Advetsaries quarrell enough before, at our quarrells? were they not rich enough with our spoyles? By the deare name of our common parents, what meanest thou Arminius? Whither tend these new-rais'd dissentions? who shall thrive by them but they which insult upon us, and rise by the fall of truth? who shall be un-
D done, but thy brethren? By that most precious, and bloody ransome of our Saviour, and by that awfull appearance we shall one make before the glorious Tribunall of the Son of God, remember thy selfe, and the poore distracted limmes of the Church: Let not those excellent parts, wherewith God hath furnished thee, lye in the narrow way, and cause any weak one either to fall, or stumble, or erre. For Gods sake, either say nothing, or the same. How many great wits have sought no by-pathes, and now are happy with their fellows! Let it be no disparagement to goe with many to heaven. What could he reply to so plaine a charge? No distinction can avoyd the power of simple truth. I know he hears not this of me first: Neither that learned and worthy Fran. Gomarus; nor your other grave fraternity of reverend Divines, have been silent in so maine a cause. I feare rather too much noise in any of these tumults: There may too many contend, not intreat. Multitude of suters is commonly power-
E full; how much more in just motions? But if either he, or you, shall turn me home, and bid me spend my little moysture upon our own brands, I grant there is both the same cause, and the same need. This Counsell is no whit further from us, because it is directed to you: Any Reader can change the Person: I lament to see, that every where peace hath not many Clients, but fewer lovers; yea, even many of those that praise her, follow her not. Of old, the very Novatian men, women, children brought stones and mortar (with the Orthodox) to the building of the Church of the resurrection, and joyned lovingly with them, against the Arrians: lesser quarrels divide us; and every division ends in blows, and every blow is returned; and none of all lights beside the Church. Even the best Apostles dissented; neither knowledge, nor holi-nesse holinesse can redresse all differences: True, but wisdome and charity could teach us to avoid their prejudice. If we had but these two vertues, quarrels should not hurt us, nor the Church by us: But (alas) selfe-love is too strong for both these: This alone opens the floud-gates of dissention, and drownes the sweet, but low valley of the Church. Men esteem of opinions, because their own; and will have truth serve, not govern. What they have undertaken, must be true: Victory is sought for, not satisfaction; victory of the Author, not of the cause: Hee is a rare man that knowes to yeeld, as well as to argue: what should we doe then, but bestow our selves upon that which too many neglect, publike peace; first, in prayers that we may prevaile, then in tears that we prevaile not? Thus have I been bold to chat with you of our greatest and common cares. Your old love, and late hospitall entertainment in that your Iland called for this remembrance; the rather to keep your English tongue in breath, which was wont not to be the least of your desires. Would God you could make us happy with news, not of truce, but sincere amity and union; not of Provinces, but spirits. The God of spirits effect it both here and there, to the glory of his Name and Church.

To W. J. condemned for Murder.

EP. VIII. Effectually preparing him, and (under his name) what soever Malefactor for his death.

IT is a bad cause that robbeth us of all the comfort of friends; yea, that turns their remembrance into sorrow. None can doe so, but those that proceed from our selves: for outward evils, which come from the infliction of others, make us cleave faster to our helpers, and cause us to seek and find ease in the very commiseration of those that love us: whereas those griefes which arise from the just displeasure of conscience, will not abide so much as the memory of others affection; or if it doe, makes it so much the greater corasive, as our case is more uncapable of their comfort. Such is yours. You have made the mention of our names tedious to your selfe, and yours to us. This is the beginning of your paine, that you had friends? If you may now smart soundly from us, for your good, it must be the onely joy you must expect, and the finall duty we owe to you. It is both vaine and comfortlesse, to heare what might have been; neither would I send you back to what is past, but purposely to increase your sorrow; who have caused all bout comfort to stand in your teare. If therefore our former Counsels had prevailed, neither had your hands shed innocent blood, nor justice yours. Now, to your great sinne, you have done the one: and the other must be done to your paine: and we your well-willers, with sorrow and shame live to be witnesses of both. Your sinne is gone before, the revenge of justice will follow: seeing you are guilty, let God be just. Other sinnes speak, this cryeth, and will never be silent, till it be answered with it selfe. For your life; the case is hopelesse; feed not your selfe with vaine presumptions, but settle your selfe to expiate anothers blood with your own. Would God your desert had been such, that we might with any comfort have desired you might live. But now, alas, your fact is so hainous, that your life can neither be craved without injustice, nor be protracted without inward torment. And if your private affection should make us deafe to the shouts of blood, and partialitie should teach us to forget all care of publique right; yet resolve, there is no place for hope. Since then you could not live guiltlesse, there remaines nothing, but that you labour to die penitent; and since your body cannot be saved alive, to endeavour that your soule may be saved in death. Wherein, how happy shall it be for you, if you shall yet give care to my last advice; too late indeed for your recompence to the world, not too late for your selfe. You have deserved death, and expect it: Take heed lest you so fasten your eyes upon the first death of the body, that you should not looke beyond it to the second; which alone is worthy of trembling, worthy of teares.

For,

For, this, though terrible to Nature, yet is common to us, with you. You must die: what doe we else? And what differs our end from yours, but in haste and violence? And who knows whether in that? It may be a sickneſſe as ſharpe, as ſudden, ſhall fetch us hence: it may be the ſame fever, or a worſe, for a better end: Or if not ſo, there is much more miſery in lingring: He dies eaſily, that dies ſoone: but the other is the utmoſt vengeance that God hath reſerved for his enemies. This is a matter of long feare, and ſhort paine. A few pangs let the ſoule out of priſon: but the torment of that other is everlaſting; after ten thouſand yeers ſcorching in that flame, the paine is never the nerer to his ending. No time gives it hope of abating, yea, time hath nothing to doe with this eternity. You that ſhall feele the paine of one minutes dying, thinke what paine it is to be dying for ever and ever. This, although it be attended with a ſharpe paine, yet is ſuch as ſome ſtrong ſpirits have endured without ſhew of yeeldance. I have heard of an Iriſh Traitor, that when he lay pining upon the wheele with his bones broke, aſked his friend if he changed his countenance at all, caring leſſe for the paine, than the ſhew of feare. Few men have died of greater paines, than others have ſuſtained and live. But that other overwhelmes both body and ſoule, and leaves no roome for any comfort in the poſſibility of miſgration. Hers, men are executioners, or diſeaſes, there fiends. Thoſe Devils that were ready to tempt the graceleſſe into ſinne, are as ready to follow the damned with tortures. Whatſoever becomes of your carcaſe, ſave your ſoule from the flames; and ſo manage this ſhort time you have to live, that you may die but once. This is not your firſt ſinne, yea, God hath now puniſhed your former ſinnes with this: a fearefull puniſhment in it ſelfe, if it deſerved no more: your conſcience (which now begins to tell truth) cannot but aſſure you, that there is no ſinne more worthy of hell, than murder; yea, more proper to it. Turn over thoſe holy leaves (which you have too much neglected, and now ſmart for neglecting) you ſhall finde murderers among thoſe that are ſhut out from the preſence of God: you ſhall finde the Prince of that darkneſſe, in the higheſt ſtile of his miſchiefe, termed a man-ſlayer. Alas! how fearefull a caſe is this, that you have her in reſembled him, for whom Tophet was prepared of old, and imitating him in his action, have endangered your ſelf to partake of his torment! Oh, that you could but ſee what you have done, what you have deſerved; that your heart could bleed enough within you, for the blood your hands have ſhed: That as you have followed Satan our common enemy in ſinning, ſo you could defie him in repenting: That your teares could diſappoint his hopes of your damnation. What a happy unhappineſſe ſhall this be to your ſad friends, that your better part yet liveth? That from an ignominious place your ſoule is received to glory? Nothing can effect this but your repentance; and that can doe it. Feare not to look into that horror, which ſhould attend your ſinne: and be now as ſevere to your ſelfe, as you have beene cruell to another. Think not to extenuate your offence with the vaine titles of manhood; what praiſe is this, that you were a valiant murderer? Strike your own breſt, (as Moſes did his Rocke) and bring down rivers of teares to waſh away your blood-ſhed. Doe not ſo much feare your judgement, as abhorre your ſinne; yea, your ſelf for it. And with ſtrong cries lift up your guilty hands to that God whom you offended, and ſay, Deliver me from blood-guiltineſſe O Lord! Let me tell you: As without repentance there is no hope; ſo with it, there is no condemnation. True penitence is ſtrong, and can grapple with the greateſt ſinne, yea with all the powers of hell. What if your hands be red with blood? Behold, the blood of your Saviour ſhall waſh away yours: If you can bathe your ſelfe in that, your Scarlet ſoule ſhall be as white as ſnow. This courſe alone ſhall make your croſſe the way to the Paradice of God. This plaiſter can heale all the ſores of the ſoule, if never ſo deſperate: Onely, take heed that your heart be deep enough pierced, ere you lay it on; elſe, under a ſeeming ſkin of diſſimulation, your ſoule ſhall feſter to death. Yet joy us with your true ſorrow, whom you have grieved with your offence; and at once comfort your friends, and ſave your ſoule.

To Mr. JOHN MOLE, of a long time now prisoner under the Inquisition at Rome.

EP. IX. Exciting him to his wonted constancy, and encouraging him to Martyrdom.

WHat passage can these lines hope to finde into that your strait and curious thraldome? Yet who would not adventure the losse of this pains for him, which is ready to lose himselfe for Christ? what doe we not owe to you which have thus given your selfe for the common faith? Blessed be the name of that God who hath singled you out for his Champion, and made you invincible: how famous are your bonds? how glorious your constancy? Oh, that out of your close charity, you could but see the honour of your suffering, the affections of Gods Saints, and in some, an holy envy at your distressed happinesse. Those walls cannot hide you: No man is attended with so many eies from earth and heaven: The Church your Mother beholds you, not with more compassion, than joy: Neither can it be said, how she at once pities your misery, and rejoyces in your patience: The blessed Angels look upon you with gratulation and applause. The adversaries with an angry sorrow to see themselves overcome by their captive, their obstinate cruelty over-matched with humble resolution, & faithfull perseverance. Your Saviour sees you from above, not as a meer spectator, but as a patient with you, in you, for you: yea, as an agent in your induring & victory, giving new courage with the one hand, and holding out a Crown with the other. Whom would not these sights incourage? who now can pity your solitarines? The hearts of all good men are with you. Neither can that place be but full of Angels, which is the continuall object of so many prayers; yea the God of heaven was never so neer you, as now you are removed from men. Let me speak a bold, but true word. It is as possible for him to be absent from his heaven, as from the prisons of his Saints. The glorified spirits above sing to him; the persecuted souls below, suffer for him, and cry to him; he is magnified in both, present with both; the faith of the one, is as pleasing to him, as the triumph of the other. Nothing obligeth us men so much, as suffering for us; words of defence are worthy of thanks, but pain is esteemed above recompence. How doe we kisse the wounds which are taken for our sakes, and professe that we would hate our selves, if we did not love those that dare bleed for us? How much more shall the God of mercies be sensible of your sorrows, and crown your patience? To whom you may truly sing that ditty of the Prophet, Surely for thy sake am I slaine continually, and am counted as a sheep for the slaughter. What need I to stir up your constancy, which hath already amazed, and wearied your persecutors? No suspition shall drive me hereto; but rather the thirst of your praise. He that exhorts to persist in well-doing, while he perswades, commendeth: Whither should I rather send you, than to the sight of your own Christian fortitude? which neither prayers, nor threats, have been able to shake: Here stands on the one hand, liberty, promotion, pleasure, life, and (which easily exceeds all these) the dear respect of wife and children (whom your only resolution shall make widow and orphanes) these with smiles, and vowes, and teares, seem to importune you. On the other hand, bondage, solitude, horror, death, (and the most lingring of all miseries) ruine of posterity: these with frowns and menaces labour to affright you: Betwixt both, you have stood unmoved, fixing your eies either right forward upon the cause of your suffering, or upwards upon the crown of your reward: It is an happy thing when our own actions may be either examples, or arguments of good. These blessed proceedings call you on to your perfection: The reward of good beginnings prosecuted, is doubled; neglected, is lost. How vaine are those temptations, which would make you a loser of all this praise, this recompence? Goe on therefore happily; keepe your eyes where they are, and your heart cannot be but where it is, and where it ought: Look still, for what you suffer, and for whom: For the truth, for Christ: what can be so precious as truth? Not life

it

it selfe. All earthly things are not so vile to life, as life to truth; Life is momentarie, Truth eternall; life is ours, the truth, Gods: Oh happy purchase, to give our life for the truth. What can we suffer too much for Christ? he hath given our life to us; he hath given his own life for us. What great thing is it, if he require what he hath given us, if ours for his? Yea, rather if he call for what he hath lent us; yet not to bereave, but to change it; giving us gold for clay, glory for our corruption, Behold that Saviour of yours weeping, and bleeding, and dying for you: alas! our soules are too strait for his sorrows; we can be made but paine for him; he was made sinne for us: we sustain, for him, but the impotent anger of men; he strugled with the infinite wrath of his father for us. Oh, who can endure enough for him, that hath passed thorow death and hell for his soule? Think this, and you shall resolve with David, I will be yet more vile for the Lord. The worst of the despight of men, is but Death; and that, if they inflict not, a disease will; or if not that, Age. Here is no imposition of that, which would not be; but a hastning of that which will be: an hastning to your gain. For behold, their violence shall turn your necessity into virtue and profit. Nature hath made you mortall: none but an enemy can make you a Martyr; you must die, though they will not; you cannot die for Christ, but by them. How could they else devise to make you happy? since the giver of both lifes hath said, He that shall lose his life for my sake shal save it. Lo, this alone is lost with keeping, and gained by losse. Say you were freed, upon the safest conditions, and returning: (as how welcome should that news be; more to yours, than to your selfe) perhaps, Death may meet you in the way, perhaps overtake you at home: neither place, nor time, can promise immunity from the common destinie of men: Those that may abridge your houres, cannot lengthen them; and while they last, cannot secure them from vexation; yea, themselves shall follow you into their dust; and cannot avoid what they can inflict; death shall equally tyrannize by them, and over them: so their favours are but fruitlesse, their malice gainfull. For it shall change your Prison into Heaven, your Fetters into a Crown, your Jaylors to Angels, your misery into glory. Look up to your future estate, and rejoyce in the present: Behold, the Tree of Life, the hidden Manna, the Scepter of power, the Morning-Starre, the white garment, the new name, the Crown, and Thorne of Heaven, are addressed for you. Overcome and enjoy them: oh glorious condition of Martyrs! whom conformity in death, hath made like their Saviour in blessednesse; whose honour is to attend him for ever, whom they have joyed to imitate. What are these which are araied in long white Robes, and whence came they? These are (saies that heavenly Elder) they which came out of great tribulation, and washed their long Robes, and have made their Robes white, in the blood of the Lambe.

Therefore they are in the presence of the Throne of God, and serve him day & night in his Temple: and he that sitteth on the Throne, will dwel among them, and govern them, and lead them unto the lively Fountains of waters, and God shall wipe all tears from their eyes.

All the elect have Seales in their fore-heads: but Martyrs have Palmes in their hands. All the elect have white Robes; Martyrs, both white and long: white, for their glory; long, for the largenesse of their glory. Once red with their own blood; now white with the blood of the Lambe: there is nothing in our blood, but weak obedience; nothing but merit in the Lambes blood; Behold, his merit makes our obedience glorious. You doe but sprinkle his feet with your blood; loe, he washes your long white Robes, with his. Every drop of your blood is answered with a streame of his; and every drop of his worth Rivers of ours: Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his Saints: Precious in prevention, precious in acceptation, precious in remuneration. Oh, give willingly that which you cannot keep, that you may receive what you cannot leese. The way is steep, but now you breathe towards the top. Let not the want of some few steps, lose you an eternall rest. Put to the strength of your owne Faith: The prayers of Gods Saints shall further your pace; and that gracious hand that sustaines heaven and earth, shall uphold, and sweetly draw you up to your glory. Goe on to credit the Gospell with your perseverance: and shew the false-hearted clients of that Roman-Court, that the Truth yeelds reall and hearty professors; such as dare no lesse smart, than speake for her.

Without the wals of your reſtraint, where can you looke beſide encouragements of ſuffering; Behold in this, how much you are happier than your many predeceſſors. Thoſe have found friends, or wives, or children, the moſt dangerous of all tempters. Suggeſtions of weakneſſe, when they come masked with love, are more powerfull to hurt. But you, all your many friends, in the valour of their Chriſtian love, wiſh rather a bleſſed Martyr, than a living and proſperous revolter: yea, your deare wife (worthy of this honour, to be the wife of a Martyr) prefers your faith, to her affection; and in a courage beyond her ſex, contemns the worſt miſery of your loſſe; profeſſing ſhe would redeem your life with hers, but that ſhe would not redeem it with your yeeldance: and while ſhe lookes upon thoſe many pawns of your chaſte love, your hopefull children, wiſhes rather to ſee them fatherleſſe, than their father unfaithfull: The greateſt part of your ſufferings are hers, She beares them with a cheerfull reſolution: She divides with you in your ſorrows, in your patience; ſhe ſhall not be divided in your glory: For us, we ſhall accompany you with our prayers, and follow you with our thankfull commemorations; vowing to write your name in red letters in the Kalenders of our hearts; and to regiſter it in the monuments of perpetuall Records, as an example to all poſterity, The memoriall of the juſt ſhall be bleſſed.

To all Readers.

EPIST. X. Containing Rules of good advice for our Chriſtian and civill cariage.

I Grant, brevity where it is neither obſcure, nor defective, is very pleaſing, even to the daintieſt judgements. No marvell therefore, if moſt men deſire much good counſell in a narrow roome; as ſome affect to have great perſonages drawne in little tablets; or, as we ſee worlds of Countries deſcribed in the compaſſe of ſmall maps: Neither doe I unwillingly yeeld to follow them; for both the powers of good advice are the ſtronger when they are thus united; and brevity makes counſell more portable for memory, and readier for uſe. Take theſe therefore for more; which as I would faine practice, ſo am I willing to commend. Let us begin with him who is the firſt and laſt: Inform your ſelf aright concerning God; without whom, in vain doe we know all things: Be acquainted with that Saviour of yours, which paid ſo much for you on earth, and now ſues for you in heaven; without whom we have nothing to doe with God, nor he with us. Adore him in your thoughts, truſt him with your ſelf: Renew your ſight of him every day, and his of you. Over-look theſe earthly things; and when you doe at any time caſt your eyes upon heaven, think, there dwels my Saviour, there I ſhall be. Call your ſelfe to often recknings; caſt up your debts, payments, graces, wants, expences, employments; yeeld not to think your ſet devotions troubleſome: Take not eaſie denials from your ſelfe: yea, give peremptory denials to your ſelfe: He can never be good that flatters himſelf: hold nature to her allowance; and let your will ſtand at courteſie: happy is that man which hath obtained to be the maſter of his own heart. Think all Gods outward favours and proviſions the beſt for you: your own ability, and actions the meaneſt. Suffer not your mind to be either a Drudge, or a Wanton; exerciſe it ever, but over-lay it not: In all your buſineſſes, look through the world, at God, whatſoever is your levell, let him be your ſcope: Every day take a view of your laſt; and think either it is this, or may be: Offer not your ſelf either to honour, or labour; let them both ſeek you: Care you only to be worthy, and you cannot hide you from God. So frame your ſelfe to the time and company, that you may neither ſerve it, nor ſullenly neglect it; & yeeld ſo far, as you may neither betray goodneſſe, nor countenance evill. Let your words be few, and digeſted: It is a ſhame for the tongue to cry the heart mercy, much more to caſt it ſelfe upon the uncertain pardon of others ears. There are but two things which a Chriſtian is charged to buy, & not to ſell, Time & Truth; both ſo precious, that we muſt purchaſe them at any rate. So uſe your friends, as thoſe which ſhould be perpetual, may be chãgeable. While you are within your ſelf, there is no danger: but thoughts once uttered muſt ſtand to hazard.

Do

Doe not heare from your ſelfe, what you would be loth to heare from others. In all good things, give the eye and eare the full of ſcope, for they let into the minde: reſtraine the tongue, for it is a ſpender. Few men have repented them of ſilence. In all ſerious matters, take counſell of dayes, and nights, and friends; and let leiſure ripen your purpoſes: neither hope to gaine ought by ſuddenneſſe. The firſt thoughts may be confident, the ſecond are wiſer. Serve honeſty ever, though without apparent wages: ſhee will pay ſure, if ſlow. As in apparell, ſo in actions, know not what is good, but what becomes you. How many warrantable acts have miſ-ſhapen the Authours? Excuſe not your own ill, agravate not others: and if you love peace, avoid cenſures, compariſons, contradictions. Our of good men chuſe acquaintance, of acquaintance, friends; of friends, familiars: after probation admit them, and after admittance change them not: Age commendeth friendſhip. Doe not alwaies your beſt: it is neither wiſe, nor ſafe for a man ever to ſtand upon the top of his ſtrength. If you would be above the expectation of others, be ever below your ſelf. Expend after your purſe, not after your minde: take not where you may deny, except upon conſcience of deſert, or hope to requite. Either frequent ſuits, or complaints, are wearieſome to a friend. Rather ſmother your griefes and wants as you may, than be either querulous, or importunate. Let not your face belie your heart, nor alwaies tell tales out of it: he is fit to live amongſt friends or enemies, that can be ingenuouſly cloſe. Give freely, ſell thriftily: Change ſeldome your place, never your ſtate: either amend inconveniences, or ſwallow them, rather than you ſhould run from your ſelfe to avoid them.

In all your recknings for the world, caſt up ſome croſſes that appeare not; either thoſe will come, or may: Let your ſuſpitions be charitable; your truſt fearfull; your cenſures ſure. Give way to the anger of the great: The thunder and cannon will abide no fence. As in throngs we are affraid of loſſe; ſo while the world comes upon you, looke well to your ſoule; There is more danger in good than in evill: I feare the number of theſe my rules; for Precepts are wont (as nailes) to drive out one another: but theſe, I intended to ſcatter amongſt many: and as I was loth that any gueſt ſhould complaine of a niggardly hand; Dainty diſhes are wont to be ſparingly ſerved out: homely ones ſupply in their bigneſſe, what they want in their worth.

TO THE RIGHT REVEREND FATHER IN GOD, AND MY VERY GOOD LORD,

THOMAS, Lord Biſhop of LONDON. I H. wiſheth all Grace and happineſſe.

RIght Reverend and Honourable:

I Know there is ſtore of Sermons extant: The Pulpit ſcarce affordeth more than the Preſſe. I adde to the number, and complaine not: in all good things, abundance is an eaſie burden. If the ſoule may feed it ſelfe with varietie, both by the eare, and by the eye, it hath no reaſon to finde fault with choyce. But if any weaker ſtomacke (as in our bodily Tables) ſhall feare to ſurfet at the ſight of too much, it is eaſie for that man to looke off, and to confine his eyes to ſome few: Who cannot much ſooner abate to himſelfe, than multiply to another? Let not his nice ſullenneſſe prejudice that delight and profit which may ariſe to others from this number. For mee, I dare not be ſo envious, as not to bleſſe God for this plenty, and ſeriouſly to rejoyce that Gods people may thus liberally feaſt themſelves by both their ſenſes: neither know I for whether more: The ſound of the word ſpoken pierceth more; the letter written endureth longer: the eare is taught more ſuddenly more ſtirringly; the eye with leiſure and continuance. According to my poore ability, I have desired to doe good both wayes; not so much fearing censures, as caring to edifie. This little labour submissely offers it selfe to your Lordship, as justly yours: being both preached at your call, and (as it were) in your charge, and by one under the charge of your fatherly jurisdiction, who unfainedly desires by all meanes to shew his true heart to Gods Church, together with his humble thankefulnesse to your Lordship: and professeth still to continue

Your Lordships in all humble

PHARISAISME AND CHRISTIANITIE.

MATTH. Chap. 5. Vers. 20.

Except your righteousnesse exceed the righteousnesse of the Scribes and Pharises, ye shall not enter into the Kingdome of Heaven.

THe curious Doctors of the Jewes had reduced all Gods statute-law to six hundred and thirteen precepts; so many as there are daies in the yeere, and members in the body. It was an honest and (which were strange) a Christian conceit of one of their Rabbins, that David abridges all these to eleven, in his Psalme 15. Esay to six, in his 33. 15. Michai yet lower to three; in his 6, 8. Esay yet againe to two, in his 56. 1. Habacuc to one, The just man shall live by faith. So yee see, the Law ends in the Gospell: and that Father said not amisse, The Law is the Gospell foretold; and the Gospell is the Law fulfilled. These two are the freehold of a Christian; and what but they?

Petr. Galatin. de arcan. fidei Cath. ad finem ex lib. Rab. Sbelomob.

The Jewes of these times perverted the Law, rejected the Gospell. Our Saviour therefore, that great Prophet of the world (as it was high time) clears the Law, delivers and settles the Gospell, well approving in both these, that he came not to consume, but to consummate the Law. Wherein (as Paul to his Corinths) he had a great doore, but many adversaries: amongst these were the great masters of Israel (so our Saviour tearms the Pharises) and their fellows (and yet their rivals) the Scribes: both so much harder to oppose, by how much their authority was greater.

Lex est Evangelium praedictum Evangelium lex completa.

Truth hath no roome till falshood be removed: Our Saviour therefore (as behoveth) first shewes the falshood of their Glosses, and the hollownesse of their profession: and if both their life and doctrine be naught, what free part is there in them? And loe both of these so faulty; that except your righteousnesse exceed the righteousnesse of the Scribes and Pharises, ye shall not enter into the kingdome of heaven.

1 Cor. 16. 9. John 3. Art thou a Master in Israel?

What were the men? What was their righteousnesse? What wanted it? Follow me, I beseech you, in these three: and if my discourse shall seem, for a while, more thorny and perplexed, remedie it with your attention.

Those things which are out of the ken of sense or memory, must be fetcht from Story. The Sect (or order whether) of the Pharises ceased with the Temple, since that, no man reads of a Pharise; and now is grown so farre out of knowledge, that the modern Jewes are more ready to learn of us who they were: There is no point, wherein it is more difficult to avoid variety, yea ostentatiō of reading, without any curious traversing

traverſing of opinions, I ſtudy for ſimple truth, as one that will not lead you out of the rode-way to ſhew you the turnings. Scribes were ancient; Ezra is called (Sopher mahir) a prompt Scribe. As long before him, ſo ever ſince they continued till Chriſts time; but in two ranks; ſome were [illegible], others [illegible]: Some popular, others legall; Some the peoples; others, Gods; the one, Secretaries, Recorders, Notaries as 2 Chron. 24. 11. (Sopher hamelec) the Kings Scribe: The other Doctors of the Law of God: The Law of the Lord is with us, in vain made he it, the pen of the Scribe is in vain.

Ezr. 6. 7.

Jer. 8. 8.

As the Phariſes were [illegible], Law maſters: ſo theſe are the ſame which Luke 11. 45. are called (νομικοὶ) interpreters of the Law. Thereto ſome not meane Criticks it ſeemes theſe ſhould be a third ſort; which conſider not that our Saviour on purpoſe addreſſing his ſpeech to the phariſee, fell by the way upon the Scribes and being admoniſhed by one of them, as of an over-ſight, now avers right downe of the Scribes, what before he had but indifferently glanced at. What they were, is plaine by Ezra pulpit, and Moſes his chaire. Theſe and Phariſes differed not ſo much; they agreed in ſome good, but in more evill. But the profeſſion of Phariſes, becauſe it is more obſcure, you ſhall give me leave to fetch ſomewhat further.

Ante adventum Chriſti, non tot & tam blaſphemæ hæreſes. Ire. lib. 5.*

There were, ſaith old Egeſippus (as Euſebius citeth him) divers opinions in the Circumciſion; which all croſſed the Tribe of Juda: Eſſens, Galileans, Emerobaptiſts, Maſbotheans, Samaritans, Phariſes, Sadduces. It were eaſie to help him with more, Sabuæans, Cannæans, Sampſæans; and if need were, yet more. Where are thoſe waverers, that ſtagger in their truſt to the Church, becauſe of different opinions, receiving that rotten argument of profane Celſus againſt the Chriſtians? Say the Papiſts, one ſaith I am Calvins, another, I am Luthers. We diſclaime, we defie theſe titles, theſe diviſions: we are one in truth: would God we were yet more one: It is the lace and fringe of Chriſts garment that is queſtioned amongſt us, the cloth is ſound. But what? was the Jewiſh Church before Chriſt, Gods true Church or not? If it were not, which was it? If it were: ſo that here rent in more than eight parts, and one of them differing from it ſelfe in eighteen opinions: and yet as Irenæus well obſerves, Before Chriſt, theſe were neither ſo many hereſies, nor ſo blaſphemous.

Shew me a Church on earth without theſe wrinkles of diviſion, and I will never ſeek for it in heaven: although to ſome, Phariſaiſme ſeems rather a ſeverall order, than a ſect: but S. Luke that knew it better, hath (αἵρεσις τῶν) the ſect of the Phariſes. When the profeſſion began, no hiſtory recordeth. Some would faine fetch them eſay 65. 5. Touch me not I am holier than thou. But theſe ſtraine too farre; for in the verſe before, the ſame men eate ſwines fleſh; which to the Phariſes is more than piaculi. Heare briefly their name, their originall, their office. Their name (though it might admit of other probable derivations, yet) by conſent of all *Hebrew Doctors (I have a great author for it) is fetcht from ſeparation; tho upon what grounds, all agree not, doubtleſſe for the perfection of their doctrine, and auſterity of life. Their originall is more intricate; which after ſome ſcanning, I have thus learned of ſome great Maſters of Jewiſh Antiquities. Before there was any open breach in the old Jewiſh Church, there were two generall and divers conceits about Gods ſervice: One that tooke up onely with the law of God; and if they could keepe that, thought they needed no more; neither would they ſapere ſupra ſcriptum, be wiſer than their Maker: Theſe were called (Karraim) of which ſort there are divers at this day in Conſtantinople, and otherwhere at deadly feod with the other Jewes, which they now call Rabbiniſts.

*In eam conſentiunt omnes Hebræi, teſte Babai. Haruch. Pagnin. in ברש Ar. Montanus Joſ. Scal I. Druſius, &c.

The other, that thought it ſmall thanks to doe only what they were bidden; Gods Law was too ſtraight for their holineſſe: It was nothing, unleſſe they did more than content God, earne him (for theſe were popiſh Jewes) and ſupererrogate of him. Theſe were therfore called Chaſidim, Holy, above the Law. They plied God with unbidden oblations, gave more than needed, did more than was commanded; yet ſo, as both parts pleaſed themſelves, reſiſted not the other. The more franke ſort upbraided not the other with too much niggardlineſſe; neither did the ſtraiter-handed envy the other for too much laviſhneſſe. Would God we could doe thus. They agreed, though they differed. But now, when theſe voluntary ſervices began to be drawn into Canons (as Scaliger ſpeaketh) and that which was before but arbitrary, was impoſed as necessary, (necessary for beliefe, necessary for action) questions arose, and the rent began in the Jewes. Those dogmaticall Doctors which stood for supererogation, and traditions above Law, were called (Perushim) Pharisees; separate from the other in strict judgement, in superfluous holinesse: These, as they were the brood of those (Chasidim) whom we finde first mentioned in the Machabees, by the corrupt name of Asidæans; so from them againe, in a second succession proceeded (as their more refined issue) the Essens, both Collegiate and Eremiticall: These Pharisees then, were a fraternity or Colledge of extraordinary devotion; whose rule was tradition, whose practice voluntary austerenesse: To them the Scribes joyned themselves, as the purer Jews; for Paul calls them [ακριβεστάτην αἵρεσιν] the most exquisite sect; yea, and (as Josephus) the best expositors; willingly expounding the law according to their Traditions, and countenancing their traditions by the forced senses of the Law. Both which professions were greatly inlarged and graced by two famous Doctors, Sammai and Hillel (whom some, though falsly, would have the founders of them) not long before Christs time; for old Hillel of a 120 yeers, protracted his daies by likely computation, to ten yeers after Christs birth. How Hierom fetcheth their names with more wittines than probabilitie, from Dissipating & Prophaning the Law; and what bickerings & deadly quarrels were even amongst themselves in those two famous houses; and what were the foure expositions of the Law which they followed; I list not now to discourse. Their imploiment was, expounding the Law, and urging Traditions, therefore their auditors had wont to say, when they called one another to Church (as S. Hierome tels us) [εἰς σοφοὺς ἀναγνῶν] The wise, that is, the Pharises, expound to day. Whence perhaps, that may be interpreted of S. Paul to the Corinths, Where is the wise? where is the Scribe? So did the Scribes too; but the difference was, that the Scribes were more Textuall, the Pharisees more Traditionall: therefore observe, that the Scribe finds fault with the suspition of blasphemy: the Pharise, with unwashen hands: the Scribes (their Doctors) excell'd for learning, the Pharisees for piety. Their attire was the same, and their fashions: but the Pharisees had [πλατύτερα κράσπεδα] more fimbriæ; and were more strict and Cappucine-like; professed more yeeres continency; and in a word, took more paines to goe to hell. These did so carry away the hearts of the Jewes, that there was no holy man, which was not tearmed a Pharisee; and therefore among the seven kindes of Pharisees in their Talmud, they make Abraham a Pharise of Love, Job a Pharise of Feare. And if from the men you cast your eyes upon their righteousnesse, you cannot but wonder at the curiositie of their zeale. Wherein look (I beseech you) first at their devotion, then their holy carriage, lastly their strict observation of the Law.

Such was their devotion, that they prayed [τρισσάκις] as a Father saith, oft and long: thrice a day was ordinary; at nine, twelve, and three a clocke: yea their progenitors (whom they would scorne not to match) divided the day into three parts; whereof one was bestowed on prayer, the next on the Law, the third on their work. See here, God had two parts of three, themselves but one: besides at their meales what strictnesse!

Their very disciples were taught (of shame to Christians) if they had forgotten to give thanks, to returne from the field to the boord to say grace. For divine service; the Decalogue must be read once a day of every man: the Scribes say the first watch: the Pharisees, any houre of the night: others, twice; without moving eye, hand, foot, in a cleane place, free from any excrement, and foure cubits distant from any the next there. For fasting, they did it twice a week; not popishly (which Tertullian justly calls Foole-fasting) but in earnest; on Monday and Thursday. Besides (to adde their almes, which were every way proportionable to the rest) what miserable penance did they wilfully? They beat their heads against the walls, as they went, till blood came: whence one of their seven Pharisees is called (κονιορτοῦς) a Pharisee that beats out the dust: they put thornes in their Skirts; to sting themselves: they lay on planks, on stones, on thornes: and Epiphan. that Heretoiricall Pharise drenched himselfe ofte, night and day, in cold water [ψυχρολουσίαις] for chastity; or (if you read it without aspiration) it signifies for folly rather; what could that apish and frantick Father have done either more or worse? This was their devotion. The holinesse of their carriage was such, that that they avoided every thing that might carry any doubt of pollution: they would not therefore converſe with any different religion; and this Law went currant amongſt them: He that eats aSamaritans bread, he as he that eats ſwines fleſh. An Hebrew Midwife might not helpe a Gentile; not bookes, not wax, not incenſe, might be ſold to them: yea, no familiarity might be ſuffered with their own vulgar. For whereas there were three ranks among the Jewes; the wiſe (thoſe were the Phariſes) their Diſciples, & the populus terræ, (as they called them) this was one of the ſix reproaches to a novice of the Phariſes, To eat with the vulgar ſort: and leſt (when they had been abroad) they ſhould have been toucht by any, contrary to the warning of their phylacteries, they ſcoure themſelves at their return; and eat not, unleſſe they have waſht [πυγμῇ]: that is, accurately, as the Syriac; oft, as Eraſmus; or with the grip't fiſt, as Beza following Hierome. And not with every water (marke the niceneſſe) but with that onely which they had drawn up with their own labour: and to make up the meaſure of their pretended ſanctimony, they vowed continency, not perpetuall (as our Romaniſts urge) but for eight or tenne years. Thus they did unbidden. How ſtrictly did they performe what was injoyned? No men ſo exact in their tithes: I pay tithes of all, ſaith the boaſting Phariſe: Of all (as a great Doctor noteth) it was more than he needed. God would have a Sabbath kept; they over-keep it. They would not on that day ſtop a running veſſell, not lay an apple to the fire, not quench a burning, not knock on a table to ſtill a childe: what ſhould I note more? not rub or ſcratch in publike. God commands them to weare (Totaphoth) Phylacteries: they doe (which our Saviour reproves) [μαγαλύνουσι] enlarge them: and theſe muſt be written with right lines in a whole parchment of the hide of a cleane beaſt. God commands to celebrate and roſt the Paſſeover; they will have it done (in an exceſſe of care) not with an iron, but a wooden ſpit, and curiouſly chuſe the wood of Pomegranate: God commanded to avoide Idolatry; they taught their Diſciples, if an Image were in the way, to fetch about ſome other; and if they muſt needs goe that way, to runne: and if a thorne ſhould light in their foot (neere to the place) not kneele, but ſit downe and pull it out, leſt they ſhould ſeeme to give it reverence. I weary you with theſe Jewiſh niceties. Conſider then how devout, how liberall, how continent, how true dealing, how zealous, how ſcrupulous, how auſtere theſe men were, and ſee if it be not a wonder that our Saviour thus brandeth them; Except your righteouſneſſe exceed the righteouſneſſe of the Scribes and Phariſes, ye ſhall not enter into the Kingdom of Heaven: That is, If your doctrine be not more righteous, you ſhall not be entred of the Church: if your holineſſe be not more perfect, you ſhall not enter into heaven: behold, Gods Kingdome below and above is ſhut upon them.

The poore Jewes were ſo beſotted with the admiration of theſe two, that they would have thought if but two men muſt goe to heaven, the one ſhould be a Scribe, the other a Phariſe. What ſtrange news was this from him that kept the keyes of David, that neither of them ſhould come there? It was not the perſon of theſe men, not their learning, not wit, not eloquence, not honour they admired ſo much, but their righteouſneſſe: and loe nothing but their righteouſneſſe is cenſured: Herein they ſeemed to exceed all men: herein all that would be ſaved, muſt exceed them. Doe but thinke how the amazed multitude ſtared upon our Saviour, when they heard this Paradox: Exceed the Phariſes in righteouſneſſe? It were much for an Angell from heaven. What ſhall the poore ſonnes of the earth doe, if theſe worthies be turned away with a repulſe? yea perhaps, your ſelves, all that heare me this day, receive this not without aſtoniſhment and feare, while your conſciences ſecretly comparing your holineſſe with theirs, finde it to come as much ſhort of theirs, as theirs of perfection. And would to God you could feare more, and be more amazed with this compariſon, for (to ſet you forward) muſt we exceed them, or elſe not be ſaved? If we let them exceed us, what hope, what poſſibility is there of our ſalvation? Ere we therefore ſhew how farre we muſt goe before them, looke backe with me (I beſeech you) a little, and ſee how farre we are behinde them.

They taught diligently, and kept Moſes his chaire warme: how many are there of us, whom the great Maſter of the Vineyard may finde loytering in this publike Market-place, market-place, and shake us by the shoulder with a Quid statis otiosi? Why stand you here idle?

They compast sea and land (Satans walke) to make a Proselyte: we sit still and freeze in our zeale, and lose Proselytes with our dull and wilfull neglect. They spent one quarter of the day in prayer: how many are there of us that would not thinke this an unreasonable service of God? We are so farre from this extreme devotion of the old Euchitæ, that we are rather worthy of a censure with those Spanish Priests for our negligence. How many of your Citizens can get leave of Mammon to bestow one houre of the day in a set course, upon God? How many of you Lawyers, are first clients to God, ere you admit others, clients to you? How many of you have your thoughts fixed in Heaven, ere they be in Westminster? Alas, what dulnesse is this? what injustice? All thy houres are his, and thou wilt not lend him one of his owne for thine own good. They read, they recited the Law, (some) twice a day; never went without some parts of it about them: but to what effect? There is not one of our people (saith Josephus) but answers to any question of the Law as readily as his owne name. How shall their diligence upbraid, yea condemne us? Alas! how doe our Bibles gather dust for want of use, while our Chronicle, or our Statute-booke, yea perhaps our idle and scurrilous play-bookes, are worn with turning? Oh how happy were our fore-fathers (whose memory is blessed for ever) if they could with much cost, and more danger get but one of Pauls Epistles in their bosomes; how did they hugge it in their armes, hide it in their chest, yea in their hearts! How did they eat, walk, sleep, with that sweet companion, and in spight of persecution, never thought themselves well, but when they conversed with it in secret! Loe now these shops are all open, we buy them not; these books are open, we read them not, and we will be ignorant because we will. The Sunne shines and we shut our windowes. It is enough for the miserable Popish Laitie to be thus dark, that live in the perpetuall night of Inquisition. Shall this be the only difference betwixt them and us; that they would read these holy leaves, and may not; we may, and will not? There is no ignorance, to the wilfull. I stand not upon a formall and verball knowledge: that was never more frequent, more flourishing. But if the maine grounds of Christianitie were throughly setled in the hearts of the multitude, we should not have so much cause of shame and sorrow, nor our adversaries of triumph and insultation. Shew lesse therefore for Gods sake, and learn more; and ballace your wavering heart with the sound truth of godlinesse, that you may flie steadily through all the tempests of errours. Make Gods Law of your learned counsell with David, and be happy. Else if you will needs love darknesse, you shall have enough of it: you have here inward darknesse, there outward (σκότος ἐξώτερον) This is your own darknesse, that his of whom the Psalmist; He sent darknesse, and it was darke: Dark indeed: A thicke and terrible darknesse, joyned with weeping and gnashing. I urge not their awfull reverence in their devotion, our sleepy or wilde carelesnesse; their austere and rough discipline of the body, our wanton pampering of the flesh; though who can abide to thinke of a chaste Pharise, and a filthy Christian? a temperate Pharise, and a drunken Christian? how shamefully is this latter vice (especially) grown upon us with time? we knew it once in our ordinary speech appropriated to beggers, now gallants fight for it. This beastlinesse had wont be bashfull, now it is impudent; once children were wont to shout at a drunkard (as some foule wonder) now not to be drunk is quarrell enough among men, among friends: Those knees, that we were wont to bow to the God of Heaven, are now bent to Bacchus, in a Paganish, bestiall, devillish devotion. To leave the title of Christians, for shame let us be either men, or beasts. My speech hastens to their holy and wise strictnesse of carriage; wherein I can never complaine enough of our inequalitie: They hated the presence, the fire, the fashion, the bookes of a Gentile, of a Samaritane; neither was there any hatred lost on the Samaritanes parts; for if he had but toucht a Jew, he would have thrown himselfe into the water, cloaths and all: both of them equally sick of a Noli me tangere; Touch me not, for I am holier, Esay 65.

Our Romish Samaritanes haunt our tables, our closets, our eares; we frown not, we dislike not: We match, converse, conferre, consult with them carelesly, as if it were were come to the old ſtay of that indifferent Apelles in Euſebius; Sat eſt credere in crucifixũ: but that which I moſt lament, and yee, Fathers and Brethren, if my voyce may reach to any whom it concerneth, in the bowels of Chriſt let me bo'dly (though moſt unworthy) move your wiſdoms, your care to redreſſe it. Our young ſtudents (the hope of poſterity) newly crept out of the ſhell of philoſophy, ſpend their firſt houres in the great Doctors of Popiſh controverſies; Bellarmine is next to Ariſtotle: yea, our very ungrounded Artizans, young Gentlemen, fraile Women, buy, reade, traverſe promiſcuouſly the dangerous writings of our ſubtileſt Jeſuites. What is the iſſue? Many of them have taken poyſon, ere they know what milke is; and when they have once taſted this bane, they muſt drinke and die. Oh what pity, what vexation is it to a true heart, to ſee us thus rob'd of our hopes; them of their ſoules! I have heard, yea I have ſeene and envied the cautelous ſeveritie of our adverſaries, which upon the deepeſt paines forbid the ſale, yea the ſight of thoſe Authors, which they terme infectious; where was ever Calvin publikely bought in one of their Church-yards? where ever read without licence, without ſecurity? I cenſure not this as the peculiar fault of this place: would God this open remiſneſſe were not a common evill, and had not ſpred it ſelfe wide through all thoſe Churches that are gone out of Babylon. Let no man tell me of the diſtinction of that old Canoniſt: Some things (ſaith he) we reade leſt they ſhould be neglected, as the Bible; ſome, leſt they ſhould be unknown, as Arts & Philoſophy; ſome, that they may be rejected, as Hereticall books. True; But let them reade that can reject, that can confute; we diſtruſt not our cauſe, but their weake judgements. A good Apothecarie can make a good medicine of a ſtrong poyſon; muſt children therefore be allowed that box? I know how unworthy I am to adviſe; only I throw down my ſelfe at your feet, and beſeech you, that our loſſes and their examples may make us no leſſe wiſe in our generation.

Matth. 23.13.

I follow the compariſon; They paid tithes of all they had: not a pot-herbe, but they tithed it. Heare this ye ſacrilegious Patrons, the Merchants of ſoules, the Pirats of the Church, the enemies of Religion; they tithed all; you nothing; they paid to their Levites, your Levites muſt pay to you: Your Cures muſt be purchaſed, your tithes abated, or compounded for: O the ſhame of Religion! How too juſtly may I uſurpe of you that of Seneca? Pettie ſacrileges are puniſhed, while great ones ride in triumph. Never excuſe it with pretence of Ceremony; Moſes never gave ſo ſtrict a charge for this, as Paul [κοινωνείτω δὲ ὁ κατηχούμενος] communicate all thy goods with thy Teacher, all, with an emphaſis. Well-fare yet the honeſt Phariſes, whoſe rule was (Decimas dives fias) Tithe and be rich: If ever thou be fatter for this gravell, or the richer with that thou ſtealeſt from God, let me come to begge at thy doore.

Gal. 6.6.

Woe to you ſpirituall Robbers. Our blind fore-fathers clothed the Church; you deſpoile it: their ignorant devotion ſhall riſe in judgement againſt your ravening covetouſneſſe. If robbery, ſimony, perjury will not carry you to hell; hope ſtill that you may be ſaved. They gave plentifull almes to the poore: we inſtead of filling their bellies, grinde their faces. What excellent Lawes had we lately enacted that there ſhould be no begger in Iſrael? Let our ſtreets, wayes, hedges, witneſſe the execution. Thy liberality relieves ſome poore. It is well. But hath not thine oppreſſion made more? Thy uſury, extorting, racking, incloſing, hath wounded whole Villages, and now thou befriendeſt two or three with the plaiſters of thy bounty. The mercies of the wicked are cruell. They were preciſe in their Sabbath; we ſo looſe in ours, as if God had no day: See whether our Tavernes, ſtreets, high-waies deſcry any great difference. Theſe things I vowed in my ſelfe to reprove, if too bitterly, (as you thinke) pardon (I beſeech you) this holy impatience: and blame the foulneſſe of theſe vices, not my juſt vehemency. And you (Chriſtian hearers) than which no name can be dearer, be perſwaded to ranſack your ſecure hearts; and if there be any of you whoſe awaked conſcience ſtrikes him for theſe ſins, and places him below theſe Jewes in this unrighteouſneſſe, if you wiſh or care to be ſaved, thinke it high time, as you would ever hope for entrance into Gods Kingdome, to ſtrike your ſelves on the thigh, and with amazement and indignation to ſay, what have I done? to abandon your wicked courſes; to reſolve, to vow, to ſtrive unto a Chriſtian and conſcionable reformation.

Paul,

Paul, a Pharise, was according to the righteousnesse of the Law unreproveable: yet if Paul had not gone from Gamaliels feet, to Christs, he had never been saved. Unreproveable, and yet rejected? Alas, my brethren, what shall become of our gluttony, drunkennesse, pride, oppression, bribing, cousenages, adultries, blasphemies, and our selves for them? God and men reprove us for these; what shall become of us? If the civilly righteous shall not be saved, where shall the notorious sinner appeare? A Christian below a Jew? For shame, where are we? where is our emulation? Heaven is our Goale, we all run; loe the Scribes and Pharises are before thee; what safety can it be to come short of those that come short of heaven? Except your righteousnesse, &c.

Phil. 3.

You have seen these Scribes and Pharises; their righteousnesse and our unrighteousnesse. See now with like patience, their unrighteousnesse that was, and our righteousnesse that must be, wherein they failed, and we must exceed. They failed then in their Traditions and Practice. May I say they failed, when they exceeded? Their Traditions exceeded in number and profecution, faulty in matter.

To run well, but out of the way (according to the Greeke Proverbe) is not better than to stand still. Fire is an excellent thing: but if it be in the top of the chimney, it doth mischiefe rather. It is good to be zealous in spight of all scoffes, but [in vain] in a good thing. If they had been as hot for God, as they were for themselves, it had been happy: but now in vaine they worship me (saith our Saviour) teaching for doctrine the Traditions of men. Hence was that axiome received currantly amongst their Jewish followers: There is more in the words of the wise than in the words of the Law: More; that is, more matter, more authority: and from this principally arises and continues that mortall quarrell betwixt them and their (Karraim) and (Minim) unto this day. A great Jesuite (at least that thinks himselfe so) writes thus in great earnest: The Pharisee (saith he) may not unfitly be compared to our Catholikes. Some men speak truth ignorantly, some unwillingly; Caiaphas never spake truer, when he meant it not: one egge is not liker to another, than the Tridentine Fathers to these Pharises in this point, besides that of free-will, merit, full performance of the Law, which they absolutely received from them: For marke, With the same reverence and devotion doe wee receive and respect Traditions, that we doe the Bookes of the Old and New Testament, say those Fathers in their fourth Session: Heare both of these speake, and see neither: if thou canst discerne whether is the Pharise, refuse me in a greater truth. Not that we did ever say with that Arrian in Hilary: We debarre all words that are not written: or would thinke fit with those phanaticall Anabaptists of Munster, that all bookes should be burnt besides the Bible: some Traditions must have place in every Church; but, Their place: they may not take wall of Scripture: Substance may not in our valuation give way to circumstance, God forbid. If any man expect that my speech on this opportunity should descend to the discourse of our contradicted ceremonies, let him know that I had rather mourne for this breach than meddle with it. God knowes how willingly I would spend my selfe into persuasions, if those would availe any thing: but I well see that tears are fitter for this Theme than words. The name of our Mother is sacred, and her peace precious. As it was a true speech cited from that Father by Bellarmine: The war of Heretikes is the peace of the Church: so would God our experience did not inverst upon us: The war of the Church is the peace of Heretikes. Our discord is their musicke; our ruine their glory: Oh what a sight is this, Brethren strive, while the enemy stands still, and laughs and triumphs. If we desired the griefe of our common mother, the languishing of the Gospell, the extirpation of Religion, the losse of posterity, the advantage of our adversaries, which way could these be better effected than by our dissentions? That Spanish Prophet in our Age (for so I finde him stiled) when King Philip asked him how he might become master of the Low-Countries, answered: If he could divide them from themselves; According to that old Machivellian principle of our Jesuites, Divide and Rule. And indeede it is concord onely (as the Poesie or Mot of the united States runs) which hath upheld them in a rich and flourishing estate against so great and potent enemies. Our Adversaries already brag of their victories: and what good heart can but bleed to see what they have gained since we dissented; to foresee what they will gaine? They are our mutuall spoiles that have made them proud and rich. If you ever therefore look to see the good daies of the Gospell, the unhorsing and confusion of that strumpet of Rome, for Gods sake, for the Churches sake, for our own soules sake, let us all compose our selves to peace and love: Oh pray for the peace of Jerusalem: that peace may be within her walls, and prosperitie within her palaces.

Nostra miseria tu es magnus de Pomp. Mimus.

For the matter of their Traditions, our Saviour hath taxed them in many particulars; about washings, oathes, offerings, retributions: whereof he hath said enough when he hath tearmed their doctrine, the Leaven of the Pharisies, that is, sowre and swelling. S. Hierome reduces them to two heads: They were Turpia anilia; some so shamefull that they might not be spoken; others idle and dotish; both so numerous that they cannot be reckoned. Take a taste for all; and to admit their reall Traditions, heare some of their interpretative. The Law was, that no Leper might come into the Temple; their Tradition was, if he were let down thorow the roofe, this were no irregularity. The Law was, a man might not carry a burthen on the Sabbath: their Traditionall glosse; if he carried ought on one shoulder, it was a burthen; if on both, none. If shooes alone, no burthen; if with nailes, not tolerable. Their limit of a Sabbaths journey was a thousand cubits; their glosse was, That this is to be understood without the walls: but if a man should walke all day through a City as bigge as Nineve, he offends not. The Church of Rome shall vie strange glosses and ceremonious observations with them, whether for number or for ridiculousnesse. The day would faile mee if I should either epitomize the volume of their holy rites, or gather up those which it hath omitted. The new elected Pope in his solemne Lateran procession must take copper money out of his Chamberlaines lap, and scatter it among the people, and say; Gold and Silver have I none. Seven years penance is injoyned to a deadly sinne; because Miriam was separated seven dayes for her leprosie; and God sayes to Ezekiel, I have given thee a day for a year. Christ said to Peter, Launch forth into the deep: therefore he meant that Peters successor should catch the great fish of Constantines donation. But I favour your eares. That one I may not omit, how S. Hierome, whom they fondly terme their Cardinall, compares some Popish fashions of his time with the Pharisaicall; who when he had spoken of their purple fringes in the foure corners of their (Tallith) and the thornes which these Rabbins tye in their skirts, for pennance, and admonition of their duty: Hoc apud nos (saith he) superstitiosæ mulierculæ in parvulis Evangeliis, in crucis ligno & ejusmodi rebus faciunt: That is, Thus superstitious old wives doe amongst us with little Gospels of Joh. with the wood of the Crosse, and the like. Thus that Father directly taxeth this Romish use: who if he were now alive, and should heare their Church groaning under the number of Ceremonies more than the Jewish, would (besides holy Austins complaint) redouble that censure of our Saviours, Woe to you Scribes, Pharisies, hypocrites: for ye binde heavy burthens and grievous to be borne, and lay them on mens shoulders. I forbeare to speak of the erroneous opinions of these Jewish Masters concerning that Pythagorian transanimation or passage of the soule from one body to another (a point which the Jewes had learned from them, Matth. 16. 14.) concerning the not rising up of the wicked, Astronomicall destiny, free will, merit of works, perfection of obedience, in every of which it were easie to lose my self, and my speech. I haste to their maine unrighteousnesse; which was not so much the planting of these stocks, which God never set, as the grafting of all holines & Gods service, upon them; a fashionable observation of the outward letter, with neglect of the true substance of the Law; a vaine-glorious ostentation of piety and perfection; and more care to be thought, than to be good; a greater desire to be great, than good; cruelty and oppression coloured with devotion. My speech now towards the closure shall draw it selfe up within these two lists, of their Hypocrisie, their Worldlinesse: Hypocrisie in Fashionablenesse and Ostentation; Worldlinesse in Covetousnesse, Ambition. Only stirre up your selves a while, and suffer not your Christian attention to faile in this last act.

Some of their Rabbins say well, that God requires two things concerning his law, Custodie and Worke. Custodie in the heart; worke in the execution: These unfound and overly Pharises did neither. It was enough if they kept the Law in their hands; so they had a formall shew of godlinesse, it was enough: if the outside of the platter were cleane, they cared for no more. God had charged them to binde the Law to their hand, and before their eyes, Deut. 6. wherein, as Jerome and Theophylact well interpret it, he meant the meditation and practice of his Law: they, like unto the foolish Patient, which when the Physitian bids him take that prescript, eat up the paper; if they could get but a list of parchment upon their left arm next their heart, and another scroll to sit upon their forehead, and foure corners of fringe, or (if these be denied) a red threed in their hand, thought they might say with Saul, Blessed be thou of the Lord, I have done the commandment of the Lord. This Opus operatum of the Papists (for I still parallel them) is no more true, I mine then false Divinity: it is not the outside of thy obedience that God cares for, if never so holy, never so glorious; it is enough that men are cousened with those flourishes: the heart and the reins are those that God looks after. What cares a good marker, man how good the fleece be, when the liver is rotten? God doth not regard the fashion so much as the stuffe. Thou deceivest thy selfe, if thou thinke those shewes that blesse the eyes of the world, can deceive him. God shall smite thee thou whited wall, God shall smite thee. Doest thou thinke hee sees not how smoothly thou hast dawbed on thine whorish complexion? He sees thee a far off, and hates thee while thy parasites applaud thy beauty. I speake not of this carrion-flesh which thou wantonly infectest with the false colours of thy price, which God shal once wash off with rivers of brimstone: I speake of thy painted soule, and thy counterfeit obedience. Give me leave (yea let mee take it) to complaine that wee are fallen into a cold and hollow age, wherein the religion of many is but fashion, and their piety gilded superstition. Men care onely to seeme Christians; if they can get Gods livery on their backs, and his name in their mouthes, they out-face all reproofes. How many are there, which if they can keep their Church, give an almes, bow their knee, say their prayers, pay their tithes, and once a yeare receive the Sacrament (it matters not how corrupt hearts, how filthy tongues, how false hands they bee are) can say in their hearts with Esau, I have enough my brother? As if God cared for this thy vaine formality; as if he hated thee not so much more than a pagan, by how much thou wouldst seeme more good. Be not deceived: if long devotions, sad lookes, hard penances, bountifull almes, would have carried it (without the solid substance of godlinesse) these Scribes and Pharises had never beene shut out of heaven. Consider this therefore (deare brethen) none but your own eyes can looke into your breasts: we see your faces, the world sees your lives; if your lives be not holy, your hearts sound, though your faces were like Angels, you should have your portion with Devils. Tell not me thou hearest, prayest, talkest, believest: How livest thou? What doest thou? Shew me thy faith by thy works, saith James. It was an excellent answer that good Master gave to Lucius in the Church-story: The faith that is seen, is better than the faith that is heard; and that of Luther not inferiour, that faith doth not onely seem openly good, but well-liking with good works. It is a leane starved carcasse of faith thou pretendest without these. If profession be all, the Scribes and Pharises are before thee. Ransack thy heart, and finde sound affection to God; firme resolutions to goodnesse, true hatred of sinne: ransacke thy life, and finde the truth of works, the life of obedience; then alone thy righteousnesse exceeds the righteousnesse of the Scribes and Pharises, and thou shalt enter into Heaven. Their ostentation follows; wherein it is strange to consider, how those that cared not to be good, should desire yet to seem good: so did these Pharises. They would not fast without a smeared face, not give an almes without a trumpet, not pray without witnesses. Scribes, Pharises, hypocrites. They did act a religious part, they did but play devotion. They were nothing beside the stage: all for sight, nothing for substance. Would God this vice of hypocrisie had either died with them, or had only hereditarily descended to their successors. Satan will not let us be thus happy. I see no mans heart: but I dare boldly say, the world is full of hypocrisie. By their fruits ye shall know them (saith our Saviour:) By their fruits; not by the blossomes of good purposes, nor the leaves of good profes-lion, but by the fruit of their actions. Not to ſpeak how our mint and cummin hath incroched upon judgement and juſtice: Search your ſelves (yee Citizens:) now you draw neer to God with your lips, with your eares, where is your heart? Here your devout attention ſeemes to cry, The Lord is God: how many are there of you, that have any God at home? how many that have a falſe God? God at Church; Mammon in your ſhops? I ſpeak not of all: God forbid. This famous City hath in the darkeſt, in the wanteneſt times, afforded (and ſo doth) many, that have done God honour, honeſty to the Goſpell. But how many are there of you that under ſmooth faces have foule conſciences? faire words, falſe meaſures, forſworn valuations, adulterate wares, griping uſuries, have filled many of your coffers, and feſtered your ſoules: You know this, and yet like a ſlouenly Curtizan you wipe your mouthes, and it was not you. Your almes are written in Church-windowes, your defraudings in the ſand; all is good ſave that which appeares not. How many are there every where, that ſhame Religion by profeſſing it? whoſe beaſtly life makes Gods truth ſuſpected: for as, howſoever the Samaritan, not the Jew, relieved the diſtreſſed traveller, yet the Jewes religion was true, not the Samaritans; ſo in others, truth of cauſes muſt not be judged by acts of perſons; yet, as he ſaid, It muſt needs be good that Nero perſecutes; ſo who is not ready to ſay: It cannot be good that ſuch a miſcreant profeſſes? Wo to thee Hypocrite, thou canſt not touch, not name goodneſſe, but thou defileſt it; God will plague thee for acting ſo high a part: See what thou art, and hate thy ſelfe; or (if not that) yet ſee how God hates thee: he that made the heart, ſayes thou art no better than an handſome toombe, the houſe of death. Behold here a greene turfe, or ſmooth marble, or ingraven braſſe, and a commending Epitaph; all ſightly: but what is within? an unſavory, rotten carcaſſe. Though thou were wrapt in gold, and perfumed with never ſo loud prayers, holy ſemblances, honeſt proteſtations; yet thou art but noyſome carrion to God: Of all earthly things, God cannot abide thee; and if thou wouldſt ſee how much lower yet his deteſtation reacheth, know that when he would deſcribe the torments of Hell, he calls them (as their worſt title) but the portion of hypocrites. Wherefore cleanſe your hands yee ſinners, and purge your hearts yee double minded: For unleſſe your righteouſnes exceed the hypocriticall righteouſnes of the Scribes and Phariſes, yee ſhall not enter into the kingdome of Heaven.

and

Jam. 4. 8. ἁγνίσατε.

My ſpeech muſt end in their Covetouſneſſe and Ambition: A paire of hainous vices. I joyn them together: for they are not only brethren, but twins; yet ſo as the elder here alſo ſerves the younger. It is Ambition that blowes the fire of Covetouſneſſe. Oppreſſion gets wealth; that wealth may procure honour. Why doe men labour to be rich; but that they may be great? Their covetouſneſſe was ſuch, that their throat (an open ſepulchre) ſwallowed up whole houſes of Widowes. Whence their goods are called by our Saviour [τὰ ὑμῶν] not τὰ ὑμᾶ, as if they were already in their bowels: and which was worſt of all, while their lips ſeemed to pray, they were but chewing of that morſell. Their Ambition ſuch, that they womaniſhly brawled and ſhouldred for the beſt ſeat; the higheſt pew: A title, a wall, a chaire, a cap, a knee, theſe were goodly cares for them that profeſſed gravity, humility, mortification. Let me boldly ſay, Jeruſalem never yeelded ſo very Phariſes as Rome. Theſe old diſciples of Sammai and Hillel were not Phariſes in compariſon of our Jeſuites. From judgement (you ſee) I am deſcended to practice: wherein it is no leſſe eaſily made good that theſe are more kindly Phariſes, than the ancient. A poore Widowes Cottage filled the paunch of an old Phariſe; How many faire patrimonies of devout young Gentlemen * Druryed by them (pardon the word, it is their owne; the thing I know and can witneſſe) have gone downe the throat of theſe Loyoliſts, let their own Quodlibets and Catechiſme report. What ſpeake I of ſecular inheritances? Theſe eyes have ſeene no meane houſes of devotion and charity ſwallowed up by them-ὑποκρισεις ἡ ὑποκρισις. Matth. 23. 6.

Luke 13. 41.

* A word which the Seminaries report (in their Quodlibet) uſual amongſt them, to ſignifie beguiled and wiped of their inheritance: from the example of Mr. Henry Drury of Lowſhall in Suffolke, ſo diſputed by the Jeſuits. As at Winnoxberg in Flanders more Dunkirk, where a rich Legacie given by a charitable Lady for the building of an Hoſpitall, was cunningly turned to the maintenance of Jeſuits.

A As for their ambitious insinuations, not only all their own Religious enviously cry down, but the whole world sees and rings of. What oare of State can stir without their rowing? What Kingdome either stands or falls without their intermedling? What noble Familie complaines not of their proling and stealth? And all this with a sterne face of sad pietie and sterne mortification. Yea what other is their great Master, but the King of Pharisees? who, under a pretence of simple pietie, challenges without shame to have devoured the whole Christian world, the naturall inheritances of secular Princes, by the foisted name of Peters patrimony, and now in most infamous and shameless ambition, calls great Emperours to his stirrup, yea to his foot-stoole. But what wander we so farre from home? Væ nobis miseris (saith St. Jerome) ad quos Phariseorũ vitia transierunt, (Woe to us wretched men, to whom the Pharises vices are derived.) The great Doctor of the Gentiles long agoe said, All seek their own and
B not the things of God; and is the world mended with age? would God we did not find it a sure rule; that (as it is in this little world) the older it growes, the more diseased, the more covetous: we are all too much the true sonnes of our great grand-mother, and have each of us an Eves sweet-tooth in our heads, we would be more than we are: & every man would be either (m) or (i) either the man, or some-body. If a number of your consciences were ript, O yee that would be Christian Gentlemen, Lawyers, Citizens, what doe we think would be found in your mawes? Here the devoured patrimony of poore Orphans; there the commons of whole Townships: here the impropriate goods of the Church; there piles of usury: here bribes and unlawfull fees; there the raw and indigested gobbets of Simony: yea, would God I might not say, but I must say it, with feare, with sorrow, even of our sacred and divine profession,
C that which our Saviour of his twelve, Yee are cleane, but not all. The multitude of our unregarded Charges, and soules dying and starved, for want of spirituall provision, (while they give us bodily) would condemn my silence for too partiall. In all conditions of men (for particulars are subject to envy and exception) the daughters of the horse-leach had never such a fruitfull generation: They cry still, Give, Give: not give alone, that is, the bread of sufficiencie; but Give, Give; that is, more than enough. But what is more than enough? What is but enough? What is not too little for the insatiable gulfe of humane desires? Every man would ingrosse the whole world to himselfe, and with that ambitious Conquerour feares it will be too little: and how few * Agurs are there, that pray against too much? From hence it is, that yee Courtiers grate upon poore Trades with hard monopolies. Hence, yee Merchants load them with deep and unreasonable prices, and make them pay deare for dayes.
D Hence ye great men wring the poore sponges of the Commonaltie into your private purses, for the maintenance of pride and excesse. Hence yee cormorant corne-mongers hatch up a dearth in the time of plenty. God sends graine, but many times the Devill sends garners. The earth hath been no niggard in yeelding: but you have beene lavish in transporting, and close in concealing. Never talke of our extreme frosts: wee see Gods hand, and kisse the rod; but if your hearts,
E your charitie, were not more frozen than ever the earth was, meane Housekeepers should not need to beg, nor the meanest to starve for want of bread. Hence lastly, our loud oppressions of all sorts cry to heaven, and are answered with threats, yea with varitie of vengeances. Take this with thee yet, O thou worldling, which hast the greedy-worme under thy tongue with Esaies dogges, and never hast enough; Thou shalt meet with two things as unsatiable as thy selfe; the Grave and Hell: and thou, whom all the world could not satisfie, there be two things whereof thou shalt have enough: Enough mould in the Grave, enough fire in hell.

I love not to end with a judgement; and as it were to let my Sunne set in a cloud. Wee are all Christians, we should know the World what it is, how vaine, how transitory, how worthlesse. We know where there are better things, which we professe our selves made for, and aspiring to: Let us use the world like it self, and leave this importunate wooing of it, to Heathens and Infidels, that know no other Heaven, no other God. Or if you like that counsell better; Be covetous, Be ambitious; Covet spirituall

THE PASSION SERMON. PREACHED AT PAULS CROSSE ON GOOD-FRIDAY. April 14. 1609.

By Jos. Hall.

¶ Imprinted at LONDON. 1642.

TO THE ONELY HONOUR AND GLORY OF GOD MY DEARE AND BLESSED SAVIOUR (WHICH HATH DONE AND SUFFERED ALL THESE THINGS FOR MY SOULE,)

HIS WEAKE AND UNWORTHY SERANT HUMBLY DESIRES TO CONSECRATE HIMSELFE AND HIS POORE LABOURS: BESEECHING HIM TO ACCEPT AND BLESSE THEM TO THE PUBLIKE GOOD, AND TO THE PRAISE OF HIS OWN GLORIOUS NAME.

TO THE READER.

I Desire not to make any Apologie for the Edition of this my Sermon: It is motive enough, that herein I affect a more publike and more enduring good. Spirituall niceneſſe, is the next degree to unfaithfulneſſe: this point cannot be too much urged, either by the tongue, or Preſſe. Religion and our ſoules depend upon it, yet are our thoughts too much beſide it. The Church of Rome ſo fixes herſelfe (in her adoration) upon the Croſſe of Chriſt, as if ſhe forgat his glorie: Many of us ſo conceive of him glorious, that we neglect the meditation of his Croſſe, the way to his glorie and ours. If we would proceed aright, we muſt paſſe from his Golgotha to the mount of Olives, and from thence to heaven; and there ſeeke and ſettle our reſt. According to my weake ability, I have led this way in my ſpeech, beſeeching my Readers to follow me with their hearts, that wee may overtake him which is entred into the true Sanctuary, even the higheſt heavens, to appeare now in the ſight of God for us.

TO THE READER.

DEare not to make any Apologie for the Edition of this my Sermon: It is more then enough, that herein I aime at a more publike and more enduring good. Spirituall riches, is the next degree to unfained holinesse: this point cannot be too much urged, either by the tongue, or Pen. Religion and our soules depend upon it, yet are our thoughts too much beside it. The Church of Rome to fixes her selfe (in her adoration) upon the Crosse of Christ, as if she forgat his glorie: Many of us to conceive of him glorious, that we neglect the meditation of his Crosse, the way to his glorie and ours. If we would proceed aright, we must passe from his Golgotha to the mount of Olives, and from thence to heaven; and there settle and finde our rest. According to my weake ability, I have led his way in my speech, beseeching my Readers to follow me with their hearts, that wee may overtake him which is entred into the true Sanctuary, even the highest heavens, to appeare now in the sight of God for us.

THE PASSION SERMON.

JOH. 19. VER. 30.

When Jesus therefore had received the vinniger, he said, It is finished; and bowing the head, he gave up the Ghost.

THE bitter and yet victorious passion of the Sonne of God, (Right honourable and beloved Christians) as it was the strangest thing that ever befell the earth; so is both of most soveraigne use, and lookes for the most frequent and carefull meditation. It is one of those things, which was once done, that it might be thought of for ever. Every day therefore must be the Good-Friday of a Christian: who, with that great Doctor of the Gentiles, must desire to know nothing but Jesus Christ, and him crucified.

There is no branch or circumstance in this wonderfull businesse, which yeelds not infinite matter of discourse. According to the solemnity of this time and place, I have chosen to commend unto your Christian attention, our Saviours Farewell to Nature (for his reviving was about it) in his last word, in his last act. His last word, It is finished; his last act, He gave up the Ghost. That which he said, he did. If there be any theame that may challenge and command our eares and hearts, this is it: for behold, the sweetest word that ever Christ spake, and the most meritorious act that ever he did, are met together, in this his last breath. In the one ye shall see him triumphing; yeelding in the other, yet so as he overcomes. Imagine therefore, that you saw Christ Jesus, in this day of his passion (who is every day here crucified before your eyes) advanced upon the Chariot of his Crosse; and now, after a weary conflict cheerefully over-looking the despight and shame of men, the wrath of his Father, the Law, sinne, death, hell; which all lie gasping at his foot: and then you shall conceive, with what spirit he saith, Consummatum est, It is finished. What is finished? Shortly; All the prophecies that were of him; All legall observations, that prefigured him; his own sufferings; our salvation. The prophecies are accomplisht, the ceremonies abolisht, his sufferings ended, our salvation wrought: these foure heads shall limit this first part of my speech; onely let them finde and leave you attentive.

Even this very word is propheſied of; All things that are written of me, have an end, saith Christ. What end? This, It is finished. This very end hath his end here. What therefore is finished? Not this prediction only of his last draught, as Augustine: that were too particular. Let our Saviour himselfe say, All things that are written of me by the Prophets. It is a sure and convertible rule; Nothing was done by Christ, which was not foretold: Nothing was ever foretold by the Prophets of Christ, which was not done.

It would take up a life to compare the Prophets and Evangelists, the predictions and the historie, and largely to discourse how the one foretells, and the other answers: let it suffice to looke at them running. Of all the Evangelists, Saint Matthew hath been most studious, in making these references and correspondences; with whom, the burden or undersong of every event, is still (ut impleretur) that it might be fulfilled. Thus hath he noted (if I have reckoned them aright) two and thirty severall prophecies concerning Christ, fulfilled in his birth, life, death.

To which S. John addes many more. Our speech must be directed to his Passion: Omitting the rest, let us insist in those.

He must be apprehended: it was fore-prophesied; The Anointed of the Lord was taken in their nets, saith Jeremie: but how? he must be sold: for what? for thirty silver peeces; and what must those doe? buy a field: all foretold; And they tooke thirty silver peeces, the price of him that was valued, and gave them for the potters field, saith Zacharie (miswritten Jeremie, by one letter mistaken in the abbreviation.) By whom? That childe of perdition, that the Scripture might be fulfilled. VVhich was he? It is foretold; He that eateth bread with me, saith the Psalmist. And what shall his Disciples doe? Run away: so saith the Prophecie; I will smite the shepheard, and the sheep shal be scattered, saith Zacharie. VVhat shall be done to him? He must be scourged and spet upon: behold, not those filthy excrements could have light upon his sacred face, without a prophecie, I hid not my face from shame & spetting, saith Esay. VVhat shall be the issue? In short, he shall be led to death: it is the prophecie, The Messias shall be slain, saith Daniel: what death? he must be lift up; Like as Moses lift up the Serpent in the wilderness, so shall the Son of man be lift up. Chrysostome saith well, that some actions are parables; so may I say, some actions are prophecies, such are all types of Christ, & this with the formost. Lift up, whither? to the Crosse: it is the prophecie, hanging upon a tree, saith Moses: how lift up? nailed to it: so is the prophecie, Foderũt manus, They have pierced my hands and my feet, saith the Psalmist: With what company? Two theeves: With the wicked was he numbred, saith Esay: Where? Without the gates, saith the prophecie: What becomes of his garments? They cannot so much as cast the dice for his coat, but it is prophecied; They divided my garments, and on my vestures cast lots, saith the Psalmist. He must die then on the Crosse: but how? voluntarily. Not a bone of him shall be broken: what hinders it? loe, there he hangs, as it were neglected and at mercy; yet all the raging Jewes, no, all the Devils in hell cannot stirre one bone in his blessed bodie: It was prophesied in the Easter-Lambe, and it must be fulfilled in him that is the true Passeover, in spight of fiends and men: how then? he must be thrust in the side: behold, not the very speare could touch his precious side being dead, but it must be guided by a prophecie; They shall see him whom they have thrust thorow, saith Zacharie: what shall he say the while? not his very words but are foretspoken: his complaint, Eli Eli lamma sabachani, as the Chaldee, or עזבתני as the Hebrew, Psal. 22. 2. his resignation, In manus tuas, Into thy hands I commend my spirit, Psal. 22. 5. his request, Father forgive them: He prayed for the transgressors, saith Esay. And now when he saw all these prophecies were fulfilled, knowing that one remained, he said, I thirst. Domine quid sitis? saith one; O Lord, what thirstest thou for? A strange hearing, that a man, yea that God and man dying, should complaine of thirst.

Could he endure the scorching flames of the wrath of his Father, the curse of our sinnes, those tortures of body, those horrours of soule, and doth he shrinke at his thirst? No, no: he could have borne his drought, he could not beare the Scripture not fulfilled. It was not necessity of nature, but the necessity of his Fathers decree, that drew forth this word, I thirst. They offered it before, he refused it: Whether it were an ordinary potion for the condemned to hasten death (as in the storie of Antonie, which is the most received construction) or whether it were that Jewish potion, whereof the Rabbins speak; whose tradition was, that the Malefactor to be executed, should should after some good counsell from two of their Teachers, be taught to say; Let my death be to the remission of all my sinnes; and then that he should have given him a boule of mixt wine, with a graine of Frankincense, to bereave him both of reason and paine.

Sit mors mea in remissionem omnium iniquitatum mearum. Ut usus rationis tollatur.

I durst be confident in this latter; the rather for that Saint Marke cals this draught, σμύρνισμένον οἶνον, Myrrhe-wine, mingled (as is like) with other ingredients. And Montanus agrees with me in the end, Ad stuporem & mentis alienationem: A fashion which Galatine observes out of the Sanedrim, to be grounded upon Prov. 31.6. Give strong drinke to him that is ready to perish. I leave it modestly in the middest; let the learneder judge. Whatsoever it were, he would not die till he had complained of thirst, and in his thirst tasted it. Neither would he have thirsted for, or tasted any but this bitter draught; that the Scripture might be fulfilled; They gave me Vineger to drinke. And loe, now Consummatum est; All is finished.

If there be any Jew amongst you, that like one of Johns unseasonable Disciples, shall aske, Art thou he, or shall we look for another? he hath his answer; Yee men of Israel, why stand you gazing & gaping for another Messias? In this alone, all the Prophecies are finished; and of him alone, all was prophecied and was finished. Pauls old rule holds still, To the Jewes a stumbling block; and that more ancient curse of David, Let their table be made a snare: And Stephens two brands stick still in the flesh of these wretched men: One in their neck, stiffe necked; the other in their heart, uncircumcised, the one, Obstinacie, the other, Unbeliefe: stiffe necks indeed, that will not stoope and relent with the yoke of sixteen hundred yeers judgement and servilitie; uncircumcised hearts, the filme of whose unbeliefe would not be cut off with so infinite convictions. Oh mad and miserable Nation! let them shew us one prophecie that is not fulfilled, let them shew us one other in whom all the prophecies can be fulfilled, and we will mix pity with our hate: If they cannot, and yet resist, their doome is past; Those mine enemies, that would not have me to reigne over them, bring them hither, and slay them before me. So let thine enemies perish, O Lord.

But what go I so far? Even amongst us (to our shame) this riotous age hath bred a monstrous generation (I pray God I be not now in some of your bosomes, that heare me this day) compounded, much like to the Turkish religion, of one part, Christian; another, Jew; a third, worldling; a fourth, Atheist; a Christians face, a Jewes heart, a worldlings life; and therefore Atheous in the whole; that acknowledge a God, and know him not; that professe a Christ, but doubt of him; yea, believe him not: The foole hath said in his heart, There is no Christ. What shall I say of these men? They are worse than devils: that yeelding spirit could say, Jesus I know: and these miscreants are still in the old tune of that tempting devill; Si tu es filius Dei, If thou be the Christ. Oh God, that after so cleare a Gospell, so many miraculous confirmations, so many thousand martyrdoms, so many glorious victories of truth, so many open confessions of Angels, men, devils, friends, enemies; such conspirations of heaven and earth, such universall contestations of all ages and people; there should be left any sparke of this damnable infidelity in the false hearts of men. Behold then, ye despisers, and wonder, and vanish away: Whom have all the Prophets foretold? or what have the prophecies of so many hundreds, yea thousands of yeers, foresaid, that is not with this word finished? who could foretell these things, but the Spirit of God? who could accomplish them, but the Sonne of God? He spake by the mouth of his holy Prophets, saith Zacharie: he hath spoken, and he hath done; one true God in both: none other spirit could foresay these things should bee done; none other power could doe these things, thus fore-shewed: this word therefore can fit none but the mouth of God our Saviour, It is finished. We know whom we have believed; Thou art the Christ the Sonne of the living God. Let him that loves not the Lord Jesus be accursed to the death.

Aug. ad. Hie. Dum volunt & Judæi esse & Christiani, nec Judæi sunt, nec Christiani.

Thus the prophecies are finished: Of the legall observations, with more brevity. Christ is the end of the Law: What Law? Ceremoniall, Morall. Of the Morall; it was kept perfectly by himself, satisfied fully for us: Of the Ceremoniall; it was referred to him, observed of him, fulfilled in him, abolisht by him. There were nothing more eaſie, than to ſhew you how all thoſe Jewiſh Ceremonies looke at Chriſt: how Circumciſion, Paſſeover, the Tabernacle, both outer and inner, the Temple, the Laver, both the Altars, the Tables of Shew-bread, the Candleſtickes, the Vaile, the Holy of Holies, the Arke, the Propitiatorie, the pot of Manna, Aarons Rod, the High Prieſt, his Order and Line; his Habits, his Inaugurations, his Waſhings, his Anointings, his Sprinklings, offerings, the Sacrifices, ἱλαστήρια εὐχαριστήρια, and what ever Jewiſh Rite; had their vertue from Chriſt, relation to him, and their end in him. This was then their laſt gaſpe; for, now ſtraight they died with Chriſt, now the vaile of the Temple rent: as Auſtin well notes out of Matthewes order; It tore then, when Chriſts laſt breath paſſed. That conceite of Theophylact is witty; that as the Jewes were wont to rend their garments, when they heard blaſphemy: ſo the Temple not enduring theſe execrable blaſphemies againſt the ſonne of God, tore his vaile in peeces. But that is not all: the vaile rent, is the obligation of the rituall Law cancelled; the way into the heavenly Sanctuary opened; the ſhadow giving roome to the ſubſtance: in a word, it doth that which Chriſt ſaith, Conſummatum eſt. Even now then the law of Ceremonies died: It had a long and ſolemne buriall, as Auguſtine ſaith well; perhaps figured in Moſes, who died not lingringly, but was thirty dayes mourned for: what means the Church of Rome to dig them up, now rotten in their graves? and that, not as they had been buried, but ſowne with a plenteous increaſe; yea, with the inverted uſury of too many of you Citizens; ten for one. It is a grave and deepe cenſure of that reſolute Hierome; Ego è contrario loquar, &c. I ſay, ſaith he, and in ſpight of al the world dare maintaine, that now the Jewiſh ceremonies are pernicious and deadly; and whoſoever ſhal obſerve them, whether he be Jew or Gentile, in barathrum Diaboli devolutum; ſhall frie in Hell for it. Still Altars? ſtill Prieſts? ſacrifices ſtill? ſtill waſhings? ſtill unctions? ſprinkling, ſhaving, purifying? ſtill all, and more than all? Let them heare but Auguſtines cenſure, Quiſquis nunc, &c. Whoſoever ſhall now uſe them, as it were raking them up out of their duſt, he ſhall not be Pius deductor corporis, ſed impius ſepulturæ violator; an impious and ſacrilegious wretch, that ranſacks the quiet tombes of the dead.

Ex quo apparet tunc ſciſſum eſſe cum Chriſtus emiſit ſpiritum.

Ceremoniæ ſicut defunctà corpora ne ceſſarium moleſtiis deducendæ erant ad ſepulturam, non ſimulatæ, ſed religioſæ, nec deferenda continuo. Auguſtin.

Ego è contrario loquar, & reclamanto mundo libera voce pronunciem, ceremonias Judæorũ perniciosas eſſe, & mortiferas, & quicunque eas obſervaverit ſive ex Judæis ſive ex Gentibus, in barathrum diaboli devolutum Hier.

Quiſquis nunc eâ celebrare voluerit, tanquam ſopitos cineres truens, non erit pius, &c.

I ſay not that all Ceremonies are dead; but the Law of Ceremonies, and of Jewiſh. It is a ſound diſtinction of them, that profound Peter Martyr hath in his Epiſtle to that worthy Martyr, Father, Biſhop Hooper: Some are typicall, fore-ſignifying Chriſt to come: ſome of order and decencie, thoſe are abrogated, not theſe: the Jewes had a faſhion of Prophecying in the Churches; ſo the Chriſtians from them, as Ambroſe: the Jewes had an eminent pulpit of wood; ſo we: they gave names at their Circumciſion; ſo we at Baptiſme: they ſung Pſalmes, melodiouſly in Churches; ſo doe we: they paid and received tithes, ſo doe we: they wrapt their dead in linnen with odors, ſo we: the Jewes had ſureties at their admiſſion into the Church; ſo we: theſe inſtances might be infinite: the Spouſe of Chriſt cannot be without her laces, and chaines, and borders. Chriſt came not to diſſolve order. But thou O Lord, how long? how long ſhall thy poore Church finde her ornaments, her ſorrows? and ſee the deare ſonnes of her wombe, bleeding about theſe apples of ſtrife: let me ſo name them, not for their value (even ſmall things, when they are commanded, look for no ſmall reſpect) but for their event: the enemie is at the gates of our Siracuſe; how long will we ſuffer our ſelves, taken up with angles and circles in the duſt: ye Men, Brethren, and Fathers, help; for Gods ſake put to your hands, to the quenching of this common flame: the one ſide by humility and obedience; the other by compaſſion; both by prayers and tears: who am I, that I ſhould revive to you the ſweet ſpirit of that divine Auguſtine, who when he heard and ſaw the bitter contentions betwixt two grave and famous Divines, Jerome and Ruffine; Heu mihi, ſaith he, qui vos alicubi ſimul invenire non poſſum; Alas, that I ſhould never find you two together, how would I fall at your feet, how would I embrace them, and weep upon them, and beſeech you, either of you for other, and each for himſelf, both of you for the Church of God, but eſpecially, for the weak, for whom Chriſt died, who not without their own great danger, ſee you two fighting in this Theatre of the world. Yet let me doe what he ſaid he would doe; beg for peace, as for life: by your filiall piety to the Church of God, whoſe ruines follow upon our diviſions; by your love of Gods truth; by the graces of that one bleſſed Spirit, whereby we are all

all informed and quickned; by the precious blood of that Sonne of God, which this day, and this houre, was ſhed for our redemption, be inclined to peace and love: though our braines be different, yet let our hearts be one. It was, as I heard, the dying ſpeech of our late reverend, worthy and gracious Dioceſan; Modo me moriente vivat ac floreat Eccleſia; Oh, yet if, when I am dead, the Church may live and flouriſh.

What a ſpirit was here? what a ſpeech? how worthy never to die? how worthy of a ſoule ſo neere to his heaven? how worthy of ſo happy a ſucceſſion? Yee whom God hath made inheritours of this bleſſed care, who doe no leſſe long for the proſperity of Sion, live you to effect what he did but live to wiſh; all peace with our ſelves, and warre with none but Rome and Hell. And if there be any wayward Separatiſt, whoſe ſoule profeſſeth to hate peace; I feare to tell him Pauls meſſage, yet I muſt: Would to God thoſe were cut off that trouble you. How cut off? As good Theodoſius ſaid to Demophilus, a contentious Prelate; Si tu pacem fugis, &c. If thou flie peace, I will make thee flie the Church. Alas, they do flie it: that which ſhould be their puniſhment, they make their contentment; how are they worthy of pity? As Optatus of his Donatiſts; they are Brethren, might be companions, and will not. Oh wilfull men; whither doe they run? from one Chriſt to another? Is Chriſt divided? we have him, thanks be to our good God, and we heare him daily; and whether ſhall we goe from thee? thou haſt the words of eternall life.

Si tu pacem fugis, ego te ab Eccleſia fugere mando.

Thus the Ceremonies are finiſhed: now heare the end of his ſufferings, with like patience and devotion: his death is here included, it was ſo neere that he ſpake of it as done; and when it was done, all was done. How eaſie is it to loſe our ſelves in this diſcourſe! how hard not to be overwhelmed with matter of wonder; & to find either beginning or end! his ſufferings found an end, our thoughts cannot. Lo, with this word he is happily waded out of thoſe deeps of ſorrows, whereof our conceits can find no bottome: yet let us, with Peter, gird our coat, and caſt our ſelves a little into this ſea.

All his life was but a perpetuall Paſſion: In that he became man, he ſuffered more than we can doe, either while we are men, or when we ceaſe to be men; he humbled, yea, he emptied himſelfe. We, when we ceaſe to be here, are cloathed upon, 2 Cor. 5. We both win by our being, and gaine by our loſſe; he loſt, by taking our more or leſſe to himſelfe, that is, manhood. For, though ever as God, I and my Father are one: yet as man, My Father is greater than I. That man ſhould be turned into a beaſt, into a worme, into duſt, into nothing; is not ſo great a diſparagement, as that God ſhould become man: and yet it is not finiſhed; it is but begun. But what man? If, as the abſolute Monarch of the world, he had commanded the vaſſalage of all Emperours, and Princes, and had trod on nothing but Crownes and Scepters, and the necks of Kings, and bidden all the Potentates of the earth to attend his traine; this had carried ſome port with it; ſuitable to the heroicall Majeſty of Gods Sonne. No ſuch matter: here is neither Forme nor Beautie; unleſſe perhaps (μορφὴν δούλου) the forme of a ſervant: you have made me to ſerve with your ſinnes. Behold, he is a man to God; a ſervant to man; and, be it ſpoken with holy reverence, a grudge to his ſervants. He is deſpiſed and rejected of men; yea (as himſelfe, of himſelfe) a worme, and no man, the ſhame of men, and contempt of the people. Who is the King of glory? the Lord of Hoaſts, he is the King of glory. Set theſe two together; the King of glory; the ſhame of men: the more honour, the more abaſement. Look back to his Cradle: there you finde him rejected of the Bethlemites; borne and laid, alas, how homely, how unworthily; ſought for by Herod, exiled to Ægypt, obſcurely brought up in the Cottage of a poore Foſter-Father, tranſported and tempted by Sathan, derided of his kindred, blaſphemouſly traduced by the Jewes, pinched with hunger, reſtleſſe, harbourleſſe, ſorrowfull, perſecuted by the Elders and Phariſes, ſold by his own ſervant, apprehended, arraigned, ſcourged, condemned, and yet it is not finiſhed. Let us, with that Diſciple, follow him a far off; and paſſing over all his contemptuous uſage in the way, ſee him brought to his Croſſe. Still the further we looke, the more wonder: every thing addes to this ignominie of ſuffering, and triumph of over-comming. Where was it? not in a corner, as Paul ſaith to Feſtus, but in Jeruſalem, the eye, the heart of the world. Obſcurity abateth ſhame: publique notice heightens it: Before all Iſrael and

Act 26. 17. ἐν γωνίᾳ.

and before this Sunne, saith God to David, when he would throughly shame him: In Jerusalem, which he had honoured with his presence, taught with his preachings, astonisht with his miracles, bewayled with his tears; O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, how oft would I, and thou wouldst not: O yet, if in this thy day. Cruelty and unkindnesse, after good desert, afflict so much more, as our merit hath been greater. Whereabouts? without the gates: in Calvarie, among the stinking bones of execrable Malefactors. Before, the glory of the place bred shame; now the vilenesse of it. When? but in the Passeover; a time of greatest frequence, and concourse of all Jews and Proselytes: An holy time: when they should receive the figure, they reject the substance: when they should kill and eat the Sacramentall Lambe, in faith, in thankfulnesse, they kill the Lambe of God, our true Passeover, in crueltie and contempt. With whom? The quality of our company either increases or lessens shame. In the midst of theeves (saith one) as the Prince of theeves: there was no guile in his mouth, much lesse in his hands: yet behold he that thought it no robbery to be equall with God, is made equall to robbers and murderers; yea superiour in evill. What suffered he? As all lifes are not alike pleasant, so all deaths are not equally fearefull. There is not more difference betwixt some life and death, than betwixt one death and another. See the Apostles gradation: He was made obedient to the death, even the death of the Crosse. The Crosse, a lingring, tormenting, ignominious death. The Jewes had foure kindes of death for malefactors, the towell, the sword, fire, stones; each of these above other in extremity. Strangling with the towell, they accounted easiest: the sword worse than the towell; the fire worse than the sword: stoning worse than the fire: but this Roman death was worst of all. Cursed is every one that hangeth on a Tree. Yet (as Jerome well) he is not therefore accursed, because he hangeth; but therefore he hangeth, because he is accursed. He was made (κατάρα) a Curse for us. The Curse was more than the shame: yet the shame h unspeakeable; and yet not more than the paine. Yet all that dye the same death, are not equally miserable: the very theeves fared better in their death than he. I heare of no irrision, no inscription, no taunts, no insultation on them: they had nothing but paine to encounter, he paine and scorne. An ingenious and noble Nature can worse brooke this than the other; any thing rather than disdainfulnesse and derision: especially, from a base enemie. I remember that learned father begins Israels affliction, with Ismaels persecuting laughter. The Jewes, the Souldiers, yea, the very Theeves flouted him, and triumpht over his misery; his blood cannot satisfie them, without his reproch. Which of his senses now was not a window to let in sorrow? his eyes saw the teares of his Mother & friends, the unthankfull demeanure of Mankind, the cruell despight of his enemies: his eares heard the revilings and blasphemies of the multitude; and (whether the place were noisom to his sent) his touch felt the nailes, his taste the gall. Look up, O all yee beholders, look upon this precious body, and see what part yee can find free. That head which is adored and trembled at by the Angelicall spirits, is all raked and harrowed with thornes: that face, of whom it is said; Thou art fairer than the children of men, is all besmeared with the filthy spittle of the Jewes, and furrowed with his tears; those eyes, cleerer than the Sun, are darkned with the shadow of death; those ears that heare the heavenly consorts of Angels, now are filled with the cursed speakings and scoffs of wretched men: those lips that spake as never man spake, that command the spirits both of light and darknesse, are scornfully wet with vineger & gall: those feet that trample on all the powers of hell (his enemies are made his footstoole) are now nailed to the footstoole of the Crosse: those hands that freely sway the scepter of the heavens, now carry the reed of reproach, and are nailed to the tree of reproach: that whole body, which was conceived by the Holy-Ghost, was all scourged, wounded, mangled: this is the out-side of his suffering. Was his heart free? Oh no: the inner part or soule of this paine, which was unseen, is as far beyond these outward and sensible, as the soule is beyond the body; Gods wrath beyond the malice of men: these were but love-tricks to what his soule endured, O all ye that passe by the way, behold and see, if there be any sorrow like to my sorrow: Alas, Lord, what can we see of thy sorrows? we cannot conceive so much as the hainousnesse and desert of one of those sinnes which thou bearest: we can no more see thy paine, than we could undergoe dergoe it; onely this we see, that what the infinite sinnes, of almost infinite men, committed against an infinite Majestie, deserved in infinite continuance; all this thou in the short time of thy Passion hast sustained. We may behold and see; but all the glorious spirits in heaven cannot looke into the depth of this suffering. Doe but looke yet a little into the passions of this his Passion: for, by the manner of his sufferings, we shall best see what he suffered. Wise and resolute men doe not complaine of a little; holy Martyrs have been racked, and would not be loosed; what shall we say if the author of their strength, God and Man, bewray passions? what would have overwhelmed men, would not have made him shrink; and what made him complain, could never have been sustained by men. What shall we then think, if he were affrighted with terrors, perplexed with sorrowes, and distracted with both these. And lo, he was all these: for, first, here was an amazed feare; For millions of men to despaire, was not so much as for him to feare: and yet it was no slight feare: he began (ἐκθαμβεῖσθαι) to be astonied with terror, which in the dayes of his flesh, offered up prayers and supplications, with strong cries and teares, to him that was able to help him, and was heard in that he feared. Never was man so afraid of the torments of Hell, as Christ (standing in our roome) of his Fathers wrath. Fear is still suteable to apprehension. Never man could so perfectly apprehend this cause of feare; he felt the chastisements of our peace, yea the curse of our sinnes; and therefore might well say with David, I suffer thy terrors with a troubled minde; yea with Job; The arrowes of God are in me, the terrors of God fight against me. With feare, there was a dejecting sorrow, (ἀδημονία) My soule is on all sides heavy to the death: his strong cries, his many teares, are witnesses of this Passion: he had formerly shed teares of pittie, and teares of love, but now of anguish: he had before sent forth cries of mercy; never of complaint till now: when the Sonne of God weeps and cries, what shall we say or thinke? yet further, betwixt both these and his love what a conflict was there? It is not amisse distinguished, that he was alwayes in Agone; but now in ἀγωνία, in a strugling passion of mixed griefe. Behold, this field was not without sweat and blood; yea, a sweat of blood. Oh what man or Angell can conceive the taking of that heart, that without all outward violence, meerely, out of the extremitie of his own Passion, bled (through the flesh and skinne,) not some faint deaw, but solid drops of blood? No thorns, no nailes fetcht blood from him, with so much paine as his own thoughts: he saw the fierce wrath of his Father, and therefore feared: he saw the heavy burden of our sins to be undertaken; and thereupon, besides feare, justly grieved: he saw the necessity of our eternall damnation, if he suffered not: if he did suffer, of our redemption; and therefore his love incountred both griefe and feare. In it selfe, he would not drinke of that cup. In respect of our good, and his decree, he would and did; and while he thus striveth, he sweats and bleeds. There was never such a combat, never such a bloodshed, and yet it is not finished; I dare not say with some Schoole-men, that the sorrow of his Passion was not so great as the sorrow of his compassion: yet that was surely exceeding great. To see the ungracious carelessnesse of mankinde, the slender fruit of his sufferings, the sorrowes of his Mother, Disciples, friends; to fore-see, from the watch-tower of his Crosse, the future temptations of his children, desolations of his Church; all these must needs strike deepe into a tender heart. These he still sees and pitties, but without passion; then he suffered in seeing them.

Can we yet say any more? Lo, all these sufferings are aggravated by his fulnesse of knowledge, and want of comfort: for, he did not shut his eies, as one saith, when he drunke this cup: he saw how dreggish, and knew how bitter it was. Sodaine evills afflict, if not lesse, shorter. He fore-saw, and fore-said, every particular he should suffer: so long as he fore-saw, he suffered: the expectation of evill, is not lesse than the sense: to looke long for good, is a punishment; but for evill, is a torment. No passion workes upon an unknowen object: as no love, so no feare is of what we know not. Hence men feare not Hell, because they fore-see it not: if we could see that pit open before we come at it, it would make us tremble at our sins, and our knees to knock together, as Baltazars; and perhaps without faith, to runne madde at the horror of judgement. He saw the burden of all particular sinnes to be laid upon him; every dramme of his Fathers wrath was measured out to him, ere he toucht this potion; this cup was full, and he knew that it must be wring'd, not a drop left: it must be finished. Oh yet, if as he fore-saw all his sorrowes, so he could have seen some mixture of refreshing. But I found none to comfort me, no, none to pity me. And yet it is a poore comfort that arises from pity. Even so, O Lord, thou treadest this wine-presse alone; none to accompany, none to assist thee. I remember, Ruffinus in his Ecclesiasticall storie reports, that one Theodorus a Martyr, told him, that when he was hanging ten houres upon the rack for religion under Julians persecution, his joynts distended and distorted, his body exquisitely tortured with change of executioners; so as never age (saith he) could remember the like: he felt no pain at all, but continued indeed all the while in the sight of all men singing and smiling: for there stood a comely young man by him on his jibbet (an Angell rather, in forme of a man) which with a cleane towell still wip't off his sweat, and powred coole water upon his racked limbs; wherewith he was so refreshed, that it grieved him to be let downe. Even the greatest torments are easie, when they have answerable comforts: but a wounded and comfortlesse spirit, who can beare? If yet but the same messenger of God might have attended his Crosse, that appeared in his agony; and might have given ease to their Lord, as he did to his servant. And yet, what can the Angels help, where God will smite? Against the violence of men, against the furie of Satan, they have prevailed in the cause of God, for men: they dare not, they cannot comfort, where God will afflict. When our Saviour had been wrestling with Satan in the End of his Lent, then they appeared to him, and served; but now, while about the same time, he is wrestling with the wrath of his Father for us, not an Angel dare be seen, to look out of the windows of heaven to releeve him. For men, much lesse could they, if they would; but what did they? Miserable comforters are ye all: the Souldiers, they stript him, scorned him with his purple crown, reed, spat on him, smote him; the passengers, they reviled him, and insulting, wagging their heads & hands at him, Hey thou that destroyedst the Temple, come down, &c. The Elders and Scribes; alas, they have bought his blood, suborned witnesses, incensed Pilate, preferred Barrabas, undertook the guilt of his death, cried out, Crucifie, Crucifie. He thou that savedst others. His Disciples: alas, they forsook him, one of them forsweares him, another runs away naked, rather than he will stay and confesse him. His mother and other friends, they look on indeed, and sorrow with him, but to his discomfort. Where the griefe is extreme, and respects neere, partnership doth but increase sorrow: Paul chides this love: What doe you weeping & breaking my heart? The teares of those we love, do either slacken our hearts, or wound them. Who then shall comfort him? himselfe? Sometimes our own thoughts find a way to succour us, unknown to others; no, not himselfe. Doubtlesse (as Aquinas) the influence of the higher part of the soule, was restrained from the aid of the inferiour: My soule is filled with evills, Psal. 87. 4. Who then? his Father? here, here was his hope: If the Lord had not holpen me, my soule had almost dwelt in silence: I and my Father are one. But now (alas) he, even he, delivers him into the hands of his enemies; when he hath done, turnes his back upon him as a stranger; yea, he woundeth him as an enemie. The Lord would breake him, Esay 53. 10. yet any thing is light to the soule, whiles the comforts of God sustaine it: who can dismay, where God will releeve? But here, My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me? What a word was here, to come from the mouth of the Sonne of God? My Disciples are men, weake and fearefull; no marvell if they forsake me. The Jewes are themselves, cruell and obstinate. Men are men, graceless and unthankfull. Devils are, according to their nature, spightfull and malicious. All these doe but their kinde; and let them doe it: but thou, O Father, thou that hast said, This is my welbeloved Sonne, in whom I am well pleased: thou of whom I have said, It is my Father that glorifies me, what? forsaken me? Not onely brought me to this shame, smitten me, unregarded me; but, as it were, forgotten, yea, forsaken me? What, even me, my Father? How many of thy constant servants have suffered heavy things: yet in the multitudes of the sorrowes of their hearts, thy presence and comforts have refreshed their soules. Hast thou releeved them, and dost

thou forlake me? me, thine onely, deare, naturall, eternall Sonne? O ye heavens and earth, how could you stand, while the Maker of you thus complained? Ye flood: but partaking after a sort of his Passion: the earth trembled and shooke, her rocks tore, her graves opened, the heavens withdrew their light, as not daring to behold this sad and fearefull spectacle.

Oh deare Christians, how should these earthen and rockie hearts of ours shake, and rend in peeces at this Meditation? how should our faces be covered with darknes, and our joy be turned into heavinesse? All these voyces, and teares, and sweats, & pangs, are for us, yea from us. Shall the Sonne of God thus smart for our sinnes, yea with our sins, and shall we not grieve for our own? shall he weep to us in this Market-place, and shall we not mourne? Nay, shall he sweat and bleed for us, and shall not we weep for our selves? Shall he thus lamentably shrieke out, under his Fathers wrath, and shall not we tremble? Shall the heavens and earth suffer with him, and we suffer nothing? I call you not to a weake and idle pity of our glorious Saviour: to what purpose? His injury was our glory. No, no, Te daughters of Jerusalem, weep not for me, but weep for your selves: for our sinnes, that have done this; not for his sorrow that suffered it: nor for his pangs, that were; but for our own, that should have been, and (if we repent not) shall be. Oh how grievous, how deadly are our sins, that cost the Sonne of God (besides blood) so much torment? how far are our soules gone, that could not be ransomed with an easier price? that, that took so much of this infinite Redeemer of men, God and man, how can it chuse but swallow up, and confound thy soule, which is but finite and sinfull? If thy soule had been in his soules stead, what had become of it? it shall be, if his were not in stead of thine. This weight that lies thus heavy on the Son of God, and wrung from him these teares, sweat, blood, and these unconceiveable groans of his afflicted spirit, how should it chuse but presse down thy soule to the bottome of hell, and so it will doe: if he have not suffered it for thee, thou must and shalt suffer it for thy self. Goe now thou lewd man, and make thy self merry with thy sins: laugh at the uncleannesses, or bloodinesse of thy youth: thou little knowest the price of a sin; thy soule shall doe, thy Saviour did, when he cried out, to the amazement of Angels, and horror of men; My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me? But now no more of this, It is finished: the greater conflict, the more happy victory. Well doth he find and feel of his Father, what his type said before, He will not chide always, nor keep his anger for ever. It is fearfull; but in him, short: eternall to sinners; short to his Son, in whom the Godhead dwelt bodily. Behold, this storme, wherewith all the powers of the world were shaken, is now over. The Elders, Pharises, Judas, the Souldiers, Priests, witnesses, Judges, thieves, executioners, devils, have all tyred themselves in vaine, with their own malice, and he triumphs over them all, upon the throne of his Crosse: his enemies are vanquisht, his Father satisfied, his soule with this word at rest and glory; It is finished. Now there is no more betraying, agonies, arraignements, scourging, scoffing, crucifying, conflicts, terrors, all is finished. Alas, beloved, and will we not let the Sonne of God be at rest? doe we now again goe about to fetch him out of his glory, to scorne and crucifie him? I feare to say it: Gods spirit dare and doth, They crucifie again to themselves the Son of God, and make a mock of him. To themselves nor in himself, that they cannot, it is no thank to them, they would doe it. See and consider the notoriously sinfull conversation of those, that should be Christians, offer violence unto our glorified Saviour, they stretch their hand to heaven, & pull him down from his throne, to his Crosse: they teare him with thornes, pierce him with nailes, load him with reproches. Thou hatest the Jewes, spittest at the name of Judas, railest on Pilate, condemnest the cruell butchers of Christ; yet thou canst blaspheme, and sweare him quite over, curse, swagger, lye, oppresse, buy & sell with lust, scoffe, scorn, and liv'st like a debauched man, yea like an humane Beast, yea like an uncleane Devil. Cry Hosanna as long as thou wilt, thou art a Pilate, a Jew, a Judas, an Executioner of the Lord of life; and so much greater shall thy judgement be, by how much thy light and his glory is more. Oh beloved, is it not enough that he died once for us? Were those pains so light, that we should every day redouble them afresh? the enormity of that so gracious a Saviour hath deserved of us by dying? Is this the recompence of that infinite love of his, that thou shouldest thus cruelly vex and wound him with thy sinnes? Every of our sinnes is a thorne, and nayle, and speare to him: while thou powrest downe thy drunken carowses, thou giv'st thy Saviour a potion of Gall; while thou despis'st his poore servants, thou spitt'st on his face: while thou putt'st on thy proud dresses, and lift'st up thy vaine heart with high conceits, thou set'st a Crown of thornes on his head: while thou wring'st and oppress'st his poore children, thou whipp'st him, and draw'st blood of his hands and feet. Thou hypocrite, how dar'st thou offer to receive the Sacrament of God, with that hand, which is thus imbrued with the blood of him whom thou receivest? In every Ordinary thy profane tongue walks, in the disgrace of the religious and conscionable. Thou make'st no scruple of thine own sins, and scorn'st those that doe: Not to be wicked, is crime enough. Heare him that saith, Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me? Saul strikes at Damascus; Christ suffers in heaven. Thou strik'st; Christ Jesus smarteth, and will revenge. These are the [συμπαθεια] afflictions of Christs sufferings: In himselfe it is finished; in his members it is not, till the world be finished. We must toyle, and groane, and bleed, that we may reigne: if he had not done so, It had not been finished. This is our warfare, this is the religion of our sorrow & death. Now are we set upon the sandie pavement of our Theatre, and are matched with all sorts of evils; evill men, evill spirits, evill accidents; and (which is worst) our owne evill hearts; temptations, crosses, persecutions, sicknesses, wants, infamies, death; all these must in our courses, be encountred by the Law of our profession. What should we doe but strive and suffer, as our Generall hath done, that we may reign as he doth, and once triumph in our Consummatum est? God and his Angels sit upon the scaffolds of heaven, and behold us: our Crown is ready: our day of deliverance shall come; yea our redemption is neere, when all teares shall be wip't from our eyes; and we that have sowne in tears, shall reape in joy. In the meane time, let us possesse our soules not in patience only, but in comfort: let us adore & magnifie our Saviour in his sufferings, and imitate him in our own: our sorrows shall have an end, our joyes shall not: our paines shall soone be finished; our glory shall be finished, but never ended.

Thus his sufferings are finished; now together with them, mans salvation. Who knows not, that man had made himselfe a deep debtor, a bankrupt, an out-law to God? Our sins are our debts; and by sins, death. Now, in this word and act, our sins are discharged, death endured, and therefore we cleared: the debt is paid, the score is crossed, the Creditor satisfied, the Debtors acquitted, and since there was no other quarrell, saved: we are all sick, and that mortally: sinne is the disease of the soule: Quot vitia, tot febres, saith Chrysostome; so many sinnes, so many fevers, and those pestilent. What wonder is it, that we have so much plague, while we have so much sin? Our Saviour is the Physitian: The whole need not the Physitian, but the sick: wherein? He healeth all our infirmities: he healeth them after a miraculous manner; not by giving us receits, but by taking our receits for us. A wonderfull Physitian, a wonderfull course of cure: One while he would cure us by abstinence; our superfluity, by his forty daies emptinesse, according to that old rule; Hunger cures the diseases of gluttony: Another while, by exercise: He went up and down from City to City, and in the day was preaching in the Temple; in the night praying in the Mount. Then, by dyet; Take eate, this is my body: and Let this cup passe. After that yet, by sweat, such a sweat as never was, a bloody one: yet more, by incision; they pierced his hands, feet, side: and yet again by potion; a bitter potion, of vineger and gall. And lastly, which is both the strangest and strongest receit of all, by dying: Which dyed for us, that whether we wake or sleep, we should live together with him. We need no more, we can go no further; there can be no more physick of this kinde: there are cordials after these, of his Resurrection and Ascension; no more penall receits. By this blood we have redemption, Ephes. 1.7. Justification, Rom. 3.24. Reconciliation, Colos. 1.20. Sanctification, 1 Pet. 1.2. Entrance into glory, Heb. 10.19. Is it not now finished? Wo were us if he had left but one mite of satisfaction upon our score, to be discharged by our soules: and wo be to them that derogate from Christ, that they may charge themselves; that botch up these all-sufficiently meritorious sufferings of Christ, as imperfect, with the super-fluities of flesh & blood. Maledictus homo qui spem ponit in homine. We may not with patience see Christ

wrong'd

A wrong'd by his falſ friends; As that heroical Luther ſaid in the like; Curſed be that ſilence that here forbeareth. To be ſhort, here be two injuries intolerable; both give Chriſt the lie upon his Croſſe: It is finiſhed. No, ſomewhat remaines: the fault is diſcharged, not the puniſhment. Of puniſhments, the eternall is quit, not the temporall. It is finiſhed by Chriſt: No, there wants yet much; the ſatisfaction of Saints applied by this Vicar: add mens ſufferings unto Chriſts; then the treaſure is full; til then, It is not finiſhed.

Maledictum ſilentium quod hic connivet.

Two qualities ſtrive for the firſt place in theſe two opinions; impiety and abſurditie: I know not whether to prefer. For impietie; here is God taxed of injuſtice, unmercifulneſſe, inſufficiencie, falſhood. Of injuſtice, that he forgives ſinne, and yet puniſhes for that which he hath forgiven: unmercifulneſſe, that he forgives not while he forgives, but doth it by halves: inſufficiencie, that his ranſome muſt be ſupplied by men: falſhood, in that he ſaith, It is finiſhed, when it is not. For abſurditie; how B groſſe and monſtrous are theſe poſitions? that at once the ſame ſinne ſhould be remitted and retained; that there ſhould be a puniſhment, where there is no fault; that what could ſtrike off our eternall puniſhment, did not wipe off the temporall; that hee which paid our pounds, ſticks at our farthings; that God will retaine what man may diſcharge; that it is, and it is not finiſhed.

If there be any opinions, whoſe mention confutes them, theſe are they. None can bee more vaine, none had more need of ſolidity: for this prop beares up, alone, the weight of all thoſe millions of indulgences, which Rome creates and ſels to the world. That Strumpet would well-neere go naked, if this were not. Theſe ſpirituall Treaſures fetcht in the temporall: which yet our reverend & learned Fulk juſtly calls a moſt blaſphemous and beggerly principle: It brings in whole cheſts, yea mines of gold, like the Popes Indies; and hath not ſo much as a ragge of proofe to cover it, C whether of Antiquity, of Reaſon, of Scripture. Not of Antiquity: for theſe Jubily proclamations began but about three hundred years ago. Not of Reaſon: how ſhould one meer man pay for another, diſpenſe with another, to another, by another? Not of Scripture, which hath flatly ſaid, The blood of Jeſus Chriſt his Son, purgeth us from all ſin: and yet I remember that acute Sadeel hath taught me, that this practice is according to Scripture: what Scripture? He caſt the money-changers out of the Temple, and ſaid, Ye have made my houſe a den of theeves. Which alſo Joachim, their propheticall Abbot, well applies to this purpoſe. Some modeſt Doctors of Lovan would fain have minced this Antichriſtian blaſphemy; who began to teach, that the paſſions of the Saints are not ſo by Indulgences applied, that they become true ſatisfactions; but that they only ſerve to move God, by the ſight of them to apply unto us Chriſts ſatisfaction. But theſe meale-mouth'd Divines were ſoone charm'd; foure ſeverall Popes (as their Cardinall confeſſes) felt upon the neck of them and their opinion: Leo the tenth, Pius the fift, Gregory the thirteenth, and Clemens the ſixt: and with their furious Buls bellow out threats againſt them, & toſſe them in the aire for Heretickes, and teach them upon pain of a curſe, to ſpeak home with Bellarmine, Paſſionibus ſanctorũ expiari delicta; and ſtraight, Applicari nobis ſanctorum paſſiones ad redimendas pœnas, quas pro peccatis Deo debemus: That by the ſufferings of Saints, our ſins are expiated; and that, by them applied, we are redeemed frõ thoſe puniſhments, which we yet owe to God. Blaſphemy, worthy the tearing of garments: How is it finiſhed by Chriſt, if men muſt ſupply? Oh bleſſed Saviour, was every drop of thy blood enough to redeem a world, & doe we yet need the help of men? How art thou a perfect Saviour, if our brethren alſo muſt be our redeemers? Oh ye bleſſed Saints, how would you abhor this ſacrilegious glory? & with thoſe holy Apoſtles, yea, that glorious Angell, ſay, Vide ne feceris; and with E thoſe wiſe Virgins, leſt there will not be enough for us and you, goe to them that ſel, and buy for your ſelves. For us, we envy not their multitude: let them have as many Saviours as Saints, and as many Saints as men; we know with Ambroſe, Chriſti paſſio adjutore non eguit; Chriſts paſſion needs no helpers: and therefore, with that worthy Martyr, dare ſay, None but Chriſt, none but Chriſt. Let our ſoules die, if he cannot ſave them; let them not fear their death or torment, if he have finiſhed. Hear this thou languiſhing & afflicted ſoul: There is not one of thy ſins but it is paid for; not one of thy debts in the ſcroll of God, but it is croſſed; not one farthing of all thine infinite ranſom is unpaid. Alas, thy sins (thou sayest) are ever before thee, and Gods indignation goes still over thee, and thou mourning all the day long, & with that pattern of distresse, cryest out in the bitternesse of thy soule, I have sinned, what shall I doe to thee, O thou preserver of men? What shouldst thou doe? turn and believe. Now thou art stung in thy conscience with this firy Serpent, look up with the eies of faith to this brazen Serpent, Christ Jesus, and be healed. Behold, his head is humbly bowed down in a gracious respect to thee; his arms are stretched out lovingly to embrace thee; yea, his precious side is open to receive thee, & his tongue interprets all these to thee for thine endlesse comfort; It is finished. There is no more accusation, judgement, death, hell for thee: all these are no more to thee than if they were not. Who shall condemn? It is Christ which is dead. I know how ready every man is to reach forth his hand to this dole of grace, and how angry to be beaten from this doore of mercy. We are all easily perswaded to hope well, because we love our selves well: which of all us in this great congregation, takes exceptions to himself, & thinks, I know there is no want in my Saviour; there is want in me. He hath finished, but I believe nor, I repent not. Every presumptuous & hard heart so catches at Christ, as if he had finisht for all, as if he had broken downe the gates of hell, & loosed the bands of death, and had made forgivenes as common as life: Prosperitas stultorum perdit eos, saith wise Solomon; Ease slaieth the foolish, and the prosperity of fools destroyeth them; yea, the confidence of prosperity. Thou sayest, God is mercifull, thy Saviour bounteous, his passion absolute: all these, and yet thou mayest be condemned. Mercifull, not unjust; bountifull, not lavish; absolutely sufficient for all, not effectuall to all. Whatsoever God is, what art thou? Here is the doubt: Thou sayest well; Christ is the good Shepheard. Wherein? He gives his life: but for whom? for his sheep. What is this to thee? while thou art secure, prophane, impenitent, thou art a Wolfe or a Goat: My sheep hear my voice: what is his voice, but his precepts? Where is thine obedience to his commandements? If thou wilt not heare his Law, never hearken to his Gospell. Here is no more mercy for thee, than if there were no Saviour. He hath finished, for those in whom he hath begun: if thou have no beginnings of grace as yet, hope not for ever finishing of salvation: Come to me all ye that are heavy laden, saith Christ: thou shalt get nothing, if thou come when he cals thee not. Thou art not called, and canst not be refreshed, unlesse thou be laden, not with sin (this alone keeps thee away from God) but with conscience of sin: A broken and contrite heart, O God, thou wilt not despise. Is thy heart wounded with thy sin? doth griefe and hatred strive within thee, whether shall be more? Are the desires of thy soule with God? Doest thou long for holinesse, complain of thy imperfections, struggle against thy corruptions? Thou art the man, feare not, It is finished. That Law which thou wouldest have kept, and couldest not, thy Saviour could, and did keep for thee: that salvation which thou couldest never work out alone (alas, poore impotent creatures, what can we doe towards heaven without him, which cannot move on earth but in him?) he alone for thee hath finished. Look up therefore boldly to the throne of God, and upon the truth of thy repentance and faith, know that there is no quarrell against thee in heaven, nothing but peace and joy. All is finished. He would be spitted on, that he might wash thee; he would be covered with scornfull robes, that thy sins might be covered; he would be whipped, that thy soule might not be scourged eternally; he would thirst, that thy soule might be satisfied; he would beare all his Fathers wrath, that thou mightest beare none; he would yeeld to death, that thou mightest never taste of it; he would be in sense for a time as forsaken of his Father, that thou mightest be received for ever.

Now bid thy soule return to her rest, and enjoyn it Davids taske: Praise the Lord O my soule; and, What shall I render to the Lord for all his benefits? I will take the cup of salvation, and call upon the name of the Lord. And, as ravisht from thy selfe with the sweet apprehension of his mercy, call all the other creatures to the fellowship of this joy with that divine Esay: Rejoyce O yee heavens, for the Lord hath done it: shout yee lower parts of the earth, burst forth into praises yee mountains: for the Lord hath redeemed Jacob, and will be glorified in Israel. And even now begin that heavenly Song, which shall never end with those glorified Saints; Praise, and honor, and glory, and power, be to Him that sitteth upon the Throne, and to the Lambe for evermore.

Thus

A Thus our speech of Christs last word is finished. His last act accompanied his words: our speech must follow it. Let it not want your devout and carefull attention; He bowed, and gave up the ghost.

The Crosse was a slow death, and had more paine than speed: whence a second violence must dispatch the crucified: their bones must be broken, that their hearts might break. Our Saviour stayes not deaths leisure, but willingly and couragiously meets him in the way; and like a Champion that scornes to be overcome, yea, knows he cannot be, yeeldeth in the middest of his strength, that he might by dying, vanquish death. He bowed and gave up: Not bowing, because he had given up, but because he would. He cryed with a loud voice, saith Matthew. Nature was strong, he might have lived; but he gave up the ghost: and would die, to shew himself Lord of life and death. Oh wondrous example! he that gave life to his enemies, gave up his own: he gives them to live, that persecute and hate him; and himselfe will die the whiles for those
B that hate him. He bowed and gave up: not they; they might crowne his head, they could not bow it: they might vex his spirit, not take it away: they could not doe that without leave; this they could not doe, because they had no leave. He alone would bow his head, and give up his ghost: I have power to lay downe my life. Man gave him not his life; man could not bereave it. No man takes it from me. Alas, who could? The High-Priests forces, when they came against him armed, he said but, I am he, they flee and fall backward. How easie a breath dispersed his enemies? whom he might as easily have bidden the earth, yea, hell to swallow, or fire from heaven to devour. Who commanded the Devils, and they obeyed, could not have been attached by men: he must give not only leave, but power to apprehend himself, else they had not lived to take him: he is laid hold of; Peter fights: Put up, saith Christ; Thinkest thou that I
C cannot pray to my Father, and he will give me more than twelve Legions of Angels? What an Army were here? more than threescore and twelve thousand Angels, and every Angell able to subdue a world of men: he could, but would not be rescued; he is led by his own power, not by his enemies; and stands now before Pilate, like the scorne of men; crowned, robbed, scourged, with an Ecce homo; Yet thou couldst have no power against me, unlesse it were given thee from above.

Behold, he himselfe must give Pilate power against himselfe, else he could not be condemned: he will be condemned, lifted up, nailed; yet no death without himselfe. He shall give his soule an offering for sinne, Esay 53.10. No action, that savours of constraint, can be meritorious: he would deserve, therefore he would suffer and die. He bowed his head, and gave up the ghost. O gracious and bountifull Saviour: he might have kept his soule within his teeth, in spight of all the world; the weakenesse of God is stronger than men: and if he had but spoken the word, the heavens and earth should
D have vanisht away before him: but he would not. Behold, when he saw, that impotent man could not take away his soule, he gave it up, and would die, that we might live. See here a Saviour, that can contemne his owne life for ours; and cares not to be dissolved in himself, that we might be united to his Father. Skin for Skin, saith the Devill, and all that he hath a man will give for his life. Loe here, to prove Satan a lyer, Skin and life and all hath Christ Jesus given for us. We are besotted with the earth, and make base shifts to live; one with a maimed body, another with a perjured soule, a third with a rotten name: and how many had rather neglect their soule than their life, and will rather renounce and curse God, than die? It is a shame to tell; Many of us Christians dote upon life, and tremble at death; and shew our selves fooles in our excesse of love, cowards in our feare. Peter denies Christ thrice, and forsweares
E him; Marcellinus twice casts graines of incense into the Idols fire; Ecebolius turnes thrice; Spira revolts and despaires: Oh let me live, saith the fearefull soule. Whether doest thou reserve thy selfe, thou weake and timorous creature? or what wouldest thou doe with thy selfe? Thou hast not thus learned Christ: he died voluntarily for thee, thou wilt not be forced to die for him: he gave up the ghost for thee, thou wilt not let others take it from thee for him, thou wilt not let him take it for himselfe.

Quod emittitur voluntarium est: quod amittitur necessarium. Ambr.

We When I look back to the first Christians, and compare their zealous contempt of death with our backwardnesse: I am at once amazed and ashamed: I see there even women (the feebler ſex) running with their little ones in their armes for the preferment of Martyrdome, and ambitiouſly ſtriving for the next blow. I ſee holy and tender Virgins, chuſing rather a ſore and ſhamefull death, than honourable Eſpouſals. I heare the bleſſed Martyrs, intreating their tyrants and tormentors for the honour of dying. Ignatius, amongſt the reſt, fearing leſt the beaſts will not devoure him; and vowing the firſt violence to them, that he might be diſpatched. And what leſſe courage was there in our memorable and glorious fore-fathers of the laſt of this age? and doe we, their cold and feeble off-ſpring, look pale at the face of a faire and naturall death; abhorre the violent, though for Chriſt? Alas, how have we gathered ruſt with our long peace? Our unwillingneſſe is from inconſideration, from diſtruſt. Looke but up to Chriſt Jeſus upon his Croſſe, and ſee him bowing his head, and breathing out his ſoule, and theſe fears ſhall vaniſh: he died, and wouldeſt thou live? he gave up the ghoſt, and wouldeſt thou keep it? whom wouldeſt thou follow, if not thy Redeemer? If thou die not, if not willingly, thou goeſt contrary to him, and ſhalt never meet him. Though thou ſhouldeſt every day die a death for him, thou couldeſt never requite his one death; and doeſt thou ſtick at one? Every word hath his force; both to him and thee: he died, which is the Lord of life, and commander of death; thou art but a tenant of life, a ſubject of death: and yet it was not a dying, but a giving up, not of a vaniſhing and aërie breath, but of a ſpirituall ſoule, which after ſeparation, hath an entire life in it ſelfe, He gave up the ghoſt: he died, that hath both overcome, and ſanctified, and ſweetned death. What feareſt thou? He hath pull'd out the ſting and malignity of death: If thou be a Chriſtian, carry it in thy boſome, it hurts thee not. Dareſt thou not truſt thy Redeemer? If he had not died, Death had been a Tyrant; now he is a ſlave. O death where is thy ſting? O grave where is thy victory? Yet the Spirit of God ſaith not, he died, but gave up the ghoſt: The very Heathen Poet ſaith; He durſt not ſay, that a good man dies. It is worth the noting (me thinks) that when S. Luke would deſcribe to us the death of Ananias and Sapphira, he ſaith (ἐξέψυξε) he expired: but when Saint John would deſcribe Chriſt's death, he ſaith, παρέδωκε τὸ πνεῦμα, He gave up the ghoſt: How? How gave he it up, and whither? So, as after a ſort he retained it: his ſoule parted from his body; his God-head was never diſtracted either from ſoule or body: this union is not in nature, but in perſon. If the natures of Chriſt could be divided, each would have his ſubſiſtence; ſo there ſhould be more perſons. God forbid, one of the natures thereof may have a ſeparation in it ſelfe: the ſoule from the body: one nature cannot be ſeparate from other, or either nature from the perſon. If you cannot conceive, wonder: the Son of God hath wedded unto himſelfe our humanity, without all poſſibility of divorce; the body hangs on the Croſſe, the ſoule is yeelded, the God-head is eviternally united to them both; acknowledges, ſuſtaines them both. The ſoule in his agony feels not the preſence of the God-head; the body upon the Croſſe feeles not the preſence of the ſoule. Yet as the Fathers of Chalcedon ſay truly, (ἀδιαιρέτως, ἀχωρίστως) indiviſibly, inſeparably is the God-head with both of theſe, ſtill and ever, one and the ſame perſon. The Paſſion of Chriſt (as Auguſtine) was the ſleep of his Divinity: ſo I may ſay, The death of Chriſt was the ſleep of his humanity. If he ſleep, he ſhall doe well, ſaid that Diſciple of Lazarus. Death was too weake to diſſolve the eternall bonds of this heavenly conjunction. Let not us Chriſtians goe too much by ſenſe; we may be firmely knit to God, and not feele it: thou canſt not hope to be ſo neere thy God, as Chriſt was, united perſonally: thou canſt not feare, that God ſhould ſeeme more abſent from thee, than he did from his owne Son: yet was he ſtill one with both body and ſoule, when they were divided from themſelves; when he was abſent to ſenſe, he was preſent to faith; when abſent in viſion, yet in union one and the ſame: ſo will he be to thy ſoule, when he is at worſt. He is thine, and thou art his: if thy hold ſeem looſened, his is not. When temptations will not let thee ſee him, he ſees thee and poſſeſſes thee; onely believe thou againſt ſenſe, above hope; and though he kill thee, yet truſt in him. Whither gave he it up? Himſelfe expreſſes; Father, into thy hands; And, This day ſhalt thou be with me in Paradiſe. It is Juſtice to reſtore, whence we receive; Into thy hands. He knew where it ſhould be both ſafe and happy: True, he might bee bold (thou ſayeſt)

Quod ſi venire noluerint, ego vim faciam ut decurrer.

Si per ſingulos dies pro eo moreremur, quis nos dilexit, non ſic debitum exolveremus, Chryſ.

Quantumcunque te diviſum, humanitas non erat Chriſto, Hilarius.

A as the Sonne with the Father. The servants have done so; David before him, Steven after him. And lest we should not thinke it our common right; Father (saith he) I will that those thou hast given me, may be with me, even where I am: he wils it, therefore it must be. It is not presumption, but faith, to charge God with thy spirit; neither can there ever be any beleeving soule so mean, that he should refuse it; all the feare is in thy self: how canst thou trust thy jewell with a stranger? What sudden familiarity is this? God hath been with thee, and gone by thee; thou hast not saluted him and now in all the haste thou bequeathest thy soule to him. On what acquaintance? How desperate is this carelesnesse? If thou have but a little money, whether thou keep it, thou layest it up in the Temple of trust; or whether thou let it, thou art sure of good assurance, sound bonds. If but a little land, how carefully doest thou make firme conveyances to thy desired heires? If goods, thy Will hath taken secure order, who shall B enjoy them: We need not teach you Citizens to make sure worke for your estates. If children, thou disposest of them in trades, with portions: onely of the soule (which is thy selfe) thou knowest not what shall become. The world must have it no more; thy self wouldest keep it, but thou knowest thou canst not: Satan would have it, and thou knowest not whether he shall: thou wouldst have God have it, and thou knowest not whether he will: yea, thy heart is now ready with Pharoah to say, Who is the Lord? O the fearefull and miserable estate of that man, that must part with his soule, he knows not whither: which if thou wouldest avoid, (as this very warning shall judge thee if thou doe not) be acquainted with God in thy life, that thou maist make him the Guardian of thy soule in thy death. Given up it must needs be, but to him that hath governed it: if thou have given it to Satan in thy life, how canst thou hope God will in thy death entertaine it? Did you not hate me, and expell me out of my
C Fathers house? how then come ye to me now in this time of your tribulation, said Jeptha to the men of Geliad. No, no, either give up thy soule to God while he cals for it in his word, in the provocations of his love, in his afflictions, in the holy motions of his spirit to thine: or else when thou wouldst give it, he will none of it, but as a Judge to deliver it to the Tormentor.

What should God do with an unclean, drunken, prophane, proud, covetous soule? without holinesse, it is no seeing of God. Depart from me, ye wicked, I know ye not: Goe to the gods you have served. See how God is even with men: they had, in the time of the Gospell, said to the holy one of Israel, Depart from us; now in the time of judgement, he saith to them, Depart from me: They would not know God when they might: now God will not know them when they would.

Now therefore (beloved) if thou would'st not have God scorne the offer of thy
D death-bed, fit thy soule for him in thy health; furnish it with grace; inure it to a sweet conversation with the God of heaven: then mayest thou boldly give it up, and he shall as graciously receive it, yea fetch it by his Angels to his glory.

He gave up the ghost. We must doe as he did: not all with the same successe. Giving up, supposes a receiving, a returning. This inmate that we have in our bosome, is sent to lodge here for a time, may not dwell here alwayes. The right of this tenure is the Lords, not ours: As he said of the hatchet; It is but lent, it must be restored: It is ours to keep, his to dispose and require. See and consider both our priviledge and charge. It is not with us as with bruit creatures: we have a living ghost to informe us, which yet is not ours, (and, alas, what is ours, if our soules be not?) but must be given up to him that gave it.

Why doe we live as those that took no keep of so glorious a guest? as those that
E should never part with it, as those that thinke it given them to spend, not to returne with a reckoning?

If thou hadst no soule, if a mortall one, if thine owne, if never to be required, how couldst thou live but sensually? Oh remember but who thou art, what thou hast, and whither thou must; and thou shalt live like thy selfe, while thou art, and give up thy ghost confidently, when thou shalt cease to be. Neither is there here more certainty of our departure, than comfort. Carry this with thee to thy death-bed, and see if it can refresh thee, when all the world cannot give thee one dram of comfort. Our spirit is our deareſt riches: it we ſhould loſe it, here were juſt cauſe of griefe. Howle and lament, if thou thinkeſt thy ſoule periſheth: it is not forfeited, but ſurrendred. How ſafely doth our ſoule paſſe through the gates of death, without any impeachment, while it is in the hand of the Almighty? Woe were us, if he did not keep it while we have it; much more when we reſtore it. We give it up to the ſame hands that created, infuſed, redeemed, renewed; that doth protect, preſerve, eſtabliſh, and will crown it: I know whom I have beleeved, and am perſwaded that he is able to keep that which I have committed to him againſt that day. O ſecure and happy eſtate of the godly: Oh bleſſed exchange of our condition: whiles our ſoule dwels in our breaſt, how is it ſubject to iuſinite miſeries, diſtempered with paſſions, charged with ſinne, vexed with tentations? above, none of theſe: how ſhould it be otherwiſe? This is our pilgrimage, that our home: this our wilderneſſe, that our land of promiſe: this our bondage, that our Kingdome: our impotency cauſeth this our ſorrow.

VVhen our ſoule is once given up, what evill ſhall reach unto heaven, and wreſtle with the Almightie? Our lothneſſe to give up, comes from our ignorance and infidelitie. No man goes unwillingly to a certaine preferment. I deſire to be diſſolved, ſaith Paul: I have ſerved thee, I have beleeved thee, and now I come to thee, ſaith Luther. The voice of Saints, not of men. If thine heart can ſay thus, thou ſhalt not need to intreat with old Hilarion, Egredere mea anima, egredere, quid times? Go thy wayes forth my ſoule, goe forth, what feareſt thou? but it ſhall flie up alone cheerefully from thee, and give up it ſelfe into the armes of God, as a faithfull Creator and Redeemer. This earth is not the element of thy ſoule, it is not where it ſhould be. It ſhall be no leſſe thine, when it is more the owners. Think now ſeriouſly of this point; Gods Angell is abroad, and ſtrikes on all ſides; we know not which of our turnes ſhall be the next: we are ſure we carry deaths enow within us. If we be ready, our day cannot come too ſoone. Stirre up thy ſoule to an heavenly cheerfulneſſe, like thy Saviour: Know but whither thou art going; and thou canſt not but with divine Paul, ſay from our Saviours mouth, even in this ſenſe; It is a more bleſſed thing to give, than to receive.

God cannot abide an unwilling gueſt: give up that ſpirit to him, which he hath given thee; and he will both receive what thou giveſt, and give it thee againe, with that glory and happineſſe, which can never be conceived, and ſhall never be ended. Even ſo Lord Jeſus come quickly.

THE IMPRESE OF GOD.

THE FIRST PART.

ZACHAR. 14. 20.

In that day shall be written upon the bridles (or bels) of the Horses, Holines unto the Lord: and the pots of the Lords house, shall be like the bowles before the Altar.

IF any man wonder whither this discourse can tend, of horses, and bels, and pots, and bowles for the Altar; Let him consider that of Tertullian, Ratio divina in medulla est, nō in superficie: These horses if they be well menaged, will prove like those fierie Horses of Elias, to carry us up to our heaven, 2 King. 2. 11. These Bels, like those golden bels of Aarons robe, Exod. 39. 25. These Pots, like that Olla pulmenti of the Prophets, after Elisha's meale, 2 King. 4. and these Bowles, like that blessed and fruitfull navell of the Church, Cant. 7. 2.

S. Paul asks, Doth God take care for oxen? so may I here, Doth God take care for horses? Surely, to provide for them, not to propheſie of them; much lesse of their bels, the unnecessary ornaments of a necessary creature; But he that forbids us to learne of the horse that lesson of stubbornnesse, by the Psalmist, and checks us oft by the oxe and asse, for their good nature, would have us learne here, under this parable of the horse, and the bels of the horse, and the writing on those bels, the estate of our own peace and sanctification. God doth both speake, and worke in Parables, as that Father saith well: Of this then I may truly say, as Hierome said of the book of Job, Singula verba plena sunt sensibus: Suffer your selves with Abrahams Ram, to be perplexed a while in these bryers, that you may be prepared for a fit sacrifice to God.

In that day:] What day is that? All dayes are his, who is the Ancient of dayes; and yet he saies, Abraham saw my day, and rejoyced. He that made all dayes, saies yet againe, This is the day which the Lord hath made: There is one day of the weeke, Gods; κυριακὴ, Revel. 1. and yet I would it were his; Gods day by creation, by ordination, I would it were his by observation too: There is one day in an age his: While it is called to day, Heb. 3. The day of visitation; and yet this thy day, Luk. 19. 42. One day in a world his, Matth. 7. 22. In that day: A day beyond the world, his. To day have I begotten thee, Hodie, i. ab Eterno, which is a nunc stans, as Aquinas defines it. The Heathens had five famous periods of computations, Ninus Monarchie, Ogyges Flood, Trojan Warre, Olympiads, Vrbs condita; All ours is ab illo die, which S. Paul cals, The fulnesse of Time; But Christ hath two dayes, as two commings: His first, In die illa radix Jesse, saith Esay 11. 10. The day of his comming to sojourne in the world; His second, 1 Cor. 1. 8. The day of his returne, which S. Paul cals ἡμέραν ἀπολυτρώσεως, Ephes. 4. 30. when he comes to ransome us, and to judge the world: both are dayes indeed; In the first, there is no night of his absence, though to our sense there bee some little darkenesse of our miserie: In the second, no absence, nor no miserie; A day day without night, *Revel.*21.25. This prophecie is true of both; Partially and inchoately of the firſt; totally and abſolutely of the ſecond: Of the firſt ſo farre as it makes way for, and reſembles the ſecond: and this as it is here principally intended, ſo ſhall it be the drift of our diſcourſe.

This is the day: Now what of this day? There ſhall be a Motto written: An honorable Motto; ſuch as was written upon the מצנפת the Turbant of the High Prieſt. Holineſſe to the Lord: And where ſhall it be written? An honorable Motto in an ignoble place; על מצלות: Not as Aquila and Theodotian, under the belly of the horſe, ſuper profundum; Nor as Symmachus, under his feet, ſuper inceſſum umbroſum; The ſenſes are ſenſeleſſe (though you take them cum grano ſalis, as the Lawyers admoniſh) they ſavour neither the ſenſe, nor word; Not, as Jerome, the Septuagint and Geneve, ſuper frænum; Tho this hath the ſenſe well, not the word; Hieroms Maſter came a little neerer (ſuper phaleras,) Thoſe of the Rabbins yet light righteſt both on the word, and ſenſe; which turn ſuper Tintinnabula; For ten times at leaſt in the Chronicles & Ezra, is the ſame word dually uſed; for Cymbals; and the Verb of this root, is the ſame, whereby God would expreſſe the tingling of the ears: תעלנה *Tinniēt aures audientiū Ier.*19 To adorne their horſes with bels, was not only a faſhion in thoſe South-East Countries, but in our fore-fathers dayes in this Land: as it were eaſie to ſhow you, but out of Chaucers Antiquity; and ſome of us have ſeen it ſtill in uſe elſewhere. What bells then were theſe? Not of the Prieſt; It had been eaſie to transferre his embleme from his forehead, to his ſkirts; but of the horſes: The horſe an uncleane beaſt, *Levit.*11. A warlike beaſt, *Equus paratur in diem belli. Prov.*21.31. Whence ſtill ſhall you finde Horſes and Chariots put together: and In bello & equis, *Oſe.*1.7. Behold this Motto had wont to be written upon a man, now upon a beaſt: had wont upon an holy man, The High Prieſt; now upon an unclean beaſt: before, upon a man of peace, now on a beaſt of warre; Before upon the forehead of the High Prieſt, now (as Rab. Eliezar) inter oculos, betwixt the eyes of the Horſe. But what? not to continue there; as ſome Rabbins and good Interpreters: but ſo that of theſe very Bells ſhall be made Pots for the uſe of ſacrifice; Like as of the glaſſes of the Jewiſh women was made a Laver; and of the Jewels of the Midianitiſh Camels a rich Ephod. This is well, to come thus neer; yet they ſhall be promoted higher: They ſhall be bowles for the Altar: The Pots might be greater, for there was *Olla Grandis.*2 *King.*4. But the bowls were more noble and more peculiarly devoted to Gods ſervice: Moſes ſhall comment upon Zacharie: *Num.*7. Twelve ſeverall times you have the matter of theſe bowles (ſilver) the weight, 70. ſhekels: The uſe, for floure and oyle for the meat-offering, beſides that following imployment for the incenſe. But I hold not this dependance neceſſary: Here are rather two diſtinct propheſies, though to one purpoſe, as we ſhall ſee in the proceſſe. You ſee now Zacharies holy riddle read; That God, under the Goſpell will effect a gracious ſanctification both of things, and perſons; and by thoſe things which in their uſe have been altogether prophane, will indifferently glorifie himſelfe, and worke them both to peace, and holineſſe: And as Cyprian ſaith, Fidem rerum cur ſua implevit.

What now is more fit for Courtiers to heare of, than an Impreſe of honour? What more fit for Kings and Princes than the Impreſe of the God of heaven? And as in all Impreſes, there is a body, and a ſoule, as they are termed; ſo are both here without any affectation: The ſoule of it is the Motto, or Word, Holineſſe to the Lord: The body, is the ſubject it ſelfe; As oft-times the very ſhield is the device: The ſubject, Bels of the horſes.

In the Word, firſt ſee the ancient uſe of Heraldry in the Scriptures: That part eſpecially which concerns Inſcriptions: as on Coyns, Sheilds, Enſignes: If the Teſtament of the Patriarks had as much credit, as antiquity, all the Patriarks had their Armes aſſign'd them by Jacob: Judah a Lyon, Dan a Serpent, Nepthali an Hinde, Benjamin a Wolf, Joſeph a bough, and ſo the reſt. The coyn which Jacob paid to the Shechemites was ſtamped with a Lambe, *Gen.*32. And, if Judahs ring that he left with Thamar, had not had an inſcription, it could not ſo certainly have deſcryed his Maſter. Theſe coynes had a figure without a word: The frontall of the High Prieſt had a word, without a figure: The ſhekel of the Sanctuary (whoſe Character we have oft ſeen) had had both a word & a figure: the word, Holy Jeruſalem; the figure, A pot of Manna, like a large chalice, and Aarons rod, not budding but branching out. Salomon compares the Church to an Army with Banners; there could be no uſe, no diſtinction of Banners, without inſcriptions; The Maccabees had foure Hebrew letters in their Enſigne, for both their word, and device: whence they had their name: Yea, this is not in via only, but in patria: They ſhall have a white ſtone, and a new name written in it: The field and the armes, both named, and unknown: The uſe therefore of inſcriptions and armes muſt needs be very laudable, as ancient; ſince God himſelf was the firſt Herald, and ſhall be the laſt. Yea the very Anabaptiſts, that ſhake off all the yoke of Magiſtracy, yet when they had ripened their fanaticall projects, & had raiſed their king Becold, from the ſhop-boord to the Thron, would not want this point of honor: And therefore he muſt have one henchman on the right hand to carry a Crown, and a Bible, with an inſcription; On the left, another, that carried a ſword naked, and a ball of Gold: Himſelfe in great ſtate carries a globe of Gold, with two ſwords acroſſe. His preſſing iron and ſheeres would have become him better.

And if I ſhould looke to heatheniſh Antiquity, I ſhould need to ſay no more, than that the Ægyptian Hieroglyphicks, whereof they ſay Horus Apollo was the inventer, were nothing elſe, but Emblems & Impreſes: among the reſt, it is memorable that Ruffinus reports, that the ſigne of the croſſe was one of their χαμματα ἱερατικα, their ancient figures long before Chriſt: which (ſaith he) ſignified to them, eternall life: and Socrates adds, that when they found the ſigne of the Croſſe (in Templo Serapidis) the Heathen and Chriſtians contended for it, each challenged it for theirs; and when the heathen knowing the ſignification of it, ſaw it thus fulfilled to the Chriſtians, many of them converted to Chriſtianity. Be it farre from us, to put any ſuperſtition in this; I think it done, by the ſame inſtinct whereby the Sybils propheſied of Chriſt. And as Armes, and Embleticall devices are thus ancient, and commendable; ſo more directly Poſies and words, whether for inſtruction, or diſtinction, are here warranted. So the word of a faithfull King, is Dominus mihi adjutor; or when he would thankfully aſcribe his peace to God; Exurgat Deus, diſſipentur inimici: ſo of a good Prince, either, I ſerve, to expreſſe his officious care; Or, One of your own, to ſignifie his reſpective love. So the good Stateſman's ſhould be given him by Salomon, Non eſt conſilium contra Dominum, No policie againſt the Lord: A good Courtier's, by Samuel, Honorantes me honorabo: A good Biſhop's, by Paul, εὐκαίρως ἀκαίρως; In ſeaſon, out of ſeaſon. A good ſubject's, Not for fear, but Conſcience. A good Chriſtians, Chriſtus mihi vivere eſt. So the Iſraelites were charged to make their Emblem the Law of God; for their poſts, for their garments. But theſe things may not be written upon our walls, or ſhields onely; They muſt be written upon our hearts; elſe we are as very painted walls, as our walls themſelves: Elſe we ſhall be like ſome Inne, that hath a Crown for the ſigne without, and within there is none but Peſants; or a Roſe upon the poſt without, and nothing but ſluttiſhneſſe and filth within: Or an Angell without, and nothing within, but lewd drunkards. As it is ſaid of God, Dixit, & factum eſt; So alſo, ſcripſit, & factum eſt; They ſhall be written holy, that is, they ſhall be made holy: Happy is it for us, tho we write no new emblemes of our owne, if we can have this holy Impreſe of God, written not in our fore-heads, but in our hearts, Holineſſe to the Lord. Thus much of the Embleme, or word. Now for the ſubject and Circumſtances: In that day, above this; there is the proficiency of the Church; Holineſſe ſhall be written upon the bels; prophane things ſhall be holy, There is the Sanctification of the Church: The bels of warlike horſes ſhall be turned to the quiet uſe of Religion: There is the religious peace of the Church. Thirdly, the pots to ſeethe in, ſhall be as Bowles, to offer up incenſe in; There is the degrees of the Churches perfection: ſo that here ariſe foure heads of our ſpeech; The Proficiencie, Sanctification, Peace, Perfection of the Church. All which crave your gracious and Chriſtian attention; or leſt I bee too long, two of them only.

When therefore ſhall this be fulfilled? Not under the Law: It had been a great profanation: For none but the High-Prieſt might weare this poſie: the place oft-times diſparages; As to put the Arke of God into a Cart, or to ſet it by Dagon.

It

It is under the Goſpell, that this poſie of Holineſſe ſhall be ſo common; in illa die, and this is that day: How great is this proficiency of the Church? Look how much difference there is between one and many, between the holieſt of men, and an ordinary beaſt, betweene the frontall of the High-Prieſt, and the Bells of horſes, ſo much there muſt be betwixt the Church in that day, and in this. It is the faſhion of the true Church, to grow up ſtill, from worſe to better, as it is ſaid of the head of the Church, Creſcebat & corroborabatur. As it is cõpared to ſtones for firmnes, ſo to graſts for growth; Yea the kingdome of heaven is like a graine of muſtard-ſeed, that of the leaſt ſeed, proves the greateſt plant, in his kinde: the river of God flowes firſt up to the ankles, then to the knees, and at laſt to the chin.

The Church was an Embryo till Abrahams time; In ſwathing-bands till Moſes: In child-hood till Chriſt; A man in Chriſt, A man full-growne in glory. As man is an Epitome of the world, ſo is every Chriſtian an abridgement of the Church; Beſt at laſt; In illa die. He is like to the feaſt of Cana, where the beſt wine was brought in laſt; not naturally, but by tranſmutation. It was a blaſphemous, and (mee thinks) a Vorſtian reaſon, that Toſtatus brings, why God did not create the voices out of the Propitiatorie, Quia Deus non poteſt agere per ſucceſſionem: Surely in us he doth; and as we can doe nothing, in inſtante, no more doth God in us. As in the Creation he could have made all at once, but he would take dayes for it; ſo in our re-creation by grace: As naturall, ſo ſpirituall agents, doe agere per moram. That rule of Aquinas is ſure, Succeſſivorum non ſimul eſt eſſe & perfectio: to which that accords of Tertullian, Perfectio ordine poſt-humat. There muſt be an illa dies, for our full ſtature; till which, if we be true Chriſtians, we muſt grow from ſtrength to ſtrength: herein grace is contrary to nature, ſtrongeſt at laſt. We muſt change till then, but in melius, till we come to our beſt; and then, we muſt be like him, in whom is no ſhadow by turning.

But, where we ſhould be like the Sunne till noone, ever riſing; there be many like Ezekia's Sunne, that goe back many degrees in the diall: whoſe beginnings are like Neroes firſt five yeares, full of hope, and peace; Or, like the firſt moneth of a new ſervant; or like unto the foure Ages, whoſe firſt was gold, the laſt iron; Or to Nebuchadnezzars image, which had a precious head, but baſe feet. Looke to your ſelves, this is a fearefull ſigne, a fearefull condition: can he ever be rich, that growes every day poorer? Can he ever reach the Goale, that goes every day a ſtep back from it? Alas then, how ſhall he ever reach the Gaole of glory, that goes every day a ſtep backward in grace? He that is worſe every day, can never be at his beſt, In illa die, In that day.

Hitherto the proficiencie; The ſanctification followes. The Moſaicall Law was ſcrupulous: There were unholy places, unholy garments, perſons, beaſts, fowles, veſſels, touches, taſtes: Under the Goſpell all is holy. All was made unholy, when the firſt Adam ſinned; when the ſecond Adam ſatisfied for ſinne, all was made holy: Moſes the ſervant built his houſe, with a τὸ μεσότοιχον φραγμὸν, Epheſ. 2. 14. a partition wall in the midſt: Chriſt the Sonne pull'd down that ſcreene, and caſt all into one ἀμφοτερα: Jewes and Gentiles, whole hooſes and cloven, dwell now both under a roofe. Moſes branded ſome creatures with uncleanneſſe; he that redeemed his children from morall impurity, redeemed his creatures from legall: What ſhould S. Peters great ſheet let down by foure corners teach us, but that all creatures through the foure corners of the world, are cleane and holy? S. Paul proclaimes the ſumme of Peters viſion; Omnia munda mundis: It is an injurious ſcrupulouſneſſe, to make differences of creatures; injurious to God, to the creature, to our ſelves: To God, while we will not let him ſerve himſelfe of his owne: To the creature, while we powre that ſhame upon it, which God never did: To our ſelves, while we bring our ſelves into bondage, where God hath inlarged us. When Julian had poyſoned the wells, & ſhambles, and fields, with his heatheniſh Luſtrations; the Chriſtians (ſaith Theodoret) ate freely of all, by vertue of Pauls, Quicquid in macello: To let paſſe the idle curiouſneſſe of our ſemi-Anabaptiſts, of the ſeparation; at whoſe folly, if any man be diſpoſed to make himſelfe ſport, let him read the Tragicomicall relation of the Troubles and Excommunication

A mication of the Engliſh at Amſterdam; There ſhall he ſee ſuch warres waged betwixt brothers, for but a buſke, or whale-bone, or lace, or cork-ſhooe, as if all Law and Goſpell ſtood upon this point; as if heaven and earth were little enough to be mingled in this quarrell; Nec gemino bellum Trojanum. To paſſe over all other lighter niceneſſe of this kinde: Who can chuſe but be aſhamed of the Church of Rome; which is here in a double extremity, both groſſe: In denying, wiping out holineſſe, where God hath written it: and in writing it, where God hath not written it: in the firſt, how doe they drive out Devils out of good creatures, by fooliſh exorciſmes? I would he were no more in themſelves. How do they forbid meats, drinks, dayes, mariage which God hath written holy? Hee that reades Navars Manuall, ſhall finde cholericke blaſphemie a veniall ſinne, pag. 91. ſome theft veniall, p. 140. Common lying, veniall, p. 191. Curſing of Parents, if not malicious, veniall, p. 100. and yet the ſame Author, chap. 21. nu. 11. p. 209. to eat of a forbidden diſh, or an allowed diſh more than once B on a forbidden day, is a mortall ſin: And now theſe venials (ſaith Francis à Victoria) by a Pater-noſter, or ſprinking of holywater, or knock of the breſt are cleared; but that mortall eater is ἔνοχος τῇ κρίσει, guilty of judgement, yea, of hell it ſelfe: Scribes, Phariſes, Hypocrites, which prate of Peters chaire, but will never take out Peters leſſon, That which God hath ſanctified, pollute thou not. In the other: What holineſſe doe they write in religious cowles, Altars, Reliques, Aſhes, Candles, Oyles, Salts, Waters, Enſignes, Roſes, Words, Graines, Agnus Dei, Medalls, and a world of ſuch trash: So much, that they have left none in themſelves. Let me have no faith, if ever play-book were more ridiculous, than their Pontificall, and book of holy Ceremonies. It is well that Jerome reads theſe words, ſuper frænum, not ſuper Tintinnabulum; Elſe, what a rule ſhould we have had; tho he had ſaid, Equorum, not Templorum: What compariſons would have been; If Holineſſe to the Lord muſt be written on the Bells of Horſes, much more on the Bells of Churches. What a colour would this have been for the waſhing, anointing, bleſſing, chriſtening of them? What a warrant for driving away Devils, chaſing of ghoſts, ſtilling of tempeſts, ſtaying of thunders, yea delivering from tentations, which the Pontificall aſcribes to them? By whoſe account, there ſhould be more vertue in this peece of metall, than in their holy Father himſelfe, yea than in any Angell of heaven: But their vulgar bridles them in this, which reads it, ſuper frænum, which ſome ſuperſtitious man would ſay were fulfilled in Conſtantines ſnaffle made of the nailes that pierced Chriſt. How worthy are they in the mean time of the whip, not of men onely, but of God, which thus in a ridiculous preſumption write holineſſe, where God would have a blanke; and wipe out holineſſe, where God hath written it?

For us, there is a double holineſſe; for uſe, for vertue: All things are holy to us for uſe; nothing is holy for vertue of Sanctification, but thoſe things which God hath ſanctified to this vertue; his word, his ſacraments: Wee may uſe the other, and put no holineſſe in them; we muſt uſe theſe, and expect holineſſe from them: οὐδὲν κοινόν, Nothing unclean, is Peters rule, but with Pauls explication, Munda mundis: All things are clean in themſelves; to thee they are not cleane, unleſſe thou be cleane. Mine owne clothes ſhall make me filthy, ſaith Job, 9. 31. Many a one may ſay ſo, more juſtly. The proud mans gay coat, the wanton womans beaſtly faſhions, both ſhew them to be uncleane, and make them ſo. But the lewd man makes his own clothes, filthy; his meats, drinks, ſports, garments, are uncleane to him, becauſe he is uncleane to God; they are curſed to him, becauſe he is curſed of God: God hath written on the outſide of his creatures, Holy to the Lord; we write on the inſide, Unholy to men; becauſe our outſide and inſide is unholy to God: yea, we doe not only deface E this inſcription of holineſſe in other creatures to us, but we will not let God write it upon us, for himſelfe. O our miſery and ſhame! All things elſe are holy; Men, Chriſtians, are unholy. There is no impurity but where is Reaſon, and Faith, the grounds of Holineſſe. How oft would God have written this title upon our foreheads? and ere he can have written one full word, we blot out all: One ſwears it away, another drinks it away, a third ſcoffs it away, a fourth riots it away, a fift ſwaggers it away; and I would to God it were uncharitable to ſay, that there is as much holineſſe in the Bridles of the Horſes, as in ſome of their Riders. Oh holineſſe, the riches of the Saints, the beauty of Angels, the delight of God, whither haſt thou withdrawne thy ſelfe? where ſhould we find thee if not among Chriſtians? and yet how can wee be, or be named Chriſtians without thee? I ſee ſome that are afraid to be too holy: and I ſee but ſome that feare to be too prophane. We are all Saints, πάντες ἅγιοι, 1 Cor. 1.2. All by calling; and ſome but by calling: By calling of men, not of God: As the Church of Rome hath ſome Saints which are queſtioned whether ever they were in nature; others, whether they be not in hell; burning Tapers to them on earth, to whom perhaps the fiends light firebrands below. As Cæſarius the Monke brings in Petrus Cantor, and Roger the Norman diſputing the caſe of Becket; ſo we have many titular Saints, few reall; many which are written in red Letters in the Calendar of the world, Holy to the Lord, whom God never Canonizes in heaven, and ſhall once entertaine with a Neſcio, I know you not. Theſe men yet have holineſſe written upon them, and are like, as Lucian compares his Græcians, to a faire, gilt, boſſed booke: look within, there is the Tragedy of Thyeſtes, or perhaps Arrius his Thalia; the name of a Muſe, the matter hereſie; or Conradus Vorſtius his late monſter, that hath De Deo in the front, and Atheiſme and Blaſphemie in the text. As S. Paul ſaies to his Corinths, would God yee could ſuffer me a little: Yee cannot want praiſers, yee may want reprovers; and yet you have not ſo much need of Panegyricks, as of reprehenſions. Theſe by how much more rare they are, by ſo much more neceſſary. Nec cenſura deeſt quæ increpet, nec medicina quæ ſanet, ſaith Cyprian. A falſe praiſe grieves, and a true praiſe ſhames, ſaith Anaſtaſius. As Kings are by God himſelfe called Gods (for there are Dii nuncupativè, and not Eſſentialiter, as Gregorie diſtinguiſhes) becauſe of their reſemblance of God, ſo their Courts ſhould be like to heaven, and their attendants like Saints & Angels: Decet domum tuam ſanctitudo, agrees to both. Thus you ſhould be: But alas, I ſee ſome care to be gallant, others care to be great, few care to be holy. Yea I know not what Devill hath poſſeſſed the hearts of many great ones of our time in both ſexes with this conceit, that they cannot be gallant enough, unleſſe they be godleſſe. Holineſſe is for Divines, or men of meane ſpirits, for grave, ſubdued, mortified, retired minds; not for them that ſtand upon the termes of honour, height of place and ſpirit, noble humours; hence are our oathes, duels, profaneneſſes. Alas, that we ſhould be ſo beſotted, as to thinke that our ſhame, which is our onely glory: It is reaſon that makes us men, but it is holineſſe that makes us Chriſtians. And woe to us that we are men, if we be not Chriſtians. Thinke as baſely of it as yee will: you ſhall one day finde, that one dram of holineſſe is worth a whole world of greatneſſe; yea, that there is no greatneſſe, but in holineſſe. For Gods ſake therefore doe not ſend holineſſe to Colledges, or Hoſpitals for her lodging, but entertaine her willingly into the Court, as a moſt happy gueſt. Thinke it a ſhame, and danger, to goe in fine clothes, while you have foule hearts; and know, that in vaine ſhall you be honour'd of men, if you be not holy to the Lord. Your goodly outſides may admit you into the Courts on earth; but you ſhall never look within the gates of the Court of heaven without holineſſe: Without holineſſe no man ſhall ſee God. O God, without holineſſe we ſhall never ſee thee; and without thee we ſhall never ſee holineſſe: write thou upon theſe flinty hearts of ours, Holineſſe to thy ſelfe: Make us holy to thee, that we may be glorious with thee and all thy Saints and Angels.

All this only for thy Chriſts ſake, and to whom, &c.

THE IMPRESE OF GOD.

THE SECOND PART.

ZACHAR. ult. 20.

In that day shall there be written upon the bridles of the Horses, The holinesse unto the Lord: and the pots in the Lords house shall be like the bowles before the Altar.

IT is well neere a yeere agoe, since in this Gracious Presence, we entred upon this mysticall, yet pertinent Text. You then heard what This day is; what these Bels or Bridles; what this inscription; what these Pots and Bowles: And out of That day you heard the proficiencie of the Church; out of Holinesse written on the Bels, the sanctification of the Church: You shall now heare, out of these Bels, or Bridles of warlike horses, thus inscribed, the change of the holy warre, and peace of the Church; out of these Pots, advanced to the likenesse of the Bowles of the Altar, the degrees of the Churches perfection, and acceptation; All which crave your gracious and honorable attention. That conceit (which yet is graced with the name of some Fathers) that takes this in the literall sense of Constantines bridle, we passe, as more worthy of smiles than confutation: Questionlesse the sense is spirituall; and it is a sure rule, that as the historicall sense is fetcht from signification of words, so the spirituall from the signification of those things, which are signified by the words.

For this inscription then, it shall not be upon the bels for their own sakes, but for the horses: not as bels, but as bels of the horses, And on the horses, not for their own sakes, but as they serve for their Riders. The horse, a militarie creature; there is no other mention of him in Scripture, no other use of him of old: when the eyes of Elishaes servant were open, he saw the hill full of horses, 2 King 6. Even the celestiall warfare is not expressed without them: Hence you shall ever find them matcht with Chariots in the Scripture: And the Poet, Nunc tempus equos, nunc poscere currus: he rusheth into the battell, saith Jeremie; and he is made for it; for he hath both strength and nimblenesse. He is strong: there is fortitudo equi, Psalm. 47. and God himselfe acknowledges it. Hast thou given the horse his strength, Job. 39. He is swift, saith Jeremy 4. 13. yea as Eagles, or Leopards, saith Abacuc. We must take these horses then, either as continuing themselves, or as altered. If the first; The very wars under the Gospell shall be holy; and God shall much glorifie himselfe by them: He saith not, There shall be no horſes, or thoſe horſes ſhall have no bels, or thoſe bels no inſcription; but thoſe horſes, and their uſe, which is warre, and their ornaments, which are bels, ſhall have a title of Holineſſe. While Cornelius Agrippa writes of the vanitie of Sciences, we may well wonder at the vanity of his opinion, that all war was forbidden under the Goſpel. But let Agrippa be vain in this, as a meere Humaniſt; and the Anabaptiſts groſly falſe, as being frantick heretiques: It is marvell how Eraſmus ſo great a ſcholler, and Ferus ſo great a Text-man could miſcary in this Manichean conceit. Alphonſus à Caſtro would faine have our Oecolampadius to keep them company, but Bellarmine himſelfe can hardly beleeve him: No marvell, when he ſees Zuinglius die in the field, tho as a Paſtor, not as a ſouldier: and when our ſwords have ſo well taught them, beſides our tongues, that the hereticks are as good friends to war, as enemies to them. It is Gods everlaſting title, Dominus exercituum. To ſpeak nothing of the old Teſtament: What can Cornelius Agrippa ſay to Cornelius the Centurion; I fear no man would give that title to him that oppoſed warre, which Gods ſpirit gives to this agent in war; A juſt man, and fearing God: His warfare, ſaith Chryſoſtome, hurt him not. Did not Chriſt himſelf bid (even he that ſaid, Who ſo ſmites with the ſword, ſhall periſh with the ſword, in caſe of private revenge) Qui non habet gladium, vendat tunicã, emat gladium? The Angels themſelves are heavenly ſouldiers; Every Chriſtian is a ſouldier; as he is a Chriſtian, he fights not againſt fleſh & blood, but principalities and powers; as he is a Chriſtian ſouldier, he fights both againſt fleſh and blood, and principalities; All the warres of God: So that contrary to S. Martin, who ſaid, I am a Chriſtian, I may not fight; he muſt ſay, I am a Chriſtian, I muſt fight. And why may he not? God when he makes us Chriſtians, leaves us the ſame wit to deviſe ſtratagems, the ſame hands to execute them. All things (as Eraſmus wittily) have in them naturally a meanes of defence; the Horſe heels, Dog teeth, Oxe hornes, Porcupine quils, Bee ſting, Serpent poyſon; thoſe weaker creatures that cannot reſiſt, have either nimble feet to out-run us, or wings to out-flie us: Only man is left naked: Yet ſo, as his furniture within can ſoon furniſh him for without: Yet all Horſes, all wars, are not written holy; As there is a ſpirituall evill war, of the fleſh againſt the ſpirit: ſo there is a temporall, of fleſh againſt fleſh. Inde bella (ſaith S. James. Militare propter prædã, to fight for a booty (ſaith Ambroſe) is ſin. That witty Alphonſus King of Arragon (to whom we are beholden for ſo many Apothegmes) had for his Impreſe a Pellican ſtriking her ſelfe in the breſt, and feeding her young with the blood; with a word, Pro lege, & grege. All warre drawes blood: oft of the innocent part, μιαιμος is μιαι-αιμος, and therefore muſt never be but pro lege, for Religion; or pro grege, for the Common-wealth. And as it hath theſe two grounds; ſo alſo two directors; Juſtice and Charity. Juſtice, that requires both authority in the menager, and innocence in menaging; Authority; A ſubordinate power is not capable of holy warre: He only may ſay pro lege, that is cuſtos utriuſque tabulæ; he only pro grege, that is ποιμην λαων: If private men ſhall ſay, pro lege, or pro grege, they are traitors, and not ſouldiers; In them, as he ſaid to Alexander, warre is but theft and murder. Only Kings are the publike Juſticers of the world: which can command peace, with their own, and puniſh the breach of peace in others Innocence. Wrong no man, ſaith John Baptiſt. That non ex jure, is more than unchriſtian, bruitiſh.

Charitie; whether in the intention; Peace muſt be the end of war. Bellarmine ſaid this one thing well, that war to the Common-wealth is as vulnera Chirurgi: or, in the action; both of undertaking and ceſſation: undertaking; according to the Jewiſh proverbe, firſt we muſt enquire of Abel; and the heathen Poet could ſay, extremo ocmo primo tentavit loco: no juſt war is ἀναρκτος: Ceſſation, upon juſt ſatisfaction; as Sheba's head raiſes the ſiege of Abel: This is bellum Domini; and Holineſſe is written upon the bels of theſe horſes of warre. Such were the warres of that bleſſed Conſtantine, both Theodoſii, Honorius, and all whom God wrote Holy, and made happy. Such were many gallant Princes of old perſwaded that thoſe wars of Paleſtine were; who in a cunning wile were ſent to get the Holy Land, that in the mean time they might leeſe their owne: How many Councels were ſummon'd, how many Armies levied, one of 200000 at once, by P. Vrbans procurement? how many ſtreams of Chriſtian blood ſpilt to recover the land of them that murdred Chriſt, which God had curſed to cõfu-ſion,

A ſion, terrã ſacerrimam, in the Plautine ſenſe? Such are thoſe that are undertaken againſt the ſcourge of Chriſtendome, the creature of Mahomet, that Turkiſh Magog. Such are thoſe that the Defender of the Chriſtian faith hath been juſtly provoked to undertake againſt that Romiſh uſurper, Peters ſucceſſor in nothing, but in denying his Maſter. The inclemencie of the late Pope labouring to foreſtall him in his juſt throne, and the abſurd pragmaticall impudencie of the preſent, in that groſſe prohibition of a favorable & naturall oath, for his Majeſties ſecurity, in a ſort countenancing rebellion againſt his Perſon; beſide thoſe ſhameleſſe libels of his factors, to the ſcorne of Gods Anointed, have ſeemed to uſurpe Samuels Meſſage, Vade, perente, demolire. To omit private motives; P. Urbane in that his zealous Oration to the Councell of Cleremont uſed no one reaſon to perſwade the world to draw their ſword againſt the Turkes, which might not juſtly be urged to Chriſtian Princes, to ſcale the wals of Rome. Doth he ſpeak of the Saracens prophaning of Jeruſalem? we parallel the ſhamefull profanations of the ſpirituall Jeruſalem; their heatheniſme was never ſo idolatrous. Doth he ſpeak of abuſing the ſepulcher of Chriſt? we parallel them with the abuſing of his ſacred body. Doth he ſpeak of the cruelty of thoſe ſavages? we alſo may ſay of them, Effunditur ſanguis Chriſtianus, Chriſti ſanguine redemptus &c. neither need I fear to ſay with Junius, that in this they are Truces Truciores. But I know what difference there is betwixt a Preacher, & an Herald: our title is Evangelizantes pacem; And tho the ſword of the hand doth well, yet it is the ſword of the mouth, that muſt ſlay that Man of ſin: Yet this I dare ſay, that if in the cauſe of God and his Church, this warre ſhould be undertaken, Holineſſe ſhould be written upon our horſes bridles; and, as we ſhall enter with fewer croſſes upon our breſts, than thoſe honeſt ſouldiers into their holy warre: ſo both our cauſe ſhould be more holy, and we ſhould returne with fewer croſſes on

C our backs; But I meddle not with this. There is a warre that we cannot ſhake off: Not with the perſon, but the corruptions of that foule Church: we have long waged it. God had never any quarrell upon earth, if this be not his. Our bleſſed forefathers have ſhed their bloud in this field, & are glorious: let us ſtir up our chriſtian courage to this ſervice, upon our horſes heads ſhall be written holineſſe; upon ours, glory and immortality. But take theſe horſes and bels altered (as fits better) by this writing from themſelves; what God writes is done: Write this man childleſſe; therefore he muſt be ſo: Joel doth not ſo well comment upon this place, Breake your plow-ſhares into ſwords, & your ſithes into ſpears, Jo. 3. 10. as Micah. 4. 3. They ſhall break their ſwords into mattocks, and their ſpears into ſithes; Mattocks & ſithes the inſtruments of profit, one for the commodities above the earth, the other for thoſe under it: which as I take it, would not be ſo ſtrictly reſtrained to the very time of Chriſts comming, when there was an univerſall peace on earth, & the Temple of Janus was ſhut: as Cyril, Chryſoſtome, Euſebius, Hierom, underſtand it: rather it is a prophecy of that outward & during peace under the Goſpell, which all the true profeſſors of it ſhould maintain with themſelves. All nations, though fierce & ſtern of diſpoſition, yet if they once ſtoop ſincerely to the Goſpel, ſhall compoſe themſelves to a ſweet accordance, & imploy their united ſtrength to the ſervice of God: But how is this fulfilled? Some in all ages have run forth into fury, & troubled the common peace: It is true, but theſe are blanks, ſuch as upon whom God hath not written holines. It is no hoping that all horſes ſhal be bridled, or all bridles written on. As grace, ſo peace is not in ſuch ſort univerſall, that all ſhould incline to it, on all conditions: There are ſome [illegible] Peace haters, it is as poſſible to tame a waſp, as to incline them to peace: Such are the wilfull Romaniſts of our time (to omit Schiſmes) which will rather mingle heaven & earth together, than remit one gainfull error. But what ever be come of theſe Manzers, which do thus exclude themſelves from the congregation of God, it were happy, if all the true and acknowleged ſons of the Church would admit the inſcriptiõ of an holy peace. Alas, why do we that are brethren fall out for our change of ſuits by the way? and make thoſe quarrels deadly, which deſerve not to be quarrels? Oh that ſome bleſſed Dove would bring an Olive of peace into the Ark of God! Who is ſo fit for this glorious ſervice, as our gracious peacemaker? Nemo me impune laceſſet, is a good Poſie; but Beati pacifici, is a better. Let the Vice-gerent of him which is the Prince of peace, as he was made for the peace of the wals, & proſperity of the gates of Sion, be that Angelus pacis, Eſ. 33.7. Let his wiſdome and ſweet moderation proceed to allay all theſe unkindely ſtorms of the Church, that we may live to ſee that happy greeting of the Pſalmiſt, Righteouſneſſe & Peace have kiſſed eachother. And as this holds in matter of judgment, ſo of practice too. Do you ſee a looſe & lawles man, wilful in his deſires, unbridled in his affections, inordinate in his life, imploying his wit to ſcoffe at his Creator, caring for nothing but the worſe part of himſelfe? There is one of Zacharies horſes; when Gods ſpirit breaths upon the ſoule of this man, he is now another from himſelfe: Holineſſe to the Lord is written upon his bels. This was done ſomtimes of old: Saul was among the Prophets; Salomon & Manaſſes, great patterns of converſion; but rarely in reſpect of the daies of the Goſpell. What ſhould I ſpeak of S. Paul? No ground would hold him, he runs chafing and foaming from Hieruſalem to Damaſcus; of his Jaylor? of Mary Magdalen? Behold whole troupes of wild natures reclaimed, Eph. 4. Coloſ. 3. Act. 2. Who can deſpaire where God undertakes? Shew me never ſo violent and deſperate a ſinner, let him be as Iobs wild aſſe in the deſart, or as Amos his horſe, that wil run upon the rocks, Amos 6.12 if God once take him in hand, thou ſhalt ſoon ſee that this horſe is fleſh, & not ſpirit, & ſhalt ſing Deborahs, Ungulæ ceciderunt, Jud. 5.22. or Joſhuahs, Subnervabis, Joſ. 11.6. Now ſhalt thou ſee him ſtand quaking under the almighty hand of God, ſo that he may write what he will in his bridle, yea in his ſkin. And if there be any ſuch headſtrong & reſtie ſteed here among us, let him know, that God will either break his ſtomack or his heart: Flagellum equo, ſaith Salomon; & if that will not ſerve, Collidã in te equũ & equiti, Jer. 51.21. But alas, how rare are theſe examples of reclamation? where is this power of the Goſpel? Men continue beaſts ſtill, and with that filthy Gryllus plead for the privilege of their beſtiality. The ſins of men ſtrive to outface the glory of the Goſpell. What ſhall I ſay to this? If after all theſe means, thou have no bridle, or thy bridle no inſcription, it is a fearfull doom of the Apoſtle: If our Goſpel be hid, it is hid to them that periſh. Thus much of the horſe & bels. Now from the pots and bowls, you ſhall ſee the degrees of the Churches perfection: and ſee it, I beſeech you, without wearines, with intention. The pots of the Temple were ſeething veſſels for the uſe of ſacrifice: Theſe are the Prieſts themſelves here, for that there is a diſtinction made betwixt the Pots of the Lords houſe, & every pot in Jeruſalem. The ordinary Jew was every pot: therfore the Pots of the Lords houſe muſt be his Miniſters. Theſe under the Goſpell ſhall be of more honorable uſe; (as the bowls before the Altar) like as the Altar of perfumes was more inward, and of higher reſpect. The pots were of ſhining braſſe; bowles of gold, 1 King. 7.50. It is no brag to ſay, that the Miniſterie of the Goſpell is more glorious than that of the Law: The leaſt in the kingdome of heaven, (ſaith Chriſt) is greater than John Baptiſt, Matth. 11.11. The kingdome of heaven, that is, the Church; not as Auſten, Jerome, Bede, expound it, of the third heaven; for Chriſt would make an oppoſition betwixt the old & new Teſtament. The not unlearned Jeſuite Maldonat, while he taxeth us for preferring every Miniſter of the Goſpell to John Baptiſt, mends the matter ſo well, that he verifies it of every perſon; Minimus quiſque in Evangelio, that is qui Evangelium recipit, major eſt illo; not feeling how he buffets himſelf: for if the leaſt of thoſe that receive the Goſpell, how much more the leaſt of thoſe that preach it? This is no arrogance. God would have every thing in the laſt Temple more glorious than in the firſt, which was figured by the outward frame, more glorious in Chriſts time, than that of Salomon; as that was beyond the Tabernacle. This is a better Teſtament, Heb. 7.22. That had the ſhadow, this the ſubſtance, Heb. 10. Under this, is greater illumination; Effundam ſpiritũ meum, ſaith the Prophet; before, ſome few drops diſtilled; now a whole current of graces; Effundam. If therefore John Baptiſt were greater than the ſonnes of men, becauſe they ſaw Chriſt to come, he pointed at his comming; ours muſt needs be more glorious, becauſe we ſee and point at him now come, and fully exhibited. We will not conteſt with the Levitical Prieſthood, for coſt of clothes, for price of veſſels; let the Church of Rome emulate this pompe, (which cares not if ſhe have golden veſſels, though ſhe have leaden Prieſts,) we envy it not; but for inward graces, for learning, knowledge, power of teaching, there is no leſſe difference, than betwixt the pots of the Temple, and bowles of

peace

A lot the Altar: God ſayes of them in way of rejection, Non eſt mihi voluntas in vobis, Mal. 1. Hence the Prieſt-hood of the new Law is Levi refined, Mal. 3. 3. Et purgabit filios Levi; which Hierom not unlikely, interprets of the miniſterie of the Goſpell: They are the ſonnes of Levi, which ſignifies Copulation; quia homines cum Deo copulant; but of Levi purged, and purged as gold: As much difference between them, as betwixt gold in the Ore, and in the wedge. Hence is double honour challenged to the Evangelicall Miniſtery, yea, and given: Yee received me, ſaith S. Paul, as an Angell of God, yea as Chriſt Jeſus, Gal. 4. 14. Hence the Angell, of himſelfe to John, I am thy fellow-ſervant. Woe be to them therefore which ſpet in the faces of thoſe whom God hath honoured: It is Gods ſecond charge, this of his Prophets: His firſt is, Touch not mine anointed; his ſecond, Hurt not my Prophets. And if one diſgracefull word ſpoken but by rude children to a Prophet of the old Teſtament, coſt ſo many throats; God be mercifull to thoſe dangerous and deadly affronts that have been, and are daily offered to the Prophets of the new: What can we ſay, but with the women of Tekoah, Serva ô Rex. We bleſſe God that we may bemoane our ſelves to the tender and indulgent ears of a gracious Soveraigne, ſenſible of theſe ſpirituall wrongs; who yet (we know) may well anſwer us with Jacobs queſtion, An loco Dei ego ſum? It grieves me to think and ſay of our ſelves, that for a great part of this, Perditio tua ex te. Woe to thoſe corrupted ſonnes of Heli, which through their inſufficiency and unconſcionableneſſe, have powred contempt on their own faces. That proud fugitive Campian could ſay, Miniſtris illorũ nihil vilius, &c. As falſly as ſpightfully. Let heaven & earth witneſs, whether any Nation in the world can afford ſo learned, ſo glorious a Clergy. But yet, among ſo many pots of the Temple, it is no marvell if ſome be dry for want of liquor, others ruſty for want of uſe, others full of liquor without meat, others ſo C full of meat that they want liquor. Let the Lords anointed, whoſe example and incourgements have raiſed even this divine learning to this excellent perfection, by his gracious countenance diſpell contempt from the profeſſors of it, and by his effectuall endevours remove the cauſes of this contempt.

But as every Chriſtian under the Goſpell is a Prieſt and Prophet, let the people be theſe pots, or the offerings of the people. That ſhall be in reſpect of the frequence, or fragrance, according to the double acception of that particle of compariſon (Camiſrachim) as the bowles; for number, or quality. For the frequence. A few ſeething pots ſerved the ſacrifice; but bowles they uſed many: what for the uſe of the Altar of incenſe, what for the receiving of the blood of the ſacrifice, Salomon made an 100 of gold. Now then ſaith God, in the dayes of the Goſpell, there ſhall be ſuch ſtore of oblations to God, that the number of the pots ſhall equalize the number of the bowles of the Altar: not unlike, becauſe of the following words; Every pot in Jeruſalem ſhall be faine to be employed to the ſacrifices. This frequence then, is either of the officers, or offerings; perſons, or acts. For the perſons; they were few in compariſon under the Law. All Paleſtine, which comprehends all their officers, except ſome few Proſelytes, was but (as Jerome, which was a Lieger there, reckons it) an 160 miles long from Dan to Beerſhebah, & 46 miles broad from Joppa to Bethleem. Now the partition wall is broken down, all nations under heaven yeeld franke offerers to the Altar of God. There was no offering then but at Jeruſalem: now Jeruſalem is every where. So much therefore as the world is wider than Judea, ſo much as Chriſtendome is larger than the walls of the Temple; ſo many more officers hath the Goſpell than the Law. And it were well, if there were as many, as they ſeem. If but as many as all the world over offer their preſence to Gods ſervice on Gods day (leave thoſe that ſpend it in the Stewes and Tavernes, to him whom they ſerve) were true offerers, how rich E would the Altar be, and the Temple how glorious? But alas, if God will be ſerved with mouthes full of oathes, curſes, bitterneſſe, with heads full of wine, with eyes full of luſt, with hands full of blood, with backs full of pride, with panches full of gluttonie, with ſoules and lives full of horrible ſins, he may have offerers as many as men: elſe as Eſay, relicta eſt in urbe ſolitudo; a few pots will hold our ſacrifices: and what is this, but through our wilfull diſobedience, to croſſe him which hath ſaid, that in this day the pots of the Temple ſhall be as the bowles of the Altar. The act or commodity is offerings; whether outward, or inward. The outward fulfilled in thoſe large endowments of the Church, by our devout and bountifull predeceſſors. What liberall revenues, rich maintenances were then put into (mort-maine) the dead hand of the Church? Lawes were faine to reſtraine the bounty of thoſe contributions (the grounds whereof I examine not) inſtead of Moſes his proclamation, Nequis facito deinceps opus ad oblationem Sanctuarii, ſatis enim eſt, adeoq; ſupereſt, Exo. 26.6. Then mons Domini, mons pinguis: but now the Church may cry with the Prophet, My leanneſſe, my leanneſſe. For ſhame, why ſhould ſacrilege croud in with religion? why ſhould our better knowledge finde us leſſe conſcionable? O injurious zeale of thoſe men, which think the Church cannot be holy enough, unleſſe ſhe beg. It hath been ſaid of old, That Religion bred wealth, and the daughter eat up the mother: I know not, if the daughter devoured the mother; I am ſure theſe men would devour both daughter and mother: Men of vaſt gorges, and inſatiable. Our Saviour cryed out againſt the Scribes and Phariſes, yet they devoured but widows houſes, poore low cottages: but theſe gulfes of men, whole Churches; and yet the ſepulchers of their throats are open for more. I can tell them of a mouth that is wider than theirs, and that is the Prophets, Os inferni: Therefore Hell hath inlarged it ſelfe, and hath opened his mouth, without meaſure: and their glory, and their pompe, and he that rejoyceth in it, ſhall deſcend into it, Eſay. 5.14. In the mean time, Oh that our Samſon would pull this hony of the Church out of the jawes of theſe Lyons; or if the cunning conveyances of ſacrilege have made that impoſſible, ſince it lies not now entire in the combes, but is let down and digeſted by theſe raveners, let him whoſe glory it is, not to be Pater Patriæ only, but Pater Eccleſiæ, provide that thoſe few pots we have, may ſtill ſeeth, and that if nothing will be added, nothing can be recovered, yet nothing may be purloyned from the Altars of God. But theſe outward offerings were but the types of the inward: What cares God for the blood or fleſh of bullocks, rams, goats? Non delectaris ſacrificio ut dem, holocauſtũ non vis, ſaith David: what then? The ſacrifice of God is a contrite ſpirit, a broken heart. Our humiliation is ſacrificium pœnitentiæ, our new obedience is ſacrificium juſtitiæ, our thankfull commemoration are ſacrificium laudis. Theſe are the oblations which as they ſhall be frequent under the Goſpell, ſo moſt fragrant unto God: and this is that laſt, and perhaps moſt proper ſenſe, wherein the fleſh-pots of the ſacrifices erunt ſicut aromata, ſhall be as perfumes in the bowles of incenſe. A lively ſacrifice is well matcht with holy and acceptable. When Noah ſacrificed to God after the Deluge, it is ſaid God ſmelt a ſavour of reſt, alluding to his name: but now the ſacrifices we offer are ὀσμὴ εὐωδίας, a ſavour of ſweetnes: ſo that the ſame ſavour that Chriſts oblation had, Epheſ. 5.2. the ſame have our offerings, Phil. 4.18. Gods children, out of the conſcience of their own weakneſſes, are eaſily diſcourged in the valuation of their own obedience. As therefore they can ſay of their perſons, with Miphiboſheth, What is thy ſervant? ſo of their ſervices, as Philip ſaid of the five loaves and two fiſhes, ἀλλὰ ταῦτα τί ἐστιν, Alas, what are theſe? But they & their offerings cãnot be ſo baſe to themſelves, as they are precious to God. There is no ſenſe that gives ſo lively a refreſhing to the ſpirits, as that of ſmelling: no ſmell can yeeld ſo true and feeling delight to the ſenſe, as the offerings of our penitence, obedience, praiſe, ſend up into the noſtrils of the Almighty. Hence as the Church can ſay of Chriſt, He is as a bundle of myrrh lying between her breaſts; ſo he again of her in that heavenly Epithalamion, Thy plants are as an Orchard of Pomegranates with ſweet fruits, as cypres, ſpicknard, ſaffron, calamus and cinamon, with all the trees of incenſe, myrrh, and aloes, with all the chiefe ſpices, Can. 4.13. Let this therfore comfort us, againſt our imperfections; If we be pots of the Lords houſe, thoſe faint ſtreams that we ſend up, ſhall be as ſweet, as the beſt incenſe of the bowles of the Altar, & God ſaies to us, as to Cornelius, Thy praiers & thine alms are come up, Act. 10. And how are they come up? Like pillars of ſmoke perfumed with myrrh & incenſe, & with all the chief ſpices, Cant. 3.6. I ſay if we be pots of the Lords houſe; for if we be Ægyptian fleſh-pots, that reek of the ſtrong-ſmelling onions and garlike of our own corruptions; If we be Ezechiels bloody pots, whoſe ſcumme or (as the vulgar) whoſe ruſt is in them, Ezec. 24. If we boil with luſt, if with revenge, if with ambition; I can ſay no other of us, than the ſonnes of the Prophets ſaid of theirs,

Mors

A Mors in olla, Death is in the pot; a double death, of body, and ſoule. It is a true ſpeech of Origen, Peccatum eſt putidi odoris: No carrion is ſo noiſome. Alas, what ſavours are ſent up to God from thoſe, that would ſeem not only pots of the Temple, but bowles of the Altar? How unſavoury is the pride, prophaneneſſe, riotouſneſſe, oppreſſion, beaſtlineſſe of our times? It were happy if the Court were free: and as it receives more ſweet influences of favour, than all other places; ſo, that it returned backe more fragrant obedience: that as it is ſaid of Maries ſpicknard, wherewith ſhe anointed Chriſt, that the whole houſe was filled with the ſavour of the ointment, Joh. 12.3. ſo the whole world might be full of the pleaſant perfumes of vertuous example, that might ariſe from hence. But alas, the painted faces, and manniſhneſſe, and monſtrous diſguiſedneſſe of the one ſex, the factious hollowneſſe, prodigall gariſhneſſe, wanton pampering, exceſſe in our reſpect to our ſelves, defects in our reſpects to God in the
B other, argue too well, that too many of us ſavour more like the golden ſockets of the holy lights, than the bowles of the Altar; God cannot abide theſe ill ſents. The five Cities of the plaines ſent up ſuch poyſonous vapours to God, that he ſent them down brimſtone againe with their fire. That which hell is deſcribed by, is ſent down from Heaven, becauſe that ſuch helliſh exhalations aſcend from them, to heaven. How ſhould the ſins of Sodome not expect the judgements of Sodome? Well might the Jewes feare, becauſe they would not be ſerviceable caldrons unto God, that therefore they ſhould be the fleſh, and their Citie the caldron, Exec. 11.3. Well may we feare it, who have had ſo ſenſible proofes, as of the favours, ſo of the judgements of God: and happy ſhall it be for us, if we can ſo feare, that our feare may prevent evils. Let theſe pots of ours therefore ſend up ſweet fumes of contrition, righteouſneſſe, thankſgiving, into the noſtrils of God; and the ſmoke of his diſpleaſure, wherewith coales of C eternall fire are kindled againſt his enemies, ſhall not come forth of his noſtrils againſt us; He ſhall ſmell a ſavour of reſt from us; we a ſavour of peace and life from him: which God for his mercy ſake, and for his ſonne Chriſts ſake, vouchſafe to grant us. To whom with the Father, and the holy Ghoſt, one glorious God, be given all praiſe, honour, and glory, now and for ever.

Amen.

PREACHT TO THE FAMILIE OF PRINCE
HENRY,

UPON THE DAY OF THEIR
dissolution at S. James.

By Jos. Hall.

A FAREWELL SERMON.

REVEL. 21. 3.

C And I heard a great voice from heaven, ſaying, Behold the Tabernacle of God is with men, and he will dwell with them, and they ſhall be his people, and God himſelfe ſhall be their God with them.

And God ſhall wipe away all teares from their eyes; and there ſhall be no more death, neither ſorrow, nor crying, neither ſhall there be any more paine, for the firſt things are paſſed. And he that ſate upon the throne, ſaid; Behold, I make all things new.

IT is no wonder, if this place, as it is (for the preſent) the Well-head of ſorrow to all Chriſtendome, have ſent forth abundance of waters of teares. And perhaps, you may expect, that as the trumpets of our late heavy funerall-ſolemnitie ſounded baſeſt and dolefulleſt, at the laſt; ſo my ſpeech, being the laſt publike breath of this ſad diſſolving Family, ſhould be moſt paſſionately ſorrowfull. And ſurely I could eaſily obtaine of my ſelfe, out of the bitterneſſe of my ſoule, to ſpend my ſelfe in lamentations, and to breake up this aſſembly, in the violent expreſſions of that griefe, wherewith our hearts are already broken: but I well conſider, that we ſhall carry ſorrow enough home with us, in my ſilence; and that it is both more hard, and more neceſſary for us, to be led forth to the waters of comfort. And becauſe our occaſions of griefe are ſuch, as no earthly tongue can releeve us, nor no earthly object, A voice from heaven ſhall doe it, and a voice leading us from earth to heaven, And I heard a voice from heaven, &c.

D This day is a day of note for three famous periods. Firſt, it is the day of the diſſipation of this Royall Family. Then, the laſt day of our publike and joynt mourning. E Laſtly, the day of the alteration and renewing of our ſtate, and courſe of life, with the New-yeere. All theſe meet in this Text with their cordialls, and divine remedies: Our diſſipation and diſſolution in theſe words, Behold the Tabernacle of God is with men. Our mourning, God ſhall wipe away all teares, &c. Our change of eſtate, Behold, I will make all things new. I muſt crave leave to glide thorow all of theſe with much ſpeed; and (for the better conveniencie of our diſcourſe) thorow the firſt, laſt.

My ſpeech therefore ſhall as it were climbe up theſe ſix ſtaires of doctrine.

1. That here our eyes are full of teares: how elſe ſhould they be wip't away? how all, unleſſe many?

2. That theſe teares are from ſorrow; and this ſorrow from death, and toyle, out of the connexion of all theſe.

3. That God will once free us, both from teares which are the effect of ſorrow, and from toyle and death, which are the cauſes of it.

4. That this our freedome muſt be upon a change; for that the firſt things are paſſed.

5. That this change ſhall be in our Renovation. Behold I make all things new.

6. That this renovation and happy change ſhall be in our perpetuall fruition of the inſeparable preſence of God, whoſe Tabernacle ſhall be with men.

Pſal.84. Judg.2.5. As thoſe grounds that lie low are commonly mooriſh, this baſe part of the world wherein we live, is the vale of teares, That true Bochim, as the Iſraelites called their mourning-place: We begin our life with teares, and therefore our Lawyers define life, by weeping; if a child were heard cry, it is a lawfull proof of his living: elſe if he be dead, we ſay he is ſtill-born; and at our parting God finds teares in our eies, which he ſhall wipe off. So we find it alwaies, not onely (לבכות עת) a time of weeping, 1 Sam.30. but (ספוד) of ſolemne mourning, as Salomon puts them together, *Eccl.*3 4. Except Lam.2.11. we be in that caſe that David & his people were in, (and Jeremie ſayes the ſame in his Lamentations, of the Jewes) that they wept till they could weep no more: Here are teares at our devotion; The Altar covered with tears, *Mal.*2. Tears in the bed, David watered his couch with teares, *Pſal.*6. Teares to waſh with, as Mariet. Teares to eat, *Pſal.*42.3. Teares to drink, *Pſal.*80. yea drunkenneſſe with teares, Eſay 16.9. This is our deſtiny as we are men, but more as we are Chriſtians, To ſow in teares; and God loves theſe wet ſeed-times; they are ſeaſonable for us here below: Thoſe men therefore are miſtaken, that think to goe to heaven with dry eyes, and hope to leap immediately out of the pleaſures of earth, into the Paradiſe of God; inſulting over the drooping eſtate of Gods diſtreſſed ones. As Jerome, & Bede, ſay of Peter, that he could not weepe while he was in the High Prieſts walls, ſo theſe men cannot weepe where they have offended. But let them know that they muſt have a time of teares, and if they doe not begin with teares, they ſhall end with them; Woe be to them that laugh, for they ſhall weep; and if they will not weepe, and ſhake their heads here, they ſhall weepe and waile, and gnaſh their teeth hereafter: Here muſt be tears, and that good ſtore: All teares; as rivers are called the teares of the Sea; (נבכי ים) *Job.*38. ſo muſt our teares be the rivers of our eyes, Pſal. 119. 136. and our eyes fountaines, *Jer.*9.1. Here muſt be teares of penitence, teares of compaſſion, and will be teares of ſorrow: Greg.Niſſ.Orat. Well are thoſe two met therefore; teares and ſorrow: for though ſome ſhed tears for ſpight, others for joy, as Cyprians Martyrs, Gaudium pectoris lachrymis exprimentes, yet commonly teares are the juyce of a minde preſſed with griefe; And as well doe tears, and crying, and ſorrow accompany death; either in the ſuppoſition, or the deniall, For as worldly ſorrow (even in this ſenſe) cauſeth death, by drying the bones, and conſuming the body: ſo death ever lightly, is a juſt cauſe of ſorrow, ſorrow to nature in our ſelves, ſorrow to ours. And as death is the terribleſt thing, ſo is it the ſaddeſt thing, that befals a man. Nature could ſay in the Poet, Quis matrem in funere nati Flere vetat? Exod.21. yea God himſelf allowed his holy Prieſts, to pollute themſelves in mourning, for their neereſt dead friends, except the High Prieſt; which was forbidden it in figure. And the Apoſtle while he forbids the Theſſalonians to mourn, as without hope, doth in a Ezech.24. ſort command their teares, but bar their immoderation. It was not without a ſpeciall reference to a judgement, that God ſayes to Ezechiel, Son of Man, Behold I will take from thee the pleaſure of thy life with a plague, yet ſhalt thou neither mourne nor weep, neither ſhall thy tears run downe. So fit did the Jewes hold tears for Funerals, that they hired mourners, which with incompoſed geſtures ran up and downe the ſtreets, *Eccl.*12. who did alſo cut and lance themſelves, that they might mourne in earneſt, *Jer.*16. That good natur'd Patriarch Iſaak mourned three yeeres for his mother, as the Chineſes doe at this day for their friends. Jacob mourned two and twenty yeares for Joſeph: and there want not ſome, which have thought Adam & Eve mourned

A ned an 100 yeares for Abel: but, who knowes not the wailings of Abel-mitzraim for Joseph; of the valley of Megiddon for Josiah? And if ever any corps deserved to swim in teares, if ever any losse could command lamentation; then this of ours, yea of this whole Iland, yea of the whole Church of God, yea of the whole world, justly calls for it, and truly hath it.

O Henry our sweet Prince, our sweet Prince Henry, the second glory of our Nation, ornament of man-kinde, hope of posterity, and life of our life, how doe all hearts bleed, and eyes worthily gush our, for thy losse! A losse, that we had neither grace to feare, nor have capacity to conceive. Shall I praise him to you, who are therefore now miserable, because you did know him so well? I forbeare it, though to my paine; If I did not spare you, I could not so swiftly passe over the name, and the vertues of that glorious Saint, our deare Master; or the aggravation of that losse, B whereof you are too sensible: my true commiseration shall command me silence: yet I could not but touch our sore (with this light hand) though yet raw & bleeding: Death (especially such a death) must have sorrow and teares; All Nations, all succession of times shall beare a part with us in this lamentation: And if we could but as heartily have prayed for him before, as we have heartily wept for him since, perhaps we had not had this cause of mourning. From sorrow, let us descend to paines, (which is no small cause of crying and teares) as I feare some of us must: The word, howsoever it is here translated, is (עמל) labour; I must confesse, labour and pain are neere one another; whence we say, that he which labours, takes paines; and contrarily, that a woman is in labour, or travell, when she is in the paine of child-birth: teares cannot be wip't away whiles toyle remaines; That the Israelites may leave crying, they must be delivered from the brick-kilnes of Ægypt. Indeed, God had in C our creation alotted us labour, without paine; but when once sinne came into the soule, paine seized upon the bones, and the mind was possessed with a wearinesse and irksome loathing of what it must doe: and ever since, sorrow and labour have beene inseparable attendants upon the life of man: Insomuch as God, when he would describe to us the happy estate of the dead, does it in those termes, They shall rest from their labours: Look into the field, there you shall see toyling at the plough and sithe. Looke into the waters, there you see tugging at the oares and cabels. Looke into the City, there you see plodding in the streets, swearing in the shops. Looke into the studies, there you see fixing of eyes, tossing of bookes, scratching the head, paleneſſe, infirmity. Looke into the Court, there you see tedious attendance, emulatory officiousneſſe. All things are full of labour, and labour is full of sorrow. If wee doe nothing, idleneſſe is wearisome; if any thing, work is wearisome; in one or both of D these, the best of life is consumed. Who now can be in love with a life, that hath nothing in it but crying, and teares in the entrance; death in the conclusion; labour and paine in the continuance; and sorrow in all these? What Gally-slave but we would be in love with our chaine? what prisoner would delight in his dungeon? How hath our infidelity besotted us, if we doe not long after that happy estate of our immortality, wherein all our teares shall be wip't away; and we at once free from labour, sorrow, and death? Now, as it is vaine to hope for this till then; so then not to hope for it, is paganish and brutish. He that hath taxed us with these penances, hath undertaken to release us. God shall wipe away all teares.

While we stay here, he keepes all our teares in a bottle, so precious is the water that Psal 56. is distilled from penitent eyes; and because he will be sure not to faile, he notes how many drops there be, in his register. It was a precious ointment, wherewith the woman E in the Pharises house (it is thought Mary Magdalen) anointed the feet of Christ: but Luke 7.37. her teares wherewith she washt them, were more worth than her spiknard. But that which is here precious, is there unseasonable; then he shal wipe away those which here he would save. As death, so passions are the companions of infirmity; whereupon some that have been too nice, have called those which were incident into Christ, Propassions; not considering that he which was capable of death, might be as well of passions. These troublesome affections of griefe, feare, and such like, doe not fall into glorified soules. It is true, that they have love, desire, joy in their greatest perfection: yea they could could not have perfection without them; but like as God loves, and hates, and rejoyces truly, but in a manner of his owne, abstracted from all infirmity, and passion: so doe his glorified Saints in imitation of him. There therefore, as we cannot die, so we cannot grieve, we cannot be afflicted. Here one sayes, My belly, my belly, with the Prophet; another, Mine head, mine head, with the Shunamites sonne; another, My sonne, my sonne, as David; another, My father, my father, with Elisha. One cryes out of his sinnes, with David; another of his hunger, with Esau; another of an ill wife, with Job; another of treacherous friends, with the Psalmist; One of a sore in body, with Ezechias; another of a troubled soule, with our Saviour in the garden; every one hath some complaint, or other, to make his cheeks wet, and his heart heavy. Stay but a while, and there shall be none of these: There shall be no crying, no complaining in the streets of the new Jerusalem: No axe, no hammer shall be heard within this heavenly Temple. Why are we not content to weep here a while, on condition that we may weep no more? Why are we not ambitious of this blessed ease? Certainly, we doe not smart enough with our evils, that we are not desirous of rest; These teares are not yet dry, yet they are ready to be overtaken by others, for our particular afflictions. Miseries, as the Psalmist compares them, are like waves, which break one upon another, and tosse us with a perpetuall vexation; and we vaine men, shall we not wish to be in our haven? Are we sick, and grieve to thinke of remedy? Are we still dying, and are we loth to thinke of life? Oh this miserable unbeliefe, that though we see a glorious heaven above us, yet we are unwilling to goe to it: we see a wearisome world about us, and yet are loth to think of leaving it: This gracious Master of ours, whose dissolution is ours, while he was here amongst us, his Princely crown could not keep his head from paine, his golden rod could not drive away his fevers; now is he freed from all his aches, agues, stitches, convulsions, cold sweats: now he triumphs in glory, amongst the Angels and Saints; now he walks in white robes, and attends on the glorious bride-groom of the Church; and do we think he would be content now, for all the Kingdomes of the world, to be as he was? We that professe it was our joy & honour to follow him, whithersoever he had gone; In his disports, in his warres, in his travels; why are we not now ambitious of following him to his better crown; yea of reigning together with him (for heaven admits of this equality) in that glory wherein he reignes with his Saviour and ours? Why doe we not now heartily, with him that was ravished into the third heaven, say, Cupio dissolvi & esse cum Christo, not barely to be dissolved; a malecontent may doe so; but therefore to be dissolved, that we may be with Christ, possessed of his everlasting glory, where we shall not only not weep, but rejoyce and sing Hallelujahs for ever; not only not die, but enjoy a blessed and heavenly life. Even so Lord Jesus come quickly. Now if any man shall aske the Disciples question: Master, when shall these things be? the celestiall voice tels him, it must be upon a change; For the first things are passed; It shall be in part, so soon as ever our first things, our life, the condition of our mortality are passed over; It shall be fully, when the first things of the world are passed; Passed, not by abolition, but by immutation, as that Father said well; Not the frame of the world, but the corruption of that frame must passe. The Spirit of God is not curious, he calls those things first, which were onely former, not in respect of the state which is, but that which shall be. For those things which were first of all, were like their maker; good, not capable of destruction: Our sinnes tainted the whole creation, and brought shame upon all the frame of heaven, and earth: That which we did, shall be disanulled; that which God did, shall stand for ever; and this dissolution shall be our glory: other dissolutions strike teares into our eyes; as this day is witnesse: it is our sorrow that the first things are passed, our offices, our pensions, our hopes, our favours, and (which we esteemed most) our services are gone: Let this last dissolution comfort us against the present. Who can grieve to see a familie dissolved, that considers the world must be dissolved? This little world of ours, first, whereof this day gives an image; for as our service, so our life must away: and then that great one, whose dissolution is represented in these. The difference is, that whereas this dissolution brings teares to some eyes, that wipes them away from all: for all our teares, and sorrow, and toyle, and crying,

2 Kings 4.

A crying, and death, are for our ſins; take away corruption, and miſery goes away with it, and till then, it will never be removed: No man puts new wine into old veſſels; much leſſe will God put the new wine of glory, into the old veſſels of corruption: They are our ſins, which as in particular they have rob'd us of our Prince, changed our ſeaſons, ſwept away thouſands with varieties of death; ſo in generall, they have deformed the face of heaven and earth, and made all the Creation ſigh and groan, and ſtill make us incapable of the perfection of our bleſſedneſſe; for while the firſt things continue, there muſt needs be teares, and ſorrow, and death. Let us therefore look upon heaven and earth as goodly creatures; but, as blemiſhed, as tranſitory, as thoſe which we ſhall once ſee more glorious. Let us looke upon our ſelves with indignation, which have thus diſtained them; and as thoſe which after ſome terme of their cottage expired, are aſſured they ſhall have a marble palace built for them, doe long after the time prefixed them, and thinke the dayes and moneths paſſe ſlowly away, till then; ſo let us B earneſtly deſire the day of the diſſolution of this great houſe of the world, that wee may have our conſummation in the new heaven. For ſo ſoone as ever the old is paſt, Behold (ſaith God) I will make all things new. Yea, the paſſage of the one, is the renewing of the other: As the ſnake is renewed, not by putting on any new coat, but by leaving his ſlough behind him: the gold is purified, by leaving his droſſe in the fire; Therefore he addes, not, I will, but, I do make all new: and becauſe this is a great worke, behold a great Agent; He that ſate upon the throne ſaid, Behold I make all new.

A Throne ſignifies Majeſty, and Sitting permanence or perpetuity: God ſayes, Heaven is my Throne, in the Pſalme: but as Salomons throne of ivory and gold, was the beſt peece of his houſe; So Gods throne is the moſt glorious heaven, the heaven of heavens; for you ſee that though heaven and earth paſſe away, yet Gods throne re- C mained ſtill, and he ſitting on it; neither ſinne nor diſſolution, may reach to the Empyreall Heaven, the ſeat of God.

Here is a ſtate worthy of the King of Kings; All the thrones of earthly Monarchs, are but peeces of his foot-ſtoole. And as his throne is majeſticall and permanent, ſo is his reſidence in it; He ſate in the Throne. S. Stephen ſaw him ſtanding, as it were ready for his defence and protection: S. John ſees him ſitting (as our Creed alſo runs) in regard of his inalterable glory. How brittle the thrones of earthly Princes are, and how they doe rather ſtand than ſit in them, and how ſlippery they ſtand too, we feele this day, and lament. O Lord, eſtabliſh the throne of thy ſervant our King, and let his ſeed endure for ever. Let his throne be as the Sunne before thee for evermore; and as the Moone a faithfull witneſſe in heaven. But howſoever it be with our earthly Gods, of his Kingdome there is no end. Here is a maſter for Kings, whoſe glory it is to riſe up from their thrones, and throw down their Crowns at his feet, and to wor- D ſhip before his foot-ſtoole.

Be wiſe therefore, O ye Kings; be learned ye Rulers of the earth: ſerve this Lord in fear, and rejoyce in him with trembling.

Yea behold here (ſince we have the honour to ſerve him, whom Kings ſerve) a royall Maſter for us; It was one of our ſinnes, I feare, that we made our Maſter, our God; I meane, that we made fleſh our arme; and placed that confidence in him, for our earthly ſtay, which we ſhould have fixed in heaven: Our too much hope hath left us comfortleſſe: Oh that we could now make God our Maſter, and truſt him ſo much the more, as we have leſſe in earth to truſt to. There is no ſervice to the King of heaven; for both his throne is everlaſting and unchangeable, and his promotions certain and honourable: He that ſits on the Throne hath ſaid it, To him that overcomes will I E give to ſit with me in my throne, even as I overcame, and ſit with my Father in his throne. Behold, yee ambitious ſpirits, how ye may truly riſe to more than ever the ſonnes of Zebedee deſired to aſpire to: ſerving is the way to reigning; ſerve him that ſits upon the Throne, and yee ſhall ſit your ſelves upon the Throne with him.

This is the Agent; the act is fit for him, I make all things new. Even the very Turks in their Alcoran, can ſubſcribe to that of Tertullian, Qui potuit facere, poteſt & reficere: I feare to wrong the Holy Majeſty with my rude compariſon; It is not ſo much to God, to make a world, as for us, to ſpeak: He ſpake the word and it was done: There is no change which is not from him: He makes new Princes, new yeares, new governments, and will make new heavens, new earth, new inhabitants; how easie then is it for him, to make new provisions for us? If we be left destitute, yet where is our faith? Shall God make us new bodies, when they are gone to dust? shall he make new heavens, and new earth, and shall not he (whose the earth is, and the fulnesse thereof) provide some new meanes, and courses of life for us, while we are upon earth? Is the maintenance of one poore worme more than the renewing of heaven & earth? shall he be able to raise us when we are not, and shall he not sustaine us while we are?

Psal. 37. 34. Away with these weake diffidences; and if we be Christians, trust God with his owne: Wait thou on the Lord, and keep his wayes, and he shall exalt thee. He will make all things new: And shall all things be made new, and our hearts be old? shall nothing but our soules be out of the fashion? Surely beloved, none but new hearts are for the new heavens: Except we be born anew, we enter not into life. All other things shall in the very instant receive their renovation; onely our hearts must be made new before hand, or else they shall never be renewed to their glory. S. Peter, when he had told us of looking for new heavens, and new earth; infers this use upon it; 2 Pet. 3 14. Wherefore (beloved) seeing ye looke for such things, be diligent, that ye may be found of him in peace, without spot, and blamelesse. Behold, the new heavens require pure and spotlesse inhabitants. As ever therefore we looke to have our part in this blessed renovation, let us cast off all our evill & corrupt affections, put off the old man with his works, and now with the new yeere, put on the new: labour for a new heart, begin a new life. That which S. John saies here, that God will say and doe in our enrrance to glorification; 2 Cor. 5. 17. out of Esay 43. Behold I make all things new. S. Paul saith he hath done it already, in our regeneration; Old things are passed away, all things are become new. What means this, but that our regeneration must make way for our glorification, and that our glory must but perfect our regeneration? and God supposes this is done, when there are meanes to doe it. Why doe we then still (in spight of the Gospell) retain our old corruptions, and think to goe to the wedding feast in our old clothes? if some of us doe not rather (as the vulgar reads that, Judg. 10. 6.) Addere nova veteribus, adde new sins to our old; new oaths, new fashions of pride, new complements of drunkennesse, new devices of filthinesse, new tricks of Machiavelisme: these are our novelties which fetch downe from God new judgements upon us, to the tingling of the eares of all hearers, and for which Topheth was prepared of old. If God have no better news for us, we shall never enjoy the new heaven with him. For Gods sake therefore, and for our soules sake, let us be wiser, and renew our covenant with God; and seeing this is a day of gifts, let my New-yeeres-gift to you be this holy advice from God, which may make you happy for ever: Let your New-yeeres-gift to God be your hearts, the best part of your selves, the center of your selves, to which all our actions are circumferences: and if they be such a present, as we have reason to feare God will not accept, because they are sinfull; yet if they be humbled, if penitent, we know he will receive them: Psal. 51. A contrite and a broken heart, O God, thou wilt not despise. And if we cannot give him our hearts, yet give him our desires, and he will take our unworthy hearts from us; Ezec. 11. 19. I will take the stony hearts out of their bodies, and he will graciously return an happy New-yeers-gift to us, Ezec. 11. 14. I wil put a new spirit within their bowels, and wil give them an heart of flesh. He will create a cleane heart, and renew a right spirit within us; so, as he will make a new heaven for us, he will make us new for this heaven; he will make his Tabernacle in us, that he may make ours with him. Behold, the Tabernacle of God is with men, &c.

The superstitious Listrians cryed out amazed, that Gods were come down to them in the likenesse of men: but we Christians know, that it is no rare thing for God to come and dwell with men; 2 Cor. 6. 16. Yee are the Temples of the living God, and I will dwell among them and walk there. The faithfull heart of man is the Tabernacle of God. But because though God be ever with us, wee are not alwayes so with him, yea whiles we are at home in the body, we are absent from the Lord, as S. Paul complaines, therefore will God vouchsafe us a neerer cohabitation that shall not be capable of any interposition, of any absence. Behold, the Tabernacle of God is with men. But besides this Tabernacle of flesh, time was when God dwelt in a materiall visible house with men: He had his

Tabernacle

A Tabernacle first, which was a moving Temple; and then his Temple, which was a fixed Tabernacle: both of them had one measure, both one name. But, as one said upon that, Eze. 42. Mensus est, similitudinem domus; that both the Tabernacle and Temple were similitudes of Gods house, rather than the house it selfe: so say I, that they were intended for notable resemblances both of the holy Church of God upon earth, and of the glorious Sanctuary of heaven. This is the true היכל of God, which word signifieth both a Temple, Ezra 4. 1. and a Palace, Dan. 1. 4. because he dwels where he is worshipped, and he is magnificent in both: It is the materiall Tabernacle which is alluded to, the immateriall which is promised; A Tabernacle that goes a thousand times more beyond the glittering Temple of Salomon, thã Salomons Temple went beyond the Tabernacle of Moses: Neither let it trouble any man, that the name of a Tabernacle implies flitting and uncertainty. For as the Temple, howsoever it were called (בית עולם) a house of Ages; yet lasted not (either the first, I mean, or second) unto 500. yeers: so this house, though God call it a Tabernacle, yet he makes it an everlasting habitation; for he tels us, that both age and death are gone before it come down to men. But why rather doth the Tabernacle of God descend to men, than men ascend to it? Whether this be in respect of Johns vision, to whom the new Jerusalem seemed to descend from heaven; descendi (as one saith) innotescenda, and therefore it is resembled by all the riches of this inferior world, gold, precious stones, pearle; Or whether heaven is therefore said to descend to us, because it meets us in the ayre, when Christ Jesus attended with innumerable Angels shall descend to fetch his elect; Or whether this phrase be used for a greater expression of love, and mercy, since it is more for a Prince to come to us, than for us to goe to his Court. Certainly, God meanes onely in this to set forth that perpetuall and reciprocall conversation, C which he will have with men: They shall dwell with God, God shall dwell with them. Our glory begins ever in grace: God doth dwell with all those in grace, with whom he will dwell in glory: Every Christian carries in his bosome a shrine of God: Know ye not that Christ Jesus is in you, saith S. Paul. Wheresoever God dwels, there is his Temple: wilt thou pray in the Temple, pray in thy selfe, saith Austen.

Here is the Altar of a cleane heart, from which the sweet incense of our prayers, as a pleasant perfume, is sent up into the nostrils of God: Here are the pure candles of our faith ever burning before God, night and day; never to be extinguished: Here is the spirituall Shew-bread, the bread of life standing ever ready upon the Table of the soule: Here doth the Arke of the heart, in the inwardest of the brest, keepe the Law of God, and that Manna that came down from heaven: Here God dwels, and here he is worshipped. Behold, what need we care whither we goe, while we carry the God of heaven with us? He is with us as our companion, as our guide, as our guest: No impotency of person, no crosse of estate, no distance of place, no opposition of men, no D gates of hell can separate him from us: He hath said it, I will not leave, nor forsake thee: We are all now parting one from another: and now is loosing a knot of the most loving and entire fellowship that ever met in the Court of any Prince: our sweet Master (that was compounded of all lovelinesse) infused this gracious harmony into our hearts; now we are saluting our last, and every one is with sorrow enough, taking his own way: how safe, how happy shall we be, if each of us shall have God to goe with him! Certainly (my deare fellowes) we shall never complain of the want of Masters, of friends, while we find our selves sure of him; nothing can make us miserable while we are furnished with him. Shall we thinke he cannot fare ill that hath money in his purse; and shall we thinke he can miscarry that hath God in his heart? How shall not E all comfort, all happines accompany that God, whose presence is the cause of all blessednesse? He shall counsell us in our doubts, direct us in our resolutions, dispose of us in our estates, cheere us in our distresses, prosper us in our lives, and in our deaths crowne us. And if such felicity follow upon Gods dwelling with us in these smoky cottages of our mortalitie, where we (through our unquiet corruptions) will not suffer our selves to have a full fruition of God; what happinesse shall there be in our dwelling with God, in those eternall Tabernacles of rest and glory? Beloved, there is no losse, no misery, which the meditation of heaven cannot digest: we have lived in the eye of a Prince, whose countenance was able to put life into any beholder: How oft hath that face shined upon us, & we have found our heart warm with those comfortable beames? Behold, we shall live with that God, in whose presence is the fulnesse of joy: we have lived in the society of worthy men; yet, but men; subject to all passions, infirmities, selfe-respects: which of us all can have escaped without some unkindnesses, detractions, emulations? Earthly Courts can be no more without these, than these can be without corruption: there, we shall live in the company of innumerable Angels, and the spirits of just and perfect men; neither can there be any jar in Revel. 19. 3. these Hallelujahs, which we shall all sing to God. We have lived to see the magnificence of earthly Princes, and to partake of it; in their buildings, furnitures, feasts, triumphs; in their wealth, pompe, pleasures: But open your eyes and see the new Jerusalem, the Citie of the great King of Saints, and all these sublunary vanities shall be contemned. Here you shall see a foure-square Citie; the walls of Jasper, the foundations garnished with all precious stones, Twelve gates of twelve pearles, The houses and streets of pure gold, like shining glasse: A Chrystall river runs in the midst of it; and on the banks of it growes the tree of life; ever greene, ever fruitfull: This is for the eye. The eare shall be filled with the melody of Angels, ever singing, Holy, holy, holy, Lord God Almightie. The taste shall be satisfied with Manna, the food of Angels, with the fruit of the tree of life, with that new wine which our Saviour hath promised to drinke with us in his Kingdome; These are the dimme shadowes of our future blessednesse. At thy right hand O God are pleasures for evermore; and such pleasures, as if they could be expressed or conceived, were not worthy of our longings, nor able to satisfie us: Oh that we could so much the more long to enjoy them, by how much lesse we are able to comprehend them! When S. Paul made his Fare-well sermon to the Ephesians, he fetcht teares from the eyes of his auditors (so full of holy passion was his speech) especially with that one clause, And now behold

Act. 20. 25. I know, that henceforth you all, through whom I have gone preaching the Kingdome of God, shall see my face no more. A sad clause indeed, You shall see my face no more. The mind of man cannot endure to take a final leave of any thing that offends it not; but the face of a friend, of a companion, hath so much pleasure in it, that we cannot without much sorrow thinke of seeing it our last: But what if we shall meet here no more? what if we shall no more see one anothers face? Brethren, we shall once meet together above; we shall once see the glorious face of God, and never look off againe.

Let it not over-grieve us to leave these Tabernacles of stone, since we must shortly lay down these Tabernacles of clay, & enter into Tabernacles not made with hands; eternall in the heavens. Till then, farewell my deare brethren, farewell in the Lord: Goe in peace, and live as those that have lost such a Master, and as those that serve a Master, whom they cannot lose: And the God of peace goe with you, and prosper you in all your wayes; and so fix this Tabernacle in you upon earth, that you may be received into those Tabernacles of the new Jerusalem, and dwell with him for ever, in that glory which hee hath provided for all that love him.

Amen.

SERMON PREACHED

at Pauls Croſſe, upon the anniverſarie Solemnitie of the happy Inauguration of our dread Soveraigne Lord, King James. March 24. 1613.

By Jos. Hall.

¶ Imprinted at London, 1642.

TO THE RIGHT HONOURABLE,

Sir JOHN SWINERTON
Knight, Lord Major of the Citie of LONDON,

All Grace and Happineſſe.

RIght Honourable:

MY owne forwardneſſe (whereof it repenteth me not) hath ſent forth other of my labours unbidden; but this, your effectuall importunitie hath drawne forth into the common light. It is an holy deſire that the eye may ſecond the eare in any thing that may help the ſoule: and we, that are fiſhers of men, ſhould be wanting to our ſelves, if we had not baits for both thoſe ſenſes. I plead not the diſadvantage of a dead letter, in reſpect of that life which elocution puts into any diſcourſe. Such as it is, I make it both publike, and yours. I have cauſed my thoughts, ſo neer as I could, to goe back to the very tearms wherein I expreſſed them, as thinking it better to fetch thoſe words I have let fall, than to follow thoſe I muſt take up. That therefore which it pleaſed your Lo. to heare with ſuch patient attention, and with ſo good affection to deſire, I not unwillingly ſuffer abroad, that theſe papers may ſpeak that permanently to the eyes of all our Countrymen, which in the passage found such favour in the eares of your Citizens, and such room in so many hearts. Besides your first and vehement motion for the Presse, your knowne love to learning deserves a better acknowledgement, and no doubt findes it from more worthy hands. And if my gratulation would adde any thing, those should envy you which will not imitate you. For the rest, God give your Lo. a wise, understanding, and couragious heart, that you may prudently and strongly menage these wilde times, upon which you are fallen: and by your holy example and powerfull endevours, help to shorten these raines of licentiousnesse: That so this Citie, which is better taught than any under heaven, may teach all other places how to live; and may honour that profession which hath made it renowned, and all Gods Church joyfull: The welfare and happinesse whereof, and your Lo. in it, is unfainedly wished,

by

Your Lordships humbly devoted,

JOS. HALL.

AN HOLY PANEGYRICK.

1 SAM. 12. 24, 25.

Therefore feare you the Lord, and ſerve him in truth with all your hearts, and conſider how great things he hath done for you. But if you doe wickedly, yee ſhall periſh, both yee and your King.

C

I Hold it no ſmall favour of God (Right Honourable and beloved) that he hath called me to the ſervice of this day, both in the name of ſuch a people to praiſe him for his Anointed, and in his name to praiſe his Anointed to his people. The ſame hand that gives the opportunity, vouchſafe to give ſucceſſe to this buſineſſe. That which the Jewes ſinned in but deſiring, it is our happineſſe to enjoy. I need not call any other witneſſe than this day, wherein we celebrate the bleſſing of a King, and (which is more) of a King higher than other Princes by the head and ſhoulders. And if other yeeres had D forgotten this tribute of their loyaltie and thankfulneſſe, yet the example of thoſe ancient Romane Chriſtians (as Euſebius and Sozomen report) would have taught us, that the tenth compleat yeere of our Conſtantine deſerves to be ſolemn and Jubilar. And if our ill nature could be content to ſmother this mercy in ſilence, the very Lepers of Samaria ſhould riſe up againſt us and ſay, We doe not well; this is a day of good tidings, and we hold our peace. My diſcourſe yet ſhall not be altogether laudatorie; but as Samuels, led in with exhortation, and caried out with threatning. For this Text is a compoſition of duties, favours, dangers: of duties which we owe, of favours received, of dangers threatned. The duties that God looks for of us, come before the mention of the favors we have received from him (though after their receit) to teach us, that as his mercy, ſo our obedience ſhould be abſolute: and the danger followes both, to make us more carefull to hold the favours, and perform the duties. E And me thinkes there cannot be a more excellent mixture. If we ſhould heare onely of the favours of God, nothing of our duties, we ſhould fall into conceitedneſſe: if onely of our duties, without recognition of his favours, we ſhould prove uncheerefull: and if both of theſe without mention of any danger, we ſhould preſume on our favours, and be ſlack in our duties. Prepare therefore your Chriſtian eares and hearts for this threefold cord of God, that (through his bleſſing) theſe duties may draw you to obedience, the dangers to a greater awe, and the favours to a further thankfulneſſe.

Decimum quemque annũ Imperatores Romani magna feſtivitate celebrant. Sozom. l. 1. 24. Idem Euſeb. de vita Conſt.

The goodneſſe of theſe outward things is not ſuch as that it can privileᵈge every deſire of them from ſin. Monarchie is the beſt of governments, and likeſt to his rule that ſits in the aſſembly of Gods. One God, one King, was the acclamation of theſe ancient Chriſtians: and yet it was miſ-deſired of the Iſraelites: We may not ever deſire that which is better in it ſelfe, but that which is better for us; Neither muſt we follow our conceit in this judgement, but the appointment of God; Now, though God had appointed in time, both a Scepter and a Law-giver to Juda, yet they ſinned in mending the paſe of God, and ſpurring on his decree. And if they had ſtayd his leaſure, ſo that they had deſired that which was beſt in it ſelfe, beſt for them, appointed by God, and now appointed; yet the manner and ground offended: For out of an humour of innovation, out of diſcontent, out of diſtruſt, out of an itch of conformity to other Nations, to aſke a King, it was not onely a ſin, as they confeſſe, verſ. 29. but (ragnab rabbah) a great wickednеſſe, as Samuel tels them. verſ. 17. and (as oftentimes we may read Gods diſpleaſure in the face of heaven) he ſhews it in the weather. God thunders and rains in the middeſt of wheat-harveſt. The thunder was feareſull; the raine in that hot climate & ſeaſon, ſtrangely unſeaſonable: both to be in the inſtant of Samuels ſpeech, was juſtly miraculous. The heathen Poets bring in their fained God thundring in applauſe; I never finde the true God did ſo. This voice of God brake theſe Cedars of Lebanon, and made theſe Hindes to calve; and now they cry Peccavimus, verſ. 19. If ever we will ſtoop, the judgements of God will bring us on our knees. Samuel takes vantage of their humiliation, and according to the golden ſentence of that Samian-wiſe-man, that bids us lay weight upon the loden, (how ever Hierom take it in another ſenſe) he lades them with theſe three duties; feare, ſervice, conſideration.

Feare and Service goe ſtill together. Serve the Lord in feare ſaith David. Feare the Lord and ſerve him, ſaith Joſhua; And, feare ever before ſervice, for that unleſſe our ſervice proceed from feare, it is hollow and worthleſſe. One ſaies well, that theſe inward diſpoſitions are as the kernell; outward acts are as the ſhell; he is but a deaf nut therefore, that hath outward ſervice, without inward feare; Feare God (ſaith Salomon) firſt, & then, keep his commandements. Behold, the ſame tongue that bade them not fear, v. 20. now bids them feare; and the ſame ſpirit that tels us they feared exceedingly (ver. 18.) now injoynes them to fear more. What ſhall we make of this? Their other feare was at the beſt Initiall; for now they began to repent; and as one ſayes of this kinde of feare, that it hath two eyes fixed on two divers objects, ſo had this of theirs: One eye looked upon the raine and thunder; the other looked up to the God that ſent it. The one of theſe it borrowed of the ſlaviſh or hoſtile fear (as Baſil calls it,) the other of the filiall; for the ſlaviſh feare caſts both eyes upon the puniſhment; the filiall looks with both eyes on the party offended. Now then Samuel would rectifie and perfect this affection, and would bring them from the feare of ſlaves through the feare of penitents, to the feare of Sonnes: and indeed one of theſe make way for another. It is true that perfect love thruſts out feare: but it is as true, that feare brings in that perfect love which is joyned with the reverence of Sonnes. Like as the needle or briſtle (ſo one compares it) draws in the thred after it, or as the potion brings health. The compunction of feare (ſaith Gregory) fits the mind for the compunction of love. We ſhall never rejoyce truly in God, except it be with trembling: Except we have quaked at his thunder, we ſhall never joy in his ſun-ſhine. How ſeaſonably therefore doth Samuel, when he ſaw them ſmitten with that guilty and ſervile feare, call them to the reverentiall feare of God; Therefore fear ye the Lord? It is good ſtriking, when God hath ſtriken; there is no fiſhing ſo good as in troubled warers. The conſcience of man is a nice and ſullen thing: and if it be not taken at fit times, there is no medling with it. Tell one of our gallants, in the midſt of all his jollity and revels, of devotion, of pietie, of judgements; he hath the Athenian queſtion ready, What will this babler ſay? Let that man alone till God hath touche his ſoule with ſome terror, till he hath caſt his body on the bed of ſickneſſe, when his feather is turned to a kerchiefe, when his face is pale, his eyes ſunke, his hand ſhaking, his breath ſhort, his fleſh conſumed, now he may be talkt with, now he hath learned of Eli to ſay, Speake Lord for thy ſervant heareth. The convex or out-bowed ſide of a veſſell will hold nothing;

A it must be the hollow and depressed part that is capable of any liquor. Oh if we were so humbled with the varieties of Gods judgements as we might, how savory should his counsels be, how precious and welcome would his feare be to our trembling hearts? whereas now our stubborne senselesnesse frustrates (in respect of our successe, though not of his decree) all the threatnings and executions of God.

There are two maine affections, Love and Feare; which as they take up the soule where they are, and as they never goe asunder, for every love hath in it a feare of offending and forgoing; and every fear (implies a love of that, which we suspect may miscary) so each of them fulfils the whole Law of God. That love is the abridgement of the Decalogue, both our Saviour and his blessed Apostle have taught us: It is as plaine of Feare. The title of Job is, A just man, and one that feared God; justice is expressed by Feare. For what is justice, but freedome from sin? And the feare of the B Lord hates evill, saith Salomon. Hence Moses his יראה Thou shalt fear, is turned by our Saviour (προσκυνησεις) Thou shalt worship, or adore. And that which Esay saith, In vain they feare me, our Saviour renders, In vaine they worship me; as if all worship consisted in Feare. Hence it is probable that God hath his name in two languages from (θεος) Feare, and the same word in the Greek signifies both Feare and Religion. And Salomon when he saies, The fear of the Lord is ראשית the beginning (as we turn it) of wisdom, saies more than we are aware of; for the word signifies as well Caput or Principatum, the head or top of wisdome; yea (saith Siracides) it is the crown upon the head; it is the root of the same wisdome, whereof it is the top-branch, saith the same Author. And surely this is the most proper disposition of men towards God; for though God stoope downe so low as to vouchsafe to be loved of men, yet that infinite ine-
C quality which there is between him and us, may seem not to allow so perfect a fimesse of that affection, as of this other; which suits so well betwixt our vilenesse, and his glory, that the more disproportion there is betwixt us, the more due and proper is our Feare. Neither is it lesse necessary than proper, for we can be no Christians without it; whether it be (as Hemingius distinguishes it well) timor cultus, or culpæ, either our feare in worshipping, or our feare of offending; the one is a devout feare, the other a carefull feare. The latter was the Corinthians feare, whose godly sorrow when the Apostle had mentioned, he addes, Yea what indignation, yea what feare, yea what desire? The former is that of the Angels, who hide their faces with their wings; yea of the Son of God, as man, who fell on his face to his Father. And this is due to God, as a Father, as a master, as a benefactor, as a God infinite in all that he is. Let me be bold to speak to you, with the Psalmist, Come ye children, hearken to me, and I will
D teach you the feare of the Lord. What is it therefore to feare God; but to acknowledge the glorious (though invisible) presence of God in all our wayes, with Moses his eyes (ἐφ' ἑαυτὸν): to be awfully affected at his presence with Jacob (quàm tremendus?) to make an humble resignation of our selves to the holy will of God with Eli, It is the Lord; and to attend reverently upon his disposing with David; Here I am, let him doe to me as seemeth good in his eyes. This is the feare of the Lord. There is nothing more talkt of, nothing lesse felt. I appeale from the tongues of men to their hands; the wise Heathen taught me to doe so, Verba rebus proba. The voice of wickednesse is actuall, saith the Psalmist; wickednesse saith there is no feare of God before his eyes. Behold whersoever is wickednesse, there can be no feare of God; these two cannot lodge under one roofe, for the fear of God drives out evill (saith Ecclesiasticus.) As therefore Abra-
E ham argues well from the cause to the effect; Because the feare of God is not in this place, therefore they will kill me: So David argues back from the effect to the cause, They imagine wickednes on their bed, &c. therfore the fear of God is not before them. I would to God his argument were not too demonstrative. Brethren, our lives shame us. If we feared the Lord, durst we dally with his name, durst we tear it in peeces? Surely we contemn his person, whose name we contemn. The Jews have a conceit, that the sin of that Israelite which was stoned for blasphemy, was onely this, that he named that ineffable name of foure letters Jehovah. Shall their feare keep them from once mentioning the dreadfull name of God, and shall not our feare keepe us from abusing it? Durst we so boldly sinne God in the face, if we feared him? Durst we mock God with a formall flouriſh of that, which our heart tels us we are not, if we feared him? Dunſt we be Chriſtians at Church, Mammoniſts at home, if we feared him? Pardon me, if in a day of gratulation I hardly temper my tongue from reproofe: for as the Jewes had ever ſome malefactor brought forth to them in their great feaſt: ſo it ſhall be the happieſt peece of our triumph and ſolemnity, if we can bring forth that wicked profaneneſſe, wherewith we have diſhonoured God, and blemiſht his Goſpell, to be ſcourged, and diſmiſſed with all holy indignity. From this feare, let us paſſe as briefly, through that which we muſt dwell in all our lives; the ſervice of God. This is the ſubject of all Sermons, mine ſhall but touch at it. You ſhall ſee how I haſten to that diſcourſe which this day and your expectation calls me to.

Divine Philoſophy teaches us to referre, not only our ſpeculations, but our affections to action. As therefore our ſervice muſt be grounded upon feare, ſo our feare muſt be reduced to ſervice. What ſtrength can theſe maſculin diſpoſitions of the ſoul yeeld us, if with the Iſraelites brood they be ſmothered in the birth? Indeed the worſt kind of feare, is that we call ſervile: but the beſt feare, is the feare of ſervants: For there is no ſervant of God, but feares filially. And againe, God hath no ſonne but he ſerves. Even the naturall ſonne of God, was ſo in the forme of a ſervant, that he ſerved indeed, and ſo did he ſerve, that he endured all ſorrow, and fulfilled all righteouſnes. So every Chriſtian is a ſon and heire to the King of heaven, and his word muſt be, I ſerve. We all know what ſervice means. For we all are, or were (I imagine) either ſervants of maſters, or ſervants of the publike, or maſters of ſervants, or all theſe. We cannot therefore be ignorant either what we require of ours, or what our ſuperiours require of us. If ſervice conſiſted onely in wearing of liveries, in taking of wages, in making of curteſies, and kiſſing of hands, there were nothing more eaſie, or more common. All of us wear the cognizance of our Chriſtianity in our Baptiſme, all live upon Gods trencher in our maintenance, all give him the complements of a faſhionable profeſſion. But, be not deceived, the life of ſervice is work; the work of a Chriſtian is obedience to the Law of God. The Centurion, when he would deſcribe his good ſervant in the Goſpell, needed ſay no more but this; I bid him doe this, and he doth it. Service then briefly is nothing but a readineſſe to doe as we are bidden; and therefore both Salomon, and he that was greater than Salomon, deſcribes it by keeping the commandements: and the choſen veſſell gives an everlaſting rule: His ſervants ye are to whom ye obey. Now I might diſtinguiſh this ſervice, into habituall & actuall. Habituall; for as the ſervant, while he eats or ſleepes, is in ſervice ſtill; ſo are we to God. Actuall, whether univerſall in the whole cariage of our lives (which Zacharie tels us is in holineſſe, and righteouſneſſe; holineſſe to God, righteouſneſſe to men) or particular, either in the duties which are proper to God, Invocation and Attendance on his ordinance (which by an excellence is termed his ſervice) or in thoſe which are proper to us, as we are peeces of a Family, Church, Common-wealth; the ſtations whereof God hath ſo diſpoſed, that we may ſerve him in ſerving one another. And thus you ſee I might make way for an endleſſe diſcourſe; but it ſhall content mee (paſſing over this world of matter) to glance onely at the generality of this infinite theme.

Rom. 6. 1.

Luke 1. 75.

As every obedience ſerves God, ſo every ſin makes God ſerve us: One ſaid wittily, that the angry man made himſelf the Judge, and God the executioner. There is no ſin that doth not the like. The glutton makes God his cator, and himſelfe the gueſt, and his belly his God, eſpecially in the new-found feaſts of this Age, wherein profuſeneſſe and profaneneſſe ſtrive for the tables end. The laſcivious man makes himſelfe the lover, and (as Vives ſaies of Mahomet) God the Pander. The covetous man makes himſelfe the Uſurer, and God the Broker. The ambitious makes God his ſtale, and honour his God. Of every ſinner doth God ſay juſtly, Servire me feciſti; Thou haſt made me to ſerve with thy ſins. There cannot be a greater honor for us than to ſerve ſuch a maſter, as commands heaven, earth, and hell: whom it is both diſhonour and baſeneſſe not to ſerve. The higheſt ſtile that King David could deviſe to give himſelf (not in the phraſe of a frivolous French complement, but in the plaine ſpeech of a true Iſraelite) was, Behold I am thy ſervant; and he that is Lord of many ſervants of the Devill,

A Devill, delights to call himselfe the servant of the servants of God. The Angels of Heaven rejoyce to bee our fellowes in this service. But there cannot be a greater shame than to see servants ride on horse-backe, and Princes walking as servants on the ground; I mean, to see the God of heaven made a lacquey to our vile affections, and in the lives of men, to see God attend upon the world. Brethren, there is service enough in the world, but it is to a wrong master. In mea patria Deus venter (as Hierome said;) every worldling is a Papist in this, that he gives δουλειαν, service, to the creature, which is the lowest respect that can be: Yea so much more humble than (latriâ) as it is more absolute, and without respect of recompence. Yea, I would it were uncharitable to say, that many besides the savages of Calecut, place Satan in the throne, and God on the foot-stoole. For as Witches and Sorcerers converse with evill spirits in plausible and familiar formes, which in ugly shapes they would abhor: B so many a man serves Satan under the formes of gold and silver, under the images of Saints and lightsome Angels, under glittering coates, or glorious titles, or beauteous faces, whom they would defie as himselfe. And as the free-borne Israelite might become a servant, either by forfeiture upon trespasse, or by sale, or by spoile in warre; so this accursed servitude is incurred the same wayes, by them which should be Christians. By forfeiture: for though the debt and trespasse be to God, yet (tradet lictori) he shall deliver the debtor to the Jaylor. By saile, as Ahab sold himself to work wickednesse: sold under sinne, saith the Apostle. By spoile: Beware least any man make a spoile of your συλαγωγων saith Paul to his Colossians. Alas, what a miserable change do these men make, to leave the living God, which is so bountifull, that he rewards a cup of cold water with eternall glory, to serve him that hath nothing to give but his bare wages; and what wages? The wages of sinne is death; And what death? not the death C of the body, in the severing of the soule; but the death of the soule, in the separation from God: there is not so much difference betwixt life and death, as there is betwixt the first death and the second. Oh woefull wages of a desperate worke! Well were these men, if they might goe unpaid, and serve for nothing: but as the mercy of God will not let any of our poore services to him goe unrewarded; so will not his justice suffer the contrary service go unpaid; in flaming fire rendering vengeance to them that know not God, and those that obey not the Gospell of our Lord Jesus. Beloved, as that worthy B. said on his death-bed, we are happy in this, that we serve a good Master: how happy shall it be for us, if we shall doe him good service, that in the day of our account we may heare, Euge serve bone, well done good servant, enter into thy Masters joy.

Now he that prescribes the act (service,) must also prescribe the manner (Truly, totally.) D God cannot abide we should serve him with a double heart (an heart and an heart) that is hypocritically. Neither that we should serve him with a false heart, that is, niggardly and unwillingly: but against doubling, he will be serv'd in truth; and against halving, he will be served with all the heart. To serve God and not in truth, is mockery. To serve him truly, and not with the whole heart, is a base dodging with God. This ὀφθαλμοδουλια eye-service is a fault with men: but let us serve God, but while he sees us, it is enough. Behold he sees us every where. If he did not see our heart, it were enough to serve him in the face; and if the heart were not his, it were too much to give him a part of it; but now that he made this whole heart of ours, it is reason he should be served with it; and now that hee sees the inside of the heart, it is madnesse not to serve him in truth. Those serve God, not in truth, which as Seneca sayes of some auditors, come to heare, not to learne: which bring their tablets to E write words, not their hearts for the finger of God to write in. Whose eyes are on their Bible, whiles their heart is on their Count-book; which can play the Saints in the Church, Ruffians in the Tavern, Tyrants in their houses, Cheators in their shops; Those Dames which under a cloke of modesty and devotion, hide nothing but pride and fiendishnesse. Those serve God, not with all their heart; whose bosome is like Rachels tent, that hath (Teraphim) Idols hid in the straw; or rather like a Philistims Temple, that hath the Ark and Dagon under one roofe; That come in ever with Naamans exceptives, Only in this: Those that have let down the world like the spies into the bottome bottome of the well of their heart, and cover the mouth of it with wheat: I meane that hide great oppreſſions, with the ſhew of ſmall beneficences: Thoſe which like Salomons falſe Curtizan, cry (Dividatur) and are willing to ſhare themſelves betwixt God and the world. And certainly, this is a noble policy of the Devill, becauſe he knows, he hath no right to the heart, he can be glad of any corner; but withall he knows, that if he have any, he hath all; for where he hath any part, God will have none. This baſe-mindedneſſe is fit for that evill one. God will have all, or nothing. It was an heroicall anſwer, that Theodoret reports of Valentinian, whom when the ſouldiers had choſen to be Emperor, they were conſulting to have another joyned with him. No (my ſouldiers) ſaid he, it was in your power to give me the Empire, while I had it not: but now when I have it, it is not in your power to give me a partner. We our ſelves ſay, The bed and the throne can abide no rivals. May we not well ſay of the heart, as Lot of Zoar, Is it not a little one? Alas it is even too little for God: what doe we think of taking an Inmate into this cottage? It is a favour and happineſſe, that the God of glory will vouchſafe to dwell in it alone. Even ſo (O God) take thou up theſe roomes for thy ſelf, and enlarge them for the entertainment of thy ſpirit: have thou us wholly, and let us have thee. Let the world ſerve it ſelfe. O let us ſerve thee, with all our hearts.

God hath ſet the heart on work to feare, the hands on worke to ſerve him: now (that nothing may be wanting) he ſets the head on work to conſider; and that, not ſo much the judgements of God, (yet thoſe are of ſingular uſe, and may not be forgotten) as his mercies, What great things he hath done for you, not againſt you. He that looked upon his own works, and ſaw they were good, and delighted in them, delights that we ſhould look upon them too, and applaud his wiſdome, power, and mercy that ſhines in them. Even the leaſt of Gods workes are worthy of the obſervation of the greateſt Angell in heaven: but (the magnalia Dei) the great things he hath done are more worthy of our wonder, of our aſtoniſhment. Great things indeed that he did for Iſrael; he meant to make that Nation a precedent of mercy; that all the world might ſee what he could doe for a people. Heaven and earth conſpir'd to bleſſe them. What ſhould I ſpeak of the wonders of Ægypt? Surely I know not whether their preſervation in it, or deliverance out of it, were more miraculous. Did they want a guide? Himſelf goes before them in fire. Did they want a ſhelter? His cloud is ſpred over them for a covering. Did they want way? The ſea it ſelfe ſhall make it; and be at once a ſtreet, and a wall to them. Did they want bread? Heaven it ſelf ſhall powre downe food of Angels. Did they want meat to their bread? The winde ſhall bring them whole drifts of Quailes into their Tents. Doe they want drinke to both? The very Rocks ſhall yeeld it them. Doe they want ſuits of apparell? Their very clothes ſhall not wax old on their backs. Doe they want advice? God himſelf ſhall give his vocall Oracle between the Cherubins. Doe they want a law? God ſhall come down upon Sinai, and deliver it in fire, thundring, ſmoke, earth-quakes, and write it with his own finger, in tables of ſtone. Doe they want habitations? God ſhall provide them a land that flowes with milk and honie. Are they perſecuted? God ſtands in fire between them and their harms. Are they ſtung to death? The brazen ſerpent ſhall cure them. Are they reſiſted? The walls of Jericho ſhall fall downe alone; haile-ſtones braine their enemies. The Sunne ſhall ſtand ſtill in heaven, to ſee Joſhuahs revenge and victory. Oh great and mighty things that God did for Iſrael!

And if any Nation under heaven could either parallel or ſecond Iſrael in the favors of God, this poore little Iland of ours is it. The cloud of his protection hath covered us. The blood-red ſea of perſecution hath given way to us, and we are paſſed it drie-ſhod. The true Manna from heaven is rained downe aboundantly about our tents. The water of life guſheth forth plentiouſly to us: The better law of the Goſpell is given us from heaven by the hand of his Sonne: The walls of the ſpirituall Jericho are fallen down before us, at the blaſt of the trumpets of God; and curſed be he that goes about to build them up againe. Now therefore, that we may come more cloſe to the taſke of this day; Let me ſay to you, as Samuel to his Iſraelites, Conſider with me what great things the Lord hath done for us: and as one wiſht that the envious had eys in every place; ſo could I ſeriouſly wiſh that all which have ill will at our Sion had their

If I ſhould looke back to the ancient mercies of God, and ſhew you that this Kingdome (though divided from the world) was one of the firſt that received the Goſpel; That it yeelded the firſt Chriſtian Emperor that gave peace & honour to the Church; The firſt & greateſt lights that ſhone forth in the darkeſt of Popery, to all the world; and that it was the firſt kingdome that ſhooke Antichriſt fully out of the ſaddle; I might find juſt matter of praiſe and exultation: but I will turne over no other Chronicles but your memory: This day alone hath matter enough of an eternall gratulation. For this is the communis terminus, wherein Gods favours meet upon our heads; which therefore repreſents to us, both what we had, and what we have; The one to our ſenſe, the other to our remembrance. This day was both Queen Elizabeths
B Initium gloriæ, and King Iames his Initium regni. To her, Natalitium ſalutis; as the paſſion dayes of Martyrs were called of old; and Natalis Imperii to him. Theſe two names ſhew us h ppines enough to take up our hearts for ever. And firſt, why ſhould it not be our perpetuall joy & rejoycing, that we were her ſubjects? O bleſſed Queen, the mother of this Nation, the Nurſe of this Church, the glory of womanhood, the envy & example of forraine Nations, the wonder of times, how ſweet and ſacred ſhall thy memory be to all poſteritities? How is thy name not Parables of the duſt, as the Jewes ſpeake; nor written in the earth, as Jeremie ſpeakes, but in the living earth of all loyall hearts, never to be razed. And though the foule mouths of our Adverſaries ſtick not to call her miſeram fœminam, as Pope Clement did; nor to ſay of her, as Evagrius ſayes uncharitably of Juſtinian the great Law-giver, (ad ſupplicia juſto Dei judicio apud inferos lucenda profecta eſt:) and thoſe that durſt bring her on the ſtage living,
C bring her now dead (as I have heard by thoſe that have ſeen it) into their proceſſions, like a tormented ghoſt attended with fiends and firebrands, to the terror of their ignorant beholders: Yet, as we ſaw ſhe never proſpered ſo well, as when ſhe was moſt curſed by their Pius 5. ſo now we hope ſhe is rather ſo much more glorious in heaven, by how much they are more malicious on earth. Theſe arrogant wretches, that can at their pleaſure fetch Salomon from heaven to hell, and Trajan & Falconella from hell to heaven; Campian and Garnet from earth to heaven, Queene Elizabeth from earth to hell; ſhall find one day that they have miſtaken the keyes, and ſhall know what it is to judge, by being judged. In the mean time, in ſpight of the gates of Rome, Memoria juſti in benedictionibus. To omit thoſe vertues which were proper to her ſex, by which ſhe deſerved to be the Queen of women, how excellent were her Maſculine graces of learning, valour, wiſdome, by which ſhe might juſtly challenge to D be the Queen of men! So learned was ſhee, that ſhee could give preſent anſwers to Embaſſadors in their own tongues: or if they liſted to borrow of their neighbours, ſhee paid them in that they borrowed. So valiant, that her name like Ziſcaes drum, made the proudeſt Romaniſts to quake. So wiſe, that whatſoever fell out happily againſt the common Adverſary in France, Netherlands, Ireland; it was by themſelves aſcribed to her policy. What ſhall I ſpeak of her long and ſucceſſefull government, of her miraculous preſervations, of her famous victories, wherein the waters, winds, fire, and earth fought for us, as if they had been in pay under Her? of Her excellent laws, of Her carefull executions? Many daughters have done worthily, but thou ſurmounteſt them all. Such was the ſweetneſſe of her government, and ſuch the feare of miſerie in her loſſe, that many worthy Chriſtians deſired their eyes might be cloſed before Hers; and how many thouſands therefore welcomed their owne death, becauſe
E it prevented Hers. Every one pointed to her white haires, and ſaid with that peaceable Leontius, When this ſnow melts, there will be a floud. Never day, except alwaies the fift of November, was like to be ſo bloudy as this; not for any doubt of Title (which never any loyall heart could queſtion, nor any diſloyall ever did, beſides Dolman) but for that our Eſauites comforted themſelves againſt us, and ſaid, The day of mourning for our mother will come ſhortly, then will we ſlay our brethren. What ſhould I ſay more? Lots were caſt upon our Land; and that honeſt Politician (which wanted nothing but a gibbet to have made him a Saint) Father Parſons, tooke paines to ſet downe

Yea, as that bleſſed ſoule of hers gained by this change of an immortall crowne for a corruptible; ſo (bleſſed be the name of our God) this Land of ours hath not loſt by that loſſe. Many think that this evening the world had his beginning. Surely a new and golden world began this day to us, and (which it could not have done by her loynes) promiſes continuance (if our ſins interrupt it not) to our poſterities. I would the flatterie of a Prince were treaſon; in effect it is ſo: (for the flatterer is ἰσοτὸς σφάκτης, a kind murtherer.) I would it were ſo in puniſhment. If I were to ſpeake before my ſoveraigne King and Maſter, I would praiſe God for him, not praiſe him to himſelf. A ſmall praiſe to the face may be adulation, (though it be within bonnds:) a great praiſe in abſence may be but juſtice. If we ſee not the worth of our King, how ſhall we be thankfull to God that gave him? Give me leave therefore freely to bring forth the Lords Evagr. l. 5. c. 21. As it was a great preſage of happineſſe to Mauritius the Emperour, that an (ἰσοτὸς) a familiar Devill removing him from place to place in his ſwathing bands, yet had no power to hurt him; So that thoſe early conſpiracies, wherewith Satan aſſaulted the very cradle of our deare Soveraigne, prevailed not, it was a juſt bodement of his future greatneſſe and beneficiall uſe to the world. And he that gave him life and crowne together, and miraculouſly preſerved them both, gave him graces fit for his Deputie on earth to weild that Crowne, and improve that life to the behoofe of Chriſtendome. Let me begin with that (which the Heathen man required to the happineſſe of any ſtate) his learning and knowledge: wherein I may ſafely ſay, he exceedeth all his 105 predeceſſors. Our Conqueror King William (as our Chroni-Malmesbur. cles reports) by a blunt proverbe that he was wont to uſe againſt unlearned Princes, made his ſonne Henry a Beauclerc to thoſe times. But a candle in the dark will make more ſhew than a bonefire by day. In theſe dayes ſo lightſome for knowledge, to excell (even for a profeſſed ſtudent) is hard and rare. Never had England more learned Biſhops and Doctors; which of them ever returned from his Majeſties diſcourſe without admiration? What King chriſtened hath written ſo learned volumes? To omit the reſt, his laſt (of this kinde) wherein he hath ſo held up Cardinall Bellarmine and his Maſter Pope Paulus, is ſuch, that Pleſſis and Mouline (the two great lights of France) profeſſe to receive their light in this diſcourſe, from his beames; and the learned Jeſuite Salkeild could not but be converted with the neceſſity of thoſe demonſtrations; and I may boldly ſay, Popery (ſince it was) never received ſo deep a wound from any work, as from that of his. What King ever moderated the ſolemne acts of an Univerſitie in all profeſſions, and had ſo many hands clapt in the applauſe of his acute and learned determinations? Briefly, ſuch is his entire acquaintance with all ſciences, and with the Queene of all, Divinitie, that he might well diſpute with the infallible Pope Paulus Quintus for his triple Crown: and I would all Chriſtian quarrels lay upon this duell. His Juſtice in governing, matcheth his knowledge how to Plato. governe; for as one that knowes the Common-wealth cannot be unhappy, wherein (according to the wiſe Heathens rule) Law is a Queene, and Will a ſubject, He hath ever endevoured to frame the proceedings of his government to the lawes, not the lawes to them. Witneſſe that memorable example, whereof your eyes were witneſſes; I meane the unpartiall execution of one of the ancienteſt Barons of thoſe parts, for the murder of a mean ſubject: wherein not the favour of the block might be yeelded, that the diſhonour of the death might bee no leſſe than the paine of the death.

Yet

A Yet who will not grant his Mercy to be eminent amongst his vertues, when Parsons himselfe yeelds it? And if a vertue so continuing, could be capable of excesse, this might seem so in him. For that which was said of Anastatius the Emperor, that he would attempt no exploit (though never so famous) if it might cost the price of Christian blood; and that which was said of Mauritius, that by his good will he would not have so much as a traitor die; and that of Vespasian, that he wept even for just executions; and lastly that of Theodosius, that he wisht he could recall those to life againe that had wronged him; may in some sense be justly verified of our mercifull Soveraigne. I pray God the measure of this vertue may never hurt himselfe; I am sure the want of it shall never give cause of complaint to his adversaries. But among all his Heroicall Graces, which commend him as a Man, as a Christian, as a King; Pietie and firmnesse in Religion calls me to it, and will not suffer me to deferre the mention
B of it any longer. A private man unsetled in opinion, is like a loose tooth in the head, troublesome and useless: but a publike person unstayed, is dangerous. Resolution for the truth is so much better than knowledge, by how much the possessing of a treasure is better than knowing where it is. With what zeale did his Majestie flie upon the blasphemous novelties of Vorstius? How many solicitations, threats, promises, profers hath he trampled under his feet in former times, for but a promise of an indifferent connivence at the Romish religion? Was it not an answer worthy of a King, worthy of marble and brasse, that he made unto their agent for this purpose, in the times of the greatest perill of resistance, That all the Crowns and Kingdoms in this world should not induce him to change any jot of his profession? Hath he not so ingaged
C himselfe in this holy quarrell, that the world confesses Rome had never such an Adversary? and all Christian Princes rejoyce to follow him as their worthy leader in all the battells of God; and all Christian Churches in their Prayers and exclamations, stile him, in a double right, Defender of the faith, more by desert, than inheritance.

But because as the Sun-beames, so praises are more kindly, when they are cast oblique upon their objects, than when they fall directly; let me shew you him rather in the blessings we receive from him, than in the graces which are in him. And not to insist upon his extinguishing of those hellish feuds in Scotland, and the reducing of those barbarous borderers to civility and order, (two acts worthy of eternitie, and which no hand but his could doe) Consider how great things the Lord hath done for us by him in our Peace, in our freedome of the Gospell, in our Deliverance.

Continuance derracts from the value of any favour. Little doe we know the price of peace. If we had been in the coat of our forefathers, or our neighbours, we should have knowne how to esteeme this deare blessing of God. Oh, my deare brethren,
D we never knew what it was to heare the murdering peeces about our eares; to see our Churches and houses flaming over our heads; to heare the fearefull cracks of their falls, mixed with the confused out-cries of men, killing, incouraging to kill, or resist, dying, and the shriekings of women and children; we never saw tender babes snatcht from the brests of their mothers, now bleeding upon the stones, or sprawling upon the pikes, and the distracted mother ravished, ere she may have leave to die. Wee never saw men and horses lie wallowing in their mingled blood, and the ghastly visages of death deformed with wounds. The impotent wife hanging with teares on her armed husband, as desirous to die with him, with whom she may not live. The amazed runnings to and fro of those that would faine escape, if they knew how, and the E furious pace of a bloody victor; The rifling of houses for spoile, and every souldier running with his load, and ready to fight with other for our booty; The miserable captive driven manacled before the insulting enemy. Never did we know how cruell an Adversary is, and how burdensome an helper is in war. Looke round about you: all your neighbours have seene and tasted these calamities: All the rest of the world haue been whirled about in these wofull tumults; onely this Iland hath like the center stood unmoveable. Onely this Isle hath been like Nilus, which when all other waters overflow, keeps within the banks. That weeare free from these and a thousand other miseries of war, whither should we ascribe it, but next under God, to his Anointed, as a King, as a King of Peace? For both Anarchie is the mother of division, division, as we see in the state of Italie; wherein when they wanted their King, all ran into civill broyles; The Venetians with them of Ravenna; Verona and Vincentia, with the Paduans and Tarvisians; The Pisans and Florentines with them of Luca and Sienna. And besides, every King is not a Peace-maker; Ours is made of Peace. There have been Princes, which as the Antiochians said of Julian (taking occasion by the Bull which he stampt in his coyne) have goared the world to death. The brests of some Princes have been like a Thunder-cloud, whose vapours would never leave working till they have vented themselves with terror to the world: Ours, hath nothing in it, but a gracious raine to water the inheritance of God. Behold, He, even He alone, like to Noah's Dove, brought an Olive of Peace to the tossed Arke of Christendome. He, like another Augustus, before the second comming of Christ, hath becalmed the world, and shut the iron gates of warre, and is the bond of that peace he hath made. And if the Peace-maker both doth blesse, and is blessed; how should we blesse him, and blesse God for him, and hold our selves blessed in him?

Now what were Peace without Religion, but like a Nabals sheep-shearing; like the fatting of an Epicurean hogge; the very festivall revels of the Devill. But for us, we have Gloria in excelsis Deo, sung before our Pax in terris; in a word, we have Peace with the Gospell. Matchiavell himself could say in his discourses, that two continued successions of vertuous Princes (fanno grandi effetti) cannot but doe great matters. We prove it so this day; wherein religion is not only warmed, but locked in her seat so fast, that the gates of hell shall never prevaile against it. There have been Princes, and that in this land, which (as the heathen Politician compared his Tyrant) have been like to ill Physitians, that have purged away the good humours, and left the bad behind them; with whom any thing hath been lawfull, but to be religious. Some of your gray haires can be my witnesses. Behold the evils we have escaped, shew us our blessings. Here hath been no dragging out of houses, no hiding of Bibles, no creeping into woods, no Bonnering or Butchering of Gods Saints, no rotting in dungeons, no casting of infants out of the mothers belly into the mothers flames; nothing but Gods truth abundantly preached, cheerfully professed, incouraged, rewarded. What Nation under heaven yeelds so many learned Divines? What times ever yeelded so many preaching Bishops? when was this Citie (the Citie of our joy) ever so happy this way, as in these late successions? Whither can wee ascribe this health of the Church, and life of the Gospel, but, next to God, to His example, His countenance, His endevours? wherein I may not omit how right he hath trod in the steps of that blessed Constantine in all his religious proceedings. Let us in one word parallel them. Constantine caused fifty volumes of the Scriptures to be fair written out in parchment, for the use of the Church. King James hath caused the Books of Scriptures to be accurately translated, and published by thousands. Constantine made a zealous edict against Novatians, Valentinians, Marcionites. King James, besides his powerfull proclamations & soveraigne lawes, hath effectually written against Popery, & Vorstianisme. Constantine took away the liberty of the meetings of Hereticks. King James hath by wholsome lawes inhibited the assemblies of Papists and Schismaticks. Constantine sate in the middest of Bishops, as if he had been one of them. King James, besides his solemne conferences, vouchsafes (not seldome) to spend his meales in discourse with his Bishops, and other worthy Divines. Constantine charged his sonnes (ut planè & sine fuco Christiani essent) that they should be Christians in earnest. King Iames hath done the like in learned and divine precepts, which shall live till time be no more. Yea, in their very coyns is a resemblance: Constantine had his picture stampt upon his metals praying. King Iames hath his picture with prayer about it; O Lord, protect the kingdoms which thou hast united. Lastly, Constantine built Churches; one in Jerusalem, another in Nicomedia. King Iames hath founded one Colledge, which shall help to build and confirme the whole Church of God upon earth. Ye wealthy Citizens that love Jerusalem, cast in your store after this royall example, into the Sanctuarie of God: and whiles you make the Church of God happy, make your selves so. Brethren, if we have any relish of Christ, any sense of heaven, let us blesse God for the life of our soule, the Gospell; and for the spirit of this life, his Anointed.

But

A But where had been our peace, or this freedome of the Gospell, without our deliverance? and where had our deliverance been without him? As it was reported of the Oake of Mamre, that all religions rendred their yeerely worship there: The Jews because of Abraham their patriarch; the Gentiles because of the Angels that appeared there to Abraham; the Christians because of Christ that was there seen of Abraham with the Angels; So was there to King James in his first beginnings, a confluence of all Sects, with papers in their hands, and (as it was best for them) with a Rogamus Domine, non pugnamus, like the subjects of Theodosius. But our cozens of Samaria, when they saw that Salomons yoke would not be lightned, soone flew off in a rage, What portion have we in David? And now those, which had so oft lookt up to heaven in vain, resolve to dig down to Hell for aid. Satan himselfe met them, and offered (for saving of their labour) to bring Hell up to them. What a world of sulphur had he provided against that day? What a brewing of death was tunned up in those vessels? The murderous pioners laught at the close felicity of their project; and now before-hand seemed in conceit to have heard the crack of this hellish thunder, and to see the mangled carkasses of the Hereticks flying up so suddenly, that their soules must needs goe upward towards their perdition, their streets strewed with legges and armes; and the stones braining as many in their fall, as they blew up in their rise. Remember the Children of Edom, O Lord, in the day of Jerusalem, which said, Down with it, down with it, even to the ground. O daughter of Babel, worthy to be destroyed, blessed shall he be that serveth thee as thou wouldest have served us. But he that sits in heaven laught as fast at them, to see their presumption that would be sending up bodies to heaven before the resurrection, and preferring companions to Elias in a fiery Chariot; and said, (ut quid fremuerunt?) Consider now how great things the Lord hath done for us; The snare is broken, and we are delivered. But how? As that learned Bishop well applied Salomon to this purpose, Divinatio in labiis Regis. If there had not been a divination in the lips of the King, we had been all in jawes of death. Under his shadow we are preserved alive, as Jeremie speaketh. It is true, God could have done it by other meanes; but he would doe it by this, that we might owe the being of our lives to him, of whom we held our well-being before. Oh praised be the God of heaven for our deliverance! Praised be God for his Anointed, by whom we are delivered. Yea how should we call to our fellow-creatures? The Angels, Saints, heavens, elements, meteors, mountaines, beasts, trees, to help us praise the Lord for this mercy. And (as the oath of the Romane souldiers ranne) how deare and precious should the life of Cæsar be to us, above all earthly things? how should we hate the base unthankfulnesse of those men, which can say of him, as one said of his Saint Martin, Martinus bonus in auxilio, charus in negotio; who whiles they owe him all, grudge him any thing. Away with the mention of outward things: all the blood in our bodies is due to him: all the prayers and well-wishes of our soules are due to him. How solemnly festivall should this day be to us and to our posterities for ever? How cheerefully for our peace, our religion, our deliverance, should we take up that acclamation which the people of Rome used in the Coronation of Charles the great, Carolo Jacobo à Deo coronato, magno & pacifico Britannorum Imperatori, vita & victoria. To Charles James crowned of God, the great and peaceable Emperor of Britaine, Life and victory; and let God and his people say, Amen.

These were great things indeed, that God did for Israel; great that he hath done for us; great for the present, not certain for the future. They had not, no more have we the blessings of God by entaile, or by lease. Only at the good will of the Lord; and that is, during our good behaviour; Sin is a forfeiture of all favours. If you do wickedly, you shall perish. It was not for nothing that the same word in the originall signifies both sin & punishment. These two are inseparable. There is nothing but a little priority in time between them. The Angels did wickedly, they perisht by their fall from heaven. The old world did wickedly, they perisht by waters from heaven. The Sodomites did wickedly, they perisht by fire from heaven. Corah & his company did wickedly, they perisht by the earth. The Ægyptians did wickedly, they perisht by the Sea. The Canaanites did wickedly, they perisht by the sword of Israel. The Israelites did wickedly, they perisht by pestilence, serpents, Philistims. What, should I run my selfe out of breath in this endlesse course of examples? There was never sin, but it had a punishment, either in the Actor, or in the Redeemer. There was never punishment, but was for sin. Heaven should have no quarrell against us, Hell could have no power over us, but for our sins. Those are they that have plagued us: those are they that threaten us.

But what shall be the judgement? Perishing. To whom? To you and your King. He doth not say, If your King doe wickedly, you shall perish, as sometimes he hath done: nor, If your King doe wickedly, he shall perish, although Kings are neither priviledged from sinnes, nor from judgements: nor, if you doe wickedly, you only shall perish; but, If ye doe wickedly, ye and your King shall perish. So neer a relation is there betwixt the King and Subjects; the sin of the one reacheth to the judgement of the other; and the judgement of the one is the smart of both. The King is the Head, the Commons the stomack: if the head be sick, the stomack is affected. David sins, the people die. If the stomack be sick, the head complaines. For the transgression of the people are many Princes. What could have snatcht from our head that sweet Prince, of fresh and bleeding memory, (that might justly have challenged Othoes name, Mirabilia mundi) now in the prime of all the worlds expectation, but our traiterous wickednesses? His Christian modesty upon his death-bed could charge himselfe, (no, no, I have sins enow of my own to doe this.) But this very accusation did cleare him, and burden us. O glorious Prince, they are our sins that are guilty of thy death, and our losse. We have done wickedly; thou perishedst. A harsh word for thy glorified condition. But such a perishing as is incident to Saints; (for there is a Perire de medio, as well as a Perire à facie) a perishing from the earth, as well as a perishing from God. It was a joyfull perishing to thee: our sins have advantaged thy soule, which is partly therefore happy, because we were unworthy of thee; but they have robbed us of our happinesse in thee. Oh our trecherous sinnes, that have offered this violence to that sweet hopefull sacred person! And doe they not yet still conspire against him, that is yet dearer to us, the root of these goodly branches, the breath of our nostrils, the anointed of God? Brethren, let me speake it confidently: As every sin is a traitor to a mans own soule, so every wicked man is a traitor to his King: yea, every of his crying sins is a false-hearted rebell, that hides powder and pocket dags for the precious life of his Soveraigne. Any states-man may learne this even of Machiavel himselfe: which I confesse when I read, I thought of the Devill confessing Christ. That the giving of God his due, is the cause of the greatnesse of any State; and contrarily, the neglect of his service, the cause of ruine: and if any prophane Zosimus shall doubt of this point, I wou'd but turne him to Evagrius his discourse to this purpose, where he shall finde instances of enow particulars. VVhat-ever politick Philosophers have distinguished, betwixt bonus vir, & civis, I say, that as a good man cannot be an ill subject, so a lewd man can no more be a good subject, than evill can be good. Let him sooth, and sweare what he will, his sins are so many treasons against the Prince and State: for, Ruine is from iniquity, saith Ezechiel. Alas, what safety can we be in, when such miscreants lurk in our houses, yea in our streets; when the Country, City, Court, is so full of these spirituall cõspiracies? Ye that are Magistrates, not for Gods sake only, but for your Kings sake, whose Deputies ye are, as he is Gods; not for religion only, but for very policie, as you tender the dear life of our gracious Soveraigne; as you regard the sweet peace of this State & Kingdome; the welfare of this Church; yea, as you love your own life, peace, welfare; rouze up your spirits, awaken your Christian courage, and set your selves heartily against the traitorly sins of these times, which threaten the bane of all these. Cleanse ye these Augean stables of our drunken Taverns, of our prophane Stages, and of those blind Vaults of professed filthinesse, Whose steps go down to the chambers of death, yea, to the deep of hell. And ye, my holy brethren, the messengers of God, if there be any sons of Thunder amongst you, if ever you ratled from heaven the terrible judgements of God against sinners, now do it; for (contrary to the naturall) the deep winter of iniquity is most seasonable for this spiritual thunder. Be heard above, be seen beneath. Out-face sin, out-preach it, out-live it. We are stars in the right hand of God: let us be like any stars save the moon, that hath blots in her face; or the star wormwood whose

A fall made bitter waters; or Saint Judes planets, that wander in irregularities. Let the light of our lives shine in the faces of the world, and dazle them whom it shall not guide. Then shall we with authority speak what we doe, when we doe that which we speak. We can never better testifie our thanktull and loyall respects to so good a King in whose favour is our life, and by whose grace we are upheld against the unworthy affronts of this sacrilegious Age, than by crying down, by living down those sinnes which threaten our happinesse in him. And ye, beloved Christians, whose faces seem worthily to congratulate the joy of this day, if ye would approve your selves good subjects to our King, labour to be good subjects to His King, the King of Heaven. Away with those rebellious wickednesses which may be prejudiciall to our peace. In vaine shall we testifie our loyalty by these outward ceremonies of rejoycing, if we be faulty in the substance. To what purpose shall we ring our bels, if in the meane time

B we hold fast Salamons (funes peccatorum) cords of sin; yea, the Prophets cart-ropes of iniquity; and thereby pull down judgement upon our heads? To what purpose shall we kindle Bonefires in our streets, if we kindle the flame of Gods displeasure against us by our sinnes? To what purpose shall ye feast one another in your houses, if you shall feast the fiends of hell with your wilfull sins? Dæmonum cibus ebrietas; Hierome saith well, Drunkenesse, luxurie, fornication, and every sinne is the very dyet and dainties of the Devill. For Gods sake therefore, for our Kings sake, for your own soules sake, be good, that you may be loyall. Oh my brethren, let us not with old Toby suffer our eyes to be blinded with the swallowes dung of this world. Let us not dare to make a willing shipwrack of conscience, for the venture of a little ballast of gaine. Away with our pride, usury, oppression, false weights, false oaths, false faces; Doe no more wickedly, that we perish not.

C They are our sins, which as they threaten to lose us our best friend above, (the God of our salvation) so they hearten our adversaries against us on earth. Their hopes, their designes, their wickednesse to us, hath been profest to be built upon ours to God. If they did not see we did evill, they durst not hope we could perish. Authority hath wisely and seasonably taken order for disarming of wilfull Recusants. What should weapons doe in the hand of disloyalty? Oh that it could take order to strip us of our sins, which will else arme God and his creatures against us! The gates of Rome, the gates of hell, could not hurt us, if we did not hurt our selves. Oh that we could so love our selves, as to part with all our plausible and gainfull evils; that we would this day renue our holy covenants with God, and keep them for ever? How would he still feed us with the finest of the wheat? How would he, that (as this day) when we feared a tempest, gave us an happy calme, prevent a tempest in our calme when

D we feare not? How safely should our children play, and we feast in our streets? How memorable a patterne of mercy should this Iland be to posterities? What famous Trophees of victory would he erect over all Antichristianisme amongst us? How freely and loud should the Gospell of God ring every where in the eare of the generations yet unborne? How sure should we be, long and long to enjoy so gratious and deare a Soveraigne, so comfortable a peace, so happy a government? even till this Eve of the Annunciation of the first comming of Christ, overtake the day of the Annunciation of the second comming, for our redemption. Which God for his mercies sake, for his Christs sake, vouchsafe to grant us. Amen.

A SERMON PREACHED BEFORE HIS MAJESTIE AT his Court at THEBALDS, on Saturday the 15. of SEPTEMBER, 1622.

John 7. 24. Judge not according to the appearance, but judge righteous judgement.

AS in the civill body, so in the naturall; the head as it is the highest, so the chiefe part: according to the place is the dignity: Of the head, the highest Region is chiefest, serving onely for the use of intellectuall powers; whereas the lower part of it is onely imployed for bodily nutrition: Now, as the reasonable part of the Soule is Vertex animæ, being contradistinguished to the sensitive; So, if ye distinguish the reasonable into Judgement and Deliberation, Naturale Judicatorium dicetur esse vertex, saith Aquinas; Judgement is the top of our soule; and therefore cals for the top of our care; If the highest wheele goe right, the inferiour hardly erre. Heare then the golden rule of the Author, of the Judge of our judgement, Judge not according to the appearance, but judge righteous judgement. The negative part is first, Judge not; then, Judge: where the mind is free and clear, it is good to begin with the positive document of right, which is the rule to it self and the wrong; but where the heart is forestalled with mis-opinion, ablative directions are first needfull to unteach error, ere we can learn truth. Judge not therefore according to the appearance: κατ' ὄψιν, is (as the Vulgar rightly) secundum faciem, according to the face, because the face onely appeares, the rest is hid: Every thing, not man onely, hath both a face and an heart; a face which is pervious to every eye, an heart to which no eye can pierce but the wise. This face, as of man, so of things, is a false rule of judgement; Frons, oculi, &c. The forehead, eyes, countenance tell many a lye. Judge not therefore according to appearance; it is no measuring by a crooked line: There is nothing more uncertaine than appearance; some things appeare that are not, and some things are that appeare not; and that (besides naturall occurrences) in morally both good and evill: Some things appeare good that are not, and therefore mis-lead the heart both to an unjust prosecution, and to a false applause; some things appeare evill that are not, and therefore mis-lead us to an injurious censure, and undeserved abomination: Again, some things are good that appeare not, and therefore lose both our allowance and pursuit; some things are good that appeare not, and therefore insinuate themselves in our acquaintance and love, to our cost: Many a Snake lies hid under the Strawberry leaves leaves, and ſtings us ere we be aware. Vitia virtutes mentiuntur, ſaith Gregorie, Vice too oft makes a maſke of the ſkin of Vertue, and lookes lovely: Vertue as often comes forth (like a Martyr in the Inquiſition) with a San-benit upon her back, and a cap painted with Devils upon her head, to make her ugly to the beholders; Judge not therfore according to the appearance. A

The appearance or face, is of things, as of men: We ſee it at once with one caſt of the eye, yet there are angles, and hils, and dales, which upon more earneſt view the eye ſees cauſe to dwell in: ſo it is with this appearance or face of things, which however it ſeemes wholly to appeare to us at the firſt glance, yet upon further ſearch will deſcry much matter of our inquiry: For every thing from the ſkin incluſively to the heart, is the face; every thing beſides true being, is appearance. All the falſe φαντασιαι that uſe to beguile the judgement of man, hide themſelves under this appearance: Theſe reduce themſelves to three heads; Preſumptions, falſe Formes, Events: Preſumptions muſt be diſtinguiſhed; for whereas there are three degrees of them, firſt (levia Probabilia) light Probabilities, then faire Probabilities, and thirdly, ſtroog Probabilities, which are called, Judicia juris, the two firſt are allowed by very Inquiſitors, but as ſufficient to cauſe ſuſpition, to take information, to attach the ſuſpected, not enough whereon to ground the Libell or the torture, much leſſe a finall judgement: Thus Elie ſees Annaes lips goe, therefore ſhe is drunk: The Phariſes ſee Chriſt ſit with ſinners, he is a friend to their ſins. B

Falſe formes are preſented either to the eye or the eare. In the former, beſides ſupernaturall deluſions, there is a deceit of the ſight, whether through the indiſpoſition of the Organ, or the diſtance of the Object, or the miſ-diſpoſition of the medium: So as if we ſhould judge according to appearance, the Sun ſhould double it ſelfe by the firſt, through the croſneſſe of the eye, it ſhould diminiſh it ſelfe by the ſecond, and ſeem as big as a large Sive, or no large Cart-wheele at the moſt: It ſhould dance in the riſing, and move irregularly by the third. To the eare are miſ-reports, and falſe ſuggeſtions, whether concerning the perſon, or the cauſe. In the former, the calumniating tongue of the Detractor, is the Jugler that makes any mans honeſty or worth appeare ſuch as his malice liſteth: In the latter, the ſmooth tongue of the ſubtile Rhetorician is the Impoſtor which makes cauſes appeare to the unſettled judgement, ſuch as his wit or favour pleaſeth: Events, which are oft-times as much againſt the intention, and above the remedie of the Agent, as beſides the nature of the Act: There is ſometimes a good event of evill, as Jaſons adverſary cured him in ſtabbing him; the Iſraelites thrive by oppreſſion, the Field of the Church yeelds moſt when it is manured with blood: There is ſometimes an ill event of good; Abimelech gives David the Shew-bread, and the Sword, he and his family dies for it: Sapientis eſt præſtare culpam; It is enough for a wiſe man to wield the Act, the iſſue he cannot: wiſdome makes demoſtrative Syllogiſmes, à priori, from the cauſes; folly Paralogiſmes, à poſteriori, from the ſucceſſe. Careat ſucceſſibus opto, quiſquis ab eventu, &c. was of old the word of the Heathen Poet. If therefore either upon ſlight probabilities, or falſe formes, or ſubſequent events we paſſe our verdict, we doe what is here forbidden, judge according to appearance. C D

Had the charge been only Judge not, and gone no further, it had been very uſefull, and no other than our Saviour gave in the Mount: we are all on our way; Every man makes himſelfe a Juſtice Itinerant, and paſſeth ſentence of all that comes before him, yea (beyond all commiſſion) of all above him; and that many times not without groſſe miſ-conſtruction, as in the caſe of our late directions: Our very Judges are at our barre; Secrets of Court, of Councell, of State eſcape us not, yea not thoſe of the moſt reſerved Cabinet of Heaven: Quis te conſtituit Judicem? who made thee a Judge? as the Iſraelite (unjuſtly) to Moſes: Theſe are ſawcy uſurpers of forbidden Chaires; and therefore it is juſt with God, that (according to the Pſalmiſt) ſuch Judges ſhould be caſt down in ſtony places, yea, as it is in the Originall, נשמטו בידי סלע that they ſhould be left in the hands of the rock (allidantur Petræ) that they ſhould be daſht againſt the rocks, that will be ſailing without Card or Compaſſe, in the vaſt Ocean of Gods Counſels, or his Anointeds. E

A But now here our Saviour ſeals our Commiſſion, ſets us upon the Bench; allows us the act, but takes order for the manner; we may judge, we may not judge according to the appearance; we may be Judges (whether κρίνω, or δίκασω) the one to condemn, the other to abſolve; we may not be κρίται διαλογισμῶν πονηρῶν Judges of evill thoughts; and we ſhall be evill-thoughted Judges, if we ſhall judge according to appearance. Not only Fortune and Love, but even Juſtice alſo is wont to be painted blindfold; to import that it may not regard faces. God ſaies to every Judge as he did to Samuel concerning Eliab, Look not on his countenance, nor the height of his ſtature. Is an outragious rape committed? Is blood ſhed? Look not whether it be a Courtiers or a Peaſants; whether by a Courtier or a Peaſant, either of them cries equally loud to heaven; Juſtice cannot be too Lyncean to the being of things, nor too blind to the appearance.

B The beſt things appeare not, the worſt appeare moſt; God, the Angels, ſouls both glorified and encaged in our boſomes, grace, ſupernaturall truths, theſe are moſtwhat the objects of our faith, and faith is the evidence of things not ſeene; Like as in bodily objects, the more pure and ſimple ought is (as aire and ethereall fire) the more it flyeth the ſight; the more groſſe and compacted (as water and earth) the more it fils the eye, Judge not therefore according to appearance.

It is an uſefull and excellent rule for the avoiding of error in our judgement of all matters whether Naturall, Civill, or Divine.

Naturall; what is the appearance of a perſon, but the colour, ſhape, ſtature? The colour is oft-times bought or borrowed, the ſhape forced by Art, the ſtature raiſed (to contradict Chriſt) a cubit high, Judge not therfore according to appearance. What are the colluſions of Juglers and Mountebanks, the weepings and motions of Images, the

C noyſes of miraculous cures and diſpoſſeſſions, but appearances? Fit aliquando in Eccleſiâ maxima deceptio populi in miraculis fictis à ſacerdotibus; There is much cozenage of the poore people by cogged miracles, ſaith Cardinall Lyranus; theſe holy frauds could not gull men if they did not judge according to appearance. Should appearance be the rule, our harveſt had been rich; there was not more ſhew of plenty in our fields, than now of ſcracity in our ſtreets. This dearth (to ſay truth) is not in the graine, but in the heart; If the hearts of men were not more blaſted with covetouſneſſe and cruell ſelfe-love, than their grain with diſtemper of ayre, this heeded not; The Barnes and Granaries are full, the Markets empty; Authority knows how to remedy this evill, how to prevent a dearth in abundance, that men may not affamiſh whom God hath fed; and that when God hath given us the ſtaffe of bread, it may not be either hid, or broken; ſhortly, that our ſtore may not be judged by the appearance.

D Civill; Wiſemen and ſtateſmen eſpecially may not alwayes looke the ſame way they would goe; like ſkilfull Sea-men, they ſometimes lavere, and (as the winde may ſtand) fetch compaſſes of lawfull policies to their wiſhed point. That of Tiberius was fearfull; of whom Xiphiline Οὐκ ἐπλευσε, ἀλλ' ἐφέρετο. That he ſayled ever againſt the winde of his words: But ſometimes a good Conſtantius or Anaſtatius, will wiſely pretend what he intends not: As our Saviour made as if he went further, when he meant to turne into Emaus: The hearts of Kings are as deepe waters; we may not thinke to draine them in the hollow of our hand: Secret things to them of whom God hath ſaid, Dixi dii eſtis; things revealed to us and our children. Even we meane ones would be loth to have alwayes our hearts read in our faces; Judge not therefore according to appearance.

Divine; In theſe our ſpeech muſt dwell; If we ſhould judge according to the ap-

E pearance, we ſhould thinke baſely of the Saviour of the world; Who that had ſeene him ſprawling and wringing in the Cratch, flitting to Ægypt, chopping of chips at Nazareth, famiſhing in the Deſart, tranſported by Satan, attended by Fiſhermen, perſecuted by his Kindred, betrayed by one Servant, abjured by another, forſaken of all, apprehended, arraigned, condemned, buffetted, ſpat upon, ſcourged to blood, ſceptred with the reed, crowned with thornes, nayled to the Croſſe, hanging naked betwixt two Theeves, ſcorned of the beholders, ſealed up in a borrowed grave, could ſay other, than, Hee hath no forme nor beauty, when we ſhall ſee him there is nothing that that wee ſhould deſire him? Who that ſhould have ſeen his ſkinne all dewed with pearles of bloody ſweat, his back bleeding, his face blubbered and beſmeared, his forehead harrowed, his hands and feet pierced, his ſide guſhing gout, his head bowed down in death, and ſhould withall have heard his dying lips ſay, My God, my God, why haſt thou forſaken me? would not have ſaid, He is deſpiſed and rejected of men, yea (in appearance) of God himſelfe. Yet even this while, to the cutting of the ſinews of thoſe ſtiff-necked Jewes, the Angels owned him for their Lord, the Sages adored him, the Star deſigned him, the Prophets fore-ſhewed him, the Devils confeſſed him, his Miracles evinced him, the Earth ſhook, the Rocks rent, the Dead lookt out, the Sunne lookt in, attoniſhed at the ſufferings of the God of nature; Even whiles he was deſpiſed of men, he commanded the Devils to their chaines: whiles baſe men ſhot out their tongues at him, Principalities and Powers bowed their knees to him; whiles he hanged deſpicably upon the tree of ſhame, the powers of hell were dragged captive after the triumphant chariot of his Croſſe; the appearance was not ſo contemptible, as the truth of his eſtate glorious. Judge not therefore according to appearance.

Should appearance be the rule, how ſcornfully would the carnall eye overlook the poore ordinances of God? What would it finde here but fooliſhneſſe of preaching, homelineſſe of Sacraments, an inky Letter, a Prieſts lips, a ſavorleſſe meſſage, a morſell of Bread, a mouthfull of Wine, an handfull of water, a ſlander-beaten Croſſe, a crucified Saviour, a militant Church, a deſpiſed profeſſion. When yet this fooliſhneſſe of preaching is the power of God to ſalvation; theſe mute Letters the lively Oracles of God; theſe vile lips the Cabinets of heaven to preſerve knowledge; this unplauſible Meſſage, magnalia Dei; this Water, the Water of Life in the midſt of the Paradiſe of God: (ἀεὶ ῥεῖ ὕδωρ) this Bread the Manna of Angels, this Wine heavenly Nectar; this Church the Kings Daughter, all glorious within; this dying Sacrifice the Lord of Life, this Croſſe the Banner of Victory, this profeſſion Heaven upon Earth. Judge not therefore according to appearance.

Should appearance be the rule, woe were Gods children, happy were his enemies. Who that had ſeen Cain ſtanding maſterly over the bleeding carkaſſe of Abel, Joſeph in his bonds, his Miſtreſſe in her dreſſe, Moſes in the Flags, Pharaoh in the Palace, David ſculking in the wilderneſſe, Saul commanding in the Court, Elias fainting under his Juniper tree, Jezebel painting in her cloſet, Michaiah in the priſon, Zidkiiah in the preſence, Jeremie in the dungeon, Zedekiah in the throne, Daniel trembling among the Lions, the Median Princes feaſting in their Bowers, Johns head bleeding in the Platter, Herods ſmiling at the Revels, Chriſt at the Barre, Pilate on the Bench, the Diſciples ſcourged, the Scribes and Elders inſulting; would not have ſaid; O happy Cain, Potiphars wife, Pharaoh, Saul, Jezebel, Zidkiiah, Zedekiah, Median Princes, Pilate, Herod, Elders; miſerable Abel, Joſeph, Moſes, David, Eliah, Michaiah, Jeremie, Daniel, John, Chriſt, the Diſciples: Yet we know Cains victory was as wofull, as Abels martyrdome glorious; Joſephs irons were more precious, than the golden tires of his Miſtreſſe; Moſes Reeds were more ſure than Pharoahs Cedars; Davids Cave in the Deſart more ſafe than the Towers of Saul; Eliahs Raven a more comfortable purveyor than all the Officers of Jezebel; Michaiahs priſon was the guard-chamber of Angels, when Ahabs preſence was the counſell-chamber of evill ſpirits; Jeremies dungeon had more true light of comfort than the ſhining ſtate of Zedekiah; Daniel was better guarded with the Lions, than Darius and the Median Princes with their Janiſaries; Johns head was more rich with the Crown of his martyrdome, than Herods with the Diadem of his Tetrarchate, Chriſt at the Barre gave life and being to Pilate on the Bench, gave motion to thoſe hands that ſtruck him, to that tongue that condemned him, and in the mean while gave ſentence on his Judge; The Diſciples were better pleaſed with their ſtripes and wales than the Jewiſh Elders with their proud Phylacteries. After this, who that had ſeen the primitive Chriſtians, ſome broyled on Gridirons, others boyled in Lead, ſome roſted, others frozen to death, ſome fleaed, others torne with horſes, ſome craſhed in peeces by the teeth of Lions, others caſt downe from the rocks to the ſtakes, ſome ſmiling on the wheele, others in the flame, all wearying their tormentors and ſhaming their Tyrants with their patience, would not have ſaid; Of all things I would not

A not be a Christian; Yet, even this while were these poore torturing stocks higher (as Marcus Arethusius bragged) than their persecutors; dying Victors, yea Victors of death; never so glorious as when they began not to be; in gasping crowned, in yeelding the ghost more than Conquerours: Judge not therefore according to appearance.

When thou lookest about, and seest on the one hand a poore conscionable Christian drouping under the remorse of his sinne, austerely checking his wanton appetite, and curbing his rebellious desires, wearing out his dayes in a rough penitentiall severity, cooling his infrequent pleasures with sighs, and saucing them with teares; on the other hand ruffling Gallants made all of pleasure and joviall delights, bathing themselves in a sea of all sensuall satieties, denying their pampered nature nothing under heaven, not wine in bowles, not strange flesh, and beastly dalliance, not unnaturall titillations, nor violent filthinesse; that feast without feare, and drink without
B measure, and sweare without feeling, and live without God; their bodies are vigorous, their coffers full, their state prosperous, their hearts chearfull: Oh how thou blessest such men; lo these (thou sayest) these are the darlings of heaven and earth; Sic ô sic juvat vivere! Whiles those other sullen mopish creatures are the (περικαθαρματα) offscouring and recrements of the world; Thou foole, give me thy hand, let me lead thee with David into the Sanctuary of God: Now what seest thou? The end, the end of these men is not peace. Surely O God thou hast set them in slippery places, and castest them down into desolation: how suddenly are they perished, and horribly consumed! Woe is me, they doe but dance a Galliard over the mouth of hell, that seemes now covered over with the greene sods of pleasure; The higher they leape, the more desperate is their lighting: Oh wofull, wofull condition of those godlesse men, yea those epicurean Porkets, whose belly is their God, whose heaven is their pleasure,
C whose cursed jollity is but a feeding up to an eternall slaughter: the day is comming wherein every minute of their sinfull unsatisfying joyes shall be answered with a thousand thousand millions of yeeres frying in that unquenchable fire; And when those damned Ghosts shall forth of their incessant flames see the glorious remuneration of the penitent and pensive souls which they have despised; they shall then gnash and yell out that late recantation; We fooles thought their life madnesse, & their end without honor; now they are counted among the children of God, & their portion is among the Saints, ours amongst Devils: Judge not therefore according to appearance.

Should we judge according to appearance, all would be Gold that glistereth, all drosse that glistereth not: Hypocrites have never shewed more faire than some Saints foule. Saul weeps, Ahab walks softly; Tobias & Sanballat will be building Gods walls; Herod heares John gladly; Baalam prophecies Christ, Judas preaches him, Satan con-
D fesses him; When even an Abraham dissembles, a David clokes adultery with murder, a Salomon gives (at least) a toleration to idolatry, a Peter forswears his Master; briefly, the prime Disciple is a Satan, Satan an Angell of light. For you: How gladly are we deceived in thinking you all such as you seeme; None but the Court of Heaven hath a fairer face. Prayers, Sermons, Sacraments, geniculation, silence, attention, reverence, applause, knees, eyes, eares, mouthes full of God; Oh that ye were thus alwaies! Oh that this were your worst side! But if we follow you from the Church, and find cursing and bitternesse under your tongues, licentious disorder in your lives, bribery and oppression in your hands; If God looke into the windowes of your hearts, and find there be (intus rapina) we cannot judge you by the appearance; or, if we could, what comfort were it to have deceived our charity with the appearance of Saints,
E when the righteous Judge shall give you your portion with Hypocrites; What ever we doe, he will be sure not to judge according to appearance.

If appearance should be the rule, false religion should be true, true false. Quædã falsa probabiliora quibusdam veris, is the old word; Some falshoods are more likely than some truths: Native beauty scorns Art: Truth is as a matron; Error a curtizan: The matron cares only to concile love by a grave and gracefull modesty, the Curtizan with philtres and farding. We have no Hierarchie mounted above Kings, no pompous ostentation of magnificence, no garish processions, no gaudy altars, no fine images clad with Taffates in summer, with velvets in winter, no flourishes of universality, no

rumors

rumors of miracles, no ſumptuous canonizations; we have nothing but (γύμνα δίδυμα) A the ſincerity of Scriptures, ſimplicity of Sacraments, decency of rare ceremonies, Chriſt crucified. We are gone if you goe by appearance: Gone? alas, who can but bluſh and weepe and bleed to ſee that Chriſtian ſoules ſhould (after ſuch beames of knowledge) ſuffer themſelves to be thus palpably cozened with the gilded ſlips of error; that after ſo many yeeres pious government of ſuch an incomparable ſucceſſion of religious Princes, Authority ſhould have cauſe to complaine of our defection.

Deare Chriſtians (I muſt be ſharpe) are we children or fooles, that we ſhould be better pleaſed with the glittering tinſell of a painted baby from a Pedlers ſhop, than with the ſecretly-rich and invaluable Jewell of divine Truth? Have we thus learned Chriſt? Is this the fruit of ſo cleere a Goſpell? of ſo bleſſed ſcepters? For Gods ſake be wiſe and honeſt, and ye cannot be Apoſtates.

Shortly, for it were eaſie to be endleſſe: If appearance might be the rule, good B ſhould be evil, evil good; there is no vertue that cannot be counterfeited, no vice that cannot be blanched: we ſhould have no ſuch friend as our enemy, a flatterer; no ſuch enemy as our friend that reproves us. It were a wonder if ye great ones ſhould not have ſome ſuch burs hanging upon your ſleeves; As ſoone ſhall corn grow without chaffe, as greatneſſe ſhall be free from adulation: Theſe ſervile ſpirits ſhall ſooth up all your purpoſes, and magnifie all your actions, and applaud your words, and adore your perſons: Sin what you will, they will not check you; Project what you will, they will not twhart you; ſay what ye will, they will not faile to ſecond you; be what ye will, they will not faile to admire you: Oh how theſe men are all for you, all yours, all you;
They love you as the Ravens doe your eyes. How deare was Siſera to Jael, when ſhe ſmoothed him up, and gave him milk in a Lordly diſh; Samſon to Dalilah, when ſhe lulled him in her lap; Chriſt to Judas, when he kiſſed him; See how he loved him, C would ſome foole have ſaid, that had judged by appearance.

In the meane time an honeſt plaine-dealing friend is like thoſe ſauces which a man praiſes with teares in his eyes; like a cheſnut, which pricks the fingers, but pleaſes our taſte; or like ſome wholſome medicinall potion, that diſtaſtes and purges us (perhaps makes us ſick) that it may heale us. Oh let the righteous ſmite me, for that is a benefit;
let him reprove me, and it ſhall be a precious oyle that ſhall not break my head; Break it? no, it ſhall heale it, when it is mortally wounded by mine own ſinne, by others aſſentation: Oh how happy were it, if we could love them that love our ſoules, and hate them that love our ſinnes. They are theſe rough hands that muſt bring us ſavory diſhes, and carry away a bleſſing; truth is for them now, thankes ſhall be for them hereafter, but in the mean time they may not be judged by the appearance.

Laſtly, if we ſhall judge friendſhip by complement, ſalubrity by ſweetneſſe, ſer- D vice by the eye, fidelity by oathes, valour by brags, a Saint by his face, a Devill by his feet, we ſhall be ſure to be deceived: Judge not therefore according to appearance.

But (that ye miſtake not) though we may not judge only by the appearance, yet appearance may not be neglected in our judgement. Some things, according to the Philoſopher, (δοκεῖ μοι, ὅτι ἅ) ſeeme and are, are as they ſeeme: Semblances are not alwaies ſevered from truth; Our ſenſes are ſafe guides to our underſtandings. We juſtly laugh at that Sceptick in Laertius, who becauſe his ſervants robbed his cupbord, doubted whether he left his victuals there: What doe we with eyes, if we may not beleeve their intelligence? That world is paſt, wherein the gloſſe Clericum amplectens fœminam præſumitur benedicendi cauſa feciſſe; The wanton imbracements of another mans wife, muſt paſſe with a Clearke for a ghoſtly benediction; Men are now more wiſe, leſſe charitable: Words and probable ſhewes are appearances, actions E are not; and yet even our words alſo ſhall judge us; if they be filthy, if blaſphemous, if but idle, we ſhall account for them, we ſhall be judged by them; Ex ore tuo; a foule tongue ſhewes ever a rotten heart; By their fruits ye ſhall know them, is our Saviours rule; I may ſafely ſay, No body deſires to borrow colours of evill; If you doe ill, thinke not that we will make dainty to thinke you ſo; when the God of love can ſay by the Diſciple of love, Qui facit peccatum, ex diabolo eſt; He that committeth ſinne, is of the Devill: Euen the righteous Judge of the world judgeth

(ſecundum

A (ſecundum opera) according to our works; we cannot erre whiles we tread in his ſteps. If we doe evill, ſinne lies at the doore; but it is on the ſtreet ſide; Every Paſſenger ſees it, cenſures it; How much more he that ſees in ſecret? Tribulation and anguiſh upon every ſoule that doth evill: Every ſoule; here is no exemption by greatneſſe, no buying off with bribes, no bleering of the eyes with pretences, no ſhrouding our ſelves in the night of ſecrecy; but if it be a ſoule that doth evill, Tribulation and anguiſh is for it: Contrarily, if we doe well, ſhall we not be accepted? if we be charitable in our almes, juſt in our awards, faithfull in our performances, ſober in our carriages, devout in our religious ſervices, conſcionable in our actions; Glory, and honour, and peace to every man that worketh good; we ſhall have peace with our ſelves, honour with men, glory with God and his Angels: Yea that peace of God which paſſeth all
B underſtanding; ſuch honour as have all his Saints, the incomprehenſible glory of the God of peace, the God of Saints and Angels: to the participation whereof, that good God that hath ordained us, as mercifully bring us for the ſake of his deare Sonne Jeſus Chriſt the juſt: To whom with thee O Father, and thy good Spirit, one infinite God, our God, be given all praiſe, honour and glory now and for ever. Amen.

THE GREAT IMPOSTOR, LAID OPEN OUT OF

IER. 17.9.

The heart is deceitfull above all things.

I Know where I am; in one of the famous Phrontisteries of Law, and Justice: wherefore serves Law and Justice, but for the prevention or punishment of fraud and wickednesse? Give me leave therefore to bring before you, Students, Masters; Fathers, Oracles of Law and Justice, the greatest Cheator and Malefactor in the world, our owne Heart. It is a great word that I have said, in promising to bring him before you; for this is one of the greatest advantages of his fraud, that he cannot be seene: That as that old Jugler Apollonius Thyaneus, when he was brought before the Judge, vanished out of sight; so this great Impostor, in his very presenting before you, dispeareth and is gone; yea so cunningly, that he doth it with our owne consent, and we would be loath that he could be seene: Therefore as an Epiphonema to this just complaint of deceitfulnesse, is added, Who can know it? It is easie to know that it is deceitfull, and in what it deceives, though the deceits themselves cannot be knowne, till too late; As we may see the ship, and the sea, and the ship going on the sea, yet the way of a ship in the sea (as Salomon observes) we know not: God askes and God shall answer; What he askes by Ieremie, he shall answer by S. Paul, Who knowes the heart of man? Even the spirit of man that is in him. If then the heart have but eyes enow to see it selfe by the reflection of thoughts, it is enough: Ye shall easily see and heare enough (out of the analogie and resemblance of hearts) to make you both astonished and ashamed. 1 Cor. 2.11.

The heart of man lies in a narrow roome, yet all the world cannot fill it; but that which may be said of the heart, would more than fill a world: Here is a double stile given it; of deceitfulnesse; of wickednesse; either of which knowes no end, whether of being, or of discourse. I spend my houre, and might doe my life, in treating of the first.

See then, I beseech you, the Impostor, and the Imposture; The Impostor himselfe, The heart of man, The Imposture, Deceitfull above all things.

As deceitfull persons are wont ever to goe under many names, and ambiguous, and must be expresst with an [aliàs] so doth the heart of man; Neither man himselfe nor any part of man hath so many names, as the heart alone; For every faculty that it hath, and every action it doth, it hath a severall name: Neither is there more multiplicitie, than doubt in this name; Not so many termes are used to signifie the heart, as the heart signifies many things.

When ye heare of the heart, ye think straight of that fleshy part in the center of the bodie, which lives first, and dies last; and whose beatings you find to keepe time all the body over; That is not it which is so cunning; Alas, that is a poore harmelesse peece meerely passive; and if it doe any thing, as the subministration of Vitall spirits, to the maintenance of the whole frame, it is but good; no, it is the spirituall part that lurkes in this flesh, which is guilty of such deceit. We must learne of wittie Idolatry to distinguish betwixt the stocke and the invisible powers that dwell in it. It is not for me to be a tickler betwixt the Hebrewes, and the Greeke Philosophers, and Physitians, in a question of naturall Learning, concerning the seat of the soule; nor to insist upon the reasons why the spirit of God rather places all the spirituall powers in the heart than in the braine; Doubtlesse in respect of the affections there resident, whereby all those speculative abilities are drawne to practise; It shall suffice us to take things as we find them, and to hold it for granted, that this Monosyllable (for so it is in many languages) comprises all that intellective and affective world which concerneth man; and in plaine termes to say, that when God sayes, The heart is deceitfull, he meanes the understanding, will, affections are deceitfull.

The understanding is doubly deceitfull; It makes us beleeve it knowes those things which it doth not; and that it knowes not those things which it doth: As some foolish Mountebanke, that holds it a great glory to seeme to know all things; or some presuming Physitian, that thinks it a shame not to professe skill in any state of the body or disease; so doth our vaine understanding; therein framing it selfe according to the spirits it meets withall; if they be proud and curious, it perswades them, they know every thing; if careless, that they know enough.

In the first kind; What hath not the fond heart of man dared to arrogate to it selfe? It knowes all the starres by their names; Tush, that is nothing; It knowes what the starres meane by their very lookes, what the birds meane by their chirping, as Apollonius did; what the heart meanes, by the features of the face; it knowes the events of life by the lines of the hand: the secrets of Art, the secrets of Nature, the secrets of State, the secrets of others hearts, yea the secrets of God in the closet of heaven; Yea, not onely what God hath done, but what he will doe: This is (sapiens stultitia) a wise folly, as Irenæus sayd of his Valentinians; All Figure-casters, Palmesters, Physiognomers, Fortune-tellers, Alchymists, fantastick projectors, and all the rabble of professors of those περίεργα, not so much curious as idle Arts, have their word given them by the Apostle, Deceiving and deceived; neither can these men make any worse fooles than their hearts have made themselves; and well may that Alexandrian tax be set upon them in both names, whether of active, or passive folly: And (as it commonly falls out, that superfluous things rob the heart of necessary) in the meane while, those things which the heart may, and would know, it lightly misknowes: As our senses are deceived by distance, or interpositions, to think the Starres beamie and sparkling; the Moone horned, the Planets equally remote, the Sunne sometimes red, pale other some: so doth also our understanding erre, in mis-opinion of divine things; It thinkes it knowes God, when it is but an Idoll of fancie, as Sauls messengers, when they came into the roome, thought they had the true David, when it was but a Wispe; it knowes the will of God, when it is nothing but grosse mis-construction: so as the common knowledge of men, though they thinke it a Torch, is but an Ignis Fatuus to lead them to a ditch: How many thousand Assyrians think they are in the way to the Prophet, when they are in the midst of Samaria? How many millions think they walke fairely on to heaven, when indeed they are in the broad way that leads to destruction? Oh poore blinde Pagans, halfe-sighted Turks, bleare-eied Jewes, blind-folded Papists, Squint-eied Schismaticks, purblind ignorants, how well doe they find themselves pleased with their devotion, and thinke God should be so too; when it is nothing but a mixture of misprison, superstition,

conceitednesse: and (according to the seldome-reverently-used proverbe) whiles they think they have God by the finger, they hold a Devill by the toe; and all this, because their heart deceives them. It careless and loath to be at the paines of knowing more, it perswades them they know enough; that they are out of more, as he did on the ointment, (Vt quid perditio hæc?) What needs all this waste? and makes them as conscionable for knowledge, as Esau was for cattel, I have enough, my brother, keep that thou hast to thy selfe; or as contentedly resolute, as the Epicure in the Gospell, Soule take thy ease, thou hast knowledge enough laid up for many yeares.

From whence it is, that too many rest simply (yea wilfully) in their owne measure, not so much as wishing more skill in Soule-matters; applauding their owne safe mediocritie, like the credulous blind man that thought he now saw a shimmering of the Sunne beames, when in deed his back was towards it: Hence it is that they scoffe at the foolishnesse of preaching, scorne the forward bookishnesse of others, fearing nothing but a surfet of Manna, and hating to know more than their neighbours, than their fore-fathers; and thus are led on muffled up in an unfelt ignorance, to their grave, yea, (without the mercy of God) to their hell.

And as in these things there is a presumption of knowing what we doe not; so contrarily, a dissimulation and concealment of the knowledge of what we doe understand: The heart of man is a great lier to it selfe this way; Saint Paul sayes that of Pagans, which I may boldly say of Christians, They have the effect of the Law written in their hearts; yet many of them will not be acknowne of one letter ingraven there by the finger of God: Certaine common principles there are (together with this law) interlinearily written in the Tables of the heart, as, That we must doe as we would be done to; That there is a God; That this God is infinite in justice and truth, and must be served like himselfe; these they either blot out, or lay their finger on, that they may not be seen, purposely, that they may sinne freely; and faine would perswade themselves they never had any such evidence from God: so putting off the checks of conscience with bold denials, like the harlot of Iericho, (but worse than she) that hath hid the Spies, and now out-faces their entertainment: Wherein the heart doth to it selfe, that which Nahash the Ammonite would have done to Israel, put out his owne right eye, that it may not see that law whereby it might be convinced, and finde it selfe miserable. Thus the understanding of man is every way deceitfull in over-knowing, mis-knowing, dissembling; in all which it is like an evill and unfaithfull eye, that either will be seeing by a false glasse, or a false light, or with distortion; or else wilfully closes the lids that it may not see at all; and in all this deceives us.

The will is no lesse cunning; which though it make faire pretences of a generall inclination to good, yet (hic & nunc) in particulars, hangs towards a pleasing evill; Yea though the understanding have sufficiently informed it of the worthinesse of good, and the turpitude of evill, yet being overcome with the false delectableness of sinne, it yeelds to a mis-assent; Reason being (as Aquinas speakes) either swallowed up by some passion, or held downe by some vicious habit: It is true, still the Will followes the Reason, neither can doe otherwise, but therefore, if Reason misled be contrary to Reason, and a schisme arise in the soule, it must follow that the Will must needs be contrary to Will and Reason; Wherein it is like a Planet, which though it be carried about perpetually by the first mover, yet slily creeps on his owne way, contrary to that strong circumvolution: And though the minde be sufficiently convinced of the necessity, or profit of a good act, yet for the tediousnesse annexed to it, in a dangerous spirituall acedie, it insensibly slips away from it, and is content to let it fall; As some idle, or fearefull Merchant, that could be glad to have gold, if it would come with ease, but will not either take the paines, or hazard the adventure to fetch it: Thus commonly the will (in both respects) Waterman-like lookes forward, and rowes backward; and under good pretences doth nothing but deceive.

The affections are as deceitfull as either; whether in mis-placing, measure, or manner.

Mis-placing: They are fiery where they should be coole, and where they should burne, freeze; Our heart makes us beleeve it loves God, and gives him pledges of affection, affection; whiles it secretly doats upon the world; like some false strumpet, that entertaines her husband with her eyes, and in the meane time treads upon the toe of an Adulterer under the board: That it loves justice, when it is but revenge; That it grieves for the missing of Christ, when indeed it is but for the loaves and fishes; That it feares God, when indeed it is but afraid of our owne torment; That it hates the sin, when it is the person; That it hates the world, when it thrusts God out of doores to lodge it.

Measure: That we love God enough, and the world but enough, when as indeed the one love is but as the cold fit of an ague, the other an hot; we chill in the one, no lesse than we glow in the other, when we make God onely a stale, to draw on the world; That we doe enough hate our corruptions, when (at our sharpest) we doe but gently sneape them, as Eli did his sonnes; or as some indulgent parent doth an unthrifty darling, whom he chides, and yet feeds with the fewell of his excesse; That we have grieved enough for our sinnes, when they have not cost us so much as one teare, nothing but a little fashionable wind, that never came further than the roots of our tongue; That we doe enough compassionate the afflictions of Ioseph, when we drinke wine in bowles; That we feare God more than men, when we are ashamed to doe that in presence of a child, which we care not to doe in the face of God.

Manner: That our heart loves, and hates, and feares, and joyes, and grieves truly, when it is an hypocrite in all; That it delights constantly in God, and holy things, when it is but an Ephraims morning dew; That our anger is zealous, when it is but a flash of personall malice, or a superstitious furie; That we feare as sons, when it is as cowards, or slaves; That we grieve as Gods patients, when we fret, and repine, and struggle like franticks against the hand of our Maker. Thus (to summe up all) the heart of man is wholly set upon cozenage; the understanding over-knowing, mis-knowing, dissembling; The will pretending, and inclining contrarily; the affections mocking us in the object, measure, manner, and in all of them the heart of man is deceitfull.

Ye have seene the face of this Cheator, looke now at his hand, and now ye see who this Deceiver is, see also the sleights of his deceit, and therein the fashion, the subject, the sequell of it, from whence we will descend to our Demeanour, towards so dangerous an Impostor.

The fashion of his deceit is the same with our ordinary Juglers; either cunning conveyance, or false resemblance. Cunning conveyance, whether into us, in us, from us.

The heart admits sin, as Paradise did the Serpent; There it is, but by what chinks or cranies it entered, we know not; so as we may say of sin as the Master of the feast in the Gospel said to his slovenly guest, Quomodo intrasti? How camest thou in hither? Corruption doth not eat into the heart as our first Parents did into the apple, so as the print of their teeth might be seen, but as the worme eats into the core, insensibly; Neither is there lesse closenesse when it is entred; I would it were as untrue a word, as it is an harsh one, that many a professedly-Christian heart, lodges a devill in the blinde roomes of it, and either knowes it not, or will not be acknowne of it; every one that harbours a willing sin in his brest, doth so: The malicious man hath a furious devill, the wanton an uncleane devill, a Beelphegor, or a Tammuz, the proud man a Lucifer the covetous a Mammon: Certainely these foule spirits are not more truly in hell, than in a wicked heart; there they are, but so closely, that I know not if the heart it selfe know it; it being verified of this citadell of the heart, which was said of that vast Ninive, that the enemie had taken some parts of it, long ere the other knew it: What should I speake of the most common, and yet most dangerous guest, that lodges in this Inne of the heart, Infidelity? Call at the doore, and aske if such a one host not there; They within make strange of it, deny it, forsweare it; Call the officers, make privie search, you shall hardly find him: Like some Jesuite in a Popish dames chamber, he is so closely contrived into false floores, and double walls, that his presence is not more easily knowne, than hardly convinced, confessed. How easie is it to say, that if infidelity did not lurke in the hearts of men, they durst not doe as they doe; they could not doe but what they doe not? Durst they sinne if they were

perſwaded of an hell? durſt they buy a minute of pleaſure with everlaſting torments? Could they ſo ſleight heaven if they beleeved it? Could they bee ſo loth to poſſeſſe it? Could they thinke much of a little painfull goodneſſe to purchaſe an eternitie of happineſſe? No, no, Men, Fathers, and Brethren; if the heart were not Infidell, whiles the face is Chriſtian, this could not bee. Neither doth the heart of man more cunningly convey ſinne into, and in it ſelfe, than from it; The ſin that ye ſaw even now openly in the hands, is ſo ſwiftly paſt under the boord, that it is now vaniſhed; Looke for it in his fore-head, there it is not; looke for it under his tongue, there is none; looke for it in his conſcience, yee finde nothing; and all this by the Legier-de-maine of the heart: Thus Achan hath hid his wedge, and now he dares ſtand out to a lot; Thus Salomons Harlot hath wip't her mouth, and it was not ſhe: Thus Saul will lie-out his Sacrilege, untill the very beaſts out-bleat, and out-bellow him; Thus the ſwearer ſweares, and when he hath done, ſweares that he ſwore not; Thus the uncleane fornicator bribes off his ſinne, and his ſhame, and now makes challenges to the world of his honeſty. It cannot be ſpoken how peeviſhly witty the heart of man is this way: neither doubt I but this wilineſſe is ſome of the poyſon that the ſubtile ſerpent infected us with in that fatall morſell: They were three cunning ſhifts which the Scripture recordeth of three women (as that ſex hath been ever noted for more ſudden pregnancie of wit) Rachel, Rahab, and the good wife of Baburim; The firſt hiding the Teraphim with a modeſt ſeat, the ſecond, the ſpies with flaxe-ſtalkes, and the third Davids ſcouts with corne ſpred over the Well; but theſe are nothing to the devices that nature hath wont to uſe for the cloaking of ſinne. God made man upright, ſaith Salomon, but he ſought many inventions: Is Adam challenged for ſinne? Behold all on the ſudden it is paſſed from his hand, to Gods; The woman that thou gaveſt me: Is Saul challenged for a covetous and diſobedient remiſſeneſſe? the ſinne is ſtraight paſſed from the field to the Altar; I ſaved the fatteſt for a Sacrifice to the Lord thy God; So the one begins his ſin in God, and the other ends it in him: Is David bewitched with luſt to abuſe the Wife: the Huſband muſt be ſent home drunke to hide it, or if not that, to his long home, in a pretended favour of his valour: Is a griping Uſurer diſpoſed to put his money together to breed a monſter? he hath a thouſand quirks to cozen both law and conſcience: Is a Simonaicall Patron diſpoſed to make a good match of his peoples ſoules? it ſhall be no bargaine, but a gift: he hath a living to give, but an horſe to ſell. And ſure I thinke in this wiſe age of the world, Uſurerers and Simoniſts ſtrive who ſhall finde the wittieſt way to hell: What ſhould I ſpeak of the ſecret frauds in contracts, booties in matches, ſubornation of inſtruments, hiring of oathes, feeing of officers, equivocations of anſwers, and ten thouſand other tricks that the heart of man hath deviſed for the conveyances of ſin; in all which it too well approves it ſelf incomparably deceitfull.

The falſe ſemblance of the heart is yet worſe; For the former is moſt-what for the ſmothering of evill; this is for the juſtifying of evill, or the diſgrace of good; In theſe two doth this act of falſhood chiefly conſiſt; in making evill good, or good evill. For the firſt; The naturall man knows well how filthy all his brood is, and therefore will not let them come forth, but diſguiſed with the colours and dreſſes of good; ſo as now every one of natures birds is a Swan; Pride is handſomneſſe, deſperate fury valour; laviſhneſſe is noble munificence, drunkenneſſe civility, flattery complement, murderous revenge, juſtice; the Curtizan is bona fœmina, the Sorcerer a wiſe man, the oppreſſor a good huſband; Abſolom will goe pay his vowes, Herod will worſhip the Babe. For the ſecond; ſuch is the envy of nature, that where ſhe ſees a better face than her own, ſhe is ready to ſcratch it, or caſt dirt in it; and therefore knowing that all vertue hath a native beautie in it, ſhe labours to reforme it by the fouleſt imputations. Would the Iſraelites be devout? they are idle; Doth David dance for joy before the Arke? he is a foole in a Morris: Doth Saint Paul diſcourſe of his heavenly Viſion? Too much learning hath made him mad: Doe the Diſciples miraculouſly ſpeak all the tongues of Babel? they are full of new wine: Doe they preach Chriſts Kingdome? they are ſeditious; The reſurrection? they are bablers. Is a man conſcionable? he is an Hypocrite: Is he conformable? he is unconſcionable: Is he plaine dealing? he is rudely uncivill:

uncivil: Is he wiſely inſinuative? he is a flatterer: In ſhort, ſuch is the wicked craft of the heart, that it would let us ſee nothing in it own forme; but faine would ſhew us evill faire, that we might be inamored of it, and vertue ugly, that we might abhorre it; and as it doth for the way, ſo doth it for the end; hiding from us the glory of heaven, that is laid up for overcommers, and ſhewing us nothing but the pleaſant cloſure of wickedneſſe; making us believe that hell is a palace, and heaven a dungeon, that ſo we might be in love with death; and thus both in cunning conveyance, and falſe ſemblance, The heart of man is deceitfull above all things.

Ye have ſeen the faſhion of this deceit; caſt now your eyes upon the ſubject; And whom doth it then deceive? It doth deceive others, it can deceive it ſelfe, it would deceive Satan, yea God himſelf. Others, firſt: How many doe we take for honeſt and ſound Chriſtians, who yet are but errant hypocrites? Theſe Apes of Satan have learned to transforme themſelves into Angels of light; The heart bids the eyes look upward to heaven, when they are full of Adultery; It bids the hands to raiſe up themſelves towards their Maker, when they are full of blood; It bids the tongue wag holily, when there is nothing in the boſome but Atheous prophaneneſſe; It bids the knee to bow like a Camell, when the heart is ſtiffe as an Elephant; yea if need be it can bid a teare fall from the eye, or an almes or juſt action fall from the hand, and all to gull the world with a good opinion; In all which, falſe chapmen and horſe-courſers doe not more ordinarily deceive their buyers in ſhops and faires, than we doe one another in our converſation: Yea, ſo crafty is the heart, that it can deceive it ſelfe; By overweening his own powers, as the proud man; by under-valuing his graces, as the modeſt; by miſtaking his eſtate, as the ignorant; How many hearts doe thus groſſely beguile themſelves? The firſt thinks he is rich, and fine, when he is beggerly and naked; ſo did the Angell of Laodicea: The ſecond is poore in his own ſpirit, when he is rich of Gods ſpirit: The third thinks that he is a great favourite of heaven, when he is rather branded for an out-caſt; that he is truly noble, when he is a ſlave to that, which is baſer than the worſt of Gods creatures, ſinne: Let the proud and ignorant worldling therefore know, that though others may mocke him with applauſes, yet that all the world cannot make him ſo much a foole as his own heart.

Yea, ſo cunning is the heart, that it thinks to goe beyond the devill himſelfe: I can (thinks it) ſwallow his bait, and yet avoid his hooke; I can ſinne, and live; I can repent of ſinning, and defeat my puniſhment by repenting; I can run upon the ſcore, and take up the ſweet and rich commodities of ſinfull pleaſure; and when I have done, I can put my ſelfe under the protection of a Saviour, and eſcape the arreſt: Oh the world of ſoules that periſh by this fraud, fondly beguiling themſelves, whiles they would beguile the Tempter.

Yet higher: Laſtly, as Satan went about to deceive the Son of God; ſo this fooliſh conſort and client of his goes about to deceive God himſelf: The firſt paire of hearts that ever was, were thus credulous, to think they ſhould now meet with a meanes of knowledge and Deifying, which God either knew not of, or grudged them, and therefore they would be ſtealing it out of the ſide of the apple, without God, yea againſt him: Tuſh, none eye ſhall ſee us; Is there knowledge in the moſt high, ſaith the ſottiſh Atheiſt? Lord have not we heard thee preach in our ſtreets? have not we caſt out Devils in thy name? ſayes the ſmoothing hypocrite; as if he could fetch God over for an admiſſion into heaven. Thou haſt not lied to man, but to God, ſaith S. Peter to Ananias. And pettiſh Jonas, after he had beene cooled in the belly of the Whale, and the Sea, yet will be bearing God down in an argument to the juſtifying of his idle choler, I doe well to be angry to the death. But as the greateſt Polititians are oft over-taken with the groſſeſt follies (God owes proud wits a ſhame) the heart of man could not poſſibly deviſe how ſo much to befoole it ſelfe, as by this wicked preſumption: Oh yee fooles, when will ye underſtand? He that formed the eye, ſhall he not ſee? He that teacheth man knowledge, ſhall not he underſtand? The Lord knoweth the thoughts of man, that they are vanity. A rod for the back of fooles, yea a rod of iron for ſuch preſumptuous fooles, to cruſh them in peeces like a Potters veſſell.

Pſal. 94. 10, 11.

Ye have ſeen the faſhion and the ſubject of this deceit: the ſequell, or effect follows;

every

every way lamentable; For hence it comes to passe that many a one hath had his heart in keeping forty, fifty, threescore yeares, and more, and yet is not acquainted with it; and all because this craft hath kept it at the Priscillianists locke, Tu omnes, ta neme, It affects to be a searcher of all men, no man is allowed to come aboard of it; And if a man whether out of curiosity, or conscience, be desirous to inquire into it (as it is a shame for a man to be a stranger at home; Know yee not your owne hearts? saith the Apostle;) it casts it selfe, Proteus-like, into so many formes, that it is very hard to apprehend it. One while the man hath no heart, (לא לב) saith Salomon; Then he hath (ולב ולב) an heart, and an heart, saith David, and one of his hearts contradicts another; and then how knowes he whether to beleeve? and what certainty, what safety can it be for a man to live unacquainted with himselfe? Of this unacquaintance, secondly, arises a dangerous misprison of a mans selfe, in the nature and quantity of his sin, in the quality of his repentance, in his peace and intireness with God, in his right to heaven, and (in a word) in his whole spirituall estate. Of this mis-prison, thirdly, arises a fearefull disappointment of all his hopes, and a plunging into unavoidable torments: Wherein it is miserable to see, how cunningly the traiterous hearts of many men beare them in hand all their lives long; soothing them in all their courses, promising them successe in all their waies, securing them from feare of evills, assuring them of the favour of God and possession of heaven, (as some fond Bigot would brag of his Bull, or Medall, or Agnus Dei, or as those Priests, that *Gerson taxes, who made the people beleeve that the Masse was good for the eye-sight, for the mawe, for bodily health, and preservation) till they come to their death-beds; But then when they come to call forth the comforters they must trust to, they finde them like to some unfaithfull Captaine, that hath all the while in Garrison filled his purse with dead payes, and made up the number of his companies with borrowed men; and in time of ease shewed faire; but when he is called forth by a sudden alarum, bewraies his shame and weakenesse, and failes his Generall when he hath most need of him; right thus doe the perfidious hearts of many, after all the glorious brags of their security, on the bed of their last reckoning, find nothing but a cold despaire, and a wofull horror of conscience; and therefore too justly may their hearts say to them, as the heart of Apollodorus the Tyrant seemed to say unto him; who dreamed one night that he was fleaed by the Scythians, and boyled in a Caldron, and that his heart spake to him out of the kettle (ἐγώ σοι τῶν κακῶν αἴτιος) It is I that have drawne thee to all this. Certainly never man was, or shall be frying in hell, but cries out of his owne heart, and accuses that deceitfull peece as guilty of all his torments: For let Satan be never so malicious, and all the world never so parasiticall, yet if his owne heart had been true to him, none of these could have hurt him. Let the rest of our enemies doe their worst, onely from the evill of our owne hearts, good Lord deliver us.

Psal. 12.

* Qui publicè volunt dogmatizare seu prædicare populo, quod si quis audit missam in illo die non erit cæcus, nec morietur morte subitanea, nec carebit sufficienti sustentatione, &c.

It were now time for our thoughts to dwell a little upon the meditation and deploration of our owne danger and misery, who are every way so invironed with subtilty. If we looke at Satan; his old title is, that old Serpent; who must needs therefore now, by so long time and experience, be both more old and more Serpent. If we look at sin, it is as crafty as he, Lest any of you be hardened through the deceitfulnesse of sin: If at our owne hearts, we heare (that which we may feele) that the heart is deceitfull above all things. Oh wretched men that we are, how are we beset with Impostors on all hands; If it were more seasonable for us to bewaile our estate, then to seek the redresse of it; But since it is not so much worth our labour to know how deepe the pit is, into which we are fallen, as how to come out of it, heare rather (I beseech you) for a conclusion, how we may avoid the danger of the deceit of our false heart; even just so as we would prevent the nimble feats of some cheating Jugler; Search him, watch him, Trust him not.

Looke well into his hands, pockets, boxes, sleeves; yea, under his very tongue it self; There is no fraud so secret, but may be descried; were our hearts as crafty as the devill himselfe, they may be found out; We are not ignorant (saith Saint Paul) of Satans devices; much more then may we know our owne; Were the hearts of men (as Salomon speakes of Kings) like unto deepe waters, they have a bottome, and may be fathomed:

τὰ νοήματα αὐτοῦ.

fathomed; Were they as darke as hell it ſelfe, and never ſo full of windings, and blind wayes, and obſcure turnings, doe but take the lanthorne of Gods law in your hand, and you ſhall eaſily find all the falſe and foule cornets of them; as David ſaith of the Sun; nothing is hid from the light thereof; Prove your ſelves, ſaith the Apoſtle; It is hard if falſhood be ſo conſtant to it ſelfe that by many queſtions it be not tripped; Where this duty is ſlackned, it is no wonder if the heart be over-run with ſpirituall fraud; Often privy ſearches ſcarre away vagrant and diſorderly perſons; where no inquiry is made, is a fit harbour for them; If yee would not have your hearts, therefore, become the lawleſſe Ordinaries of uncleane ſpirits, ſearch them oft; Leave not a ſtraw unſhaken to find out theſe Labaniſh Teraphims that are ſtolne, and hid within us: And, when wee have ſearched our beſt, if we feare there are yet ſome unknowne evills lurking within us, (as the man after Gods owne heart prayes againſt ſecret ſinnes) let us call him in that cannot be deceived; and ſay to God with the Pſalmiſt, Search thou mee, O Lord, and try mee; Oh let us yeeld our ſelves over to be ranſackt by that all-ſeeing eye, and effectuall hand of the Almighty. All our daubing, and cogging, and packing, and ſhuffling lies open before him, and he onely can make the heart aſhamed of it ſelfe.

And when our hearts are once ſtript naked, and carefully ſearchd, let our eyes be ever fixedly bent upon their conveiances, and inclinations; If we ſearch and watch not, we may be ſafe for the preſent, long we cannot; for our eye is no ſooner off, then the heart is buſie in ſome practiſe of falſhood; It is well if it forbeare whiles we look on, for, The thoughts of mans heart are onely evill continually; and many a heart is like ſome bold and cunning theefe, that lookes a man in the face, and cuts his purſe: But ſurely, if there be any guardian of the ſoule, it is the eye; The wiſe mans eye (ſaith Salomon) is in his head; doubtleſſe, on purpoſe to look into his heart: My ſonne, above all keepings, keepe thy heart, ſaith he; If we doe not dogge our hearts then in all our wayes, but ſuffer our ſelves to loſe the ſight of them, they run wild, and we ſhall not recover them till after many ſlippery tricks on their parts, and much repentance on ours. Alas, how little is this regarded in the world? wherein the moſt take no keepe of their ſoules, but ſuffer themſelves to run after the wayes of their owne hearts, without obſervation, without controlement; What ſhould I ſay of theſe men, but that they would faine be deceived, and periſh? For after this looſe licentiouſneſſe (without the great mercy of God) they never ſet eye more upon their hearts, till they ſee them either fearfully intoyled in the preſent judgements of God, or faſt chained in the pit of hell, in the torments of finall condemnation.

Thirdly, if our ſearches and watches ſhould faile us, we are ſure our diſtruſt cannot; It is not poſſible our heart ſhould deceive us, if we truſt it not; We carrie a remedy within us of others fraud, and why not of our owne? The Italians not unwiſely pray God (in their knowne Proverbe) to deliver them from whom they truſt; for we are obnoxious to thoſe we relie upon, but nothing can leeſe that which it had not; Diſtruſt therefore can never be diſappointed: If our hearts then ſhall promiſe us ought (as it hath learned to proffer largely, of him that ſayd, All theſe will I give thee) although with vowes and oathes, ask for his aſſurances; if he cannot fetch them from the evidences of God, truſt him not: If he ſhall report ought to us, aske for his witneſſes; if he cannot produce them from the records of God, truſt him not: If he ſhall adviſe us ought, ask for his warrant; if he cannot fetch it from the Oracles of God, truſt him not; And in all things ſo beare our ſelves to our hearts, as thoſe that thinke they live among theeves and cozeners; ever jelouſly and ſuſpiciouſly; taking nothing of their word, ſcarce daring to truſt our owne ſenſes; making ſure work in all matters of their tranſactions. I know I ſpeake to wiſe men, whoſe counſell is wont to be asked, and followed, in matter of the aſſurances of eſtates; whoſe wiſdome is frequently imploied in the triall, eviction, dooming of malefactors: Alas, what ſhall it availe you that you can adviſe for the prevention of others fraud, if in the meane time you ſuffer your ſelves to be cozened at home? What comfort can you find in publike ſervice to the ſtate againſt offenders, if you ſhould carry a fraudulent and wicked heart in your owne boſomes? There is one above whom we may truſt, whoſe word is more firme then heaven; when heaven ſhall paſſe, that ſhall ſtand; It is no truſting ought beſides, any further then he gives

A gives his word for it. Mans Epithet is Homo mendax, and his best part, the hearts, deceitfull. Alas, what shall we think, or say of the condition of those men, which never follow any other advice than what they take of their owne heart? Such are the most; that make not Gods Law of their counsell; As Esay said of Israel, Abiit vagus in viacordis sui: Surely they are not more sure they have an heart, than that they shall be deceived with it, and betrayed unto death; Of them may I say, as Salomon doth of the wanton foole, that follows an harlot; Thus with her great craft she caused him to yeeld, and with her flattering lips she inticed him: And he followed her straightways, as an Oxe that goes to the slaughter, or as a foole to the stocks for correction. Oh then, deare Christians, as ever yee desire to avoid that direfull slaughter-house of hell, those wailings, and gnashings, and B gnawings, and everlasting burnings, looke carefully to your owne hearts; and what ever suggestions they shall make unto you, trust them not, till you have tried them by that unfaileable rule of righteousnesse, the royall law of your Maker, which can no more deceive you than your hearts can free you from deceit.

Esa. 57. 17.

Pro. 7. 21.

Lastly, that we may avoid not onely the events, but the very enterprises of this deceit, let us countermine the subtill workings of the heart. Our Saviour hath bidden us be wise as Serpents; What should be wise but the heart? And can the heart be wiser than it selfe? Can the wisdome of the heart remedie the craft of the heart? Certainly it may. There are two men in every regenerate breast, the old and the new; And of these (as they are ever plotting against each other) we must take the better side, and labour that the new man, by being more wise in God, may out-strip the old: And how C shall that be done? If we would dispossesse the strong man that keepes the house, our Saviour bids us bring in a stronger than he; and if we would over-reach the subtilty of the old man, yea, the old Serpent, bring in a wiser than he, even the spirit of God, the God of wisdome; If we would have Achitophels wicked counsels crossed, set up an Hushai within us: The foolishnesse of God is wiser than the wisdome of men. Could we but settle God within us, our craftie hearts would be out of countenance, and durst not offer to play any of their deluding tricks before him, from whom nothing is hid; and if they could be so impudently presumptuous, yet they should be so soone controlled in their first motions, that there would be more danger of their confusion D than of our deceit. As ye love your selves therefore and your owne safety, and would be free from the perill of this secret broaker of Satan, your owne hearts, render them obediently into the hands of God; give him the keyes of these closets, of his owne making; beseech him that he will vouchsafe to dwell and reigne in them; so shall we be sure that neither Satan shall deceive them, nor they deceive us; but both wee and they shall be kept safe and inviolable, and presented glorious to the appearance of our Lord Jesus Christ: To whom with the Father, and the holy Ghost, be all honour and glory, for ever and ever.

Amen.

PREACHED TO

THE COVRT AT

THEOBALDS, on Sunday,

Sept. 21. 1623.

By Ios. Hall.

Imprinted at London, 1647.

TO THE RIGHT HONOVRABLE WILLIAM EARL OF PEMBROKE, LORD

High Chamberlaine; CHANCELLOR of the Universitie of Oxford; One of his MAIESTIES most Honourable Privie Counsell.

RIGHT HONOVRABLE,

LEt it please you to receive from the Presse what you vouchsafed to require from my pen: Unworthy I confesse either of the publike light, or the beames of your Honours judicious eyes; yet such as (besides the motive of common importunitie) I easily apprehended, might be not a little usefull for the times; which, if ever, require quickning: Neither is it to no purpose that the world should see in what stile we speake to the Court, not without acceptation. This, and whatever service I may bee capable of, are justly devoted to your Lordship, whom all good hearts follow with true Honour, as the great Patron of learning, the sincere friend of Religion, and rich purchaser of Truth. The God of heaven adde to the number of such Peeres, and to the measure of your Lo: graces and happinesse.

Your Honours in all humble and faithfull observance, IOS. HALL.

THE BEST BARGAINE.

Pro. 23, 23. Buy the Truth, and ſell it not.

THe ſubject of my Text is a Bargaine, and Sale. A Bargaine enjoyned, a ſale forbidden: and the ſubject of both bargaine and ſale, is Truth. A bargain able to make us all rich: a ſale able to make any of us miſerable. Buy the Truth, and ſell it not. A ſentence of ſhort ſound, but large extent, the words are but ſeaven ſyllables, an eaſie load for our memories: the matter is a world of work; a long taske for our lives. And firſt, let me call you to this Mart, which holds both now, and ever: If ye love your ſelves, be ye cuſtomers at this ſhop of heaven: Buy the Truth.

In every bargaine there is merx, and mercatura; the commoditie, and the match; The commoditie to be bought is the Truth; The match made for this commodity, is Buying Buy the Truth. An ill Judge may put a good Interrogatory; yet it was a queſtion too good for the mouth of a Pilate, What is Truth? The ſchooles have wearied themſelves in the ſolution; To what purpoſe ſhould I reade a Metaphyſicall Lecture to Courtiers? Truth is as Time, one in all; yet, as Time, though but one, is diſtinguiſhed into paſt, preſent, future, and every thing hath a Time of it owne; ſo is Truth variouſly diſtinguiſhed, according to the ſubjects wherein it is; This is Anſelms, cited by Aquinas; I had rather ſay, Truth is as light: (Send forth thy Truth, and thy light, ſaith the Pſalmiſt) which (though but one in all) yet there is one light of the Sunne, another of the Moone, another of the Starres, another of this lower ayre: There is an eſſentiall, and cauſall Truth in the Divine underſtanding, which the Schools call Primò primam; This will not be ſold, cannot be bought; God will not part with it, the world is not worth it; This Truth is as the Light in the body of the Sunne. There is an intrinſecall or formall truth in things truly exiſting; For, Being and True are convertible; and Saint Auſten rightly defines, Verum eſt illud quod eſt; All this created Truth in things, is derived exemplarily, and cauſally, from that increated Truth of God; this the ſchools call Secundo-primam; and it is as the light of the Sun-beames, caſt upon the Moone, and Starres. There is an extrinſecall, or ſecondary truth of propoſitions following upon, and conformable to the truth of the things expreſſed: thus, Verum is no other than Eſſe declarativum, as Hilarie; And this Truth, being the thing it ſelfe ſubjectively; in words expreſſively, in the mind of man terminatively, preſuppoſeth a double conformity or adequation; both of the underſtanding to the matter conceived; and of the words to the underſtanding; ſo as Truth is when we ſpeake as we think, and think as it is; And this Truth is as the light diffuſed from thoſe heavenly bodies, to the Region of this lower aire; This is the Truth we are called to Buy: But this derivative and relative Truth, whether in the mind, or in the mouth, hath much multiplicity, according to the matter either conceived, or uttered; There is a Theologicall Truth, there is a naturall, there is a morall, there is a civill; all theſe muſt bee deare bought; but the beſt at the higheſt rate, which is Theologicall, or divine; whether in the principles, or neceſſary concluſions; The principles of divine Truth are Scriptura veritatis, *Dan.*10. The Law of Truth, *Mal.*2. The Word of Truth, 2 *Cor.*6. The neceſſary concluſions are they, which upon irrefragable inferences are deduced from thoſe holy grounds: Shortly then, every parcell of Divine Truth, whether laid downe in Scripture, or drawne neceſſarily from Scripture, is this Mercimonium ſacrum, which we are bidden to Buy, Buy the Truth.

This is the commoditie, The match is, קנה; that is, Beat the price, and pay it. Buy it; Of whom? For what? Of whom, but of the owner, of the maker?

The owner, It is Veritas Domini, Gods Truth, *Pſ.*117. His ſtile is the Lord God of Truth, *Pſal.*31. The maker; The works of his hands are truth and judgement. Pſal.111. And if any uſurping ſpirit of error ſhall have made a free-booty of Truth, and ſhall with-hold it in unrighteouſneſſe, we muſt redeeme it out of his hands with the higheſt ranſome.

What is the price? That is the maine thing in buying; For, Buying is no other than pactio pretii: Elſe-where God proclaimes, Hoe, every one that thirſteth, come, buy wine and milke without money, and without price, Eſay 55. This is a Donation in forme of ſale: But here muſt be a price in the hand; God will give mercy, and not ſell it; He will ſell Truth, and not give it: For what will he ſel it? Firſt, for Labour, the Heathen Poet could ſay, his gods ſold learning for ſwear; The originall word here uſed is (נצפ) Compara Get it any way, either laboré, or pretio; yea labore & pretio. This great foreman of Gods ſhop tels us we cannot have it under, *Pro.*24. We muſt ſeek for her as ſilver, and ſearch for her as for hid Treaſures; The veine of Truth lies low, it muſt be digged and delved for to the very center. If Truth could be bought with eaſe and pleaſure, many a lazy Chriſtian would bid faire for it, who now reſolve rather upon want, than toile. The ſlothfull worldling will rather take up a falſhood for truth, than beat his braine to diſcerne Truth from falſhood; an error of free-coſt is better than an high-rated Veritie; Labour for Truth is turn'd over for the task of Church-men; no life ſavours to theſe flegmatick Spirits, but that of the Lilies, Neque laborant, neque nent; They neither labour nor ſpin; This dull reſolution is unworthy of a Chriſtian, yea of a reaſonable ſoule; and if we ſhould take up no other for the body, we ſhould be fed with hunger, and clothed with nakedneſſe; the earth ſhould be our feather-bed, and the skie our Canopie; we ſhould abound with want, live ſavagely, and die miſerably. It was the juſt Canon of the Apoſtle, He that labours not, let him not eate; Certainly, he can never eat of the heavenly Manna of Truth, that will not ſtep forth to gather it: Heare this, ye delicate Courtiers, that would heare a Sermon if ye could riſe out of your beds, that would lend God an houre, if ye could ſpare it from your pleaſures: the God of heaven ſcornes to have his precious Truth ſo baſely under-valued; if ye bid God leſſe than labour for Truth, I can give you no comfort, but that ye may go to hell with eaſe.

The markets of Truth, as of all other commodities, vary: It is the rule of Caſuiſts; Juſtitia pretii non conſiſtit in individuo; The Juſtice of price doth not pitch ever upon a point; Sometimes the price of Truth hath riſen, it would not be bought but for danger; ſometimes, not under loſſe, not under diſgrace, not under impriſonment, not under exile; ſometimes yet dearer, not under paine; yea ſometimes it hath not gone for leſſe than blood: It did coſt Elias danger, Michaiah diſgrace, Ieremie impriſonment, the Diſciples loſſe, Iohn and Athanaſius exile, the holy Confeſſors paine, the holy Martyrs death; Even the higheſt of theſe is pretium legitimum, if God call for it, how ever nature may tax it as rigorous, yea ſuch as the franke hearts of faithfull Chriſtians have bidden at the firſt word for Truth; What doe ye weeping, and breaking my heart; For I am ready not to be bound only but to die for the name of the Lord Ieſus, ſaith S. Paul, Act. 21. Skin for skin, yea all that a man hath will he give for his life, ſaith Satan: but skin, and life, and all, muſt a man give for Truth, and not thinke it an hard penni-worth; Neither count I my life deare unto me that I may finiſh my courſe with joy; ſaith the choſen veſſell, to his Epheſians. Oh the heroicall ſpirits of our bleſſed forefathers, that ſtuck not to give their deareſt heart-blood for but ſome corollaries of ſacred Truth; whoſe burning zeale to Truth conſumed them before thoſe fires of Martyrdome, and ſent up their pure and glorious ſoules, like Manoahs Angell, to heaven, in the flame! Bleſſed be God, bleſſed be his Anointed, under whoſe gratious Scepter we have enjoied dayes as much more happie than theirs, as their hearts were more fervent than ours: We may now buy Truth

A at a better hand, ſtake but our labour, we carry it with thanks: I feare there want not thoſe that would be glad to marre the market; It can be only knowne to heaven what trecheries the malice of hell may be a brewing. Had but that Powder once taken, nothing had been abated of the higheſt price of our predeceſſors; we had paid for every dram of Truth, as many ounces of blood, as ever it coſt the frankeſt Martyr; ſhould the Devill have been ſuffered to doe his worſt, we might not have grudged at this price of Truth. Non eſt delicata in Deum, & ſecura confeſſio, qui in me credit, debet ſuum ſanguinem fundere, ſaith Ierome. Chriſtian profeſſion is no ſecure or delicate matter, he that believes muſt be no niggard of his blood. But why thus deare? Not without good reaſon: Monopolies uſe to inhance the price: Ye can buy truth at no ſhop but one. In cælo præparatum eſt veritas tua, Pſal. 89.2. Thy truth is prepared in heaven. And it is a juſt B Rule of Law, Quiſque in rebus ſuis eſt moderator, & arbiter, Every man may rate his owne: Neither is this only the ſole commodity of God, but beſides, deare to the owner, Dilexiſti veritatem, Thou haſt loved the Truth, ſaith the Pſalmiſt. And it is a true rule in the Caſes of Commerce, Affectus æſtimari poteſt, Our love may be valued in the price. Yea, O God, thy love to Truth cannot be valued; It is thy ſelfe, thou that art Truth it ſelf haſt ſaid ſo, I am the Way, the Truth, and the Life. We cannot therefore know how much thou loveſt thy Truth, becauſe as thy ſelfe is infinite, ſo is thy love to thy ſelfe: What ſhould we hunt for compariſons? If all the earth were gold, what were it? when even very heaven it ſelfe is traſh to thee in reſpect of truth: No marvell if thou ſet it at an high rate, it is not more precious to thee, than beneficiall to us. It frees us, Iohn 8. C 32. It renewes us, Iames 1.18. It confirmes us, Prov. 12.19. It ſanctifies us, Iohn 17.17. It defends us, Pſal. 91.4. Shortly, it doth all for us that God doth, for God works by his Almighty word, and his Word is Truth, Iohn 17. Therefore buy the Truth. And if truth be thus precious, thus beneficiall, how comes it to paſſe that it is neglected, contemned? Some paſſe by it, and doe not ſo much as cheapen it; Others cheapen it, but bid nothing; Others bid ſomething, but under-foot; Others bid well, but ſtake it not; Others laſtly ſtake downe, but revoke it. The firſt that paſſe by and cheapen it not, are careleſſe unbeleevers; The next that cheapen it, and bid nothing, are formall Chriſtians; The third that bid ſomething but not enough, are worldly ſemi-Chriſtians; The D fourth that bid well and ſtake it not, are glorious hypocrites; The laſt that ſtake downe and revoke it, are damnable Apoſtates. Take all theſe out of the ſociety of men; and how many cuſtomers hath God that care to buy the Truth? If Truth were ſome rich chattell, it would be bought; If Truth were ſome goodly Lordſhip, or the reverſion of ſome good Office, it would be bought; If Truth were ſome Benefice, or ſpirituall promotion (Oh times!) it would be bought; Yea, how deare are we content to pay for our filthy luſts! we will needs purchaſe them (too oft) with ſhame, beggery, diſeaſe, damnation; only the ſaving Truth of God will not off hand. What is the reaſon of this? Firſt of all, It is but bare, ſimple, plaine, honeſt, homely Truth, without welt, without guard, It will abide none but native colours, it ſcorneth to wooe favour E with farding, and licking, and counterfeiſance, it hates either bought, or borrowed beauty, and therefore like ſome native face among the painted, looks courſe, and ruſty. There are two ſhops that get away all the cuſtome from Truth, the ſhop of Vanity, the ſhop of Error: the one ſels knacks and gew-gawes, the other falſe wares, and adulterate, both of their commodities are ſo gilded, and gaudy, and glittering, that all fooles throng thither, and complaine to want elbow-roome, and ſtrive who ſhall be firſt ſerved; Whereas the ſecret work of artleſſe and unpoliſht truth can winne no eye to view it, no tongue to aske ſo much, as, What will it coſt me? Oh yee ſonnes of men, how long will yee love vanitie, and ſeeke after lies?

Secondly, though Truth in it ſelfe bee alwayes excellent, yet the iſſue of it is not ſeldome diſtaſtfull, Veritas odium: There is one Michaiah whom I hate: Am I become your enemy, becauſe I tell you the truth? And this is the cauſe that Frier Menot alleages, why truth in his time was ſo unwelcome to the Court. But if truth be the mother of Hatred, ſhee is the daughter of Time, and Truth hath learn't this of Time, to devoure her owne brood; So that in time, Truth ſhall conſume Hatred, and at laſt a galling Truth ſhall have more thanks, than a ſmoothing ſuppatification; In the meane time, Veritas nihil erubescit præterquam abscondi; Truth blusheth at nothing but secrecy, as Tertul. A

How ever then fond, or false hearts value the Truth, let us, that should be wise Christians, esteeme it as the pearle hid in the field, which the man sold all that ever he had to purchase. Would it not set any heart on fire with an holy anger, to see what the enemies of Truth bid, and give for falshood, for faction? Their liberty, their country, the life of their Soveraigne, the eternall state of their soules hath not seemed too deare to cast away upon an ill bargaine of mis-religion; and shall not we bid so much as our zealous well-wishes, our effectuall endevours, our carefull observances for the undoubted truth of our Maker and Redeemer? What shall I say to the miserable and stupid carelessnesse of these thriftlesse and godlesse times; wherein every thing is appriſed, every thing is bought, save that which is most pretious, most beneficiall, Truth. Yea great ones are made for precedents to the inferiour world; your example is able to bring either good or evill into fashion; For Gods sake, for your soules sake, what ever transactions ye make for the world, lay your plots for the blessed purchase of Truth; Oh let not your fickle honours, your unsatisfying pleasures, your worthlesse profits, yea your momentany lives seeme deare to you in comparison of heavenly Truth. It is no shame in other parts for great Peeres to bee Merchants; Mercatores tui erant Primipes, saith the Angell concerning Babylon, Revel. 18. Thy Merchants were the Princes of the earth. And why should not yee great ones be the Merchants of Truth? Blessed be the God of Truth, ye are so. It is no proud word to say, that no Court under heaven hath so rich a stock of truth as this of Great Britaine, yet let me tell you, the very Angels knew not so much, but they desired to know more, Ephes. 3. 10. And if ye had already that vespertine knowledge of the Saints which yee shall once have in heaven, yet know that this Bargaine stands not more in the judgement, than in the affections. What ever our speculations may be, if our hearts be not set upon Truth, we may be Brokers, wee are not Merchants; Brokers for others, not Merchants for our selves. As our Saviour then, when he bids us sell all, forsake all, holds it done, when in preparation of mind we are ready to abdicate all for his name, though wee doe it not: so doth God hold us to buy Truth, when we bestow our best thoughts, our deareſt well-wishes upon it, though we have it already. Oh rouze up your languishing zeale, ye noble Courtiers, rouze up your drouping love to divine Truth; Give your hearts to it, ye cannot but give all for it; And if you doe not find the sweet gaine of this Bargaine, in this lower Region of error and confusion, ye shall once find it in those eternall and empyreall habitations of truth, where the God of Truth shall make up the Truth of his promises, with the everlasting Truth of his glorious performances; where Mercy and Truth shall so meet, and embrace one another, that both of them shall embrace the faithfull soule, for ever and ever. B C D

This for the Bargaine of Truth; The forbidden sale followeth; sell it not. Commonly what we buy, we may sell. Alexander, not the Great, but the good, sold Miters, Keyes, Altars; the verse gives the reason; Emerat ille prius, He bought them. So S. Austen of Simon Magus, Volebat emere spiritum sanctum, quia vendere volebat spiritum sanctum; Hee would buy the Holy Ghost, because he meant to sell it. Give me a man that buyes a Seat of Judicature; I dare not trust him for not selling of Justice; he that sits in the chair of Simony, will not give Orders, will not stick to sell soules. Some things we may buy to sell, as Ioseph did the Egyptian corne; some things we must sell, if wee buy, as an Israelites inheritance, Lev. 25. But here we are charged to buy what it is a sin to sell; Buy the Truth and sell it not; There is many a good thing ill sold; Esau sels his birth-right for pottage; Hanun and Shechem sell their Country for love; Dalilah sels her lover for a bribe; The Patriarchs sell their Brother for twenty silver rings; Haman sels the Iewes for nought. The Gentiles sell the Jewish girles for wine, Ioel. 3. 3. Israel sels the righteous for silver, and the poore for shooes, Amos 2, 6. Their Judges sell sins or innocency for rewards, Esay 5 23. Ahab sels himselfe to wickednesse; Iudas sels his master; Demas sels the Truth; All these make an ill market; And in all it is a sure rule, the better the commodity is, the more pernicious is the sale. The indefiniteneſse of the charge implies a generality. Buy it at any price; At no price sell it. It is the favour of God, that E

it may be bought for any rate; It is the justice of God, that upon any rate it should not be sold: As buying and selling are oppositres in relation; So that for which we must not sell Truth, is opposite to that for which we may buy it. We must buy it with labour, therefore we may not sell it for ease; If need be, we must buy it with losse, therefore we may not sell it for gaine; we must buy it with disgrace, we may not sell it for honour; we must buy it with exile or imprisonment, we may not sell it for liberty; we must buy it with paine, we may not sell it for pleasure; we must buy it with death, we may not sell it for life. Not for any, not for all of these may we sell Truth; this were damnosa mercatio, as Chrys. In every bargaine and sale there must be a proportion; now ease, gaine, honour, liberty, pleasure, life, yea worlds of all these are no way countervailable to Truth; For what shall it profit a man to win the whole world and leese his owne soule? And he cannot sell Truth, but his soule is lost: And if any thing in the world may seeme a due price of Truth, it is Peace. Oh sweet and deare name of Peace, the good newes of Angels, the joy of good men! who can but affect thee, who can but magnifie thee? The God of heaven before whom I stand, from whom I speake, knows how oft, how deeply I have mourned for the divisions of his Church, how earnestly I have set my hand on worke upon such poore thoughts of re-union, as my meanesse could reach; but when all is done, I still found we may not offer to sel Truth for peace. It is true that there be some Scholasticall and immateriall Truths (the infinite subdivision whereof have rather troubled than informed Christendome) which for the purchase of peace might be kept in, and returned into such safe generalities as minds not unreasonable might rest in; but sold out they may not be; If some Truths may be contracted into a narrower roome, none may be contracted for; Qui divinis innutriti sunt eloquiis, as that Father said; Those that are trained up in divine Truths may not change a syllable for a word. Tene quod habes, Hold that thou hast, is a good rule in all things; which if in temporalities it were well observed, we should not have so many gallants squander away their inheritances, to live Camelion-like upon the ayre of favour; But how ever this be too well observed in these earthly things by frugal hands, which take as if they were quick, hold as if they were dead, yet in spirituall graces it can never be observed enough; we got Truth, we buy it as Iacob did his birthright, to keep, to enjoy, not to sell againe: If therefore the world, if Satan shall offer to grease us in the fist for truth, let us answer him as Simon Peter did Simon the Sorcerer, Thy money perish with thee, because thou hast thought the truth of God may be purchased with money.

Matth. 16. 26.

What shall we say then to those pedling petty-chapmen which we meet withall in every market, that will be bartering away the truth of God for trifles? Surely the forme of our spirituall market is contrary to the civill; in our civill markets there are more buyers than sellers; there would be but poore takings, if many did not buy of one; but in the spirituall, there are more Sellers of Truth than Buyers.

Many a one sels that he never had, that he should have had the Truth of God; Here one chops away the Truth for Feare or Ambition; There another lets it goe for the old shooes of a Gibeonitish pretence of Antiquity; Here one parts with it for a painted, gilded hobby-horse of an outwardly pompous magnificence of the Church; there another for the bables of childish superstition; One for the fancy of hope, another for the breath of a colloguing Impostor; Amongst them all, Diminutæ sunt veritates à filiis hominum, Ps. 12. Truth is failed from the children of men; Yea as Esay complained in his time, Corruit in platea veritas, Esay 59. 14. Truth is fallen in the streets. What a shame it is to see, that in the clear & glorious Sun-shine of the Gospell, under the pious government of the true Defender of the Faith, there should not want some soules that should truck for the truth of God, as if it were some Cheap-side, or some Smithfield-Commoditie? Commutaverunt veritatem Dei; They have changed the Truth of God into a lie, Rom. 1. 25. And all their care is, that they may be deceived good cheap. Whose heart cannot bleed to see so many well rigg'd and hopefull Barks of our young Gentry, laden with the most precious merchandizes of Nature and Grace, hal'd in every day to these deceitfull Ports of Error, the owners partly cheated, partly robbed of Truth, despoiled of their rich fraight, and at last turn'd over board into a sea of Desideration? O foolish Galatians, who hath bewitched you, that ye should not obey, that ye should not hold fast the Truth; Where shall I lay the fault of this miscarriage? Me thinks I could ask the Disciples question, Nunquid ego Domine, Is it we Lord? Are there of us that preach our selves, and not Christ? Are there that preach Christ, and live him not? Woe to the world because of offences. It must needs be that offences should come, but woe to the man by whom the offence commeth: God forbid that we should be so bad that the seven Hils should not justifie us; But what ever we be, the Truth is still, and ever it selfe, neither the better for our innocence, nor worse for our guilt. If men be faulty, what hath Truth offended? Except the sacred word of the Ever-living God can mis-guide you, we have set you right. We are but dust and ashes, yet, O God, give us thine humble vassals leave in an awfull confidence so far to contest with thee, the Lord of heaven and earth, as to say, if we be deceived, thou hast deceived us. It is thou that hast spoken by us to thy people; Let God be true, and every man a Lyer; Whither should we goe from thee? Thou hast the words of eternall life. Deare Christians, our forefathers transmitted to us the intire inheritance of the glorious Gospell of Jesus Christ, repurchased by the blood of their martyrdome; Oh let not our ill husbandry impaire it; Let not posterity once say, they might have beene happy, but for the unthriftinesse of us their progenitors; Let it not be said, that the coldnesse of us the Teachers, and professors of Truth, hath dealt with Religion as Rehoboam did with his shields, which he found of Gold, but left of Brasse. If Truth had no friends, we should plead for it; but now that we have before our eyes so powerfull an Τπερμαχος of Christian faith, that with his very pen hath so laid error upon the back, that all the world cannot raise it; what a shame were it to be wanting to him, to Truth, to our selves? But perhaps now I know some of your thoughts; you would buy Truth, (yee thinke) you would hold it, if ye could be sure to know it; There are many slips amongst the true coyne; Either of the mothers pleaded the living child to be hers, with equall protestations, oaths, teares. True, yet a Salomons sword can divide Truth from falshood; and there is a test, and fire that can discerne true metals from adulterate; In spight of all counterfeiting there are certaine infallible marks, to know Truth from Error; Take but a few of many; whether in the originals, in the natures, in the ends of both. In the first, Truth is divine, Error is humane; what is grounded upon the divine word must needs bee irrefragably true; that which upon humane Traditions, either must, or may be erroneous. In the second, Truth is one, conforme ever to it selfe, αὐτῇ ἑαυτῇ σύμφωνος; as one said, Omne verum omni vero consonat, All Truth accords with every Truth, as Gerson; and as it is pure, so peaceable; Error is full of dissonance, of crueltie: No particulars of ours dissent from the written verity of God; We teach no man to equivocate; Our practice is not bloody with treasons and massacres. In the third, Truth, as it came from God, so is referd to him; neither hath any other end than the glory of the God of Truth; Error hath ever some selfe-respects; either αἰσχροκερδίαν, or κενοδοξίαν, filthy lucre, or vaine-glory; profit, or pride; We doe not prank up nature; we aime not, either to fill the cofers, or feed the ambition of men; Let your Wisdomes apply and infer, and now (if ye can) shut your eyes, that you should not see the Truth; and if ye care not for your soules, when yee see it, sell it: Let no false tongue perswade you there is no danger in this sale: How charitably soever we thinke of poore blinded soules, that live in the forced, and invincible darknesse of error, certainly Apostasy is deadly; How ever those speed that are robbed of Truth, you cannot sell Truth, and be saved. Have mercy therfore on your owne soules, for their sakes, for the sake of him that bought them, with the deare ransome of his precious blood; And as God hath blessed you with the invaluable treasure of Truth, so hoard it up in your hearts, and manage it in your lives; Oh let me be Gens justa custodiens veritatem, Esa. 26. A just nation keeping fast the Truth; So whiles ye keep the Truth, the Truth shall keep you, both in life, in Death, in Judgment, In life unto death, in death and judgment unto the consummation of that endlesse & incomprehensible glory, which the God of Truth hath prepared for them that overcome.

To the happy possession whereof he that hath ordained, in his good time as mercifully bring us, and that for the sake of the Son of his Love, Jesus Christ the Righteous, To whom with thee, O Father, and thy blessed Spirit, one infinite God, bee given all praise, honour, and glory, now and for ever. Amen.

HONOVRABLE

A SERMON PREACHED AT THE REEDIFIED CHAPEL OF THE RIGHT HONOURA-ble Earle of Exceter, in his Houſe of Saint Iohns.

HAGGAI 2. 9.

The glory of the latter houſe ſhall be greater than of the former, ſaith the Lord of Hoſts; and in this place will I give peace, ſaith the Lord of Hoſts.

AS we have Houſes of our owne, ſo God hath his; yea, as great men have more houſes than one, ſo hath the great God of Heaven much more; more, both in ſucceſſion (as here, the latter houſe, and the firſt) and in variety: He hath an houſe of fleſh, (Ye are the Temples of the living God;) An houſe of ſtone; (Salomon ſhall build me an houſe;) An houſe immateriall in the Heavens, 2 Cor. 5. 1. Wherefore then hath God an houſe? Wherefore have we ours, but to dwell in? But doth not he himſelfe tell David, and ſo doth Stephen the Protomaryr (upon whoſe day we are fallen) tell the Jewes, that He dwels not in Temples made with hands? True, he dwels not in his Houſe, as we in ours by way of comprehenſion; he dwels in it by teſtification of preſence. So doe we dwell in our houſes, that our houſes containe us, that we are only within them, and they without us. So doth he dwell in his, that yet he is elſewhere, yea every where, that his houſe is within him. Shortly, God dwells where he witneſſes his gracious preſence, that, becauſe he doth both in the Empyreall heaven, amongſt his Angels and Saints, and in his Church upon earth; therefore his dwelling is both in the higheſt heaven in perfect glory; and on Earth, in the hearts and aſſembly of his children. As of the former, our Saviour ſaith, In domo patris mei, In my Fathers houſe are many Manſions: So alſo may we ſay of the latter, There is much variety and choice in it; There was the Church of the Jewes, the Church of the Gentiles; There is a materiall, and a ſpirituall houſe. In the one, Salomons, Zorobabels, ſuch piles as this: In the other, ſo much multiplicitie, as there are Nations, yea, Congregations that profeſſe the Name of Chriſt. One of theſe was a figure of the other; the Materiall, under the Law, of the Spirituall, under the Goſpell. Ye ſee now the firſt houſe, and the latter, the ſubject of our Text and diſcourſe. The latter, commended to us, comparatively, poſitively. Comparatively with the former, Major gloria. Poſitively, in it ſelfe, In this place will I give peace. Both, ſet out by the ſtile of the promiſer, and avower; ſaith the Lord of Hoſts. All which challenge your Chriſtian attention.

As the first house (which was materiall) was a figure of the second, which is spirituall: so the glory of that materiall, was a figure of the glory of this spirituall. Now because all the life and glory of the spirituall, stands in Christ the Messias, the Prophet looks through the type of the materiall, at him which shall beautifie, yea glorifie, the spirituall, of whose exhibition the Prophet speakes, Adhuc modicum, yet a little while, and I will shake the Heavens. This Modicum was but some 500. and odde yeares; much to men, but a modicum to the Ancient of dayes, with whom 1000. yeares are but one day. It is in and by him, that this latter house under the Gospell, shall in glory surpasse that first under the law. The Prophets had spoken gloriously of the temple that should be; and now, lest when the people should see the homely and cottage-like reedification of Zorobbabel, they should be dis-heartned and offended, the Prophet desires to draw their eyes from the stone and timber, to the spirituall inside of the Evangellcall Church, shewing the glory of this latter House, to exceed the former.

Some grosse interpreters have lookt with Jewish eyes upon the outward fabricke, which was threefold: Salomons, Zorobabels, Herods. Salomons, sumptuous and magnificent: Zorobabels, meane and homely; Herods, rich and majesticall, immodico sumptu, incredibili splendore, as one sayes. Salomons was before defaced. Now because Zorobabel was so farre from making his Word good, that the people wept, when they saw the difference (which Calvin well obserues, was not without a speciall providence of the al-wise God; else the Jewes would so have fixed their eyes upon the outward splendor, that they would never have looked for the spirituall and inward Grace of the House of God:) therefore they have taken it of Herods temple; the walls and lining whereof were indeed answerable to this Propheſie, more glorious. But this conceit, as it is too carnall, so is quite dissonant from the context, both in regard of the precedents, and subsequents. Of the precedents: For how did the desire of all nations come to that Pile of Herods? Of the subsequents: For, what peace was under the Herodian Temple? first, the builder of it, was the chiefe oppressor of the Jewish liberty: and then, secondly, it gave occasion to the perpetuall miserie of that people. Pilate would expilate the Treasures of it for aquæ ductæ, which denied, cost the Jews much bloud. Under Claudius, twenty thousand slaine in a Feast of unleavened bread. Ionathas the Priest slaine by theeves suborned by Felix, in the very Temple; and ever after, it was the harbour and spoile of Villaines. What hills of Carcasses? What streames of bloud was in't at the last vastation? Enough to amaze any Reader: soas in that 79. yeares wherein it stood (longer it did not,) it was no better than a stage of Tragedies, a shambles of cruelty. Of that therefore God could not say, Dabo pacem, it was Templum adulterinum, as one cals it justly, and had neither command nor promise: It was the Spirituall Temple, the Evangelicall Church, whose glory shall be greater than the Jewish, which shall be blessed with the desire of the Nations, with the assurance of Peace. But why then doth the Holy Ghost speake of Gold and Silver, the costly materials of an outward structure? Even these very metals are figurative, not that God cares so much for them, but because we doe; because our eies use to be dazled with this best parcell of Earth; Therefore when he would describe a glorious Church, he borrowes the resemblance of Gold, Silver, precious stones, Esay 60. and even by these doth he set forth his new and Heavenly Jerusalem, Revelat. 21. Wherein then is the glory of Gods Evangelicall House greater, than of the Legall? Yea, wherein is it not greater? Whether ye look to the efficient, the matter, the duration, the extent, the service. The efficient, that was built by man though directed by God: In this, God himselfe is the Architect, not onely giving the modell, but the frame. The matter, whether of structure, or ornament. The structure of the one was of stone and wood: of the other is of living stones. The ornament of the one was Gold and Silver: of the other, divine Graces of Faith, Charity, Hope, Sanctity, Truth, Piety, and all other vertues, to which, Gold it selfe were but trash.

The duration of the one (even that longst-lived Temple of Salomon, though called (Beth γνωλαμ domus seculi) was but 430. yeares. Of the other, beyond time to eternitie. The extent of the one to be measured by a few poles, yea, (though ye take in the Courts and all) by a few Acres: Of the other, universall, so far as the King of Heaven hath

A hath any Land. The ſervice in the one performed by a few men, mortall, ſinfull, the bloud of beaſts ſhed upon the Altar: In the other, performed by our eternall High-Prieſt, after that higher order of Melchiſedec; offering up his owne moſt precious bloud for our redemption. In that, Chriſt Jeſus was obſcurely figured: In this, really exhibited, borne, living, dying, riſing, aſcending, preached, beleeved, lived; Every way therefore both in efficient, matter, duration, extent, ſervice, Major gloria.

Let no man tell me now of that juſt wonder of the world, the Jewiſh Temple, white Marble without, lined with Gold within, Brazen pillars, Golden veſſels, coſtly vailes, an High-Prieſthood ſet forth with precious Stones, rich Robes, exquiſite Perfumes, curious Muſicke, and what ever that ancient goodly inſtitution had rare and admirable; I ſay, the Clay of the Goſpell, is more worth then the marble of the Law; Evangelicall Braſſe, more worth than legall Gold; the ragges of the Evangelicall Prieſthood, more excellent than the robes of the Leviticall. In ſhort; the beſt of the Law is not comparable to the baſeſt of the Goſpell.

Iohn Baptiſt was the Ianus of both Teſtaments; he was to the Churches, as Noah was to the Worlds; he law both the firſt, and the latter. It is a great word that our Saviour ſaith of him, that amongſt thoſe which were borne, or rather (as ours read it better) begotten of women, there did not a greater than he ariſe: but it is a greater word that he ſpeakes of the Children of the new Teſtament, that the leaſt in the Kingdome of Heaven is greater than he: I ſtand not upon examining the compariſon, whether it be ratione ſanctitatis, or officii; it makes either way for my purpoſe, therefore was Iohn ſo great, becauſe he was the laſt of the Law, and the firſt of the Goſpell: and the old rule is, minimum maximi majus eſt maximo minimi; therefore is the leaſt in the Kingdome of Grace greater the he, becauſe he is all, what Iohn was halfe; wholly under that Evangelium Regni, which is able to advance him to a greater perfection, than that Harbinger of Chriſt. What a favour then is it (Right Honourable and beloved) that God hath reſerved us to theſe better dayes of his Goſpell, wherein the helpes of ſalvation are more cleere, obvious, effectuall; wherein, as the glory of the latter Houſe exceeded the former; ſo the meanes of that incomprehenſible glory of the houſe not made with hands, eternall in the Heavens, lie more open unto us? What ſhould we doe, but both uti, and frui, gladly uſe, and ſweetly enjoy this unſpeakeable bleſſing, which God hath kept in ſtore for us, and walke worthy of ſo incomparable a mercy? The old Jewes lived in the dawning of the day, wherein they had but a glimmering of that Sun, which would riſe. We live after the high noone of that happy day. If we walke not anſwerable to ſo great a light, what can we looke for, but utter darkneſſe?

The leaſt of the greateſt is more, than the greateſt of the leaſt. Goſpell of the Kingdome.

Yeſhall now give me leave (Right Honourable) to carry theſe words in a meet analogie to the preſent occaſion. The Temples under the Law, were both a figure, and a patterne of the Churches under the Goſpell. Within this roofe under which we now ſtand here, was both the former, and the latter houſe; and even in theſe walls doth God make his words good, That the glory of this latter Houſe ſhall be greater than of the former. The firſt foundation of it was, no doubt, both pious and rich. I ſhall not need to fetch the Pedegrees of it from Saint Iohn Baptiſt in Jeruſalem, nor to diſcourſe of either the devotion, or wealth of that religiouſly-military Order, for whom theſe ſtones were firſt laid. Imagine the Altar never ſo gay, the Imagery never ſo curious, the Veſtments never ſo rich, the Pillars, Walls, Windowes, Pavement, never ſo exquiſite; yet I dare boldly ſay, this preſent glory of this Houſe in this comely whiteneſſe, and well-contrived coarctation, is greater than the former. What care I? Nay, what doth God care for the worke of a Lapidary, or Painter, or Maſon? One zealous Prayer, one Orthodox Sermon, is a more glorious furniture, than all the precious rarities of Mechanique excellencies. I doe moſt willingly (as what good heart doth not?) honour the vertuous actions, and godly intentions of our worthy forefathers, which (no doubt) it hath pleaſed God in mercie to accept and crowne, but withall it muſt be yeelded, that they lived under the tyrannous injurie and uſurpation of thoſe Phariſees, who kept the keyes of knowledge at their owne girdles, and would neither draw for them, nor ſuffer them to draw for themſelves. Bleſſed be God for better conditions; the Well of life lies open to us, neither are we only allowed, but invited to those heavenly liquors, Inebriamini O Charissimi, Drink, yea, drinke abundantly, O beloved, Cant. 5. 1. This happy libertie of the saving Gospell of Jesus Christ, daily and sincerely preached to us (Noble and beloved Christians) is worthy to be more worth unto us, than all the treasures, ornaments, privileges, of this transitorie World; and this, since through the inestimable goodnesse of God, yee doe, and may find in this latter House; well hath God verified this word in your eyes and eares, The glory of the latter House shall be greater than of the former.

Hitherto the comparative praise of the latter House; the positive followes in the promise of a gracious effect; In this place will I give peace: wherein I know not whether the blessing doth more grace the place, or the place the blessing; both grace each other, and both blesse Gods people; In this place will I give peace. If ye looke at the blessing it selfe, it is incomparable, Peace; that whereby the Hebrewes had wont to expresse all welfare in their salutations, and well-wishes; the Apostolicall benediction dicheromizes all good things into Grace and Peace; wherein at the narrowest, by Grace, all spirituall favours were signified; temporall by Peace. The sweet singer of Israel could not wish better to Gods Church, than Peace be within her walls: and behold, this is it which God will give, Dabo pacem: yea, our eyes should stoop too low, if they should fix here. The sweet Quiristers of Heaven, when they sung that divine Caroll, to the honour of the first Christmas, next to Gloria in excelsis Deo, said, In terris pax: Yet higher, the great Saviour of the World, when he would leave the most precious Legacie to his deare ones on earth, that they were capable of, he sayes, My peace I give you. And what he there gives, he here promises, Dabo pacem, I will give it. But where? Whence? In this place. Not any where; not every where; but in his owne House, in his later House, his Evangelicall House; as if this blessing were confined to his holy walls, he saith, In this place will I give peace. This flower is not for every soile; it growes not wild, but is only to be found in the Garden of Sion. It is very pregnant which the Psalmist hath, Psal. 128. 5. and 134. 3. The Lord that made Heaven and Earth, blesse thee out of Sion. He doth not say, The Lord that made the earth blesse thee out of heaven; nor, The Lord that made Heaven, blesse thee out of heaven; but, blesse thee out of Sion: As if hee would teach us, that all blessings come, as immediately and primarily from heaven, so mediately and secondarily from Sion, where this Temple stood. Some Philosophers have held the Moone to be the receptacle of all the influences of the heavenly bodies, and the conveyances of them to this inferiour world, so as all the vertue of the upper Orbes and Starres, are derived by her, to this elementarie Spheare. Such doth both David and Haggai repute the house of God; whither, as to Iosephs Store-house, doth God convey the blessings of peace, that they may be thence transmitted to the sons of men. How, and why then doth God give peace in this his House? Because here (as Bernard well) Deus & audit, & auditur, God heares, and is heard here: audit orantes, erudit audientes; he heares his suppliants, and teacheth his hearers. As this place hath two uses, it is both Oratorium, and Auditorium: so in respect of both, doth it blesse us with peace: our mouth procures it in the one, our eare in the other; God workes in our hearts by both. In the first, God sayes, as our Saviour cites it, Domus mea Domus orationis: My House shall be called the House of prayer. And what blessing is it, even the best of Peace, that our prayers cannot infeoffe us in? Salomon when he would consecrate the Church he had built, solemnly sues to God, that he would invest it with this privilege of an universall-gracious audience; and numbring the occasions of distressed Suppliants, makes it ever the foot of his request; (Then harken to the prayer that thy servant shall make towards this place; Heare thou in heaven, thy dwelling place; and when thou heareſt, have mercy.) If ever therefore we would have peace outward, inward, private, publick, secular, spirituall: If we would have peace in our estate, peace in our Land, peace in our Church, peace in our soules, pray for it. And if ever we will pray for it, pray here, in Gods house, for in this place will I give peace. In vaine shall we looke for it elsewhere if we aske it not here. It is true, we are bidden every where to lift up pure hands to God: but they cannot be pure, that are profane; and they cannot bee but profane, that contemne the holy Ordinances of God. He said well, In temple

I will give peace.

Glory to God in the highest heaven, in earth, peace, &c.

vii

A vis orare? in te ora; (for, Know you not, that your bodies are the Temples of the living God?) but let me as truely returne it; Intra vis orare? intra templa ora. Wouldest thou pray with effect at home? Pray at Church; else thy devotion is but the sacrifice of fooles; for he hath said it, who hath good reason to appoint the circumstances of his owne beneficence, In this place will I give peace.

Will ye then see the reason why there is so much empty Caske in the Celler of God? Therefore are men void of grace, because they are void of devotion. They seeke not God where he may be found; and therefore it is just with God not to be found of them, where they pretend to seeke him: for In hoc loco, in this place will I give peace.

B Gerson distinguishes well in his Sermon de Angelis, that there is Duplex Cœlum, A double Heaven; Gloriæ & Ecclesiæ, of Glory above, of the Church below; the Church is the Heaven on earth; where God is seen, heard, spoken unto: where are his Saints (whose assemblies are here;) where are his Angels: (Let the woman have power on her head, because of the Angels, 1 Cor. 11.) As the Jewes then, whilest the Church of God was Nationall, were wont (according to command) to looke towards the Temple, if they could not come to it, in their devotions: So now that the Church is Catholike, or universall, and every of our Churches is equally Gods house, (supra,) we shall gladly with Peter and Iohn, goe up to this Temple to pray; How can we looke for a better incouragement, than God gives us here, In this place will I give peace?

In the latter, as it is Auditorium, so, I create the fruit of the lips to be peace (saith C God.) Naturally we are all (even those that applaud themselves in the best opinion of their harmelesse and faire disposition) enemies to God: Enemies both actively and passively. Actively, στυγητοὶ God-haters, Rom. 1. Passively, Filii iræ, The sons of displeasure. We fell out in Adam through our owne wilfull apostasie and disobedience; and we still stand out in the maintenance of our inward corruption. There is no way to peace but by reconciliation; there is no way to reconciliation, but by the Gospell of Jesus Christ, which is Evangelium pacis; there is no proper element for the Gospell of God, but the House of God; Locus iste, In this place will I give peace. It is not (I know) for every heart to apprehend, either the want of this peace, or the misery of this want. This is one of those happinesses which is most bragg'd of, where it is least had. The sensuall Securitan pleases himselfe in the conceit of his owne peace. All is well at home; he quarrels not with himselfe, for he denies himselfe nothing: God quarrels not with him, here are no checks of a chiding conscience; no frownes of an angry Judge; nothing but Pulchritudo Pacis (as the Prophet speakes.) Alas my beloved, call not this peace, call it stupiditie; even Hell it selfe is not a Kingdome divided in it selfe. There is no blessing, which is not also counterfeited, Pacem veram dabo, is the stile of the Prophets, Ier. 14. 13. This were a needlesse Epithet, if there were not a false peace; such is this of carnall hearts. That word of eternall Truth must stand: There is no peace, saith my God, to the wicked. Have you seene a sore suddenly fild up with unsound flesh, and fairely skinned over, without all offence to the eye, which ere E long will breake out againe, and bewray a secret, and so much-more-hardly-cured corruption? such is a wicked mans peace. Have you seene a slave sit quietly in the Gally, not strugling with his chaine, not repining at his Oare (necessitas fortiter, consuetudo facile?) Have you heard a dying man professe, that he felt no paine? Such is a wicked mans peace, of which he shall once say, though now all seeme smooth, and plausible; In pace amaritudo mea amarissima; In peace I had great bitternesse, Esay 38. 17. Neither is the want of this peace lesse perceived, than the misery of this want. Men see no difference in the face of Heaven, whatsoever they doe; their blasphemies and prayers find the same entertainement: therefore the careless man resolves, I shall have peace, though I follow the wayes of mine owne heart. Oh the miserable sottishnesse of wilfull sinners! Sinne lyes (like a sleeping Bandog) at the doore of their heart; they looke upon him as if hee would never wake; or, as if though he should, yet he were so clogged, and chained, and muzled, that there can be no danger of his hurt. Let God but rowze him up a little, he shall bay them to despaire; he shall flie upon them, and pull out their throats: Then shall their troubled heart project terrible things, and they shall feele what it is to live in the anger of a God. They shall see the Almighty

The Gospell of peace.

The beauty of peace.

I will give true peace.

Necessity hath taught him to beare it strongly, custome easily.

Almighty putting himſelfe into the fearefull formes of vengeance; Who can ſtand before his indignation? And who can abide in the fierceneſſe of his anger? His fury is powred out like fire, and the rocks are throwne downe before him, Nahum 1. 6. And if his very love have drawne bloud of his deare ones: (Terrores Domini militant contra me, ſaith holy Iob: The terrors of the Lord are ſet in aray againſt me, Iob 6. 4.) and he that bore the chaſtiſements of our peace, the Sonne of his love, could ſay (My God, my God, why haſt thou forſaken me?) Oh what ſhall be the judgements of his wrath? If this be the rod of children, Oh, what ſhall be the Scorpions for his enemies? They ſhall ſee that gulfe of fire ready to receive them into everlaſting burnings. They ſhall ſee the Devils their inceſſant tormentors ready to ſeize upon their guilty ſoules. Then, O then, ſhall they know, too late, what an happineſſe it is, that God here promiſes, Dabo pacem. Would we then avoyd the unſpeakable horrour of this wofull condition? Would we find the bed of our ſickneſſe and death, comforted with the ſweet teſtimony of an heavenly peace betwixt God and our ſoules? See whence we muſt fetch it. In this place will I give peace. If ever we have it, we muſt have it from the bleſſed ordinances of God, his Word and Sacraments, which this place can afford us. In vaine ſhall yee ſeeke for this (deare Chriſtians) in a licentious Taverne, in a rich Counting-houſe, in Chambers of dalliance, in full Tables, in Pompous Courts, no, not in thrones of earthly Majeſty. Alas, many of theſe are the make-bates betwixt Heaven and us, moſt of them can marre, none of them can make our peace. It is onely the deſpiſed Miniſtery of the Goſpell; the Word of reconciliation, (as it is called, 2 Cor. 5. 19.) which ſounds in Gods Houſe, that can doe it. As yee love your ſoules therefore, as you would finde peace at the laſt, and would looke with a comfortable aſſurance in the face of death and judgement; as yee would ſee a gratious Mercy-ſeat in the dreadfull Tribunall of God at the day of our laſt appearance, frequent the Houſe of God, attend reverently and conſcionably upon the ſacred Inſtitutions of God, yeeld your ſelves over to be wrought upon by the powerfull Goſpell of Jeſus Chriſt. Oh be not you wanting unto God, he will not be wanting unto you, but will make good this promiſe of his unfailable grace, In this place will I give peace.

It is a great word that is here ſpoken, Dabo pacem; and therefore it is undertaken by an omnipotent Agent, I will give peace. If all the Angels of Heaven ſhould have ſaid ſo, we ſhould ſoone have replied, as Korah and his company did to Moſes and Aaron, Yee tooke too much upon you, Numbers 16. 3. This worke is not for any finite power, the ſtile of peace, is the peace of God; the ſtile of God, the Mediator betwixt God and man, is, The Prince of peace. He is the true Salomon, the other was but typicall. It is he only, that when the Diſciples were toſſed with contrary winds and threatning billowes, could command the winds and waves to a calme. It is hee only, that when his Church is toſſed with the winds and waves of raging and impetuous enmitie, can give outward peace. It is he onely, that when the diſtreſſed ſoule is toſſed with the winds and waves of ſtrong temptation, of weake diffidence, can give inward peace. Juſtly therefore doth he challenge this act as his own, I will give peace. We uſe to ſay, It is beſt treating of peace with a ſword in our hand. Thoſe who have the advantage of the warre, may command peace: underlings muſt ſtoop to ſuch conditions, as the victor will yeeld. To ſhew us therefore how eaſily he can give peace, God ſtiles himſelfe the God of Hoſts; a title wherein he takes no ſmall delight, referring not to the being of the creature, but to their marſhalling; not to their naturall eſtate, but their militarie; neither would God be lookt at in it, as a Creator, but as a Generall. In but two of the Prophets, Eſay and Ieremie, no leſſe than an hundred and thirty times hath hee this ſtile given him. Every thing, as it hath an exiſtence from the Maker, ſo an order from the Governour; and that order is no other than warlike, wherein it doth (militare Deo) ſerve under the colours of the Almighty. All creatures are both muſtred, and trained, and placed in Garriſon, and brought forth into the field, in the ſervice of their Creator; they are all exercitus pugnatorum. If yee looke into Heaven, there is a company of heavenly Souldiers, Luke 2. Neither was there onely the conſtruction of Idolaters, univerſa militia cæli, to which they burnt incenſe; but Moſes himſelfe; Thus the Heaven and Earth were finiſhed, and all

A the Hoſt of them, Gen. 2.1. If ye look to the Earth, not men onely, whom reaſon hath fitted for ſuch deſignes, but even the brute, yea, the baſeſt and indocibleſt of the brute creatures are ranged into arrayes: even the very Locuſts, though they have no Leader, yet Egrediuntur per turmas, They goe forth by bands, Prov. 30.27. And if ye looke into Egypt (where for the time was Sedes belli,) you ſhall finde a band of Frogs, that were appointed to march into the very bed chamber, the bed, the ovens, the diſhes of Pharaoh; you ſhall finde an hoſt of Lice, of Flies, of Caterpillers, ſent againſt thoſe Egyptian Tyrants. Elſewhere, ye ſhall finde troupes of Palmer wormes, of Locuſts, of Cankerwormes, of Caterpillers, to ſet upon Iſrael, Ioel 1.4. Shortly, where he meanes to preſerve, the fiery Charets and Horſemen of Heaven ſhall com-
B paſſe Dothan. Where he meanes to deſtroy, the moſt deſpicable of his creatures ſhall be armed, to the ruine of the proudeſt. Doth Goliah ſtalke forth to the defiance of the God of Iſrael? A pibble out of the brook ſhall ſtrew him on the ground. Doth an Herod heare his flatterers gladly ſay, Nec vox hominem ſonat? Stay but a while, God ſets his vermine upon him; all the Kings guard cannot maſter thoſe Lice. He hath Hornets for the Hivites and Canaanites, Exod. 23. Mice for the Philiſtims, 1 Sam. 6. Rats for the Covetous Prelate: A Flie for Pope Adiran: A world of creatures for either defenſive or offenſive ſervices. Quare fremuerunt gentes? Why doe the Heathen rage, and the people imagine a vaine thing? The Kings of the Earth ſet themſelves, and the Rulers take counſell together againſt the Lord, and againſt his Anointed: Preſumptuous duſt
C and aſhes, that dare riſe up againſt the God of Hoſts! If a ſilly Ant out of a Mole-hill ſhould march forth, and proffer to wreſtle a fall with a Gyant, there were ſome proportion in this challenge; there is none of a finite power to an infinite. Should all the powers of Hell band themſelves with thoſe on earth, Quis reſtitit? What power have they of being, of motion, but from him whom they oppoſe? How eaſily can he blow upon their enterpriſes? How eaſily can he command theſe to the duſt, thoſe to their Chaines? Be confounded therefore, O vaine men, whoſe breath is in your noſtrils (and that not your owne neither) when ye thinke of the power and Majeſty of the God of Hoſts.

Who hath reſiſted his will?

And why are we diſmaid with the rumours, or feares of the ſtrongeſt oppoſitions? Gebal and Ammon, and Amelek, the Philiſtims, with them that dwell at Tyre? Aſhur
D alſo is joyned to the inceſtuous children of Lot: (ἀλληγόρια) O thou of little faith, why feareſt thou? The Lord of hoſts is with us, the God of Iacob is our refuge, Pſal. 46. Come, all ye Bands of wickedneſſe, and conſpire againſt the Scepter of the Kingdome (that is, the Goſpell) of Jeſus Chriſt. He hath his Armageddon, He hath a feaſt for the fowles of the aire, and the beaſt of the field, whom he hath invited to the fleſh of Captaines, and the fleſh of Kings, Revel. 19.8. I will not be afraid of ten thouſands of people that have ſet themſelves againſt me round about; Dominus ſuſcepit; The Lord hath ſuſtained me, and he is the Lord of Hoſts.

Yea, why are we apalled, when we ſee the meaſures of the ſonnes of Anak; the E ſpirituall wickedneſſes in heavenly places? If we looke at their number, they are Legions. If to their ſtrength, they are Principalities and Powers. If to their nature, they are ſpirits that rule in the aire. We are men, fleſh and bloud, ſingle, weake, ſinfull. What ever we are, our God is in heaven, and doth whatſoever he will, he is the ~~Lord of Hoſts, tho Cowards in our ſelves; yet in~~ him we are more than Conquerors; he who is more then all power, than all Truth, hath ſaid it; The Gates of Hell ſhall not prevaile againſt his Church. Thanks be to God, which giveth us victory, through our Lord Jeſus Chriſt.

Laſtly, he is the Lord of hoſts; his undertakings are infallible: Hath he ſaid, that the glory of the Evangelicall Church ſhall exceed the Legall? Hath he ſaid, that, In this place he will give peace? How can the Church faile of glory, or the ſoule of peace? ~~His word can be no more defective, than himſelfe impotent.~~ Truſt God with his owne cauſes; truſt him with thy ſelfe; doe that he bids; expect what he promiſes; haunt this Houſe of his, wait on his ordinances. The Lord of Hoſts ſhall give thee that peace, which paſſeth all underſtanding; and with peace, glory, in that upper Houſe of his not made with hands, eternall in the Heavens.

To

To the poſſeſſion whereof, that God, who hath ordained us, in his good time mercifully bring us. A

And now, O Lord God of Hoſts, make good thy promiſes to this Houſe of thine. Whenſoever any Suppliant ſhall in this place offer up his praiers unto thee, heare thou in Heaven, thy dwelling place; and when thou heareſt, have mercy. What Word ſoever of thine ſhall ſound out of this place, let it be the ſavour of life unto life to every hearer. What Sacrament ſoever of thine in this place ſhall be adminiſtred, let it be effectuall to the ſalvation of every receiver.

Thou that art the God of glory, and peace, give peace and glory to thy Servants, for thy mercies ſake, for thy Sonnes ſake, even the Sonne of thy love, Ieſus Chriſt the juſt. To whom with thee, and the holy Ghoſt, one infinite God, be given all praiſe, honour, and thanksgiving now and for ever. B

TO THE WORSHIPFVLL AND REVEREND, Mr. Dr. HALL, Deane of VVorceſter, my worthy and much reſpected Friend, all happineſſe, with my love in CHRIST JESUS.

REverend Sir; this Sermon, I know, is at the Preſſe before you expected: Bnt I thought (as this glorious Chapell occaſioned it, ſo) it might miniſter occaſion of perpetuall remembrance of the Chapell, by remaining its firſt Monument. And although both theſe were confined to the private, the Chapell for the Family of my right Honourable Lord the Earle of Exceter, who hath given the materiall thereof ſufficient luſtre: and the Copy of the Sermon to the Cabinet of my truly Noble, and vertuous Lady, his Counteſſe; yet both theſe are much and oft required to the publike, the Sermon to be an inſtruction, and ſo it is; the Chapell to be an example, and ſo it may be. The Sermon to teach all, to be all glorious in their ſoules. The Chapell to teach ſome, who build houſes for their owne habitation, to ſet up an other for Gods Religion. The Sermon was craved at the hands of my Honourable Lady, that it might come to the Preſſe, who, of her owne pious diſpoſition, gave forth the Copy, and for her Noble eſteeme of your ſelfe, and of the worth of your Sermon, was willing and deſirous to give it way to the Printer. And this I thought good to impart unto you, and to the courteous Reader, that you may be ſatisfied of the meanes how, and the cauſe why it comes in publike. And ſo praying for you, and deſiring your prayers for me, I remaine

Your truly loving Friend,

H. BAGULEY.

ESAY. 32. 17.

Opus Justitiæ pax.

The work of Justice (or Righteousnes) shall be Peace.

MY Text (you heare) is of Justice and Peace, two royall graces: and such as flow from soveraign Majesty. There is a double Justice, Divine and Humane; there is a double Peace, outward in the state, inward in the soule: accordingly there is a double sense of my Text, a spirituall, a civill sense: The spirituall concerning Theologicall Justice, and inward peace: The civill concerning humane Justice and outward peace. The spirituall thus: The Messias shall cause the fruit of his perfect justice to be our inward peace with God and our selves: The civill thus; The Magistrate shall cause the work of civill Justice, in his administration, to be outward peace with one another: In both or either (as Musculus well) there is an allusion in the Hebrew word to a field; the soile is the heart of the State, the seed is Justice, the fruit Peace: That which was waste ground is now a Carmell, a fruitfull field, and the fruit of this field of Justice is Peace. As there is good reason, we will begin with the spirituall Justice and Peace.

The great king of Heaven will disforest that Peace of the world, which he calls his Church, and put it to tillage: it shall be sown with righteousnes, and shall yeeld a sweet crop of Peace; in this only, not in the barren heaths of the prophane world, shall true peace grow.

At first, God and man were good frends: How should there be other than good termes betwixt Heaven and Paradise? God made man just; and just man (whiles he was so) could not choose but love the just God that made him; sin set them at ods; in one act and instant did man leese both his justice and peace; now the world is changed; now the stile of God is Fortis ultor, God the avenger, Jer 51. 56. and the stile of men, Filii iræ, sons of wrath, Ephes. 2. 3. There is no possible peace to be made betwixt God and man, but by the perfect justice of him that was both God and man: I would there were a peace in the Church about this justice; it is pitie and shame there is not: but there must be heresies: As there are two parts of Divinity, the Law & the Gospell; so each of these have their Justice; there is a justice of the Law, and an Evangelicall justice. The justice of the Law when a meer morall man is justified (out of his own powers) by the works of the Law; very Papists will give so much way to S. Paul, so much affront to Pelagius, as to renounce this; freely anathematizing that man who by the strength of humane nature, or the doctrine of the Law, shall challenge justification; Unles perhaps some Andradius have privileg to teach, that this Ethica justitia, was enough to justifie and save the old Philosophers.

God the avenger. The sons of wrath.

Morall righteousnesse.

The Evangelicall Justice is not without the intervention of a Saviour; To which claim is laid in two kinds, either as imputative or as inherent; The inherent wrought in us: the imputed wrought for us. How easie were it to lead you through a thicket of distinctions into a large field of controversie, concerning the nature, means, manner of our justification? No head in all Divinity yeelds either more, or more important Problems; In so much as Cardinall De monte, Vice-President for the time of the Councell of Trent, in an Oration made by him in the eleventh session, professes, that when they meant to dispatch their Decree concerning Justification in fifteen daies, it cost them seven moneths to finish, without one daies intermission; and when all is done, they have left the world, which was before (as Pighius ingenuously) intricated by the thorny questions of Schoolmen, rather more unsatisfied and perplexed than they found it. It is the main care of our lives, and deaths, what shall give us peace & acceptation before the dreadfull Tribunall of God: What, but righteousnes? What righteousnes, or whose? Ours, or Christs? Ours, in the inherent graces wrought in us, in the holy works wrought by us; or Christs, in his most perfect obedience, and meritorious satisfaction wrought for us, applied to us? The Tridentine faction is for the former; we are for the latter; God is as direct on our side as his word can make him; Every where blazoning the defects of our own righteousnes, the imperfections of our best Graces, the deadly nature of our least sins; the radicall sinfulnes of our habituall concupiscence, the pollution of our best works: Every where extolling the perfect obedience of our Redeemer, the gracious application of that obedience, the sweet comfort of that application, the assurance and unfailablenes of that comfort: and lastly, our happy rest in that assurance. I instance not; open the book, see where your eyes can look beside these. Satis aperte (saith their Cassander) The Scripture is clear ours; so is all antiquity, if they beleeve that learned Arbiter; so are their more ingenuous Doctors of the last age; so would they all be, if they had grace to know God, themselves, grace, sin, heaven, hell; God perfectly just, themselves miserably weake, Grace sensibly imperfect, sin unmeasurably sinfull; Lastly, if they knew that heaven is for none but the pure, that hell is for the presumptuous. O Saviour, no man is just through thee, but he that is sanctified by thee; What is our inherent justice, but sanctity? That we aspire towards, we attain not to; Woe were us if we were not more just in thee, than sanctified in our selves; we are sanctified, in part, according to the weaknes of our receit; we are justified thorowly, according to the perfection of thine acceptation; were we fully sanctified here, we should be more than men; were we not thorowly justified, we should be no more than sinners before thee; while we stand before thee as sinners, we can have no peace; Let others trust in the Charets & Horses of their own strength, we will remember the name of the Lord our God; The work of thy Justice shall be our Peace.

Peace is a sweet word; Every body would be glad of it, especially Peace at the last, as the Psalmist speaks: how have the politickly-religious held out twigs for the drowning soule to catch at? Due satisfactions, undue supererogations, patronages of saints, bargains of Indulgences, woolward Pilgrimages, and at last (after whips and haire-clothes) leave the dying soule to a feare of Hell, doubt of Heaven, assurance of Purgatory flames; How truly may it now say to these Doctors, as Job to his friends, miserable comforters are ye all: Hearken, O ye deere Christians, to a better voice that sounds from Heaven; Come to me all ye that labor; and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest. Mat. 11. 28.

Is there any of you whose unquiet brest boiles continually with the conscience of any foule sin? whose heart is daily tyr'd upon by the vulture of his secret guiltinesse? whose bosom is gnawed before-hand with that hellish Worm, which can no more give over than die? It boots not to ask thee if thou wouldst have peace. Peace? rather than life; Oh wherewithall shall I come before the Lord, & bow my self before the most high God? Shall I com before him with burnt offerings? Will the Lord be pleased with thousands of Rams, or with ten thousand Rivers of Oyle? Shall I give my first born for my transgression the fruit of my body for the sin of my soul? Heare thou distracted heart; what talkest thou of giving to the owner? The world is his: thou art not thine own; Yea, were these things thine, and not his, yet know, it is not giving, but taking that must procure thy Micah. 6.

Peace: An infinite Juſtice is offended; an infinite Juſtice hath ſatisfied, an infinite mercy hath applied it; Take thou hold by the hand of faith on that infinite mercy & juſtice of thy Saviour; The work of his Juſtice ſhall be thy Peace.

Fly about whither thou wilt, O thou weary Dove, thorow all the wide Regions of the heaven, & waters, thou ſhalt no where find reſt for the ſoles of thy feet, but in this Ark of Chriſts perfect righteouſnes: In vain ſhalt thou ſeek it in ſchooles of morality, in learned Libraries, in ſpatious fields & forreſts, in pleaſant gardens, in ſullen retirednes, in witty converſation, in wanton Theaters, in drunken cellars, in tables of gluttony, in beds of luſt, cheſts of Mammon, whiffs & draughts of intoxication ſongs of ribaldry, ſports of recreation; No no, the more thou ſeekſt it in moſt of theſe, the farther it flies from thee, the farther thou art from finding it; and if theſe things may give ſome poore truce to thy thoughts, it ſhall ſoon end in a more direfull war. There is no peace, ſaith my God, to the wicked: Stray whither thou wilt, O thou wounded heart, thorow the Launds & Woods; alas the ſhaft ſticks ſtill in thee, or if that be ſhaken out, the head; None but the ſoveraign Dittany of thy Saviors Righteouſneſſe can drive it out; and till it be out, thou canſt have no peace. In plain terms; wouldſt thou have peace? None but Chriſt can give it thee; He will give it to none but the penitent, none but the faithfull; Oh ſpend thy ſelf into the ſighs and tears of true repentance; and then raiſe thy humbled ſoule to a lively confidence in thine all-ſufficient Redeemer; ſet thy Lord Jeſus betwixt God & thy ſins; God cannot ſee thy debt, but through thine acquittance; By his ſtripes we are healed, by his wounds, we are ſtanched, by his death we are quickned, by his righteouſnes we are diſcharged. The work of his righteouſnes is our peace. Oh ſafe and bleſſed condition of beleevers; Let ſin, Satan, world, death, hell, do their worſt; Who ſhall lay any thing to the charge of Gods elect? It is God that juſtifieth, who ſhall condemn? It is Chriſt that dyed, yea rather, that is riſen again, who is alſo at the right hand of God, & maketh interceſſion for us: Our enemy is now our Father; our Judge is our Saviour, the offended our ſurety, that precious blood our ranſom, that perfect righteouſnes our everlaſting peace.

Thus much of our ſpirituall Juſtice, and Peace. The Civill follows: I know theſe two are wide terms; Juſtice compriſes all virtue, as Peace all bleſſings; For that is juſt in all kinds, which hath a meet adequation to the rule; All virtue therfore conforming us to the law of God, which is the rule of perfection, challengeth juſtly to it ſelf a ſtile of Juſtice.

Narrower bounds will ſerve our turn: We ſpeak of Juſtice firſt as a ſingle virtue, Habits are diſtinguiſhed by their acts; acts by their objects. The object of all morall virtue is good, as of all intellectuall, is True. The object of this virtue of Juſtice is the good of men in relation to each other; Other virtues order a man in regard to himſelfe; Juſtice in regard to another. This good being either common or privat; common of all, privat of ſome; the acts and virtue of juſtice muſt be ſuteable; either, as man ſtands in an habitude to the whol body, or as he ſtands to ſpeciall Limbs of the body: The former of theſe is that which Philoſophers and Caſuiſts call a legall and univerſall juſtice, The latter is that particular juſtice, which we uſe to diſtinguiſh by Diſtribution and Commutation; the one conſiſting in matter of Commerce, the other in Reward or Puniſhment: both of them according to a meet, though different, equality: An Arithmeticall equality in Commutation; a Geometricall in diſtribution; the former regarding the value or worth of the thing; the latter, regarding the proportionable difference of the perſon. The work of all theſe three juſtices, is Peace.

Frſt, the legall juſtice is the apparant mother and nurſe of publick Peace: When Governors & Subjects are carefull to give each other their own; when both conſpire to command and obey for the common good; when men frame their lives to the wholſom lawes of their Soveraigns, not more out of fear than conſcience; when reſpect to the community caries men from partiall reflection upon themſelves; As contrarily diſtractions and privat ends are the bane of any ſtate. When the head and members unite their thoughts and endevors in the center of the common good; the head to deviſe and command, the eies to ſee, the eare to heare, the palat to taſte, the heart to move, the bellows of the lungs to blow, the liver to ſanguifie, the ſtomack to digeſt, the guts to export, the hands to execute, the tongue to talk for the good of this naturall Common-wealth of the body, all goes well and happily; but if any of theſe parts will be gathering to themſelves, & obſtructions grow within; and mutinous diſtempers ariſe in the humors, ruine is threatned to the whol: If either the Superiors miſcommand, or the inferiors diſobey, it is an affront to Peace. I need not tell you that good lawes are the wals of the City, the ſinews of the Politick-body, the rule of our life, the life of our ſtate, without which men would turne brute, yea monſtrous, the world were a Chaos, yea an hell. It is wiſdom that makes lawes, it is Juſtice that keeps them; Oh let this Juſtice ſtill bleſſe us with a perpetuall peace: as thoſe that do not think the world made for us, but our ſelves made for the world, let us drive at an univerſall good: let there be ever that ſweet correſpondence betwixt Soveraignty and ſubjection, that the one may be happy in the other, both in peace.

Secondly, the diſtributive Juſtice is not leſſe fruitfull of peace; when rewards of honors and gracious reſpects are ſuited to the well-deſerving; when malefactors ſmart according to their crimes; This Juſtice hath ſtocks for the vagrant, whips for harlots brands for petty larzons, ropes for felons, weights for the contumaciouſly ſilent, ſtakes for blaſphemous hereticks, gibbets for murtherers, the hurdle & the knife and the pole for traitors; and upon all theſe engins of Juſtice hangs the garland of peace. It was not for nothing that Maximillia the firſt, paſſing by the gallows, ſaluted it with ſalve Juſtitia. Ye never ſee Juſtice painted without a ſword; when that ſword glitters with uſe, it is wel with the publick; woe be to the Nation where it ruſts. There can be no more acceptable ſacrifice than the blood of the flagitious. Immediatly after Garnets execution, Father David at Ypre, in a publick Sermon declared the miracles ſhown thereat; amongſt the reſt, that a ſpring of oyle brake forth ſuddenly in the place where that Saint was martyred; In ſtead of a lie, let it be a parable; The blood of Traytors ſhed by the ſword of Juſtice, is a well of oyle to fatten, and refreſh the Common-wealth.

I know wel how mercy befits the mouths of Gods Miniſters: The ſoft tongue of a Divine is no meet whetſton for the edge of ſeverity; but withall, I dare ſay, that Juſtice is a noble work of mercy; neither need we wiſh to be more charitable, than the God of mercy that ſaies, Thine eye ſhall not ſpare the murtherer, Numb. 35. 31. The tempter to Idolatry, Deut. 13. 6. The very ſons of Levi were appointed to win an everlaſting bleſſing, by conſecrating their hands to God in Iſraelitiſh blood: The unjuſt favor, and plauſibility of Romiſh Doctors, towards capitall offendors, hath made their Sanctuaries (even literally) a den of theeves, an harbor of vilany. It is memorable of Lewis of France (ſtiled the Saint) that he reverſed a pardon wrought from him to a malefactor, upon reading that verſe in the Pſalm, Beati qui faciunt juſtitiam in omni tempore; Bleſſed are they that doe juſtice at all times: No marvel if one of thoſe foure things which Iſabel of Spain was wont to ſay ſhe loved to ſee, were, A Theef upon the Ladder; Even through his halter might ſhe ſee the proſpect of peace. Woe be to them that eyther for gaine or privat intereſt ingage themſelves in the ſuit of favor to maliciouſly bloody hands; that by the dam of their bribes labor to ſtop the due courſe of punitive Juſtice; theſe, theſe are the enemies of peace; theſe ſtain the land with that Crimſon die that cannot be waſht out but by many wofull lavers of revenge: Farre, far be it from any of you, generous Chriſtians, to endevor either to corrupt, or interrupt the waies of Judgment, or for a privat benefit to croſſe the publike Peace: Woe be to thoſe partiall Judges, that juſtifie the wicked, and condemn the innocent; the girdle of whoſe equity ſags down on that ſide where the purſe hangs: Laſtly, woe to thoſe unworthy ones that raiſe themſelves by fraud, bribes, ſymonie, ſacrilege; therfore are theſe enemies to the State, becauſe to Peace; and therefore enemies to Peace becauſe violaters of juſtice, And the worke of juſtice is Peace.

Pſal. 106. 3.

Thirdly, that commutative Juſtice works Peace, needs no other proofe than that all the reall brables and ſuits amongſt men, ariſe from either true or pretended injuſtice of contracts. Let me leade you in a Terme morning to the ſpacious Hall of Juſtice: What is the cauſe of all that concourſe? that Hive-like murmure? that noiſe at the Bar, but injurious bargains, fraudulent conveyances, falſe titles, diſappoinment of truſts,

A truſts, wrongfull detentions of money, goods, lands, coozenages, oppreſſions, extortions? Could the honeſty and privat Juſtice of men prevent theſe enormities, ſilence and ſolitude would dwell in that wide palace of Juſtice; neither would there be more Pleas then Cob-webs under that vaſt roofe. Every way therfore it is cleere, that the worke of Juſtice is Peace; In ſo much as the Guardians of Peace are called Juſticers.

This for the Commen-wealth; If it pleaſe you to caſt your eyes upon her Siſter the Church, you ſhall find that the outward Peace thereof alſo muſt ariſe from Juſtice. Alas; thence is our hopeleſnes: never may they proſper that love not, that wiſh not Peace within thoſe ſacred walls; but what poſſibility of Peace in the peremptory repulſes of Juſtice; What poſſibility of Juſtice in the long uſurped tyranny of the ſucceſſor of Romulus? Could we hope to ſee Juſtice once ſhine from thoſe ſeven hils, we would make account of peace; but oh, the miſerable injuſtice of that imperious Sea; Injuſtice of claime, injuſtice of practice. Of claime, over Kings, Church, Scriptures, Conſcience: Over Kings; there is S. Pauls ſuperexalted (ὑπερυψωμένος) His uſuall title is Orbis Dominus; Dominus univerſorum in the mouths and pens of his flatterers: And leaſt Princes ſhould ſeeme exempted; he is Rex Regum, as Paulus 4. ſayes of himſelf; He is ſuper Imperatores & Reges, ſaith their Antonius, Triumphus Capiſtranus, and who not? How much? you know the calculation of the magnitude of the two great lights: How over them? As the maſter over the ſervant; they are the words of their Pope Nicholas; The imperiall throne is unde niſi à nobis, ſaith Pope Adrian: What ſhould I tell you of his bridle, ſtirrop, toe, cup, canopy? Let the booke of holy Ceremonies ſay the reſt; Theſe things are ſtale, The world hath long C ſeene and bluſhed.

Lord of the World.

Over Emperors and Kings.

Whence but from us.

Over the Church; There is challenged a proper head-ſhip, from whom all influences of life, ſenſe, motion come; as their Bozius: why ſaid I over? He is under the Church: For he is the foundation of the Church, ſaith Bellarmine; Over, as the head, under as the foundation? What can Chriſt be more? Thence, where are generall councels but under him, as the ſtreame of Jeſuites; Who but he is regula fidei, as their Andradius: he alone hath infallibility and indefectibility, whether in decretis fidei, or in præceptis morum, as Bellarmine. He hath power to make new Creeds, and to obtrude them to the Church; the deniall whereof was one of thoſe Articles which Leo the tenth condemned in Luther.

In Decrees of faith or precepts of manners.

D Over Scriptures. There is claimed a power to authorize them for ſuch; A power to interpret them, ſententialiter & Obligatorie, being ſuch; A power to diſpenſe with them, ex cauſa, though ſuch. Over the conſciences of men; In diſpenſing with their oathes, in allowance of their ſins. It is one head of their Canon Law, A Juramento fidelitatis abſolvit. Decret. p. 2. Cauſ. 15, qu. 6. And in every oath is underſtood a reſervation and exception of the Popes power, ſay his Paraſites.

He abſolves from the Oath of Allegeance.

I am aſhamed to tell, and you would bluſh to heare, the diſpenſation reported to be granted by Sixtus 4. to the family of the Cardinall of S. Lucie; and by Alexander 6. to Peter Mendoza Cardinall of Valentia.

And as there is horrible injuſtice in theſe claims; ſo is there no leſſe in practice. Take a taſte of all: What can be more unjuſt then to caſt out of the lap of the E Church thoſe that oppoſe their novelties, to condemn them to the ſtake, to hell for Hereticks? What more unjuſt then to falſifie the writings of ancient or modern Authors by ſecret expurgations, by wilfull miſ-editions? What more unjuſt than the withholding the remedy of generall Councels, and tranſacting all the affaires of the Church by a pack't conclave; What more unjuſt than the ſuppreſſion of the Scriptures, and mutilation of the Sacrament to the Laity? What more unjuſt than allowance of equivocation, than upholding a faction by willing falſhood of rumors, than plotting the ſubverſion of King and State, by unnaturall conſpiracies? Well may we call heaven and earth to record againſt the unjuſtice of theſe claimes, of theſe practiſes. What then? Is it to hope for peace, notwithſtanding the continuance of all theſe? So the worke of injuſtice ſhall be Peace: And an unjuſt and unſound Peace muſt needs be that ariſes from injuſtice; Is it to hope they will abandon theſe things for for Peace? Oh that the Church of God might once be ſo happy: That there were A but any life in that poſſibility; In the meane time, let God and his holy Angels witnes betwixt us, that on their part the Peace faileth; we are guiltleſſe: VVhat have we done? VVhat have we attempted? VVhat have we innovated? Only we have ſtood upon a juſt and modeſt negative, and have unjuſtly ſuffered. Oh that all the innocent blood we have ſhed could waſh their hands from injuſtice, from enmitie to Peace.

The like diſcourſe to this ye ſhall finde in Contra. Schluſſelburgius in his preface to his 13 book Catal. Hæret.

That from them we may return to our ſelves; for the publick, we enjoy an happy Peace; Bleſſed be God for Juſtice: and if in this common harmony of Peace, there be found ſome privat jarres of diſcord, whence is it but from our own injuſtice? The world is of another minde; whoſe wont is to cenſure him that puniſhes the fault, not him that makes it; Severity, not guiltineſſe in common opinion, breakes the B
Peace: Let the queſtion be who is the great make-bate of the world; begin with the family: who troubles the houſe? Not unruly, headſtrong, debaucht children, that are ready to throw the houſe out of the windowes, but the auſtere father, that reproves, that corrects them; would he winke at their diſorders, all would be quiet. Not careleſſe, ſlothfull, falſe, lime-fingred ſervants, but the ſtrict maſter, that obſerves and rates and chaſtiſes them; would he hold his hands, and tongue, there would be peace.

Not the peeviſh and turbulent wife, who forgetting the rib, uſurps upon the head, but the reſolute huſband, that hates to leeſe his authority in his love; remembring that though the rib be neere the heart, yet the head is above the ſhoulders; Would he fall from the termes of his honor, there would be peace. C

In the country, not the oppreſſing Gentleman, that tyrannizes over his cottagers, incroaches upon his neighbors inheritance, incloſes commons, depopulates villages, ſcruzes his Tenants to death, but the poore ſoules that when they are cruſhed, yeeld the juyce of teares, exhibit bills of complaint, throw open the new thornes, maintain the old mounds, would theſe men be content to be quietly racked and ſpoyled, there would be peace.

In the City; not the impure Sodomitiſh brothels, that ſell themſelves to work wickedneſs; nor the abominable Pandars, not the jugling Cheater, not the Counterfeit Vagrant, but the Marſhall that drawes theſe to correction; not the dece itfull Merchant that ſophiſticates his commodities, inhanceth prices, ſels every inch of (what he cannot warrant) Time; not the unconſcionable and fraudulent Artiſan, but the D Promoter and the Bench.

In the common-wealth; not the cruel robber by ſea or land, that lies in the way like a ſpider in a window, for a booty, for blood: Not the bold night-walker that keeps ſavage houres fit for the guilty intentions of his burglaries, but the watch that takes him; Not the rank adulterer that neighs after his neighbors wife, and thirſts after only ſtoln waters, but the ſworn men that preſent him; Not the trayterous Coyner, that in every ſtamp reads his own conviction, whiles he ſtill renews that face againſt which he offends, but the Sheriffe that attaches him.

Not the unreformable drunkard, that makes a God of his liquor, a beaſt of himſelf, and raves, and ſwaggers in his cups, but the Conſtable that puniſhes him; would theſe E
Officers connive at all theſe vilanies, there would be peace.

In the Church, not the chaffering Patron, or per jur'd Chaplain; not the ſeducing heretick, or ſeditious ſchiſmatick; not the ſcandalous Levite, not the careles Queſtman, not the corrupt Officiall, but the clamorous Preacher, or the rigorous High-Commiſſion. In the world; laſtly, Not the ambitious incrochers upon others dominions, not violaters of leagues, not uſurpers of miſ-gotten titles and dignities, not ſuborners, or abettors of conſpiracies, and traytors, but the unkind patients that will not recipere ferrum: I wis the great potentates of the world might ſee a ready way to peace.

Thus in family, countrey, city, common-wealth, church, world, the greateſt part ſeek a licencious peace in a diſordered lawleſneſſe; condemning true juſtice of cruelty, ſtripping her of the honor of peace, branding her with the cenſure of troubleſome.

A ſom. Fooliſh men ſpeak fooliſh things: O noble and incomparable bleſſing of Peace, how injuriouſly art thou aſcribed to unjuſt neglect? Oh divine virtue of juſtice, how deſervedly have the Ancients given thee wings, and ſent thee up to heaven in a deteſtation of theſe earthly indignities; whence thou commeſt not down at all, unleſſe it pleaſe that eſſentiall and infinite juſtice to communicate thee to ſome choyce favorites. It is but a juſt word, that this Iland hath been long approved the darling of heaven; We have enjoyed Peace, to the admiration, to the envy of neighbourhood: Would we continue it? would we traduce it to ours? Juſtice muſt doe it for us. Both Juſtice and Peace, are from the throne; Peace is the Kings peace; and juſtly deſcends from Soveraignty by commiſſion; let me have leave to ſay with the princely Prophet (a word that was too good for the frequent text of a Pope) Diligite juſtitiam qui judicatis terram. Still, O God, give thy judgment to the King, & thy ju-
B ſtice to the kings ſon. And if any ſhall offer wrong to the Lords anointed in his perſon, in his ſeed, the work of that injuſtice ſhall be war; yea Bellum Domini, the Lords war (2 Sam. 25.28.) Then let him who is both the Lord of Hoſts, and the God of Peace, riſe up mightily for his anointed, the true king of Peace; that he who hath graciouſly ſaid all this while, Da pacem Domine, Give Peace in our time, O Lord; may ſuperſcribe at the laſt his juſt Trophees, with, Bleſſed be the Lord which teacheth my hands to warre, and my fingers to fight.

Ye have heard of the ſpirituall Juſtice and Peace; Ye have heard of the Civill; may it pleaſe you to mix both of them together: My text alone doeh it; if you doe but with our moſt accurat Tranſlation, read Righteouſnes for Juſtice; So ſhall you ſee the ſpirituall diſpoſition of Righteouſnes produce the civill effect of Peace: What
C is righteouſnes, but the ſincere uprightnes of the heart to God in all our waies? He is perfect with God, that would be ſo.

What need I tel you that this is the way to true inward Peace, Nil conſcire, A cleer heart will be a quiet one. There is no feaſt to a good conſcience, this is meat, muſick, welcom: Is ſeems harder that true ſpirituall honeſty ſhould procure even outward peace: Heare wiſe Salomon: By the bleſſing of the upright, the city is exalted, Pro. 11.11. When a mans waies pleaſe the Lord, He maketh even his enemies to be at peace with him Pr. 16.7. Righteouſnes exalteth a nation, but ſin is a reproach to any people. Pr. 14.24. It follows then as a juſt corollary, That the honeſteſt, & conſcionableſt man is the beſt ſubjett: He may perhaps be plain, perhaps poor, perhaps weak, but the ſtate is more be-
D holden to his integrity, than to the ableſt purſe, than to the ſtrongeſt arm; Whereas the graceles and vicious perſon, let him be never ſo plauſible a talker, never ſo careful an Officer, never ſo valiant a Leader, never ſo officious a Courtier, never ſo deep in ſubſidies, never ſo forward in actions, is no other than an enemy to the ſtate, which he profeſſes to adore.

Let no Philoſopher tell me of, malus vir bonus civis: I ſay from better authority that a lewd man can no more be a good ſubject, than an ill ſubject can be a good man; Heare this then (whereſoever ye are) ye ſecret oppreſſors, ye prophane ſcoffers, ye foule mouth'd ſwearers, ye cloſe adulterers, ye kind drunkards, and who ever come within this black liſt of wickednes, how can ye be loyall, whiles you lodg traytors in your boſoms? Proteſt what ye will; your ſins break the peace, and conſpire againſt
E the ſacred Crown and dignity of your Soveraign; What care wee that you draw your ſword, and vow your blood, and drink your healths to your Gouernors, when in the meane while you provoke God to anger, and ſet quarels betwixt your Country and Heaven.

That I may winde up this clew; It were folly to commend to you the worth of peace: we know that the excellency of Princes is expreſſed by ſerenity; what good hath the earth which God doth not couch under the name of Peace? Bleſſed be God, and his Anointed, we have long and comfortably taſted the ſweetnes of his bleſſing, the Lillies and Lions of our Salomon have been juſtly worded with Beati pacifici: Would we have this happines perpetuated to us, to poſterity? Oh let Prince and people meete in the ambition to be Gens juſta, a righteous nation, righteous every way: Firſt, let God have his own; his own daies, his own ſervices, his feare, his love,

Not to be guilty of ill.

An ill man a good ſubject.

love, his all : Let Religion leade all our prc jects, not follow them : Let our lives be led in a conſcionable obedience to all the Lawes of our maker : Farre be all blaſphemies, curſes and obſcenities from our tongues, all outrages and violences from our hands, all preſumptuous and rebellious thoughts from our hearts. Let our hearts, and hands, tongues, lives, bodies and ſoules, be ſincerely devoted to him. Then, for men : Let us give Cæſar his own; Tribute, feare, ſubjection, loyaltie, and (if hee need) our lives : Let the Nobilitie have honor, obeiſance, obſervation : Let the Clergy have their dues, and our reverence : Let the commons have truth, love, fidelity in all their transactions : Let there be trutinæ juſtæ, ponderа juſta : Let there be no grinding of faces, no trampling on the poore (Amos 5.11.) no ſwallowing of widdowes houſes, no force, no fraud, no perjury, no perfidiouſnes.

Levit.19.36. Juſt balances, juſt weights.

Finally, for our ſelves, let every man poſſeſſe his veſſel in holineſſe and honour: framing himſelfe to all Chriſtian and heavenly temper, in all wiſdom, ſobriety, chaſtity, meeknes, conſtancy, moderation, patience and ſweet contentation : ſo ſhall the work of our righteouſnes be peace of heart, peace of ſtate; privat and publique peace : Peace with our ſelves, peace with ths world, peace with God; temporall Peace here, eternall peace and glory above, unto the fruition whereof, he who hath ordained us, mercifully bring us, for the ſake of him who is the Prince of Peace, JESUS CHRIST the Righteous.

SERMON PREACHED

In Latine, in the Convocation held in Saint Paul's Church, To the Clergy of ENGLAND, And especially that of the Province of Canterburie.

By JOS. HALL, D. of Divinity, and Deane of WORCESTER.

TO THE RIGHT HONOURABLE MY SINGULAR GOOD LORD,

EDWARD Lord DENNY, Baron of Waltham, all health and Happineſſe.

Right Honorable,

I Might well perceive by the Author that this Sermon was never intended to be publiſhed in any other language than that wherein it was firſt ſpoken: being in reſpect of the matter, in a ſort appropriat to that Auditory wherein it was delivered; But beſides the common deſire of many, finding the tranſlation attempted by divers, and performed by ſome in ſuch a manner as did not altogether ſatisfie; It pleaſed my Father herein to improve my leiſure; wherein, howſoever I may have ſomewhat failed of the firſt elegancy, yet I have not been far ſhort of the ſenſe. I have preſumed to dedicate the ſame to your Lordſhip, in reſpect of your many favors, and my obligations, for which (beſides this officious, though unequall requitall) I ſhall ſtill vow my prayers for your Lordſhip, and remaine,

Your Lordſhips moſt

humbly devoted,

YEe are here met (which I humbly wiſh, may prove every way proſperous, and happy to the Church of God) moſt Reverend Father in God, Reverend Biſhops, venerable Deanes, Archdeacons, Brethren of the Clergie, by the providence of our good God, and the command of our gracious Soveraigne, to hold an holy Convocation this day.

Bleſſed Paul, in whoſe name this ancient pile doth not a little pride it ſelfe, ſalutes you by my unworthy tongue, and as if he were preſent, addreſſes himſelfe to you, and exhorts you

In his former Epiſtle to the Corithians, the 12 Chapter, verſe 4.

There are diverſities of gifts, but the ſame Spirit; there are diverſities of miniſteries, but the ſame Lord, and there are diverſities of operations, but the ſame God, &c.

SEE I beſeech you, the meet correſpondence of all things. Ye are met in one, and here is unity; Ye are many of you met from the utmoſt parts of this large Province, and here is manifold diverſity; ye are met the floure of our Engliſh Clergie, learned and exquiſite Divines, and here are diverſities of gifts; Ye are met, the Lords and Commons of our ſacred function, and here are diverſities of miniſteries; Ye are met for the holy affaires of the Church, and here are operations: Ye are met (as I verily hope, and wiſh) in unity of Spirit, and here is one Spirit; Ye are laſtly met to conſecrate your ſelves, your gifts, miniſteries, operations, to the ſervice of our Lord God; and here is that Lord, that God whom we profeſſe to ſerve.

Now that ſame God, that ſame Lord Jeſus Chriſt, that ſame holy Spirit, be preſent with us all this day; and by his bleſſed influences guide and govern this ſacred meeting, and hapily direct all our councels and endevours to the glory of his own great name, the ſalvation of our ſoules, and the aſſured edification of his Church, through Jeſus Chirſt.

See here then, Honored Prelates, and beloved Brethren, the loope or combination of both worlds; Both the worlds of our Divinity; The greater world, God; the leſſer world, Man; What is there that can ſo much concern us to know, to behold? Will ye look up to God? He is one in eſſence (ἐν οὐσίᾳ) Three in Perſon, the Father, Lord, Spirit. He is three in one, and one in three; The Father Lord, Spirit, one and the ſame God.

Will ye caſt your eyes to Man? ye ſhall ſee him not ſingle, but branched into infinite diverſitie; not bare and naked, but furniſhed with gifts: not ſuperfluous, but deſtin'd to due ſervices: not idle, but buſie in meet operations: Neither are theſe operations, ſervices, gifts, all of one kind, but diverſly diſtinguiſhed and varied: And whence are theſe ſo manifold graces ſo divers imployments, but from one God, the Father, Lord, Spirit? And wherefore are all theſe, but that theſe operations, miniſteries, gifts, proceeding from one God, Lord, Spirit, may be directed to one, and may end as they began, in a perfect unity?

O marvelous conjunction of divine and humane things! O unutterable communion of heaven and earth: Wherein is laid forth unto us the intire reſpects and union of God to himſelfe by conſubſtantiality, of God to man by munificence, of man to God by the bond of thankfulnes, of men to each other by the bond of charity, of gifts to miniſteries, of miniſteries to operations, of all to all.

I ſhall not now need, neither indeed would it befit me, in ſo awfull an aſſembly of Divines to dwell upon Catecheticall points, concerning the miſtery of the ſacred Trinitie; although this labor is well worthy of you elſewhere, my brethren, and ſuch as (if I may perſwade you) you ſhall carefully beſtow at home; This familiar kind of teaching the word of the beginnings of Chriſt is grown out of fashion; Like ambitious Orators, wee overlook this popular ſtrain, and are carried to an affectation of perfection. You ſee how the Heron can ſoare high, yet lives, for the moſt part, in the loweſt valley; builds in the talleſt trees, yet feeds in the humble mariſhes: So doe ye, my deere fellow laborers, not ſo much caring to ſhew your ſelves learned, as to make your people ſo.

This by the way. Such as God is, ſuch he expreſſes himſelf to us; and ſuch as he expreſſes himſelfe to us, ſuch he formes us to himſelfe: As the Sun looking upon a cloud fitly diſpoſed, for that purpoſe, imprints in that moiſt glaſſe a certain bright Image of himſelf; ſo doth God to his Church: From that Celeſtiall and divine Trinity, therfore, is here apparently deduced another Trinity, ſublunary and humane; Of gifts, miniſteries, operations: From the ſpirit are derived gifts; miniſteries from the Son, operations from the Father: There are diverſities of gifts, but the ſame ſpirit; of miniſteries, but the ſame Lord; of operation, but the ſame God.

Away with all niceties of Pythagorean calculations; All numbers are alike to me, ſave thoſe which God himſelf hath chalked out unto us, as here he hath manifeſtly done. In one word, an Unity and a Trinity make up this golden ſentence. There is a Trinity in this Unity, There is an Unity in this Trinity: Firſt, here is a perfect (that is, a Triple) Trinity; a Trinity of diverſities, a Trinity of faculties, a Trinity of givers; for there are ſo many diverſities as faculties, and ſo many faculties as givers: The faculties are three; gifts, miniſteries, operations: The givers three, The Father, the Son, the Spirit, which all are included in one Unitie (τῆς αὐτοῦ) the ſame God; And yet even that Unity hath his diſtinction, whiles gifts are (as it were) by a ſpecialty aſcribed to the Spirit, miniſteries to the Son, to the Father operations.

That our diſcourſe may not ſeem too perplexed, we will follow the foot-ſteps of the Apoſtle, and with all poſſible perſpicuity, will apply the diverſities to the faculties, the faculties to the givers; Theſe Trinities to their Unitie, and (this done) draw to a briefe concluſion.

A threefold Diverſity argues multiplicity; What meant the Ancients to dreame but of three Graces? there are a thouſand graces, gifts infinite: Look upon all the grand-children of Adam, that ever were; amongſt ſo many thouſand millions of faces ye ſhall eaſily obſerve ſome variety of favors: It is a wonder to ſee what diverſity of formes there is, in that which we call beauty: No twins are ſo like as not to bewray ſome diſſimilitude: Certainly there is not ſo great variety of faces, as of mindes: As features are to the countenance, ſo are gifts to the mind; Each one hath ſome, all have many, none have all. There are diverſities of gifts.

Salmeron, with Cajetan, underſtands here thoſe gifts which we call Gratias gratis datas, Graces freely given; wherin he ſaies true, but not enough: For as the old word is, Favors muſt be enlarged; and thoſe gifts which make us gracious are beſt worthy

A thy of this name; It is not amiſſe that Hugo reckons up three ſorts of Gods gifts to man: Gifts of nature, of grace, of glory: By the gifts of nature we are men, by the gifts of grace we are holy, by the gifts of glory we ſhall be bleſſed. The gifts of nature are memory, reaſon, will, wherein we excell the brute creatures; The gifts of grace are faith, hope, charity, wherin we goe beyond the Devils. The gifts of glory, eternall and true bleſſednesſe; bleſſed and eternall truth, true and bleſſed eternity, wherein we are equall to the Angels: Amongſt the gifts of nature the ſame Author reckons ſome to be of the loweſt ranke, ſome of the meane, ſome of the higheſt: In the loweſt, he accounts beauty and health of body: In the meane he accounts the faculties of the minde: In the higheſt the virtues of the ſoule; Thus there are diverſities of gifts.

B There are ſome gifts of Regeneration; there are ſome gifts of our calling: by the former we are borne againe for our own good; with the latter we are furniſhed, for the good of others: Theſe latter are peculiarly beſtowed upon ſeverall men, the former are by a certain common propriety beſtowed upon all the Saints of God; For, as in the moſt wiſe diſpoſition of this univerſe, the beſt things, and thoſe which are neceſſary for the ſuſtentation of life, as ayre, light, fire, water, are abundantly given to all, but thoſe things which ſerve only for ornament and pleaſure, as Gold, Pearle, Precious-ſtones, are more ſparingly beſtowed upon ſome few; ſo every ſaving grace is abundantly diſpenſed to all Saints, by the liberall hand of God; Whereas tongues, prophecy, power of miracles, as alſo eloquence, ſkill, honor, and the reſt of this kind, are reſerved only for ſom few receivers; And in all theſe what ſtrange diverſity there is? They differ in reſpect of themſelves, being in nature divers from each other:

C They differ in reſpect of the Subject, as being diverſly given to one, and other; for as the blind Bard ſaw truly, God doth not give all to all; They differ in reſpect of degree, as they are more given to one, than to other. Thus every way There are diverſities of gifts.

It is the common voice of nature, that the ſame remayning the ſame cannot produce but the ſame; but, when we ſpeak of the God of Nature; that word of Bonaventure is more true: Ab uniſſimo Deo manant multiforma; ab æterno temporalia: From that moſt one God flowes multiformity of effects, and from that eternall God, temporall effects. Hugo ſaid well, In te variatur, qui in ſe non mutatur, he is varied in thee who is not changed in himſelf: If the divine power had made only one creature, that

D alonly work of his had been worthy of a God, and ſuch as could proceed from no les than an omnipotent hand; But now he hath created many things, yea innumerable; If God had made theſe many creatures altogether uniform and like themſelves; only diſtinguiſhed in number, not in form; the work had been more excellent and admirable, than the frame of any one creature alone; but nôw, that he hath made theſe many, theſe innumerable creatures, no leſſe different from themſelves, and ſo, as that the difference of their forms ſtrives with the praiſe of their number: O the depth of divine wiſdom! O the ſtupendious workmanſhip of omnipotency! And yet there is no Subject wherein the power and providence of the Almighty doth ſo much magnifie it ſelf as in the divers Oeconomy of man; In ſo much as in this little world, there is a world of diverſities; Marvell at your ſelves, brethren, and be aſtoniſhed at your

E owne proſpects: Whether we looke at the faſhion of the face, or the proportion of parts, or the colour of the ſkin, or the ſtature of the body, or the indowments of the minde, the degrees of faculties, the diſpoſition of nature, the meaſure of graces, the oportunities of ſtations, or laſtly the outward condition of our life; O good God what wondrous diverſitie is here; how impoſſible is it for the eye to meete twiſe with the like object, whitherſoever it roveth? Thus there are diverſities of gifts.

Away now from hence with all haughtines of pride, all mutinies of envy; Theſe two dangers will be ſure to haunt the moſt juſt inequality; the needy is envious, the rich is proud.

Poore I am contemned, others are ſet up; others ſhine in ſcarlet, and purple, whiles I am patching of naſty rags, others wallow in their wealth and exceſſe, I famiſh for hunger; others Lord it in lofty ſeats, I am trod under their foot-ſtooles; Others are eloquent, I am a ſtammerer: Others excell in the ſkill of Arts and Tongues, I am a ſilly ignorant, And why ſhould not I? Oh foole, theſe that thou talkeſt of, are gifts, and therfore freely beſtowed where it pleaſes the giver; What doth he owe to thee, that hath given theſe things to others? Withall, know, there are diverſities of gifts, God hath perhaps denied thee heapes of red and white earth; but he hath given thee ſtrength of body; At how high a rate would the great ones of the world buy that bleſſing of thine? He hath denied thee eloquence, he hath yet given thee ſharpnes of wit; he hath denied thee honor, but he hath given thee ſweet reſt, quiet ſecurity; he hath denied thee preferment, he hath not denied thee health. Goe then, and envie the great mans weake ſtomack, ſleeples nights, racks of cares; envy, to him, if thou canſt, the ſlippery ſtaires of the Court, and the common envy of the moſt; He wants ſomthing that thou enjoyeſt, and ſomthing he hath which is denied thee: He had rather make choice of thy condition, thou of his: Each of you hath his own, neither of you ſhall have all; Neither ſhall have both: There are diverſities of gifts.

Yea, and we new-blown bladders, how eaſily are we puft up with every blaſt of gifts; I am not like other men, How baſe are the vulgar of men? I ſit glorioufly impurpled, other fellows may be glad to lick the duſt of my foot ſtoole; I am enriched with all liberall ſciences, this people which know not the Law, are accurſed; I have ſkill of tongues, others are rude Idiots; I leade the amazed hearers by the eares whither I liſt, through the power of my oratory, others freeze and languiſh in their Pulpits. Heare, O thou proud man, Theſe things whereof thou braggeſt, are not thine own; what haſt thou that thou haſt not received? All theſe are gifts; And art thou thus happy alone? Vain boaſter, thou knoweſt not others, thou knoweſt not thy ſelf; There are diverſities of gifts which thy thoughts reach not unto: Sit thou aloft, and cheer thy ſelf with the bowed knees of thy ſuppliants, they are happier men than thy ſelf that are glad to lie cloſe, and affect a quiet and ſafe obſcurity: Be thou more learned than another, that other perhaps is wiſer than thou: be thou more eloquent than another man, that other is perhaps more juditious: if thy tongue be richer than anothers, his mind is richer than thine.

It is reported, that in the houſe of worthy M. Luther was found written, Res & verba Philippus, Res ſine verbis Lutherus, Verba ſine re Eraſmus: Melanchon was words and matter: Luther, matter without words: Eraſmus, words without matter: Every one hath his own ſhare: Neither art thou furniſhed with all gifts; nor that other with none: Let not him envie thee, neither doe thou contemn him; Rather both apply your ſelves to caſt in the ſhot of your contributions to the publique good: For to what end hath our bountifull God ſhowred down theſe divers kinds of gifts from heaven upon man, but that he might hereby provide for the common profit & welfare of mankind?

Why hath the blinde man legs, and the lame man eyes, but that the one may exchange with the other, for the benefit of both? Thinkeſt thou that God meant to heape his gifts upon thee for thine own ſake only? Fie on this ſhamefull ſelfe-love: Surely he that made thee, made thee for a conduit-pipe to convay, not a Ciſterne to hold the water of his graces. God hath cloathed you (as ye well know, Reverend Prelates) with this ſacred purple, that you ſhould ſhine before others as conſpicuous Guides of that ſtrait and hard way of life, and that by your well beſtowed honours you ſhould credit his Church, and be the ſervants of many.

Ye perceive now, I imagin, how nuexpectedly my ſpeech is glided from Gifts to Miniſteries: The author of theſe Gifts, the ſpirit of God, leads me by S. Pauls hand; who preſently upon the mention of gifts, ſubjoynes miniſteries, and upon the mention of miniſteries, ads operations. This moſt munificent Spirit (τὸ πνεῦμα) (that with Athanaſius we may note the force of the Article) hath enabled the moſt of you, Fathers & brethren, with an eminent meaſure of gifts: With what powers of the mind, what ſingular learning, what powerfull eloquence, with how great wiſdom, with what gravity, with what titles of honor, with what large dignities? It is a great word that I ſhall ſpeak, and yet I muſt, and will ſay it, without all, either arogance or flattery;

A tery; Stupor mundi Clerus Britannicus : The wonder of the world is the Clergie of Britain. So many learned Divines, so many eloquent Preachers shal in vain be sought elsewhere this day, in whatever region under the cope of heaven; What should I reckon up those great lights of our Church, not long since set; Juels, Humfreys, Foxes Whitgifts, Fulkes, Whitakers, Raynolds, Bilsons, Greenams, Babingtons, Eedeses, Hollands, Playfers, Abbotses, Perkinses, Feilds, Hookers, Overalls, Willets, Whites, Masons? There are now of you under this very roofe, that heare me this day, in whose just praises I could be content to spend not an houre, but a life, were it not that mutuall modesty injoynes me silence: How great soever yee are, yee are not your own; All these gifts end in services. Oh let it please you to stir up this grace of God in you; and faithfully to imploy all these your gifts to the happy advancement of your ministeries; in the practice of your life, (as in the course of my speech) Let the Diversities of B gifts be taken up with the Diversities of ministeries.

There are then as differences of gifts, so of ministeries; And which be they? differences in Offices, and in degrees; There were Apostles, Prophets, Evangelists; There are, were, shall be Bishops, Presbyters, Deacons; These are more than one ranke of Ministers; It was part of the exploded heresie of Erius that tooke away these three steps of the Clergie, as the Synod of Carthage calls them. Yea, and somewhere, Jerome himself smarts with the lash of this censure, as if perhaps he did more favour of Ærius, than of Tully; Not without open wrong in both; but I may not now stay upon needlesse Apologies; There is none of you, I hope, can be so witlesse as to question these diversities of Ministeries; Did they ever reade Histories that D doubt of this point? Sure, they have never so much as seen them: Turne over all C the monuments of Times, and places, so farre as ever Christendome hath spred it selfe, you shall finde nothing more evident; I will not here stand to abridge the Annalls of all Ages, and Regions; Look upon the Councels; and first of all, the first and chiefe of those which are stiled Generall, the great Councell of Nice, You shall there see three hundred and eighteen Bishops, so many as Abraham had souldiers in the victory over the Kings, as Ambrose wittily alludeth. But perhaps they were then but newly instituted, newly received in the Church; No such matter; Those Fathers professe it to be (ἀρχαῖον ἔθος) the ancient guise, that the Bishop of Alexandria should be over Ægypt, Libya, Pentapolis, as the Bishop of Rome was over his Suburbicary Churches: Do but hear Policrates Bishop of Ephesus, an old man of above threescore D solemnly protesting that he succeeded his grand-fathers, and great-grand-fathers, for seven successive generations, in the same Episcopall chaire. Heare but Irenæus, Tertullian, Clement, Dorotheus, Eusebius, describing & recording the Bishops of Antioch Alexandria, Hierusalem, Rome, in the undoubted order of their successions, not onely by their numbers, but by their names also. Certainly, never day lookt forth since the age of the Apostles, wherein the Spouse of Christ wanted the attendance of these Bride-men: But what doe I urge this? The Sunne is in heaven, and shines there: Even Jerome himselfe, though but a Presbyter, and a stout Champion of his own order, yet deduceth this difference of degrees from the cradle of the first Schisme, from the common degree of the first Church, from tradition Apostolicall; yea, when St. Paul wrote this to his Corinthians, that jarring word had sounded in the Church, I am E Pauls, I am Apolloes, I am Cephaes, and therefore even then had these differences been.

Differences perhaps in Order you will say, not in Degree; Yes, both in Order, and in Power, too; There were those whom S. Paul calls (προϊσταμένους καὶ ἡγουμένους) Presidents and Rulers, I whom Ignatius calls (ἡγεμόνας) Governours; Dionysius Hierarchs; Cyprian, Overseers; to whom Saint Paul attributes Power of reformation and correction; to whom the Canons of the Apostles give the power of sententc or constitution; Ignatius, chiefety and authority; Eusebius, out of Egesippus, the throne of Episcopality; Cyprian, the vigor and authority of the chaire; Origen, the highest pitch of the Church; Jerom, a peerlesse and eminent power; The Councell of Sardis, the height of government; and lastly, Epiphanius an order generative of Fathers. But what doe I gleaning after the harvest of so great Authors as have discussed this point?

ἐπισκόπους καὶ πρεσβυτέρους, ἀρχιερέας καὶ ἱερεῖς.

Oh how oft, and with what deep sighes hath this most flourishing and happy Church

Church of England wisht, that she might with some of her owne blood have purchased unto her deerest Sisters abroad, the retention of this most ancient, and every way best forme of government; Which might happily also have taken place, if they had met with such a Monarchicall reformation, as (through the blessing of God) was designed unto us; Now they are faine to undergoe that administration, Provisionally onely (if we may beleeve wise and learned Fregevil) which the necessity of their condition doth for the time cast upon them: The God of heaven raise them up Queenes for their nurses, and Kings for their nursing-fathers, that they may once enjoy with us this happy blessing of the sequence and subordination of degrees; In the meane time I dare with Ignatius professe to put my soule (ἀντίψυχον &c.) in pawn for the safe observation of this excellent order; Which, if it have ever not happily succeeded to any region, or Church, it is the fault of the person, not of the institution it selfe, which cannot justly be deemed other, than wholsome, holy, divine.

But remember, I beseech you, in the meane while, (Reverend Fathers) that these are διακονίαι) ministeries; a word taked out of the very dust, lest it should not imply humility enough; Yee are graced with honors by the pious munificence of Princes, But our Lord Jesus Christ (ye know) uses to measure your honors by your services; Yee are Fathers of the Church, but Sons of the Bride-chamber; Peeres of the state, but servants of the Church; Generalls of this warfare, but with S. Paul fellow-souldiers; Rulers in Gods house, but withall, fellow-servants; Intreat your Clergie kindly, use them familiarly, as knowing your selves to be Fathers in dignity, brethren in service; Yee know the Counsell of Saint Ambrose; Let those of the Clergie, within your charge, be as limmes of your owne body: God hath called you starres and Angels; Imitate ye the starres, which the higher they are, the lesser they are wont to appeare; Imitate ye the Angels, who though Peers of heaven, yet are wont to approve themselves ministring spirits for the poorest of Gods Saints; No spectacle can be more odious than a proud Prelate.

But heare me also, O ye Laicks, take heed of contemning this sacred function: These are ministeries indeed, but glorious and honourable: To serve God, is to rule and command; And what is it even to serve you? Surely those heavenly spirits, those principalities and powers doe the very same to us continually; whom yet their love and service, hath never drawn into contempt; We beseech you brethren, that you know them which labor amongst you, and are over you in the Lord, and admonish you, and hold them deare for their works sake.

We have dispatched the Diversities of Ministeries: now follows that of Operations; God hath not ordained to himselfe ildle sereices, but busie and painfull; One governs, another teaches, a third doth both teach and governe, worthy therefore of double honour, for his rule, for his labor. And he that governs, sometimes must strike with the rod, sometimes with the sword; One while he must kindly allure, another while he must sharply punish; he must uphold the falling, retaine the wavering, reduce the wandering; And for him that teaches, it is not onely the charge of doctrine that lies upon him, but of reproof, of correction, of instruction in righteousnes. One while he directs with counsels, then he erects with promises; than again he dejects with threatnings, he wounds the whole, salves the wounded, workes alwaies: The office of a Bishop is (καλὸν ἔργον) a worthy worke; Whosoever playes in this holy Chaire, shall once waile in hell: Saint Bernard said well in that famous Epistle of his, to Henricus Senonensis; Many would not so eagerly run to honors, if they could thinke them burdens; Certainly they would feare to be crushed with this weight, neither would with so much paine and perill gape for every promotion; Thus he. But will it please you withall, to heare what that pious Censor casts in the teeth of his owne time; Sola attenditur gloria, & non pœna; Curritur in clero passim, &c. The dignity only is cared for, not the duty; Men of all ages and ranks in the Clergie, learned and unlearned, runne to spirituall Cures, as if they might live for ever, Sine curis, when once they have gotten Cures of soules; Doe you marke well this Prophecie (for such it might seeme) of the Oracle of Clarevall? would

A Would to God this were not the very diſeaſe of our times. There be ſome delicate peeces that thruſt themſelves into fat benefices, onely that they may make much of one; and give themſelves over to their pleaſure, and eaſe; Even of thoſe mouthes which are ſacred to God, there want not ſome, which out of a wanton cuſtome favour of nothing but Indian ſoot; and takes more pleaſure to put forth a cloud of ſmoake, than the thundrings and lightnings of the Law: ſome negligent paſtorlings there are, which have more heed to their own hides, than to the ſoules of their people. I ſpeake plaine truth, in a plaine faſhion, nudè nudè, as that faithfull monitor profeſſes.

Howſoever I beſeech you, brethren, ſuffer you ſelves to be ſtirred with this poore
B ſpeech of mine: Even ſleeping lions are wont to be awakned with the ſting of a gnat. Are theſe the Operations, the diverſities whereof call God their Father? God indeed, but Deum ventrem; that beaſtly deity, the belly; I tremble to adde the reſt, but I muſt; whoſe glory is their ſhame, whoſe end is damnation. It is now time for us to play, and keep holy-day? Behold two cruell enemies are upon us, Impiety and ſuperſtition, and doe we either ſit ſtill with our hands folded, or riſe, and in a wilfull careleſneſſe open the gates to our enemie? That ſoveraigne Maſter of ours the great Houſholder of the world, when he was to goe forth into a farre Countrey, yea rather when he was to returne to his owne everlaſting countrey and Ours, committed to every one of us one talent at the leaſt, to ſome more; and bade us, Negotiamini dum venio; Traffique till I come; Loe he bade us Negotiari, not nepotari; To trade, not to triſle, to labor, not to deboſhe. And is this the traffique which he requires, to ſeeke
C our owne, to take our eaſe, to ſay nothing, to doe worſe? No, theſe are thoſe unclean napkins rather, wherein we have ſlothfully hid the Talents, which we ſhould have improved to the gaine of our Maſter, by putting them into the hands of the Exchangers. That awfull Judge of heaven and earth will be ſure upon his return to call us to an account; which if we muſt give for our idle words, why not alſo for our idle ſilence, as Ambroſe wittily? What ſhall we wretched creatures then anſwer for our ſelves? where ſhall we appeare? It is a fearefull word, O evill ſervant, but more fearefull that which follows, Bring him hither, and kill him before me; Oh then, let me intreat you, let me adjure you, brethren, by the deare reſpect to your owne ſouls, by the bowels, yea by the wounds and precious bloud of Jeſus Chriſt, by that dreadfull Tribunall, before which we muſt all, one day ſtand, that you carefully en-D deavour to ſet forth and accompliſh your miniſteries with all holy operations; Preach the Word, be inſtant, in ſeaſon, out of ſeaſon, reprove, exhort with all long ſuffering and doctrine. Let every of us ſtudy to approve himſelfe unto God, a labourer that ſhall not be aſhamed, and a right divider of the Word of Truth; Oh ſweet Word, and ſuch as in compariſon whereof the very harmony of heaven ſounds harſhly, Well done good ſervant; thou haſt been faithfull in a little, enter into thy maſters joy. Oh let it be our onely ambition, deare brethren, that we may once heare this Word; Let us work that which God hath commanded, and God ſhall be ſure to crown that which we have wrought.

Yea and ye (Honored Fathers) who are this day met to conſult of the weighty af-
E faires both of Church and Common-wealth, work now; If ever ye have wrought heretofore, if ever ye will work hereafter, Now work; A large doore and effectuall is opened unto you, and many adverſaries; ye ſee how audacious Will-worſhip hath of late ſet upon us; how proudly the Tridentine faith hath advanced her creſt, and hath dared to flie fiercely in the very face of the Goſpell: The Romiſh forces put themſelves openly into array; and have dared to ſound not an alarum only, but (which no wiſe man knows whether he ſhould more ſtampe at or ſcorn) a victory: They preſume to erect here amongſt us an Hierarchy emulous to yours, and in the time of your life, and health, and vigor, appoint what heires ſhall ſucceed in your Seas: What wiſe ſpectator can think this indignity to be endured? Is this to be ſmothered in ſilence? Is this to be longer winked at? Rouſe up your ſelves, O yee holy Fathers, if there be any order of piety in your breſts, and deſtroy this Tyberine Monſter, (Popery, I mean) with the breath of your mouthes: and what ever grace and authority yee have with our Gracious King, with the Peeres, and commons of this Realme, improve it all with your beſt prayers and counſels, to the utter extermination of Idolatry, to the happy victory, and advancement of the ſincere Truth of God.

And thus ye ſee with how ſwift a pace I have run over theſe Operations, Miniſteries, Gifts, and the diverſities of them all; One thing onely remaines to be duly conſidered of us; and that is, That all theſe Miniſteries, Gifts, Operations, doe flow from one and the ſame, Spirit, Lord, and God; This Trinity from an Unity; Wherein yee eaſily diſcover the Emphaſis to lie not ſo much in the Author, as in the Identity; (τῦ αὐτοῦ) I ſhall not therefore in the remainder of my diſcourſe proſecute, either the wonderfull wiſdome, of abſolute perfection, or the bouutifull liberality of God, but rather drive my ſpeech to the conſideration of the Unity of this gracious giver of all theſe.

Wee ſilly men, in the height of our bounty, beſtow ſome one favour upon ſome one Subject; But this one God hath beſtowed all upon all, and upon every one, ſome: Neither may we conceive of any other, whether fountain, or Ocean of good; And why hath our Apoſtle ſo carefully beaten upon this point; urging not ſo much the beneficence, as the unity of the Giver? Surely, as Salmeron gueſſes well, ut ſchiſmatum radices everleret, that he might pull up the roots of ſchiſmes: For if there were divers givers, there might be ſome reaſon for every ſect to ſtand for the author of his owne gift, of his owne miniſterie; But now, that one and the ſame Spirit hath given to every one theſe divers gifts, that one and the ſame Lord hath appointed to every one theſe divers miniſteries, that one and the ſame God hath diſtributed to every one theſe divers operations, Why ſhould not all theſe gifts, miniſteries, operations unanimouſly conſpire to the glory of that one giver and founder of them all?

Certainly, every thing here ſounds of unity: The Church is an intire body (as our Apoſtle ſpeakes ſoon after) we are members of it: One man is an eye, another, an eare, a third is a tongue; One is a palate, another a hand, another a foot; yea one is a Thumbe, another a little finger, or (if lower yet) a joint of that ſmall limme: We muſt all concurre in our deſires and endevours to the conſtitution and maintenance of this one body: Whoſoever he be that doth otherwiſe, he is juſtly found guilty, not onely of the violation of the publike weale, but of Divine Unity: And now, O ye Reverend Fathers, I find my ſelfe entred into a pleaſing and ample common place; and ſuch a one, as wherein I could wiſh with Peter to fix the Tabernacle of my abode: Would to God your leiſure could allow you to walk along with me a while throrow theſe ſweet, and flowry Meades of Unity, and happie conſpiration of thoughts: And yet I ſhall not ſo much bend the reſidue of my ſpeech to the praiſe of unity (to what purpoſe were that waſte?) as to the neceſſary vindication of it from the unjuſt challenges of the enemies of peace.

It is an heavy crime, and, of all other, the moſt hainous, wherewith we are charged by the Romaniſts, That we are faln off from the Catholick Church, that wee have rent the ſeamleſſe coat of Chriſt, yea broken his bones, and torne his very body in pieces, whereof if we were indeed guilty, how unworthy were we to breath in this aire, how moſt worthy of the loweſt Hell? But we call heaven and earth to record, how unjuſtly this calumny is caſt upon us, yea, we proteſt before God and men, that the envy of this ſo foule a crimination lights moſt juſtly upon the heads of the accuſers. May it pleaſe you to heare a ſhort Apologue; A certaine man invited to a feaſt one or two of his friends, entertained them bountifully; They ſate together lovingly, they ate together, and were merry one with another; In the ſecond courſe (as the cuſtome is) the Maſter offereth them wine, ſets before them an apple: now a worme had ſomewhat eaten the apple, and a ſpider by chance had fallen into the cup; The gueſt ſees and balks it; The Maſter urgeth him; Why doe you not eat, quoth he, why drink you not? I dare not, ſaith the other, t'is not ſafe to doe either; ſeeſt thou not this vermine in the cup, and that in the apple? Tuſh, ſaith the Maſter, what ſo great matter is this? It was I that ſet this before thee; It was I that began to thee in the other; drink it, eat it, at leaſt for my ſake. But, ſuffer me firſt (replies the

A the gueſt) to take out this ſpider, to cut out this worme; the wine, the apple likes me well enough; the ſpider, the worm, I cannot away with; Away with ſuch over-nice and curious companions (quoth he againe) Fy upon thee, thou ungratefull fellow, that doſt ſo little regard my friendſhip, ſo contemn my cheere; and with that in a rage, throws the platters and pots in the very face of his gueſt, and thruſts him out of doores all wounded. Tell me now, I beſeech you; worthy Auditors, whether of theſe violates the lawes of hoſpitality? I dare ſay, you have eaſily applied it before me; There was a time when we ſate together in a familiar manner with theſe Romaniſts, and fared well; The ſpider in the cup, The worm in the apple, what elſe be they, but ſuperſtition in their worſhip, rotten and unwholſome traditions in their faith? without theſe, the Religion pleaſeth us well: But they will needs importunately thruſt theſe upon us, and we refuſing, are therefore ſcorned, ſpit upon, beaten,
B and caſt out; Had they but given us leave to take out this ſpider, this worme, we had ſtill eaten, and drank together moſt gladly: They obſtinately reſiſted, and prefer'd their own headſtrong will to our good and ſafety; nay, they repell us with reproches, ſtrike us with their thundering Anathemaes, condemn us to the ſtakes; what ſhould we doe in this caſe? Heare, oh heavens, and hearken oh earth, and thou Almighty God, the Maker and Governor of them both, ſuffer thy ſelfe, and thy glorious ſpirits to be called to the teſtimony of our innocency; We are compelled, we are driven away from the Communion of the Church of Rome; They forced us to goe from them, who departed firſt from themſelves.

We have willingly departed from the Communion of their errors, from the Communion of the Church we have not departed; Let them renounce their erroneous
C doctrine, we imbrace their Church; Let them but caſt away their ſoul-ſlaying Traditions, we will communicate with them in the right of one and the ſame Church, and remaine ſo for ever.

But, alas, I muſt be forced to complain, and that not without extreme grief of heart how that it cannot be determined, whether thoſe that boaſt themſelves for Catholikes, be greater enemies to Truth, or to Charity. To Truth, in that they have of late forged new errors, and forced them upon the Church; to Charity in that they have not ſtuck to condemne the adverſe part, and to brand them with the black marke of Hereſie. I will ſpeake (if you pleaſe) more plainly; Three manner of waies doe theſe Romaniſts offend againſt Charity. Firſt; that they will not remit any thing
D either of their moſt convicted opinion or vicious practice: no not for Peace ſake. Secondly, that for Articles of Chriſtian faith, they put upon the Church certaine opinions of their owne, falſe, doubtfull, and uncertaine, peculiar onely to the Schooles, which doe no whit touch the foundation of Religion. And laſtly, that if they meet with any faithfull and ſound monitors, which doe never ſo little gainſay theſe new Articles, they cruelly caſt them out of the boſome of the Church, and throw them headlong into Hell: Away with theſe ſchiſmatiks, Hereticks, Atheiſts; I wis the Proteſtants have no Church, no faith, no ſalvation. Good Lord what fury, what frenzy diſtempers Chriſtians; that they ſhould be ſo impotently malicious againſt thoſe, who profeſſe themſelves to be redeemed by the ranſome of the ſame moſt precious bloud? At length, At length, O ye Chriſtians, be wiſe, and acknow-
E ledge thoſe, whom the God and Father of mercies holds worthy of his armes, yea of his bowels. Let frantick error bawle what it liſt, we are Chriſtians, we are Catholicks, the undivided members of one holy Catholick and Apoſtolik Church; Let us meet at this barre, if you pleaſe; Let who will maintaine the plea; What is it which maketh a Church? What is it which maketh that Church One, holy, Catholick, Apoſtolick? Is it not one holy Catholick Apoſtolick faith? But which is that? Is it not the ſame which was delivered by Chriſt, and the Apoſtles, to the whole world, and was alwaies and every where approved through all ages, even unto our times? Wherefore are the Scriptures, wherefore the Creeds, wherefore were the primitive Counſels but that there might be certaine marks, whereby Catholicks might be undoubtedly diſcerned from Hereticks? You know the Epilogue of the Athanaſian Creed, this is the Catholick Faith. If we may beleive Leo, the heads of all hereſies are quite cut off with this one ſword of the Creed; How much more then, with that two-edged ſword of the ſcriptures, and of the Fathers their interpreters? What then? Thoſe that then were Catholicks, can they in any age be condemned for Hereticks? No: Faith is alwaies conſtant to it ſelfe, and ſo is the Church that is built upon that Faith. Did we ever deny or make doubt of any Article, or clauſe of that Ancient Divinity? Either then Chriſt himſelfe, the Apoſtles, Councels, Fathers, erred from the Catholick Truth; or we yet remaine Catholicks. What ever other opinions we meet withall, concerning Religion, neither make nor marre it; Say they be falſe, ſay they be vicious, they are but hay and ſtubble, which nothing appertaine to the fonndation of this everlaſting frame. The Church may be either more ſound, or more corrupt for them; It cannot be more or leſſe a Church; The beauty or deformity of a Church may conſiſt in them; the ſtrength, the welfare of it doth not: Surely, whoſoever willingly ſubſcribes to the Word of God ſigned in the everlaſting monuments of Scripture, to the ancient Creeds, to the foure Generall Counſels, to the common conſent of the Fathers, for ſix hundred yeares after Chriſt, which we of the reformed Church religiouſly profeſſe to doe; if he may erre in ſmall points, yet he cannot be an Heretick. Some particular Church may eaſily offend by imputing hereſie to an undeſerved opinion, whether perhaps true, or lightly erroneous; but neither ſoule, nor Church can greatly erre, while it treads in the ſteps of the moſt ancient and univerſall: Muſt he therefore of neceſſity die a Romaniſt, that would die a Catholick? This is an idle fancy, and worthy of no leſſe than Bedlam.

Give me leave (ye Reverend Fathers) The bleſſed Ghoſt of the moſt holy, and lateſt Biſhop of this See, interrupts my ſpeech, and charges me not to ſuffer his aſhes ſo ſhamefully to be wronged. I can neither be ſilent for indignation, nor ſpeake for anger: It was not only rumor'd, but bookes were caſt a broad over the world, concerning the revolt of this worthy and excellent Prelate, reporting that at his death, he reconciled himſelf to the Church of Rome, and with many ſighs, renounced the Hereſies of the Church of England: and at laſt being abſolved by a Popiſh Prieſt, ſweetly ſlept in the faith of the Church of Rome; Neither did his departed ſoule want, ſomewhere (as is reported) ſuffrages and oblations of Maſmongers in this behalfe; Oh immortall God! what blaſphemy is here? Can impudency it ſelfe, ſo caſt off all ſhame, as to raiſe ſo ſlanderous a ly, thus boldly, againſt the credit of ſo many witneſſes, againſt the ſolemne deteſtation of their own Prieſt, againſt the religious oathes of his neereſt friends, and domeſtick ſervants? againſt the Sermon and publike writings of his learned Son? a Son well worthy of ſuch a Father? Other lies have ſome colour to plead for their credit; This (beſides boldneſſe) hath none at all. How many of us ſate by that faithfull Paſtor of ours then breathing towards his laſt, and received from his dying lips, words of moſt conſtant piety: And ſome of you (Reverend Fathers) devoutly received with him, that ſacred Viaticum, the laſt bread that ever he taſted, even the bread of the Lord; and were witneſſes of the laſt motions of his ſoule, then ready to depart, and breathing towards his heaven. Ours he lived, Ours he died, and now, as ours, is crowned in heauen. Goe on now, ye miſ-zealous ſpirits; go on to lie ſtoutly; ſomewhat will alwayes ſtick faſt to the accuſers; but in the meane time, it cannot be truth, that needs the props of lies. Only this by the way.

Let the boldeſt Sophiſter of the Romiſh Schoole, come forth now, and if he can, for ſhame, let him undertake to prove that thoſe moſt noted additions of the Tridentine Faith, which onely we reject, were received of all the Church, in all Ages, for neceſſary heads of Religion: or let him confeſſe (as he needs muſt) that we have ſtill conſtantly perſiſted in the Communion of One, Holy, Catholick Church and faith; He ſhall eaſily bewray his own novelty, but never ſhall evince any Hereſie of ours. It is a golden ſaying of Cardinal Contarenus; Hearken I beſeech you, if any ingenuous ſpirit of you all, be a friend to Rome, Non opus eſt concilio, non ſyllogiſmis ad ſedandas hal ſe Lutheranorũ turbas, &c. There needs no Councel (ſaith he) no Syllogiſmes to allay theſe broyles of the Lutherans, but onely charity, humility, and a ſincere mind, that being void

A void of all ſelfe-love, we may be perſwaded to correct and reform thoſe things wherin we have manifeſtly tranſgreſſed. Thus he: Thou art wiſe indeed (O Contarenus) would to God thy fellows were ſo alſo. But we (forſooth) are the diſobedient and rebellious children of our mother the Church, whoſe commands while we diſdain to receive, and obey and reverence her decrees, we are enwrapped in a ſhamefull ſchiſme, and ſtricken with the curſes of an angry Mother. Surely this were an odious contumely. But for us; we have not acknowledg'd her a Mother, a Siſter we have: But grant we were ſons, yet we are no ſlaves. To forge a new faith, and imperiouſly thruſt it upon her own, is not the part of an indulgent parent, but of a Tyrant; This lawleſſe liberty (we confeſſe) we could never endure, and therefore are we openly
B thunder-ſtricken with more than one Anathema. Neither have they otherwiſe dealt with us, than that fooliſh fellow in Gerſon, who being very buſie to drive away a fly from his neighbours forehead, braind the man.

But lament ye with me (my brethren) the wofull caſe of that Church, that hath learned to fit her faith to the Times, and is more impatient of a remedy, than of the diſeaſe. Whilſt they ſo eagerly perſecute us, let us heartily pity them: And let us ſtill wiſh to them, (that which they envy and deny to us) Salvation; Father forgive them, for they know not what they doe.

Our prayers, our teares, our admonitions muſt not be wanting: Return to your ſelves now at laſt (oh ye Chriſtian ſoules) Returne, from whence you have ſenſibly
C declined; Recover your firſt love, your firſt works. Suffer not your ſelves any longer to be mocked with the glorious title of a Church. Frame your ſelves to that holy Unity which hitherto you have ſo ſtifly reſiſted, which if once we might live to ſee effected, you ſhould well find (as it runs in the law of the twelve Tables) that the recovered ſhould with us have the ſame priviledges with the healthfull. Behold we are ready (as our gracious and peaceable King James piouſly undertooke) to meet you halfe way.

But if they ſhall ſtill obſtinatly caſt off all hope of Unity, and being ſet on fire with the hatred of peace, ſhall go on to delight themſelves onely, in the alarum of their ſacred Trumpet (as they call it) why ſhould not we, religiouſly and entirely keepe peace among our ſelves? I ſpeak to all the Sonnes of the purer Church whereſoever diſperſed, we profeſſe this Church of ours by Gods grace reformed: Reformed (I D ſay) not new made, as ſome emulous ſpirit ſpightfully ſlander us. For me; I am ready to ſink to the very ground, when I heare that hedge-row reproach, Where was your Religion before Luther? Where was your Church? Heare, oh ye ignorant, Heare, oh ye envious Cavillers, we deſired the reformation of an old Religion, not the formation of a new. The Church accordingly was reform'd, not new wrought. It remaines therefore the ſame Church it was before, but onely purged from ſome ſuperfluous and pernicious additaments of error. It is a new face that was lately waſhed? a new garment that is but mended? a new houſe that is reparied? Bluſh, if ye have any ſhame, who thus ignorantly, and maliciouſly caſt this in our teeth.

Goe to now (my brethren) we are by Gods grace reformed, let us take heed leſt we be deformed again by mutuall diſſentions; This is that which weakens, and lames
E us, and which laies us open to the inſulting triumphs of our Adverſaries. Yet (leſt we ſhould ſeeme to give too much way to a ſpightfull ſlander) theſe jarres of ours are not ſo great, as our enemies either deſire, or clamour. Certainly, what diſcords ſoever hitherto have troubled us, we are beholding to none other for them, but to theſe our kinde enemies, who upbraid us with them: For if they had but reacht forth unto us an helping hand in due time, and joyntly conferd their endevours (which then behoved them) for the reforming of the Church, all had runne ſquarely on; There had been no jarres, no grudgings, no parts taking: But they ſtifly refuſed and by their frowardneſſe, and pertinacie, cauſed this ſo weighty a taſke to be caſt upon ſome few: and thoſe both weak, unable, and altogether unfit for ſuch a charge. It could not therfore be otherwiſe, but that the opinions of ſome ſingle men, not conferd together, in ſuch a buſineſſe, muſt needs ſomwhat differ. But thanks be to thee O bleſſed God the Author of peace, that haſt vouchſafed by thy ſpirit ſo to bridle the distemperate affections of men, that their busie spirits being stirred up have not boyled forth into more fearefull divisions.

But what are these so great dissentions, and blowes of bloudy warre, which our adversaries so cry out upon? Forsooth, rather than want, they can faine names of sects to themselves; And where they can finde the least difference in the paper of any obscure Author of ours, presently they cry out, new schismes, new sects; What malice is this? what eager desire of multiplying quarrells? If it had been so of old, so small hides had not served to containe the Volumes of Augustine, Epiphanius, Philastrius: there had not been fewer sects, than teachers since the publishing of the Gospell. But let us passe over the number, and come to the weight. Let the malicious prattle what they will; With some of ours, the controversie is not about any solid lims of Christian Faith, but onely of the very skin; with some others, not about the skin, but the garment rather, not about the garment it selfe neither, but of the very hem. There are certaine scholasticall opinions of a middle ranke, meere Theological Corollaries, or perhaps some outward ceremonies, wherein we differ: Principles of Christian Religion there are not. And withall these controversies are but such, as that when the heat whether of zeal, or anger, shall abate, and either part shall well understand each other, they will easily admit of a Reconciliation. Neither have these very Romanists lesser quarrells amongst themselves; They can more hide their enmities, not exercise them lesse. If they be more wise, they are not more accordant. Neither is there (I dare say) any head of Religion, wherein they doe at once differ from us, and agree all with one another. Finally, our differences are no greater, than were those of old, among the holy Fathers of the Church, whose quarrels notwithstanding are not so odiously blazoned by posterity. I let passe the private scoldings of the Ancients, not without some unpleasing (I had almost said misbeseeming) tartnesse. I had rather set before your eyes (for good lucke sake) those publique altercations of the Churches and Fathers, which afterward shut up in a blessed concord. What quarrels arose at the Counsell of Ephesus, betweene Cyril of Alexandria, and John of Antioch? The Churches under both, stuck not to counterthunder Anathemaes one against another; Thereupon Theodoret thrust in his sickle into this harvest; against whom Cyrillus (by Evoptius instigation) makes as strong opposition: Theodoret accuseth Cyril of Apolinarisme; Cyril accuses Theodoret of Nestorianisme; The flame of their rage brake out more & more, & almost drew the Christian world to parties; so that afterwards when Theodoret would have entred the Councell of Chalcedon, the Ægyptian, and other reverend Bishops cryed out, We must cast out Cyril, if we take in Theodoret: The very Canons cast him forth: God abhors him. The like was done afterwards in the eighth Action; The Bishops openly proclaiming, He is an Heretick, a Nestorian; Away with the Heretick. But when the matter was well scand, and it was found that he willingly subscrib'd to the Orthodox Creeds, and the Epistle of Leo; The whole Synod with one accord cried out, Theodoret is well worthy of a See in the Church, Let the Church receive her Orthodox Pastor.

It is worthy of immortality, that which Gregory Nazianzen recorderh of holy Athanasius: The Romans seem'd to the Eastern Churches to follow the heresies of Sabellius, in denying of three Hypostases; The Easterne likewise seemed to the Romans, to savour too much of Arrius, in denying three Persons; the quarrell grew hot; Then came that great dispenser of soules, and having meekly and mildly called forth both sides before him, he so handled the businesse, that granting them the free use of their termes, he tied them close to the matter, and shewed them a light, whereby they might behold one another: upon this, without more adoe, finding themselves, both, in the right, they fall to mutuall imbracements. Neither would it speed otherwise with us, Brethren, (as I doe verily believe) if some Athanasius from Heaven would but joyn our hands together.

Oh if once the gates of intestine & horrid warres were shut up, and the Religious Princes, which are the Nursing fathers of the reformed Churches, would command by vertue of their authority a Synod to be assembled (as generall as it might) wherein both parts freely and modestly might lay forth their opinions, and such common termes

A termes might be agreed upon, as wherein both parts might freely reſt without prejudice to either: How eaſily then, how happily might theſe grievous ſtirs be quietly pacified? Let us pray for this (my Bretheren) let us pray devoutly. In the mean while let us all ſweetly incline our hearts to peace, and unity. Let there be amongſt us (as S. Auguſtine to Jerome) pure brotherhood; Neither let us ſuffer our ſelves, upon every ſlight quirke of opinion, to be diſtracted, or torn aſunder. Let us forget that there were ever any ſuch (in reſpect of the devotion of a Sect) as Luther, Melanthon, Calvin, Zuinglius, Arminius, or if any other mortall name, for what have we to doe with man? Let us breath nothing, let us affect nothing, but Jeſus Chriſt.

We Divines are Pleyades, (as Gregory ſaith wittily) Let us therefore ſhine ſtill together, though not without ſome difference of place. In a Pomegranate are many graines under one rinde; You know the myſtery. Let us joyne theſe pomegranates to our Bels; Let us be loud, but conſorted. Let us devote for ever, with one heart, all our operations, miniſteries, gifts, to one God, the Father, Sonne, and holy Ghoſt; to one Head, Chriſt; one body, the Church; that being waſht with one Baptiſme, ranſomed with one price, profeſſing one Faith, and holding the unity of the Spirit in the bond of Peace, we may at laſt happily enjoy one, and the ſame Heaven, through Jeſus Chriſt our Lord:

To whom with the Father, and the holy Spirit, be aſcribed all honour and glory for evermore.

Amen.

TO OUR GRATIOVS AND BLESSED MOTHER, THE Church of England;

THE MEANEST OF HER CHILDREN DEDICATES THIS HER APOLOGIE, AND WISHETH ALL PEACE AND HAPPINESSE.

NO leſſe than a yeare and a halfe is paſt (Reverend, Deare and Holy Mother) ſince I wrote a loving monitory Letter to * two of thine unworthy Sons; which (I heard) were fled from thee in perſon, in affection, and ſomewhat in opinion: Supposing them yet thine in the maine ſubſtance, though in ſome circumſtances their own. Since which, one of them hath waſht off thy Font-water as uncleane, and hath written deſperately both againſt Thee and his own fellows: From the other, I received (not two moneths ſince) a ſtomackefull Pamphlet; beſides the private injuries to the Monitor, caſting upon thine honorable Name blaſphemous imputations of Apoſtaſie, Antichriſtianiſme, Whoredome, Rebellion: Mine own wrongs I could have contemned in ſilence; but, For Sions ſake, I cannot hold my peace: If I remember not thee, O Jeruſalem, let my tongue cleave to the roofe of my mouth: It were a ſhame and ſinne for me, that my zeale ſhould be leſſe hot for thine innocency, than theirs to thy falſe diſgrace, disgrace. How have I hastened therefore to let the World see thy sincere Truth, and their perverse slanders! Unto thy sacred Name then (whereto I have in all piety devoted my selfe) I humbly present this my speedy and dutifull labor: whereby I hope thy weake Sonnes may be confirmed, the strong encouraged, the rebellious shamed: And if any shall still obstinately accurse thee, I refer their revenge unto thy Glorious Head, who hath espoused thee to himselfe, in Truth and righteousnesse: Let him whose thou art, right thee: In the meane time, we thy true sonnes shall not only defend, but magnifie thee: Thou maist be black, but thou art comely: the Daughters have seen thee, and counted thee blessed; even the Queen, and the Concubines, and they have praised thee: thou art thy Welbeloveds, and his desire is towards thee. So let it be, and so let thine be towards him for ever; and mine toward you both, who am the least of all thy little Ones.

A COMMON APOLOGIE AGAINST THE BROWNISTS.

SECTION I.

IF Truth and Peace (Zacharies two Companions) had met in our love, this Controverſie had never been; the ſevering of theſe two hath cauſed this ſeparation: for while ſome unquiet minds have ſought Truth without Peace, they have at once loſt Truth, Peace, Love, us and themſelves. God knows how unwillingly I put my hand to this unkind quarrell: Nothing ſo much abates the courage of a Chriſtian, as to call his Brother Adverſary: We muſt doe it; woe be the men by whom this offence commeth: Yet by how much the inſultation of a brotherly enemie is more intolerable; and the griefe of our bleſſed mother greater for the wrong of her own; So much more cauſe I ſee to break this ſilence: If they will have the laſt words, they may not have all. For our carriage to them: They ſay, when Fire, the God of the Chaldees had devoured all the other wooden Deities, that Canopis ſet upon him a Caldron full of water, whoſe bottome was deviſed with holes ſtopt with wax; which no ſooner felt the flame, but gave way to quenching of that furious Idoll. If the fire of inordinate zeale, conceit, contention, have conſumed all other parts in the ſeparation, and caſt forth (more than Nebuchadnezzars Furnance) from their Amſterdam hither; it were well if the waters of our moderation and reaſon could vanquiſh, yea abate it: This little Hin of mine ſhall be ſpent that way: we may try and wiſh, but not hope it: the ſpirits of theſe men are too well known, to admit any expectation of yeeldance. Since yet both for prevention and neceſſary defence, this taſk muſt be undertaken, I crave nothing of my Reader but patience and juſtice; of God, victory to the Truth: as for favour, I wiſh no more than an enemy would give againſt himſelfe: With this confidence I enter into theſe liſts, and turne my pen to an Adverſary, God knowes whether more proud or weak.

SEP.

It is an hard thing even for ſober-minded men in caſes of controverſie, to uſe ſoberly the advantages of the times: upon which whileſt men are mounted on high, they uſe to behold behold such as they oppose too overlie, and not without contempt, and so are ofttimes emboldned to roule upon them as from aloft very weake and weightlesse discourses, thinking any sleight and slender opposition sufficient to oppresse those underlings, whom they have (as they suppose) at so great an advantage. Upon this very presumption it commeth to passe, that this Author undertaketh thus solemnly and severely to censure a cause, whereof (as appeareth in the sequell of the discourse) he is utterly ignorant: which had he been but halfe so carefull to have understood, as he hath been forward to censure, he would either have been (I doubt not) more equall towards it, or more weighty against it.

As this Epistle is come to mine hands so I wish the answer of it may come to the hands of him that occasioned it: Intreating the Christian Reader, in the name of the Lord, unpartially to behold without either prejudice of cause, or respect of person, what is written on both sides, and so from the Court of a sound Conscience to give just judgement.

Section II.

The answerers Preamble retorted, confuted.

IT is an hard thing even for those that would seem sober-minded men, in cases of Controversie, to use soberly the frownes and disadvantages of causes and times: whereby whiles men are dejected and trodden down, they use to behold their opposites mounted on high, too repiningly, and not without desperate envy: and so are oft-times moved to shoot up at them, as from below, the bitter arrowes of spightfull and spleenish discourses; thinking any harefull opposition sufficiently charitable, to oppugne those adversaries, which have them (as they feele) at so great an advantage: upon this impotent maliciousnesse, it commeth to passe, that this Answerer undertaketh thus severely and peremptorily, to censure that charitable censure, of ignorance, which (as shall appeare in the sequell) he either simply or willingly understood not: and to brand a deare Church of Christ with Apostasie, Rebellion, Antichristianisme: What can be more easie than to return accusations?

Your Preamble (with a grave bitternesse) charges me with, First, Presumption upon advantages; Secondly, weake and weightlesse discourse; Thirdly, Ignorance of the cause censured: It had been madnesse in mee to write, if I had not presumed upon advantages; but of the cause of the truth, not of the times: Though (blessed be God) the times favour the truth, and us: if you scorne them and their favours, complaine not to be an underling: think that the times are wiser than to bestow their favours upon wilfull adversaries; but in spight of times, you are not more under us in estate, than in conceit above us: so we say, The Sunne is under a Cloud, we know it is above it. *Would God overlinesse and contempt were not yours, even to them which are mounted highest upon best desert; and now you that have not learned sobriety in just disadvantages, tax us, not to use soberly the advantages of time: there was no gall in my pen, no insultation, I wrote to you as brethren and wisht you companions: there was more danger of flattery in my stile, than bitternesse: wherein used I not my advantages soberly? Not in that I said too much, but not enough; Not in that I was too sharpe, but not weighty enough; My opposition was not too vehement, but too slight and slender: So, strong Champions blame their adversary for striking too easily: you might have forborne this fault, it was my favour that I did not my worst: you are worthy of more weight, that complaine of ease. The discourse that I roll'd down upon you, was weak and weightlesse: you shall well finde, this was my lenity, not my impotence. The fault hereof is partly in your expectation, not in my letter: I meant but a short Epistle, you look't belike for a volume, or nothing; I meant only a generall monition; you look't for a solid prosecution of particulars: It is not for you to give taskes to others pens. By what Law, must we write nothing but large Scholasticall Discourses? Such Tomes as yours: May wee not touch your sore, unlesse wee will launce and search it? I was not enough your enemy; forgive me this error, and you shall smart more: But, not only my omissions were of ignorance, but my censures, though severe and solemne: An easie imputation from so great a controuler: I pardon you, and take this as the common lot of enemies. I never yet could see any Scribler so so unlearned, as he durst not charge his opposite with ignorance. If D. Whitaker, Mr. Perkins, Mr. Gyfford, and that Oracle of our present times Dr. Andrwes, went away content with this livery from yours; how can I repine? If I have censured what cause I knew not, let me be censured for more than ignorance, impudency: but if you know not what I censured (let all my trust lie on this issue) take both ignorance, boldnesse, and malice to your selfe: Is your cause so mysticall, that you can feare any mans ignorance? What Cobler or Spinster hath not heard of the main holds of Brownism? Am I only a stranger in Hierusalem? If I know not all your opinions, pardon me: your own have not received this illumination; I speak boldly, not your selfe; Every day brings new conceits, and not one day teaches, but corrects another: you must be more constant to your selves, ere you can upbraid ignorance or avoid it. But whither I knew your prime fancies, appeares sufficiently by a particular discourse, which above a yeer since was in the hands of some of your Clyents, and I wonder if not in yours: Shortly; am I ignorant? If I were obstinate too, you might hope (with the next Gale) for me, your more equall aduersary, at Amsterdam. As I am; my want of care and skill, shall (I hope) lose nothing of the truth by you, nor suffer any of your foule aspersions upon the face of Gods Church and ours.

The crime here objected is separation, a thing very odious in the eyes of all them from whom it is made: as evermore casting upon them the imputation of evill, whereof all men are impatient: And hence it commeth to passe, that the Church of England can better brooke the vilest persons continuing communion with it, than any whomsoever separating from it, though upon never so just and well grounded reasons.

Pref. Be it known therefore to all the separation, that we account them in respect of their constitution, to be as very an Harlot, as either her Mother the Church of England, or her Grand-mother Rome is, &c. Iterato baptizatus scienter, iterato Dominum crucifigit. De consecr. dist. 4. Quivis, &c. The crime of the separation how great, M. Perry in his disc. of this subject.

I Wrote not to you alone: what is become of your partner, yea your guide? Woe is me, he hath renounced our Christendome with our Church: and hath washt off his former water, with new: and condemnes you all, for not separating further, no lesse then we condemn you for separating so farre. As if you could not be enough out of Babylon, unlesse you be out of your selves. Alas, miserable Countreymen, whither run you? Religion hath but his height, beyond which is error and madnesse: he tels you true, your station is unsafe; either you must forward to him, or back to us.

*I objected separation to you: yet not so extreme as your answer bewrayes: a late separation, not the first; my charity hoped you lesse ill, than you will needs deserve: you grant it odious, because it casts imputation of evill upon the forsaken: Of evill? Yea of the worst, an estate incurable & desperate. He is an ill Physitian, that will leave his Patient upon every distemper: his departure argues the disease helplesse, were we but faulty, as your Land-Lord Churches, your own rules would not abide your flight Vid. Johnson, Preface in his inquire; Esay 5. 20. Hence the Church of England justly matches Separatists with the vilest persons. God himselfe doth so: who are more vile than patrons of evill? yet no greater woe is to them that speake good of evill, than those that speak evill of good: So wise Generals punish mutinous persons, worse than Robbers or Adulterers: So Corah and his company (a Story cunningly turned upon us by your Martyr) their opposition to Moses, were more fearefully plagued, than the Idolatrous Israelites. These sinnes are more directly against common society, the other more personally: and if both have like iniquity; yet the former mer have both more offence, and more danger: And if not ſo, yet who cannot rather brooke a lewd ſervant, then an undutifull ſonne, though pretending faire colours for his diſobedience? At leaſt, you think the Church of England thinks her ſelf Gods Church, as well as your Saints of Amſterdam, You that ſo accurſe Apoſtaſie in others, could you expect, ſhe ſhould brook it in you?

Prov.21.2. But your reaſons are juſt and well grounded: every way of a man is right in his owne eyes; Said we not well, that thou art a Samaritane, and haſt a Devill, ſay the Jewes? What Schiſme ever did not thinke well of it ſelfe? For us: we call Heaven and Earth to record, your cauſe hath no more juſtice than your ſelves hath charity.

And yet ſeparation from the World, and ſo from the men of the World, and ſo from the Prince of of the world that reigneth in them, and ſo from whatſoever is contrary to God, is the firſt ſtep to our communion with God, and Angels, and good men, as the firſt ſtep to a ladder is to leave the Earth.

SECTION LIIII.

The kinds of the ſeparation, and which is juſt. ἀκλησία.

YET there is a commendable and happy ſeparation from the World, from the Prince & men of the World, and whatſoever is contrary to God: who doubts it? There were no Heaven for us without this, no Church; which hath her name given by her Father and Huſband, of calling out from other. Out of the Ægypt of the World doth God call his ſonnes: But this ſeparation is into the viſible Church from the World; not (as yours) out of the Church, becauſe of ſome particular mixtures with the World: or (if you had rather take it of profeſſion) out of the World of Pagans and Infidels, into the viſible Church; not out of the World of true (though faulty) Chriſtians, into a purer Church. That I may here at once for all give light to this point of ſeparation: we find in Scripture a ſeparation either to good, or from evill: To good; ſo the Levites were ſeparated from among the children of Iſrael, to beare the Ark, and to miniſter: ſo the firſt born, firſt fruits, and Cities of refuge: So Paul was (ἀφορισθὲις) ſeparated, which ſome would have allude to his Phariſaiſme, but hath plain reference to Gods own words (Acts 13.2.) Separate me Barnabas and Saul: Though this is rather a deſtination to ſome worthy purpoſe, than a properly called ſeparation.

So S. Paul charges us to hold that which is good, and abſtaine from all appearance of evill: ſo Jeremie is charged to ſeparate the precious (doctrine or practice) from the vile. From ſinners, not only practiſed by God himſelf (to omit his eternall and ſecret Decree, whereby the Elect are ſeparated from the Reprobate) both in his gracious vocation, ſequeſtring them from nature and ſin, as alſo in his execution of judgement, whether particular, as of the Iſraelites from the Tabernacles of Corah; or univerſall, and finall, of the Sheepe from the Goats; But alſo enjoyned from God to men, in reſpect either of our affection, or of our yoke, and familiar ſociety, whereof Saint PAUL: Be not unequally yoked with Infidels, Come out from among them, and ſeparate your ſelves. In all this we agree: In the latitude of this laſt only we differ: I finde you call for a double ſeparation. A firſt ſeparation in the gathering of the Church: A ſecond in the menaging of it: The firſt at our entrance into the Church, the ſecond in our continuance: The firſt of the Church, from Pagans and Worldlings, an initiatory profeſſion; The ſecond of lewd men from the Church by juſt cenſures; You ſpeak confuſedly of your own ſeparation; one while of both, another while of either ſingle. For the 1. either confeſſe it done by our Baptiſme, or elſe you ſhal be forced to hold, we muſt rebaptiſe: But of this conſtitutive ſeparation anon: For the 2. of ſinners, whether in judgement, or life, ſome are more groſſe, hainous, incorrigible: others leſſe notorious, and more tractable: thoſe other muſt be ſeparated by juſt cenſures; not theſe. Amongſt many good ſeparations then, yours cannot be ſeparated from evill, for that we ſhould ſo far ſeparate from the evill, that therefore we ſhould ſeparate from Gods children in the communion of the holy things of God, that for ſome (after your worſt done) not fundamentall corruptions, we ſhould ſeparate from that Church, in whoſe wombe we were conceived, and from betwixt whoſe knees we fell to God: in a word, (as one of yours once ſaid) to ſeparate not only from viſible evill, but from viſible good, as all Antichriſtian: who but yours can think leſſe than abſurd and impious? Grant, we ſhould be clean ſeparated from the world; yet if we be not, muſt you be ſeparated from us? Doe but ſtay till God have ſeparated us from himſelf: Will the wiſe Huſbandman caſt away his Corn-heap for the chaffe and duſt? Shall the Fiſher caſt away a good draught, becauſe his Drag-net hath Weeds? Doth God ſeparate from the faithfull ſoule, becauſe it hath ſome corruptions her Inmates, though not her commanders? Certainly, if you could throughly ſeparate the World from you, you would never thus ſeparate your ſelves from us: Begin at home, ſeparate all ſelf-love, and ſelf-will, and uncharitableneſſe from your hearts, and you cannot but joyn with that Church, from which you have ſeparated: Your Doctor would perſwade us, you ſeparate from nothing but our corruptions: you are honeſter, and grant it from our Church: it were happy for you, if he lied not; who in the next page confutes himſelf, ſhewing that you ſeparate from us, as Chriſt from the Samaritans, namely from the Church, not the corruptions only; and not as he did from the Jewes, namely from their corruptions, not from their Church: His memory ſaveſ our labor, and mars his diſcourſe.

The ſeparation we have made in reſpect of our knowledge, and obedience, is indeed late, and new: yet is in the nature and cauſes thereof as ancient as the Goſpell, which was firſt founded in the enmity which God himſelfe put betwixt the ſeed of the Woman, and the ſeed of the Serpent, Gen. 3. 15. which enmity hath not only been ſucceſſively continued, but alſo viſibly manifeſted by the actuall ſeparation of all true Churches, from the World in their collection and conſtitution, before the Law, under the Law, and under the Goſpell, Gen. 4. 13, 14, 16. & 6. 1, 2. & 7. 17. with 1 Pet. 3. 20. 12. & 12. 2. YEt, if not equity, it were well you could plead age: This your ſeparation in the nature and cauſes of it (you ſay) is no leſſe ancient than the firſt inſtitution of enmity betwixt the two ſeeds: you might have gone a little higher, and have ſaid, than our firſt Parents running from God in the Garden, or their ſeparation from God by their ſin: But we take your time and eaſily believe that this your late ſeparation was founded upon that ancient enmity of the ſeed of the ſerpent with the Womans. That ſubtill devill, when he ſaw the Church breath from the perſecutions of Tyrants, vexed her no leſſe with her own diviſions; ſeeking that by fraud, which by violence he could not effect. Hence all the fearfull Schiſmes of the Church, whereof yours is part. This enmity hath not only been ſucceſſively continued, but alſo too viſibly manifeſted by the actuall (but wilfull) ſeparation of Hereticks and Sectaries from the Church in all ages: But I miſtake you; yours is as ancient as the Goſpell: What? that Evangelium æternum of the Friers? whoſe name they accurſedly borrowed from Rev. 14. 6. Or that Evangelium Regni of the familiſts? Or that Evangelium aliud, whereof S. Paul taxeth his Galatians? None of all theſe, you ſay; but as that Goſpell of Peace, of Truth, of Glory; ſo ancient, and never known till Bolton, Barrow, and Brown? Could it eſcape all the holy Prophets, Apoſtles, Doctors of the old, middle, and latter world, and light only upon theſe your three Patriarchs? Perhaps Novatus or Donatus (thoſe Saints with their Schooles) had ſome little glimpſe of it; but this perfection of knowledge is but late and new: So many rich Mines have lien long unknown, and great parts of the World have been discoured by late Venturers. If this course have come late to your knowledge and obedience, not so to others: For loe, it was practised successively in the constitution and collection of all true Churches, through all times, before the Law, under the Law, after it: We have acknowledged many separations: but as soon shall you find the time past in the present, as your late separation, in the ancient & approved. You quote Scriptures, though (to your praise) more dainty indeed than your fellows. Who cannot doe so? Who hath not? Even Satan himselfe cites the word against him which was the word of his Father. Let us not number, but weigh your texts: The rather, for that I find these as your Master-proofes, set as challengers in every of your defences: In *Gen.*4.13. Cain a bloudy Fratricide is excommunicated: In *Gen.*6.1,2. The Sons of God maried the daughters of men: In Gen 7.1.&7. Noah is approved as righteous and enters the Arke: In 1 Pet. 3.20,21. The rest in Noahs time were disobedient, and perished: What of all this? Alas, what mockage is this of the Reader, and Scriptures? Surely, you even joyn Scriptures, as you separate your selves: This is right as your Pastor, to prove all members of the visible Church, elect and precious stones, cites, 1 *King.*7.9. where is speech only of Salomons house in the Forrest of Lebanon, his porch for his Thron, his Hall, his Palace for Pharaohs daughter, and when he comes to describe the office of his imaginary Doctor, thwacks fourteen Scriptures into the margent, whereof not any one hath any just colour of inference to his purpose: and in this discourse of the power of the Church (that he might seem to honor his serpent with shew of texts) hath repeated six places twice over in the space of six lines. For these of yours you might object the first to the Cainites, not to us. Cain was cast out worthily. Do we either deny, or utterly forbear this censure? Take heed you follow him not, in your voluntary exile, to the land of Nod. The second you might object to those mungrell Christians that march with Turks and Pagans. There are sonnes of God, that is, members of the visible Church; and daughters of men which are without the bounds, meer Infidels: it is sin for those sons to yoke themselves with those daughters. What is this to us? Noah was righteous, the multitude disobedient: Who denies it? yet Noah separated not from the corrupted Church, till the floud separated him from the earth, but continued an ancient Preacher of righteousnesse, even to that perverse and rebellious generation. But it sufficeth you, that Cain and the Giants were separated from the rest: We yeeld it: what will follow hence, save only that notorious Malefactors must be cast out, and professed Heathen not let into the Church? We hold and wish no lesse: your places evince no more. These before the Law: In *Lev.*20.24,26. God chose out Israel from other people: This was Gods act, not theirs: a seque string of his Israelites from the Gentiles, not of Israel from it self: yours is your own, and from men, in all main points, of your own profession: But therefore Israel must be holy: If any man deny holinesse to be required of every Christian, let him feel your Maranatha. In *Neh.*9.2. The Israelites separated themselves from the strangers, which were Infidels: whether in their marriage, or devotion: Neither Gods service, nor an Israelites bed was for heathens. This was not the constituting of a new Church, but reforming of the old; If therefore you can parallel us with Pagans, and your selves will be Jews, this place fits you. Lastly, what if there be an hatred betwixt the World and Christs true Disciples, *Joh.*17.14.16. what if Peter charged his Auditors to save themselves from the errors & practice of that froward Generation, whose hands were yet freshly imbrewed with the bloud of Christ, *Act.*2.40? What if the same which Peter taught, Paul practised, in separating his followers from hearing some obstinate and blasphemous Jewes, *Act.*19.9. what if the Church of Corinth were Saints by calling, 1 *Cor.*1.2. and therefore must be separated from the yoke of infidels, 2.6.17. Are these your patterns? Are these fit matches for your brethren, baptized in the same water and name, professing every point of the same true faith, using (for substance) the same worship with you? He that saith he is in the light and hateth his brother, is in darknesse, 1 John 2.9.

Which separation the Church of England neither hath made, nor doth make, but stands actually one with all that part of the World within the Kingdome, without separation: for which cause, amongst others, we have chosen by the grace of God, rather to separate our selves to the Lord from it, than with it from him, in the visible constitution of it.

SECTION VI.

BUt all these examples, perhaps are not so much to warrant what you have done as to condemn the Church of England for what she hath not done: for such separation she neither hath made nor doth make, but stands actually one with all that part of the world within the Kingdome without separation. Lo, here the main ground of this Schism, which your Proto-Martyr Barrow hammers upon in every page; an ill constitution: Thus he comments upon your words: For where such prophane confuse multitudes without any exception, separation or choise, were all of them from publike Idolatry, at one instant received or rather compelled to be members of the Church, in some parish or other, where they inhabited, without any due calling to the faith, by the preaching of the Gospell going before, or orderly joyning together in the faith, there being no voluntary or particular confession of their own faith and duties made or required of any, and lastly, no holy walking in the faith amongst them; who can say that these Churches consisting of this people, were ever rightly gathered or built according to the rule of Christs Testament? In his words & yours I find both a miscollection, and a wrong charge. For the former: the want of noting one poore distinction, breeds all this confusion of Doctrine, and separation of men: for there is one case of a new Church to be called from Heathenism to Christianity, another of a former Church to be reformed from errors, to more sincere Christianity. In the first of these is required indeed a solemn initiation by Baptisme; and before that, a voluntary and particular confession of faith, and therefore a cleare separation, and exception of the Christian, from the infidell: In the latter, neither is new Baptisme lawfull (though some of you belike of old were in hand with a rebaptization: which not then speeding, succeedeth now to your shame) nor a new voluntary and particular confession of Faith, besides that in baptisme (though very commendable) will ever be proved simply necessary to the being of a Church; so long as the erring parties doe actually renounce their doctrines, and in open profession embrace the truth; and (as generally in the publike confession) so particularly upon good occasion give just testimonies of their repentance: This is our case, we did not make a new Church, but mended an old: your Clifton is driven to this hold by necessity of Argument; Otherwise he sees there is no avoyding of Anabaptisme: Mended, saith your Doctor, and yet admitted the miscelline rabble of the prophane? Say now, that such separation were not made: Let some few be holy, and the more part prophane: Shall the lewdnesse of some disanull Gods Covenant with others? This is your mercy Gods is more: who still held Israell for his, when but few held his pure service: Let that Divine Psalmist teach you how full the Tents of Israel were of mutinous Rebels in the Desart; yet the Pillar by day and night forsook them not; and Moses was so farre from rejecting them, that he would not endure God should reject them to his owne advantage: Look into the black censures, and bitter complaints of all the Prophets and wonder that they separated not: Looke into the increased masse of corruptions in that declined Church; whereof the blessed eyes of our Saviour were witnesses, and marvell at his silent & sociable incuriousnesse: yea, his charge of not separating; Ye know not of what spirit you are: Now you fly to constitution, as if notorious evils were more tolerable in continuance, than in the collection of Assemblies: Sardi had but a few names that had not defiled their garments; God praises these, bids them not separate from the rest. Thyatira suffers a false propheteesse: the rest that have not this learning, yet are bidden but to hold their own; not to separate from the Angell, which hath not separated Jezabel from the Church.

What separation the Church of England hath made. Bar p.22.&55. F. Johns. against M.H. Act. & Mon. passim.

YOur charge is no lesse injurious; that the Church of England hath made no separation: Concerning which you have learned of your Martyr, and overseers so to speake, as if before her late disclamation of popery, in Queen Elizabeths time, she had not been. Her monuments could have taught you better, and have lead you to her ancient Pedigree not much below the Apostolike dayes, and in many descents have shewed you not a few worthy witnesses and patrons of Truth; all which, with their holy and constant off-spring, it might have pleased you to have separated from this imputation of not separating: Will you know therefore how the Church of England hath separated? In her first conversion she separated her selfe from Pagans: in her continuance she separated her selfe from grosse heretiques, and sealed her separation with bloud: in her reformation she separated her selfe from wilfull Papists, by her publike profession of Truth, and proclaimed hatred of error? and she daily doth separate the notoriously evill, by suspensions, by excommunications, though not so many as yours; Besides the particular separations of many from the acknowledged corruptions, in judgement, profession, practice. All these will be avowed in spight of all contradiction: with what forehead then can you say; the whole Church of England hath not at all separated?

Troubl. & excom pa.191. M.Sprag.1.

After all your shifts and idle tales of constitution, you have separated from this Church against the Lord; not with the Lord, from it: If there be Christ with us, if the Spirit of God in us, if Assemblies, if calling by the word: whatsoever is, or is not else in the Constitution, there is whatsoever is required to the essence of a Church. No corruption either in gathering or continuance can destroy the truth of being, but the grace of being well: If Christ have taken away his Word and Spirit you have justly subduced; else you have gone from him in us.

Fr. Jun. lib. de Eccles.

And when you have all done, the Separatists Idoll; visible Constitution, will prove but an appendance of an externall forme, no part of the essence of a true Church: and therefore your separation no lesse vaine than the ground, than the Authors. Lastly, if our bounty should (which it cannot) grant, that our collection was at first deeply faulty: cannot the Ratihabition (as the Lawyers speake) be drawn back? may not an after-allowance rectifie and confirme it? In contracts (your own similitude) a following consent justifies an act done before consent: and why not in the contract betwixt God and his visible Church? Loe, he hath confirmed it by his gracious benedictions, and as much as may be in silence given us abundant proofes of his acceptation: That after-act, which makes your Baptisme lawfull, why can it not make our Church?

Section VIII.

Constitution of a Church.

BUt for as much as Constitution is the very state of Brownisme, Let us (I beseech you) inquire a little into the complexion of your Constitution: Whether Physick, or Law, or Architecture have lent you it: sure I am, it is in this use, Apocryphall: Never man used it thus scrupulously till your times: Though, what need you the helpe of Fathers or Schooles: new words must expresse new Paradoxes. It is no treason to coine termes: What then is Constituion? Your Doctor can best tell us: As the Constitution of a Common-wealth, or of a City, is a gathering or uniting of a people together into a civill Politie: So (saith he) the Constitution of the Common-wealth of Israel, and of the City of God, the new Jerusalem, is a gathering and uniting of people into a divine Polity. The forme of which Polity, is Order: which order is requisite in all actions, and Adminstrations of the Church, as the Apostle sheweth, and specially in the Constitution thereof: so that next unto faith in God, it is to be esteemed most necessary for all holy societies. Hence Paul rejoyced in the Colossians Order and Faith: To this Constitution therefore, belong a people, as the matter; secondly, a calling, or gathering together, as the form, whereof the Church consisteth. The Constitution of the Church of England is false in both: Why so? Have we not a people? Are not those people called together? To prevent this, you say our Constitution is false, not none: Why false? Because

H. Answorth. Counterp pag. 170.

Coloss. 1.5.

cause those people have neither Faith, nor Order. For Faith first: Who are you that dare thus boldly break into the closets of God, the hearts of men? and condemn them to want that, which cannot be seen by any but divine eyes? How dare you intrude thus into the Throne of your Maker? Consider, and conferre seriously: What Faith is it, that is thus necessarily required to each member in this Constitution? Your own Doctor shall define it: Faith required to the receiving in of members, is the knowledge of the Doctrine of salvation by Christ, 1 Cor. 12. 9. Gal. 3. 2. Now I beseech you in the feare of God, lay by a while all unchristian prejudice, and peremptory verdicts of those soules, which cost Christ as much bloud as your own: and tell me ingenuously, whether you dare say, that not only your Christian brethren with whom you lately conversed, but even your fore-fathers which lived under Queen Elizabeths first confused Reformation, knew not the Doctrine of salvation by Christ: if you say they did not, your rash judgement shall be punished fearefully by him whose office you usurp. As you look to answer before him that would not break the bruised Reed, nor quench the smoaking Flax; presume not thus, above men and Angels. If they did, then had they sufficient claime both to true Constitution and Church: But this faith must be testified by obedience; so it was. If you thinke not so, yours is not testified by love: both were weak, both were true: Weakneſse in any grace or work, takes not away truth: Their sinnes of ignorance could no more disanull Gods Covenant with them, than multiplicity of wives with the Patriarchs.

SECTION IX.

WHat wanted they then? Nothing but Order; and not all Order, but yours: Order, a thing requisite and excellent; but let the world judge whether essentiall. Consider now, I beseech you in the bowels of Christ Jesus, whether this be a matter for which heaven and earth should be mixed: whether for want of your Order, all the world must be put out of all order, and the Church out of life and being. Nothing (say we) can be more disorderly, than the confusion of your Democracy, or popular state (if not Anarchy:) Where all (in a sort) ordaine and excommunicate; We condemn you not for no true members of the Church: what can be more orderlesse (by your own confessions) than the Trivenue Church at Amsterdam? which yet you grant but faulty. If there be disproportion and dislocation of some parts, is it no true humane body? Will you rise from the feast, unlesse the dishes be set on in your own fashion? Is it no City, if there be mud-wals half broken, low Cottages unequally built, no State-house? But your order hath more essence than you can expresse; and is the same which Politicians in their trade call (συνταξιν τῆς πολεως) an incorporating into one common civill body, by a voluntary union, and that under a lawfull government: Our Church wants both: wherein there is both constraint, and false office. Take your own resemblance and your own asking: Say that some Tyrant (as Basilius of Russia) shall forcibly compell a certaine number of Subjects into Mosco, and shall hold them in an awfull Garrison, forcing them to new laws and Magistrates, perhaps hard and bloudy: They yeeld; and making the best of all, live together in a cheerfull communion, with due commerce, loving conversation, submissive execution of the enjoyned lawes: In such case, whether is Moscoa true City, or not? Since your Doctor cites Aristotle, let it not irke him to learn of that Philosopher, who can teach him, that when Calisthenes had driven out the Tyrant from Athens, and set up a new Goverument, and received many strangers, and bondmen into the Tribes, it was doubted, not which of them were Citizens, but whether they were made Citizens unjustly. If you should find a company of true Christians in utmost India, would you stand upon termes, and inquire how they became so? whiles they have what is necessary for that heavenly profession; what need your curiosity trouble it selfe with the meanes?

YOu ſee then what an idle plea conſtraint is in the conſtitution of a Citty, the ground of all your exception: But it is otherwiſe in Gods city, the Church, why then doth his Doctorſhip parallel theſe two? And why may not even cõſtraint it ſelf have place in the lawfull conſtitution or reformation of a Church? Did not Manaſſes after his comming home to God, charge and cõmand Juda to ſerve the Lord God of Iſrael? Did not worthy Joſiah, when he had made a covenant before the Lord, cauſe all that were found in Jeruſalem, and Benjamin, to ſtand to it, and compelled all that were found in Iſrael, to ſerve the Lord their God? What have Queen Elizabeth, or King James done more? Or what other? did not Aſa upon Obeds prophecy gather both Juda and Benjamin, and all the ſtrangers from Ephraim, Manaſſes and Simeon, and enact with them, that whoſoever would not ſeek the Lord God, ſhould be ſlaine? What means this perverſneſſe? You that teach we may not ſtay Princes leiſure to reform, will you not allow Princes to urge others to reform? What crime is this, that men were not ſuffered to be open Idolaters, that they were forced to yeeld ſubmiſſion to Gods ordinances? Even your own teach, that Magiſtrates may compell Infidels to hear the doctrine of the Church; and Papiſts, you ſay elſe-where (though too roughly) are Infidels: but you ſay, not to be members of the Church: Gods people are of the willing ſort: True, Neither did they compell them to this: They were before entred into the viſible Church by true Baptiſme, though miſerably corrupted: They were not now initiated, but purged: Your ſubtill Doctor can tell us from Bernard, that faith is to be perſwaded, not to be compelled: yet let him remember that the gueſts muſt be compelled to come in, though not to eate when they are come. Compelled, not by perſwaſions; for theſe were the firſt invitations; therefore by further meanes; Though this conceit hath no place with us, where men are urged not to receive a new faith, but to perform the old; to abandon that wicked Idolatry which had defiled them, and to entertaine but that truth, which the very power of their Baptiſme challenged at their hand: but this was the old ſong of the Donatiſts; far be it from our conſcience, to compell any man to the faith. If God did not draw us, and by a ſweet violence bend our wils to his, when ſhould we follow him? Either you have not read, or not cared for the practice of the ancient Church, & Auguſtines reſolution concerning the ſharp penalties impoſed upon the Donatiſts (would God none of your kindred) in his time; with his excellent defences of theſe proceedings.

Conſtitution of the Church of England.] Barrow and Greenw. paſſim.

BUt tell us then, what ſhould have been done? The Goſpell ſhould have been every where preached; All converts ſhould have been ſingled out, and have given a voluntary and particular confeſſion of their Faith, and Repentance: I anſwer you: The Goſpell was long and worthily preached in the dayes of King Edward; enough to yeeld both Martyrs to the ſtake and Profeſſors to the ſucceeding times. Were their holy Sermons, their learned writings and their precious bloud (which was no leſſe vocall) of no force? Afterwards in the beginning of Famous Queene Elizabeths reparation, what confluence was there of zealous Confeſſors returning now from their late exile? How painfully and divinely did they labor in this Vineyard of God? How did they (with their many holy Partners which had ſhrowded themſelves during that ſtorme of perſecution, in a dangerous ſecrecy) ſpread themſelves over this Land, and each-where drew flockes of hearers to them, and with them? Is all this nothing to their ingrateſull Poſterity? If you murmure that there were no more, take heed leſt you forget there were ſo many: for us, we doe ſeriouſly bleſſe God for theſe, and triumph in them.

All this premiſed; now comes a Chriſtian Edict from the ſtate, that every man ſhal yeeld obedience to this Truth, wherin they had been thus inſtructed: It was perfor-

A med by the most, whose submission, what was it but an actuall profession of their faith, and repentance? And since such was their face, who dares judge of their hearts? More than this, if ever can be shewed absolutely necessary in such a State of the Church to the very constitution, and repaired Being thereof, I doe here vow never to take the Church of England for my Mother.

We know, and grieve to see how scornfully your whol Sect, and amongst the rest your resolute Doctor turns over these gracious entrances and proceedings of these two Royall and blessed Reformers; and whom should he finde to raise his scoffes upon, but that Saint-like Historian M. Fox? Now (saies M. Fox) a new face of things began to appeare, as it were in a Stage, new players comming in, the old thrust B out: Now (saith your Doctors Comment) new Bishops came in, as players upon the old stage of the Popish Church, as if the Church were no whit altered, but the men: Shall we say, this is too much malice, or too little wit, and conscience? Even in the Lord Protectors daies, that holy man reports, that after the Scriptures restored, and Masses abolished, greater things followed these softer beginnings, in the reformation of the Churches: Learned and godly Divines were called for from forreign parts, a separation was made (though not so much willing, as wilfull) of open and manifest Adversaries from Professors, whether true or dissembled: Commissioners were appointed to visit every severall Dioceese. Every Bench of them had severall godly & learned Preachers to instruct the people in the truth, and to dissuade them from Idolatry and Superstition. The Popes Supremacy not thrust, but taught down: All wil-worship whatsoever, oppugned by publike Sermons: Images de- C stroyed, Pilgrimages forbidden, the Sacraments injoyned to be reverently and holily ministred, Ecclesiasticall persons reformed in life, in Doctrine: Processions laid down, Presence and attendance upon Gods word commanded, the holy expending of Sabbath daies appointed, due preparation to Gods table called for, set times of teaching injoyned to Bishops and other Ministers, all Shrines & Monuments of Idolatry required to be utterly taken from publike and private houses: All this, before his Parliament: By that, all bloudy laws against Gods truth were repealed, zealous Preachers encouraged, so as (saith that worthy Historian) God was much glorified, and the people in many places greatly edified. What need I goe further than this first yeare? Heare this and be ashamed, and assure your selves, that no man can ever reade those holy Monuments of the Church, but must needs spet at your separation. D After that sweet and hopefull Prince, what his Renowned Sister Queen Elizabeth did, the present times doe speak, and the future shall speak, when all these Murmurers shall sleep in the dust. The publike Disputations, zealous preachings, restaurations of banished Religion and men, Extirpations of Idolatry, Christian laws wise and holy proceedings, and renewed covenants with God, are still fresh in the memories of some, and in the eares of all; so as all the World will justly say, you have lost shame with Truth, in denying it: Yea, to fetch the matter yet further: If the Reader shall look back to the dayes of their puissant Father King Henry the Eighth, he cannot but acknowledge (especially during the time of Queen Anne, and before those six bloody Articles) a true face of a Church (though over-spred with some Mor- E phue of corruptions) and some commendable forwardnesse of Reformation: for both the Popes Supremacy was abrogated, the true Doctrine of justification commonly taught, confidence in Saints untaught, the vanity of Pardons declared, worship of Images and Pilgrimages forbidden, learned and godly Minsters required, their absences and mis-demeanors inhibited, the Scriptures translated, publikely and privately enjoyned to be read and received, the Word of God commanded to be sincerely and carefully preached: and to all this, Holy Master Fox addeth for my conclusion, such a vigilant care was then in the King and his Councell, how by all waies and meanes to redresse Religion, to reform errors, to correct corrupt customes, to help ignorance, and to reduce the mis-leading of Christs Flock, drowned in blind Popery, Superstitious Customes, and Idolatry, to some better forme of Reformation, whereunto he provided not onely these Articles, Precepts, Injunctions above specified, to informe the rude people, but also procured the Bishops to help forward the the same cause of decayed Doctrine, with their diligent preaching, and teaching of the people. Goe now and say, that suddenly in one day, by Queen Elizabeths Trumpet, or by the sound of a bell, in the name of Antichrist, all were called to the Church: Goe, say with your Patriarch, that we erect Religions by Proclamations, and Parliaments.

Upon these premises I dare conclude, and doubt not to maintain against all Separatists in the World, that England (to goe no higher) had in the dayes of King Henry the Eighth, a true visible Church of God: and so by consequent their succeeding seed was by true Baptisme justly admitted into the bosome thereof; and therefore that even of them, without any further profession, Gods Church was truly constituted. If you shall say, that the following Idolatry of some of them in Queen Maries dayes excluded them: Consider, how hard it will be to prove, that Gods covenant with any people, is presently disanulled by the sinnes of the most, whether of ignorance, or weakneſſe; and if they had herein renounced God, yet that God also mutually renounced them. To shut up your constitution then: There is no remedy: Either you must goe forward to Anabaptisme, or come back to us. All your Rabbins cannot answer that charge of your rebaptized brother: If we be a true Church you must returne; if we be not (as a false Church is no Church of God) you must rebaptize: If our Baptisme be good, then is our constitution good. Thus your own principles teach. The outward part of a true visible Church is a vow, Promise, Oath, or Covenant betwixt God and the Saints: Now I ask, Is this made by us in baptisme, or no? If it be, then we have by your confession (for so much as is outwardly required) a true visible Church: so your separation is unjust: If it be not, then you must rebaptize; for the first Baptisme is a nullity: and (if ours be not) you were never thereby as yet entred into any visible Church.

To the title of a Ring-leader, wherewith it pleaseth this Pistler to stile me, I answer that if the thing I have done be good, it is good and commendable to have been forward in it; if it be evill, let it be reproved by the light of Gods Word, and that God, to whom I have done that I have done, will (I doubt not) give me both to see, and to heale mine error by speedy repentance: if I have fled away on foot, I shall return on Horse-back: But as I durst never set foot into this way, but upon a most sound and unresistable conviction of conscience by the word of God: (as I was perswaded) so must my retyring be wrought by more solid reasons from the same word, than are to be found in a thousand such pretty Pamphlets, and formall flourishes as this is.

The Answerers title.

AS for the title of Ring-leader, wherewith I stiled this Pamphleter; if I have given him too much honor in his Sect, I am sorry: Perhaps I should have put him (pardon an homly, but in this sense, not unusuall word) in the taile of this Traine: Perhaps, I should have endorsed my Letter to M. Smith, and his shaddow; So I perceive he was: Whatsoever, whether he lead or follow, God meets with him. If he lead: Behold I will come against them that propheſie false dreams (saith the Lord) and doe tell them, and cause my people to erre by their lyes. If he come behind; Thou shalt not follow a multitude in evill (saith God.) If either, or both, or neither, If he wil go alone; woe unto the foolish Prophets (saith the Lord) which follow their own spirits, and have seen nothing. Howsoever, your evill shall be reproved by the light of Gods word: Your conjunction I cannot promise, your reproofe I dare; If thereupon you finde grace to see and heale your errors, we should with all brotherly humbleneſſe attend on foot upon your return on Horse-back; but if the sway of your mis-resolved conscience be heady and unresistable, and your retyring hopeleſſe; these not solid reasons, these pretty Pamphlets, these formall flourishes shall one day be fearefull and materiall evidences against you before that awfull Judge, which hath already said, That judgements are prepared for the Scorners, and stripes for the back of Fooles.

Your pitying of us and sorrowing for us, especially for the wrong done by us, were in you commendable affections, if by us justly occasioned; but if your Church be deeply drencht in Apostasie, and you cry, Peace, Peace, when sodaine and certaine desolation is at hand, it is you that doe wrong, though you make the complaint: and so being cruell towards your selves, and your own, whom you flatter, you cannot be truly pitifull towards others whom you bewaile. But I will not discourage you in this affection, lest we finde few in the same fault: the most in stead of pity & compassion, affording us nothing but fury & indignation.

SECTION XIII.

I Professed to bestow pity and sorrow upon you and your wrong: You entertain both harshly, and with a churlish repulse: What should a man doe with such dispositions? Let him stroke them on the back, they snarle at him, and shew their teeth: Let him shew them a Cudgell, they fly in his face: you allow not our actions, and return our wrong; Ours is both the injury and complaint; How can this be? You are the Agents, we sit still, and suffer in this rent; Yet (since the cause makes the Schisme) let us enquire, not whose the action is, but whose the desert: Our Church is deepe drencht in Apostasie; and we cry Peace, peace: No lesse than a whol Church at once, and that not sprinkled, or wetshod, but drencht in Apostasie; What, did we fall off from you, or you from us? Tell me, were we ever the true Church of God? and were we then yours? We cannot fall, unlesse we once stood: Was your Church before this Apostasie? Shew us your Ancestors in opinion: Name me but one that ever taught as you doe, and I vow to separate: Was it not? Then we fell not from you: Every Apostasie of the Church must needs be from the true Church. A true Church, & not yours? And yet can there be but one true; See now whether in branding us with Apostasie, you have not proved yours to be no true Church; Still I am ignorant: Queen Maries dayes (say you) had a true Church, which separated from Popery, chose them Ministers, served God holily, from thence was our Apostasie: But, were not the same also (for the most part) Christians in King Edwards daies? Did they then, in that confused allowance of the Gospell, separate? Or (I pray you) were Cranmer, Latimer, Ridley, Hooper, and the rest, parts of that Church, or no? Was there any other ordination of Ministers than from them? Reject these, and all the world will hisse at you; Receive them, & where is our Apostasie? What Antichristianism have we, wherof these were freed; But you leap back (if I urge you farre) from hence to the Apostles times, to fetch our once true Church from far, that it might be deare; you shall not carve for us: we like not these bold over-leaps of so many Centuries: I speak boldly; you dare not stand to the triall of any Church, since theirs: Now I heare your Doctor say, this Challenge savours of Rome: Antiquity is with you, a Popish plea: we have willingly taken up our Adversaries, at this (by pretence, their own) weapon; You debar it in the cõscience of your own novell singularity; Yet your Pastor can be cõtent to make use of Tertul. alone against all Fathers; That such things are justly to be charged with vanity, as are done without any precept, either of the Lord, or of the Apostles: And the Apostles did faithfully deliver to the Nations the Discipline they received of Christ which we must believe to be the tumultuary Discipline of the refined houseful at Amsterdam: What? all in all ages, and places till now Apostates? Say if you can, that those famous Churches, wherein Cyprian, Athanasius, Ambrose, Hierome, Austen, Chrysostom, and the rest of those blessed Lights lived, were lesse deepe in this Apostasie than ours? O Apostaticall Fathers, that separated not! yea, say if you dare, that other reformed Churches are not over the Ankles with us in this Apostasie: what hard news is this to us, when as your Oracle dare say not much lesse, of the reformed Churches of Netherlands, with whom you live? Thus he writes; For not hearing of them in other Cõgregations in these countries; this I answer, That seeing by the mercy of God, we have seen & forsaken the corruptions, yet remaining in the publike ministration and condition dition of theſe Churches, (if they be all like to theſe of this city) we cannot therefore partake with them, in ſuch caſe, without declining, & Apoſtaſy from the truth which we have our ſelves already received and profeſſed. See here, to partake with them in Gods ſervice is Apoſtaſie; If ſo in the acceſſories, Alas, what crime is in the principall? It were but apoſtaſie to hear an Engliſh ſermon; a Dutch is no leſſe, Wo is you that you dwell ſtill in Meſhech: Good men; it were not more happy for you than the Church, that you were well in Heaven. No leſſe than Apoſtaſie? Let no Reader be appalled at ſo fearfull a word; this is one of the terms of Art, familiar to this way: Finde but any one page of a Dutch printed Volume without Apoſtaſie, Excommunication Cõmingling, Conſtitution, and ſuſpect it not theirs: Hereſy is not more frequent at Rome, than Apoſtaſie at Amſterdam; nor Indulgences more ordinary there, than here Excommunications. Cõmon uſe makes terrible things eaſie: Their own M. S L. for holding with the Dutch Baptiſme, and Read-prayers, is acknowledged to be caſt out for an Apoſtate: yea, their Doctor Maſter Anſworth is noted with this marke from themſelves: There is much latitude (as happy is) in their Apoſtaſie; For when Stanſhal, Mercer, & Jacob Johnſon were to be choſen Officers in their Church, and exception was taken by ſome at their Apoſtaſie, anſwer was made, It was not ſuch Apoſtaſie as debarred them from Office, it was but a ſlip. John Marke (whether, as Iſichius & Theophylact think, the bleſſed Evangeliſt, or ſome other holy Miniſter) is by the whol Parlour at Amſterdam, branded with this lame Apoſtaſie; who departed indeed, but from Paul in his journy, not from Chriſt in his faith, and therefore (שמעזיתה) is expounded by (μὴ συνιδοῦσα) Act. 15.38. why doe we thinke much to drink of an Evangeliſts Cup? Yet let this ignorant Epiſtler teach his cenſorious Anſwerer one point of his own (that is the Separatiſts) ſkill: and tell him that he objects two crimes to one poor Church, which are incompatible; want of Conſtitution, and Apoſtaſie. Thus writes your Maſter of us: If it were admitted (which can never be proved) that they ſomtimes had been true eſtabliſhed Churches. Lo here, we never had true Cõſtitution therfore we are not capable of apoſtaſie: If we once had it, & ſo were true Churches, hear what your Paſtor ſaith: As Chriſt giveth to all true Churches their being, ſo we muſt leave it unto him to take it away, when, and as he pleaſeth. And therfore ſince he hath not removed his Candleſticke, nor taken away his Kingdome, in ſpight of all objected Apoſtaſies, we ſtill continue ſo: and by conſequent your ſeparation upon this ground is moſt unjuſt. An apoſtat had wont to be the fearfull ſurname of damned Julian: Tortus was an eaſie accuſer, to whom yet, we may ſay with Elihu, Num dicis Regi, Apoſtata? Behold, now ſo many apoſtates as men: Holy Cyprian deſcribes him by forſaking Chriſts colours, and taking up Armes for Gentiliſme in life, or hereſie in judgement: And Auſten tels us, there cannot be a greater ſin than Apoſtaſie; making elſe-where this ſinner, worſe than the Infidell. And the old vulgar can give no worſe terme to (בליעל) where he findes it, yea to (חמודי ים) Rebels themſelves. What doth this brand to a Church, not Chriſtian only (though you deny it) but famous? Of whom is truly verified (after all your ſpleene) that which the Spirit writes to the Angell of Epheſus: Laborasti & non Defeciſti: Say if you can, what Article of the Chriſtian and Apoſtolike faith have we renounced? What Hereſie maintaine we? Wherein have we run from the Tents of Chriſt? What hold we that may not ſtand with life in Chriſt, and ſalvation? We challenge all men and Devils in this point, for our innocence: Diſtinguiſh for ſtarke ſhame, of ſo foule a word; or (which is better) eate it whole; and let not this blemiſh be left upon your ſoule & name in the Records of God, and the world; that you once ſaid of a Church, too good for yours, Drencht in Apoſtaſie. If we cry Peace, whiles you cry Apoſtaſie; ſurely we flatter, whiles you raile: betwixt theſe two dangerous extremes, we know an wholſome mean, ſo to approve, that we foſter not ſecurity: ſo to cenſure, that we neither revile, nor ſeparate: and in one word, to doe that which your Paſtor could exhort the Separators from your Separation (for even this Schiſme hath Schiſmes) If we ſhould miſlike, yet to reſt in our differences of judgement, and notwithſtanding peaceably to continue with the Church: Had you taken this courſe you ſhould neither have needed to expect our pitie, nor to complain of our cruelty. The first action laid against us, is of unnaturalnesse and ingratitude towards our Mother the Church of England, for our causelesse separation from her: to which unjust accusation, and triviall querimony, our most just defence hath been, and is, that to our knowledge we have done her no wrong, we doe freely, and with all thankfulnesse acknowledge every good thing she hath, and which our selves have there received.

Section XIV.

INgratitude and unnaturalnesse to your Mother is objected, in that you fly from her, yea now (woe is me) that you spet in her face, and mark her for an Harlot: Would God the accusation were as far from being just, as from being triviall: Yet C perhaps you intend it not in the lightnesse of this charge, but the commonnesse: you have caused me to smart for my charity, yet I forbeare it not: What is your defence? That you have done her no wrong, to your knowledg. Modestly spoken, but doubtfully: we know your wrong, but we know not your knowledge. It is well, if your wrong be not wilfull: an ignorant wrong is both in more hope of amends, and of mercy: But is not this caution added, rather for that you thinke no hard measure can possibly be a wrong to so vile a Church? I ask, and would be denyed: No, you do freely, and with all thankfulnesse acknowledge every good thing she hath: Whatsoever you doe to us, I will not any more in favor of you, wilfully wrong my selfe: you have bidden me now to take you as a compleat Separatist: and speake this for your selfe and yours; Let the Reader now judge whether the wrong of your Sect be D wilfull, and acknowledgement of our good, free and thankfull. Your first false named Martyr shall give the first witnesse of the titles of our Church: Who (saith he) that were not drunk and intoxicate with the Whores Cup, could affirm this confuse Babel, these cages of uncleane Birds, these Prisons of foule and hatefull spirits, to be the Spouse of Christ? And else-where, he cals the people of our Church, Goats and Swine. Is this any wrong to your knowledge? The same Author: They have not (saith he) in their Churches any one thing in their practice and proceedings, not one pin, naile, or hook according to the true pattern: Do you not now freely and thankfully acknowledge our Churches good things? What is more ordinary with him, and his brother in evil, John Greenwood, than to call our Ministers Baals Priests, Cainits, E the marked servants of Antichrist, Sellers of the Whores wares, Worshippers of the Beast? Is this yet any wrong to your knowledge? Pastor Johnson stickes not to say, that the Ministery and Worship of the Church of England were taken out of the Whores Cup; and plainly stiles our Church (as which of you doe not?) Daughter of the great Babylon, that mother of Whoredomes and abominations of the earth: yet more; That Hierarchie, Worship, Constitution, and Government, which they professe and practise, being directly Antichristian, doe utterly destroy true Christianity, so as their people and Churches cannot in that estate be judged true Christians: Doe you not now freely and thankfully acknowledge our good things? What can any Devill of Hell say worse against us than this, That we are no Christians? Or what good can there be in us, if no true Christianity? If we denyed every Article of the Christian Creed: if we were Mahumetans (as your good Pastor stickes not to compare us) if the most damned Heretikes under heaven, what could he he say, but no Christians? Your Teachers and Pastor (which is a wonder) agree: For your Doctor Ainsworth makes this one head of his poysonous Counterpoyson, that Christ is not the Head, Mediator, Prophet, Priest, King of the Church of England: You, their Disciple, are not yet promoted to this height of immodesty; yet what are your good things? Yea, that your uncharitableness may be, above all examples, monstrous, You do not only deny us any interest in the Church of Christ, but exclude us (what you may) from all hope and possibility of attaining the honor of Christendome: For when a godly Minister protested to Master Barrow, the truth of his Ministery; upon the approbation also of his people, he received this answer from him: Though you had such allowance, it could nothing availe, but rather overthrow your Ministery, they being as yet ungathered to Christ, and therefore neither may not in this estate chuse them a Minister, nor any exercise a Ministery unto them, without hainous sacrilege. O desperate judgement; we neither are Christians, nor can be! No Christianity without Faith, no Faith without the Ministery of the Word, no Word to us without Sacrilege: What are we, that the very offer of bringing us to God should be criminal? These are your acknowledgements of our good; who have learned of your Pastor to kisse and kill all at once; to blesse and curse with one breath: your mercies are cruell.

BUt who can wonder at your unnaturalness to the Church, that heares what measure you meet to your owne? Error is commonly joyned with cruelty: The outragious demenors of the Circumcelliones in Augustines time, and more than barbarous tyranny of the Arrians before him, are well known by all Historie, and not enough by any: God forbid, that I should compare you to these. Heare rather of Novatus, the Father of a not unlike Sect, of whom Cyprian reports, that he would neither bestow bread on his father alive, nor buriall on him dead, but suffered him both to starve and stinke in the street: and for his wife (lest he should be mercifull to any) he spurned her with his heele: and slew his owne childe in her body: What need I seeke so farre? I grieve to think and report, that your own Pastor hath paralleld this cruelty: His own brother (which is no lesse savage) though one of your Sect, is the publike accuser condemner & of him in this crime to all the world: who after a pitifull relation of his eight yeeres quarrels with him, and foure yeeres Excommunication, in his Epistle before a large Volume to this purpose, writes thus.

After all these, hath not our kinde, carefull, and old Father come a long journey to make Peace? Hath he not labored with you, the Elders and the Church; to bring you to peace? Hath he not used the helpe and counsell of the reformed Churches herein? Yet will you not be reclaimed; but adding that sinne above all, have also monstrously excommunicated your Father the Peace-seeker, &c. And straight; How oft desired he you, (as if he had been the sonne, and you the father) even with teares, that you would repent? In a word, how came he and I to your doore, shewing you that it might be upon his departing) you should see his face no more? &c. Yet you forced him by your ill dealing, still to leave upon you his curse, and all the curses written in Gods booke against unthankfull and disobedient children. Thus farre a brother concerning a brother, against father and brother. Other strangely-unkinde usages of both, I had rather leave to the discovery of Master White, and this miserable Plantiffe, who have written enough to make an enemie ashamed. But whereupon was all this fearefull broyle in a pure Church? For nothing but a little lace, and Whale-bone in his wives sleeve. The Trojane warre could not be slandered with so weighty a beginning. As for your Elder, Daniel Studly (whom your Pastor so much extolleth) if Master Whites Apostasie may be your shift against his Relation; let him speake, who should have been a Fellow Elder with him, banished from your truth, though ejected by your censure: Marke (saith *G. It is no joy to me to blazon these, or your other sins; would God they were fewer, and lesse in us all. Onely it was fit the World should know, as how undutifull you are to your common Parent, so that Father, Brother, Children beare part with your Mother in these your cruelties.

IF then such be the good things of our Church; What good can you acknowledge to have received from her? Nothing gives what it hath not: A Baptisme perhaps; Alas no true sacrament, you say: yea, the seale of graceleſneſſe and mischiefe; As litle are you beholden to the Church for that, as the Church to you, for your good acceptation: Why are you not baptized? You that cannot abide a false Church, why doe you content your selves with a false Sacrament? especially since our Church, being not yet gathered to Christ, is no Church, and therefore her baptisme a nullity.

What the Separatists think themselves beholden to the Church of England for. Bar. Exam. before the Archbishop and L. Anderson. Brown, state of Christians p. 39 Qui non habet quod det, quomodo det? vox Donat. Opt. li. 1.

What else doe you owe to the liberality of this Step-dame? You are close; your Pastor is lavish for you both; who thus speaks of himself, and you, and us: I confesse that whiles I was Minister in your Church of England, I stood in an Antichristian estate; yet doubt I not, but even then, being of the Elect of God, I was partaker through faith, of the mercy of God in Christ to salvation: but as for you (M. Jacob and his fellow-Christians) whiles you thus remain, you cannot in that estate approve your selves to have the promise of salvation. Behold here, the Church of England gave you but an Antichristian estate; if God give secret mercy, what is that to her?

Bar. supra. Fr. Johns against M. Jacob p. 41. Exc. 2.

D Gods superabundant grace doth neither abate ought of her Antichristianism nor move you to follow him in covering and passing by the manifold enormities in our Church, wherewith those good things are inseparably commingled: Your owne mouth shall condemn you: Doth God passe over our enormities, and doe you stick, yea separate? Doth his grace cover them, and doe you display them? Have you learned to be more just than your Maker? Or if you be not above his justice, why are you against his mercy? God hath not disclaimed us, by your own confession; you have prevented him. If Princes leasures may not be staied in reforming, yet shall not Gods in rejecting? Your ignorance enwrapped you in your errors: his infinite wisdome E sees them, and yet his infinite mercy forbears them: so might you at once have seen, disliked, stayed; If you did not herein goe contrary to the courses of our common God, how happy should both sides have been? yea, how should there be no sides? How should we be more inseparably commingled, than our good and evill?

But should you have continued still in sin that grace might have abounded? God forbid: you might have continued here without sinne (save your own) and then grace would no lesse have abounded to you, than now your sin abounds in not continuing: What need you to surfet of another mans Trencher? Others sinnes need no more to infect you, than your graces can sanctifie them. As for your further light, suspect it not of God: suspect it to be meere darknesse: and if the light in you bee darknesse, how great is that darknesse? What? so true and glorious a light of God, and never seen till now? No worlds, Times, Churches, Patriarchs, Prophets, Apostles, Martyrs, Fathers, Doctors, Christians, ever saw this truth looke forth besides you untill you? Externall light was Gods firſt creature, and ſhall this ſpirituall light, whereby all Churches ſhould be diſcerned, come thus late? Miſtruſt therefore your eyes, and your light: and feare Eſayes woe, and the Jewes miſerable diſappointment: we wait for light, but loe, it is darkneſſe: for brightneſſe, but we walk in obſcurity.

But the Church of England (ſay you) is our Mother, and ſo ought not to be avoyded: but ſay I, we muſt not ſo cleave to holy Mother Church, as we neglect our heavenly Father, and his commandements which we know in that eſtate we could not but tranſgreſſe, and that hainouſly, and againſt our conſciences, not only in the want of many Chriſtian Ordinances, to which we are moſt ſtraightly bound both by Gods Word and our own neceſſities.

SECTION XVII.

THe Church of England is your Mother, to her ſmall comfort; ſhe hath born you, and repented. Alas, you have given her cauſe to powre out Jobs curſes upon your Birth day, by your not only forſaking but curſing her: Stand not upon her faults, which you ſhall never prove capitall: Not onely the beſt Parent might have brought forth a rebellious ſonne to be ſtoned. What then? Do we prefer duty to piety, and ſo plead for our holy Mother Church, that we neglect our heavenly Father, yea, offend him? See what you ſay: it muſt needs be an holy Mother that cannot be pleaſed without the diſpleaſure of God: A good wife, that oppoſes ſuch an huſband: a good ſonne that upbraids this unjuſtly: Therefore is ſhe a Church, your Mother, holy, becauſe ſhe bred you to God, cleaves to him, obeies his commandements, and commands them. And ſo farre is ſhe from this deſperate contradiction, that ſhe voweth not to hold you for her ſonne, unleſſe you honour God as a Father. It is a wilfull ſlander that you could not but hainouſly tranſgreſſe under her: I dare take it upon my ſoule, that all your tranſgreſſion which you ſhould neceſſarily have incurred by her obedience, is nothing ſo hainous, as your uncharitableneſſe in your cenſures and diſobedience. Conſcience is a common plea, even to thoſe you hate: we inquire not how ſtrong it is, but how well informed: not whether it ſuggeſt this, but whereupon. To goe againſt the conſcience is ſinne, to follow a miſ-informed conſcience is ſinne alſo: If you doe not the firſt, we know you are faultie in the ſecond: He that is greater than the conſcience, will not take this for an excuſe: But wherein ſhould have been this tranſgreſſion; ſo unavoydable, hainous, againſt conſcience? Firſt, in the want of many ordinances, to which we are moſt ſtrictly bound, both by Gods Word, and our own neceſſities.

SECTION XVIII.

CAn you thinke this hangs well together? You ſhould here want many of Gods Ordinances: why ſhould you want them? Becauſe you are not ſuffered to enjoy them: who hinders it? Superiour powers: Did ever man wilfully and hainouſly offend, for wanting of that which he could not have? What hath conſcience to doe with that which is out of our power? Is neceſſity with you become a ſinne, and that hainous. David is driven to lurke in the wildernes, and forced to want the uſe of many divine Ordinances: It was his ſorrow, not his tranſgreſſion: He complains of this, but doth he accuſe himſelf of ſinne? Not to deſire them had been ſin, no ſinne to be debarred them: Well might this be Sauls ſinne, but not his. Have you not ſins enow of your own, that you muſt needs borrow of others? But I ſee your ground: You are bound to have theſe Ordinances; and therefore without Princes, yea againſt them: ſo it is your tranſgreſſion to want them in ſpight of Magiſtrates: Gaudentius the Donatiſt taught you this of old; and this is one of the Hebrew Songs which M. Barrow ſings to us in Babylon, that we care not to make Chriſt attend upon Princes, and to be ſubject to their Lawes and Government: and his Predeceſſor (the root of your Sect) tells us in this ſenſe the Kingdome of Heaven muſt ſuffer violence, and that it comes not with obſervation: that men may ſay, Loe the Parliament, or loe, the Biſhops decrees: and in the ſame Treatiſe; The Lords Kingdome muſt wait on your

A your policy, forsooth; and his Church must be framed your civill State, &c. Just as that Donatist of old, in Augustine, Quid vobis, &c. What have you to do with worldly Emperours? and as that other in Optatus: Quid imperatori cum Ecclesia? What hath the Emperour to doe with the Church? Yea, your Martyr feares not to teach us, that Gods servants being as yet private men, may and must together build his Church, though all the Princes of the world should prohibit the same upon paine of death: Belike then you should sin hainously, if you should not be Rebels. The question is not, whether we should ask leave of Princes to be Christians; but whether of Christian Princes we should aske leave to establish circumstances of Government: God must be served though we suffer; our bloud is well bestowed upon our Maker: but in patience, not in violence. Private profession is one thing; Publike Reformation and Injunction is another; Every man must doe that in the main: none may do this, but they of whom God sayes, I have said, Ye are Gods: and of them, There is difference betwixt Christian and Heathen Princes: If (at least) all Princes were not to you Heathen: If these should have been altogether stayed for, Religion had come late: If the other should not be stayed for, Religion would soon be over-laid with confusion: Lastly, the body of Religion is one thing, the skirts of outward Government another: that may not depend on men to be embraced, or (with loyalty) prosecuted: these (upon those generall rules Christ) both may, and do, and must: If you cut off but one lap of these with David, you shall be touched: To deny this power to Gods Deputies on Earth, what is it, but ye take too much upon you, Moses and Aaron, all the Congregation is holy: wherefore lift ye your selves above the Congregation of the Lord? See, if herein you come not too neere the wals of that Rome, which ye so abhorre and accurse, in ascribing such power to the Church, none to Princes. Let your Doctor tell you, whether the best Israelites in the times of Abijah, Asa, Jehosaphat, Ezekiah, Josiah, tooke upon them to reform without, or before, or against their Princes? Yea, did Nehemiah himself without Artabshat (though an Heathen King) set upon the wals of Gods City? Or what did Zerubabel, and Joshua without Cyrus? In whose time Hagai and Zachariah prophesied indeed, but built not: And when contrary Letters came from above, they laid by both Trowels and Swords: They would be Jewes still, they would not be Rebels for God: Had those letters injoyned Swines flesh, or Idolatry, or forbidden the use of the Law, those which now yeelded, had suffered, and at once testified their obedience to authority, and piety to him that sits in the assembly of these earthen gods. I urge no more: Perhaps you are more wise, or lesse mutinous: you might easily therefore purge your conscience from this sinne, of wanting what you might not perforce enjoy.

Say that your Church should employ you back to this our Babylon, for the calling out of more Proselytes: you are intercepted, imprisoned: Shall it be sinne in you not to heare the Prophesies at Amsterdam? The Clink is a lawfull excuse: If your feet be bound, your conscience is not bound. In these Negatives, outward force takes away both sinne and blame, and alters them from the patient to the actor: so that now you see your straight bonds (if they were such) loosed by obedience, and over-ruling power.

The necessity of their pretended ordinance.

THe first of these then, is easily untwisted: your second is necessity: Than which what can be stronger? what law, or what remedy is against necessity? What we must have we cannot want: Oppose but the publike necessity to yours: your necessity of having, to the the publike necessity of withholding: and let one of the necessities (like two nailes) drive out another: So they have done; and your own necessity (as the stronger) hath prevailed; for that other necessity might be eluded by flight: you have sought and found elsewhere what the necessitie of our laws denied, and the necessitie of your conscience required. Beware lest unjustly: Sinne is as strong bond to a good heart as impossibilitie; Christians cannot doe what they ought not: contrary to the laws of your Prince and Country, you have fled not only from us, but from our Communion. Either is disobedience no sin or might you doe this evill, that good may come of it? But what necessitie is this? simple & absolute, or conditionall? Is there no remedy but you must needs have such Elders, Pastors, Doctors, Releevers, such offices, such executions? Can there be no Church, no Christians without them? What shall we say of the families of the patriarks, of the Jewish congregations under the Law, yea, of Christ and his Apostles? Either deny them to have been visible Churches, or shew us your distinct offices amongst them: But as yet (you say) they were not: Therfore God hath had a true Church (thousands of yeeres) without them: Therefore they are not of the essence of the Church: You call me to the times since Christ: I demand then, was there not a worthy Church of God in Jerusalem from the time of Christs Ascension, till the election of the seven Deacons. Those hundred and twentie Disciples, Act. 1.15. and three thousand Converts, Act. 2.41. Those continuall Troups that flocked to the Apostles, were they no true Church? Let the Apostles and Evangelists be Pastors and Doctors: where were their Elders, Deacons, Releevers? Afterwards when Deacons were ordained, yet what news is there of Elders, till Act. 11? yet that of Jerusalem was more forward than the rest: We will not (as you are wont) argue from Scriptures negatively; no proofe, yet much probabilitie is in S. Pauls silence: He writes to Rome, Corinth, and other Churches; those his Divine letters in a sweet Christian civilitie salute even ordinary Christians; And would he have utterly passed by all mention of these Church-officers, amongst his so precise acknowledgement of lesser titles in others, if they had been ere this ordained? yet all these more than true Churches, famous some of them, rich, forward and exemplary. Onely the Philippian Church is stiled with Bishops and Deacons, but no Elders besides them. The Churches of Christ since these, (if

Heare then what we ſay both to you and them, our enemies both: and yet the enemies of our enemies: Firſt, we diſclamie, and defie your Pedegree and theirs. The Church of Rome was never our Mothers Mother: Our Chriſtian faith came not from the ſeven-hils: Neither was derived either from Auguſtine the Monke, or Pope Gregory. Britany had a worthy Church before either of them lookt into the world: It is true that the ancient Romane Church was ſiſter to ours: here was neer kindred, no dependance: And not more conſanguinity, than (while ſhe continued faithfull) Chriſtian love: Now ſhe is gone a whoring, her chaſt ſiſter juſtly ſpitteth at her: yet even ſtill (if you diſtinguiſh, as your learned Antagoniſt hath taught you, betwixt the Church and Papacie) ſhe acknowledges her Siſterhood, though ſhe refrains her converſation: as ſhe hath many flaviſh and factious abettors of her known and groſſe errors (to whom we deny this title) affirming them the body, whereof Antichriſt is the head, the great Whore, and Mother of abominations; ſo againe how many thouſands hath ſhe, which retaining the foundation according to their knowledge (as our learned Whitakers had wont to ſay of Bernard) follow Abſolom with a ſimple heart: all which to reject from Gods Church, were no better than preſumptuous cruelty. It were well for you before God and the World, if you could as eaſily waſh your hands of unnaturall impiety, and trecherouſneſſe, as we of Baſtardy and unjuſt ſequeſtration. There can be no Baſtardy, where was never any Motherhood, we were Nephews to that Church, never ſonnes: unleſſe as Rome was the mother Citty of the world, ſo by humane inſtitution, we ſuffered our ſelves to be ranged under her Patriarchall authority, as being the moſt famous Church of the Weſt: a matter of courteſie, and pretended Order; no neceſſity, no ſpirtuall obligation. As for our ſequeſtration, your mouth and theirs may be ſtopt with this Anſwer: As all corrupted Churches, ſo ſome things the Church of Rome ſtill holds aright; a true God in three perſons, true Scriptures, though with addition, a true Chriſt, though mangled with foule and erroneous conſequences; true Baptiſme, though ſhamefully deformed with rotten Traditions; and many other undeniable truths of God: ſome other things (and too many) her wicked Apoſtaſie hath deviſed and maintained abominably amiſſe; the body of her Antichriſtianiſme, groſſe errors, and (by juſt ſequell) hereſies; their Popes Supremacy, Infallibility, Illumination, Tranſubſtantiation, Idolatrous and ſuper-

A ſuperſtitious worſhip, and a thouſand other of this bran, in regard of all theſe latter, we profeſſe to the world a juſt and ancient ſeparation from this falſe faith and devotion of the Romiſh Church; which neither you will ſay, nor they ſhall ever prove faulty: yea rather they have in all theſe ſeparated from us, who ſtill irrefragably profeſſe to hold with the ancient, from whom they are departed. In regard of the other we are ſtill with them, holding and embracing with them what they hold with Chriſt: neither will you (I think) ever prove that in theſe we ſhould differ. As for our communion, they have ſeparated us by their proud and fooliſh excommunications: if they had not, we would juſtly have begun: from their Tyrany and Antichriſtianiſme, from their miſerable Idolatry: but as for the body of their poore se-
B duced Chriſtians, which remaine amongſt them upon the true foundation (as doubtleſſe there are thouſands of them which laugh at their Pardons, Miracles, Superſtitions, and their truſt in merits repoſing only upon Chriſt) we adhere to them in love and pity, and have teſtified our affection by our bloud, ready upon any juſt call to do it more; neither would feare to joyn with them in any true ſervice of our common God: But the full diſcourſe of this point, that honorable and learned Pleſſes hath ſo foreſtalled, that whatſoever I ſay, would ſeem but borrowed. Unto this rich Treatiſe I referre my Reader, for full ſatisfaction: Would God this point were throughly known, and well weighed on our parts. The neglect or ignorance whereof hath both bred and nurſed your ſeparation, and driven the weake and inconſiderate into ſtrange extremities.

Phil Morn. du Pleſſis lib. de Eccle. cap. 10.

This ſay we of our ſelves in no more Charity than Truth: But for you; how dare
C you make this ſhameleſſe compariſon? Can your heart ſuffer your tongue to ſay, that there is no more difference betwixt Rome and us, than there is betwixt us and you? How many hundred errors, how many damnable hereſies have we evinced with you, in that (ſo compounded) Church? ſhew us but one miſ-opinion in our Church that you can prove within the ken of the foundation: Let not zeale make you impudent: Your Doctor could ſay (ingenuouſly ſure) that in the Doctrines which ſhe profeſſeth, ſhe is farre better and purer than the Whore Mother of Rome; and your laſt Martyr, yet better: If you mean (ſaith he) by a Church (as the moſt doe) that publike profeſſion whereby men doe profeſſe ſalvation to be had by the death and righteouſneſſe of Jeſus Chriſt, I am free from denying any Church of Chriſt to be in this Land: for I know the Doctrine touching the holy Trinity, the natures and offices of the Lord Je-
D ſus, free juſtification by him; both the Sacraments, &c. publiſhed by her Majeſties authority, and commanded by her laws, to be the Lords bleſſed and undoubted Truths, without the knowledge and profeſſion whereof no ſalvation is to be had: Thus he with ſome honeſt, though little ſenſe. If therefore your will doe not ſtand in your light, you may well ſee, why we ſhould thus forſake their communion, and yet not you ours. Yet though their corruptions be incomparably more, we have not dared to ſeparate ſo farre from them, as you have done from us for leſſe: Still we hold them even a viſible Church, but unſound, ſick, dying; ſick, not of a conſumption only, but of a leproſie or plague (ſo is the Papacie to the Church) diſeaſes, not more deadly than infectious: If they be not rather in Sardis taking; of whom the ſpirit of God
E ſaith, thou haſt a name that thou liveſt, but thou art dead; and yet in the next words bids them awake, and ſtrengthen the things which are ready to die. And though our judgement and practice have forſaken their erroneous doctrines and ſervice, yet our charity (if you take that former diſtinction) hath not utterly forſaken and condemned their perſons. This is our cooleneſſe, but equality: your reprobation of us for them hath not more zeale than head ſtrong uncharitableneſſe.

The ſeparation made by our holy Martyrs.

BUt how could you without bluſhing once name Cranmer, Latimer, and thoſe other holy Martyrs, which have been ſo oft objected to the conviction of your Schiſme? Thoſe Saints ſo forſooke the Romiſh Church, as we have done, dyed witneſſes of Gods truth in that Church, from which you are ſeparted: lived, preached, governed, ſhed their bloud in the communion of the Church of England, which you diſclaime and condemn as no Church of God, as meerly Antichriſtian: Either of neceſſity they were no Martyrs, yea, no Chriſtians, or elſe your Seperations & Cenſures of us are wicked. Chuſe whether you will; They were in the ſame caſe with us; we are in the ſame caſe with them; no difference but in the time: either their bloud will be upon your heads, or your own: this Church had then the ſame conſtitution, the ſame confuſion, the ſame worſhip the ſame miniſtery, the ſame government (which you brand with Antichriſtianiſme) ſwayed by the holy hands of theſe men of God; condemn them, or allow us. For their Separation: They found many main errors of Doctrine in the Church of Rome (in the Papacy nothing but errors) worth dying for: ſhew us one ſuch in ours, and we will not only approve your Separation, but imitate it.

Sep.

But here in the name of the Church of England, you waſh your hands of all Babyloniſh abominations, which you pretend you have forſaken, and her for them. And in this regard you ſpeak thus: The Reformation you have made of the many and maine corruptions of the Romiſh Church, we doe ingennuouſly acknowledge and doe withall embrace with you all the truths which to our knowledge you have received in ſtead of them. But Rome was not built all in a day. The myſtery of iniquity did advance it ſelfe by degrees: and as the riſe was, ſo muſt the fall be. That Man of Sinne, and Lawleſſe man, muſt languiſh and die away of a conſumption, 2 Theſſal. 2. 8. And what though many of the higheſt Towers of Babel, and of the ſtrongeſt Pillars alſo be demoliſhed, and pulled down, yet may the building ſtand ſtill, though tottering to and fro (as it doth) and only under-propped and upheld with the ſhoulder and arme of fleſh, without which in a very moment it would fall flat upon, and lye levell with the earth.

Section XIV.

What ſeparation England hath made.

THe Church of England doth not now waſh her hands of Babyloniſh abominations, but rather ſhewes they are cleane. Would God they were no more foule with your ſlander than her own Antichriſtianiſme. Here will be found not pretences, but proofes of our forſaking Babylon; of your forſaking us, not ſo much as well coloured pretences: You begin to be ingenuous; while you confeſſe a reformation in the Church of England: not of ſome corruptions, but many; and thoſe many not ſlight, but maine.

The gifts of Adverſaries are thankleſſe: As Jerom ſaid of his Ruffinus; ſo may we of you, that you wrong us with praiſes: This is no more praiſe than your next page gives to Antichriſt himſelfe. Leave out many, and though your commendations be more uncertaine, we ſhall accept it: ſo your indefinite propoſition ſhall ſound to us as generall, That we have reformed the maine corruptions of the Romiſh Church: None therefore remain upon us, but ſlight and ſuperficiall blemiſhes. So you have forſaken a Church of foule ſkin, but of a ſound heart; for want of beauty, not of truth.

But you ſay many, not All, that if you can pick a quarrell with one, you might reject all: yet ſhew us that one maine and ſubſtantiall error, which we have not reformed: and you doe not more embrace thoſe truths with us which we have received, than we will condemn that falſhood which you have rejected, and embrace the truth of that ſeparation which you have practiſed.

The degrees whereby that ſtrumpet of Babylon got on horſback you have learned of us, who have both learned and taught, that as Chriſt came not abrupely into the world, but with many preſages, and prefigurations, (The day was long dawning ere this Sunne aroſe) ſo his adverſary (that Antichriſt) breakes not ſuddenly upon the Church

A Church, but comes with much preparation & long expectance: and as his riſe, ſo his fall muſt be graduall, and leiſurely: Why ſay you then, that the whole Church every where, muſt at once utterly fall off from the Church where the Man of ſinne ſitteth? His fall depends on the fall of others, or rather their riſing from under him: If neither of theſe muſt be ſudden, why is your haſte? But this muſt not be, yet ought: as there muſt be hereſies, yet there ought not: It is one thing what God hath ſecretly decreed, another what muſt be deſired of us: If we could pull that Harlot from her ſeat, and put her to Jezabels death, it were happy: Have we not endevoured it? What ſpeak you of the higheſt Towers, and ſtrongeſt pillars, or tottering remainders of Babylon? we ſhew you all her roofe bare, her walls razed, her vaults digged up, her monuments defaced, her Altars ſacrificed to deſolation. Shortly, all her building demoliſhed, not a ſtone upon a ſtone, ſave in rude heapes, to tell that here once was Babylon: Your ſtrife goes about to build again that her Tower of confuſion. God divides your languages: It will be well; if yet you build not more than we have reſerved.

SECTION XXVI.

C YOu will now be free both in your profeſſion and gift; You give us to have renounced many falſe doctrines in Popery: and to have embraced ſo many truths: we take it untill more: You profeſſe where you ſtick, what you miſlike: In theſe foure famous heads, which you have learned by heart from all your predeceſſours; An hatefull Prelacy, A deviſed Miniſtery, a confuſed and prophane communion, and laſtly, the intermixtures of grievous errors.

What if this truth were taught under a hatefull Prelacy? Suppoſe it were ſo; Muſt I not embrace the truth, becauſe I hate the Prelacy? What if Iſrael live under the hatefull Ægyptians? What if Jeremie live under hatefull Paſhur? What if the Jewes live under an hatefull Prieſthood; What if the diſciples live under hatefull Scribes? What are other perſons to my profeſſion? If I may be freely allowed to be a true profeſſed Chriſtian, what care I under whoſe hands? But why is our Prelacy hatefull? Actively to you, or paſſively from you? In that it hates you? Would God you were not more your own enemies; Or rather becauſe you hate it? your hatred is neither any news, or paine; Who or what of ours is not hatefull to you? Our Churches, Bels, Cloathes, Sacraments, Preachings, Prayers, Singings, Catechiſmes, Courts, Meetings, Burials, Mariages: it is marvell that our aire infects not; and that our heaven and earth (as Optatus ſaid of the Donatiſts) eſcape your hatred; not the forwardeſt of our Preachers (as you terme them) have found any other entertainment; no enemy could be more ſpightfull; I ſpeak it to your ſhame. Rome it ſelf in divers controverſary diſcourſes hath bewrayed leſſe gall, than Amſterdam; the better they are to others, you profeſſe they are the worſe: yea, would to God that of Paul were not verified of you; hateful, and hating one another; but we have learned, that of wiſe Chriſtians, not the meaſure of hatred ſhould be reſpected, but the deſert; David is hated for no cauſe, Michaiah for a good cauſe: Your cauſes ſhall be examined in their places onwards. It were happy if you hated your own ſinnes more, and peace leſſe; our Prelacy would trouble you leſſe, and you the Church.

FOr our deviſed office of Miniſtery you have given it a true title. It was deviſed indeed by our Saviour, when he ſaid, Go teach all Nations and Baptize; and performed in continuance, when he gave ſome to be Paſtors & Teachers; and not onely the Office of Miniſtery in generall, but ours whom he hath made able to teach, and deſirous, ſeparated us for this cauſe to the work, upon due triall admitted us, ordained us by impoſition of hands of the Elderſhip, and praier, directed us in the right diviſion diviſion of the Word, committed a charge to us; followed our Miniſtery with power, and bleſſed our labours with gracious ſucceſſe, even in the hearts of thoſe whoſe tongues are thus buſie to deny the truth of our vocation: Behold here the deviſed Office of our Miniſtery: What can you deviſe againſt this? Your Paſtor, who (as his brother writes) hopes to work wonders by his logicall ſkill, hath killed us with ſeven Arguments, which he profeſſeth the quinteſſence of his own, and Penries extractions, whereto your Doctor refers us as abſolute. I would it were not tedious, or worth a Readers labour to ſee them ſcanned. I proteſt before God and the world, I never read more groſſe ſtuffe ſo boldly and peremptorily faced out: ſo full of Tautologies and beggings of the Queſtion never to be yeelded. Let me mention the maine heads of them, and for the reſt be ſorry that I may not be endleſſe.

Certaine Arg. againſt the Miniſt. of England. Counterpoyſ.

To prove therefore that no communion may be had with the Miniſtery of the Church of England, he uſes theſe ſeven demonſtrations; Firſt, Becauſe it is not that Miniſtery which Chriſt gave, and ſet in his Church. Secondly, Becauſe it is the Miniſtery of Antichriſts Apoſtaſie. Thirdly, Becauſe none can communicate with the Miniſtery of England, but he worſhips the beaſts image, and yeeldeth ſpirituall ſubjection to Antichriſt. Fourthly, Becauſe this Miniſtery deriveth not their power and function from Chriſt. Fiftly, Becauſe they Miniſter the holy things of God by vertue of a falſe ſpirituall calling. Sixtly, Becauſe it is a ſtrange Miniſtery, not appointed by God in his word. Seventhly, Becauſe it is not from Heaven, but from Men.

Now I beſeech thee Chriſtian Reader, judge whether that which this man was wont ſo oft to object to his brother (a crackt brain) appeare not plainly in this goodly equipage of reaſons? For what is all this, but one and the ſame thing tumbled ſeven times over? which yet with ſeven thouſand times babbling ſhall never be the more probable. That our Miniſtery was not given and ſet in the Church by Chriſt, but Antichriſtian, what is it elſe to be from men, to be ſtrange, to be a falſe ſpirituall calling, not to be derived from Chriſt, to worſhip the image of the Beaſt? So this great challēger that hath abridged his nine arguments to ſeven, might aſwell have abridged his ſeven to one and a half. Here would have been as much ſubſtance, but leſſe glory: As for his maine defence: Firſt, we may not either have, or expect now in the Church that Miniſtery which Chriſt ſet: Where are our Apoſtles, Prophets, Evangeliſts? If we muſt alwaies looke for the very ſame adminiſtration of the Church which our Saviour left, why doe we not challenge theſe extraordinary functions? Doe we not rather thinke, ſince it pleaſed him to begin with thoſe Offices which ſhould not continue, that herein he purpoſely intended to teach us, that if we have the ſame heavenly buſineſſe done, we ſhould not be curious in the circumſtances of the perſons? But for thoſe ordinary callings of Paſtors and Doctors (intended to perpetuity) with what forehead can he deny them to be in our Church? How many have we that conſcionably teach and feed, or rather feed by teaching? Call them what you pleaſe, Superintendents (that is) Biſhops, Prelates, Prieſts, Lecturers, Parſons, Vicars, &c. If they preach Chriſt truly, upon true inward abilities, upon a ſufficient (if not perfect) outward vocation: ſuch a one (let all hiſtories witneſſe) for the ſubſtance, as hath been ever in the Church ſince the Apoſtles times: they are Paſtors & Doctors allowed, by Chriſt: We ſtand not upon circumſtances and appendances of the faſhions of ordination, manner of choice, attire, title, maintenance: but if for ſubſtance theſe be not true Paſtors and Doctors, Chriſt had never any in his Church, ſince the Apoſtles left the earth. All the difficultie is in our outward calling: Let the Reader grant our grave and learned Biſhops to be but Chriſtians, and this will eaſily be evinced lawfull, even by their rules: For, if with them every plebeian Artificer hath power to elect and ordaine by vertue of his Chriſtian profeſſion (the act of the worthieſt ſtanding for all) how can they deny this right to perſons qualified (beſides cōmon graces) with wiſedome, learning, experience, authority? Either their Biſhoprick makes them no Chriſtians (a poſition which of all the world beſides this Sect, would be hiſſed at) or elſe their hands impoſed are thus farre (by the rules of Separatiſts) effectuall. Now your beſt courſe is (like to an Hare that runnes back from whence ſhe was ſtarted) to fly to your firſt hold: No Church, therefore no Miniſtery: So now, not the Church

Ubi res convenit quis non verba contemnat? Aug. de Ordin. 2.

Brow. ſtate of Chriſtians.

A Church hath deviſed the Miniſtery, but the Miniſtery hath deviſed the Church: I follow you not in that idle circle: Thence you have been hunted already: But now, ſince I have given account of ours; I pray you tell me ſeriouſly, Who deviſed your Office of Miniſtery; I dare ſay, not Chriſt, not his Apoſtles, not their Succeſſors: What Church ever in the world can be produced (unleſſe in caſe of extremity for one turne) whoſe conſpiring multitude made themſelves Miniſters at pleaſure? What rule of Chriſt preſcribes it? What reformed Church ever did, or doth practiſe it? what example warrants it? where have the inferiours laid hands upon their Superiours? What congregation of Chriſtendome in all records afforded you the neceſſary patterne of an unteaching Paſtor, or an unfeeding Teacher?

B It is an old policy of the faulty, to complaine firſt: Certainly, there was never Popiſh Legend a more errand device of man than ſome parts of this Miniſtery of yours, ſo much gloried in for ſincere correſpondence to the firſt Inſtitution.

Section XXVIII.

YOur ſcornfull exception at the confuſed communion of the profane multitude, ſavors ſtrong of Phariſee, who thought it ſinne to converſe (cum terræ filiis) the baſe vulgar, and whoſe very Phylacteries did ſay, Touch me not, for I am cleaner than thou. This multitude is profane (you ſay) and this communion confuſed: If ſome be profane, yet not all; for then could be no confuſion in the mixture; If ſome be not profane, why doe you not love them as much as you hate the other? If all main truths be taught amongſt ſome godly, ſome profane; why will you C more ſhun thoſe profane, than cleave to thoſe Truths, and thoſe godly? If you have duly admoniſhed him, and deteſt and bewailed his ſinne; what is another mans profanenes to you? If profanenes be not puniſhed, or confuſion be tolerated, it is their ſin, whom it concerneth to redreſſe them: If the Officers ſinne, muſt we runne from the Church? It is a famous and pregnant proteſtation of God by Ezekiel: The righteouſnes of the righteous ſhall be upon him, & the wickednes of the wicked ſhall be upon himſelf. And if the Fathers ſowre Grapes cannot hurt the childrens teeth, how much leſſe ſhall the neighbours? But whither will you run from this Communion of the profane? The ſame fault you finde with the Dutch and French, yea, in your own. How well you have avoided it in your ſeparation, let M. White, George Johnſon, Maſter Smith be ſufficient witneſſes, whoſe plentifull reports of your known uncleanneſſes, D ſmothered miſchiefs, malicious proceedings, corrupt packings, communicating with known offenders, bolſtering of ſinnes, and willing connivences, as they are ſhamefull to relate, ſo might well have ſtopt your mouth from excepting at our confuſed Communion of the profane.

Shall ſome generall Truths (yea, though few of them in the particulars may be ſoundly practiſed) ſweeten and ſanctifie the other errors? Call

Call you our Doctrines some generall truths? Look into our Confessions, Apologies, Articles, and compare them with any, with all other Churches; and if you find a more particular, sound, Christian, absolute profession of all fundamentall truths in any Church, since Christ ascended into heaven, renounce us as you doe, and we will separate unto you: but these truths are not soundly practised: Let your Pastor teach you, that if errors of practise should be stood upon, there could be no true Church upon earth: Pull out your own beame first: we willingly yeeld this to be one of your truths, that no truth can satisfie error: That one heresie makes an Hereticke: but learn withall that every error doth not pollute all truths: That there is hay and stubble, which may burn, yet both the foundation stand, and the builder be saved: Such is ours at the worst, why doe you condemn where God will save? No Scripture is more worn with your Tongues and Pens, then that of the Leaven, 1 Cor. 5. 6. If you would compare Christs Leaven with Pauls, you should satisfie your selfe. Christ sayes, the Kingdome of heaven is as Leaven; Paul saies, A grosse sinne is Leaven: Both leavens the whole lumpe: neither may be taken precisely, but in resemblace: not of equality (as he said well) but of qualitie: For notwithstanding the Leaven of the Kingdome, some part you grant is unsanctified; So notwithstanding the leaven of sin, some (which have striven against it to their utmost) are not sowred: The leavening in both places must extend only to whom it is extended: the subjects of regeneration in the one; the partners of sin in the other: So our Saviour saith, Ye are the salt of the earth; yet too much of the earth is unseasoned: The truth of the effect must be regarded in these speeches, not the quantity: It was enough for S. Paul to shew them by this similitude, that grosse sins where they are tolerated, have a power to infect other: whether it be (as Hierome interprets it) by ill example, or by procurement of judgements: and thereupon the incestuous must be cast out: All this tends to the excommunicating of the evill, not to the separating of the good: Did ever Paul say, If the incestuous be not cast out, separate from the Church? Shew us this, and we are yours; Else it is a shame for you that you are not ours: If Antichrist hold many truths, and we but many, we must needs be proud of your praises: We hold all his truths, and have shewed you, how we hate all his forgeries, no lesse than you hate us: Yet the mysterie of iniquitie is still spunne in the Church of England; but with a finer thread: So fine, that the very eyes of your malice cannot see it; yet none of our least Lots have escaped you: Thanks be to our good God, we have the great mystery of godlinesse so fairely and happily spun amongst us, as all, but you, blesse God with us, and for us: As soone shall yee finde Charitie and Peace in your English Church, as heresie in our Church of England.

Doubtlesse they were: Who can deny it? But now (say you) they have the same Ecclesiasticall Jurisdiction continued: This is your miserable Sophistrie: Those Popish Archbishops, Bishops, and Clergy were members of Antichrist: not as Church-Governors, but as Popish; while they swore subjection to him, while they defended him, whiles they worshipt him above all that is called God, and extorted this homage from others, how could they be other but limmes of that man of sinne? shall others therefore which defie him, resist, trample upon him, spend their lives and labors in oppugnation of him, be necessarily in the same case, because in the same roome? Let me helpe your Anabaptists
B with a sound Argument: The Princes, Peeres, and Magistrates of the Land in Queene Maries dayes were shoulders and armes of Antichrist; their calling is still the same, therefore now they are such: Your Master Smith upon no other ground disclaimeth Infants Baptisme, crying out that this is the maine relique of Antichristianisme: But see how like a wise Master you confute your selfe: They are still members of the body, though the head (the Pope) be cut off: The head is Antichrist, therefore the body without the head is no part of Antichrist: He that is without the head Christ, is no member of Christ: so contrarily; I here you say, the very Jurisdiction and Office is here Antichristian, not the abuse: What? in them, and not in all Bishops since, and in the Apostles times? Alas, who are you that you should oppose all Churches and times? Ignorance of Church-story, and not distinguishing
C betwixt substances and appendances, personall abuses, and callings, hath led you to this error: Yet since you have reckoned up so many Popes, let me helpe you with more: Was there not one in Lambeth, when Doctor Cranmer was there? One in Fulham, when Ridley was there? One in Worcester, when Latimer was there? One at Winchester, when Philpot was there? We will goe higher; Was not Hilarius at Arles, Paulinus at Nola, Primasius at Utica, Eucherius at Lyons, Cyril at Alexandria, Chrysost. at Constantinople, Augustine at Hippo, Ambrose at Millain? What should I be infinite? Was not Cyprian at Carthage, Evodius, and after him Ignatius in Saint Johns time at Antioch, Polycarpus at Smyrna, Philip at Cæsarea, James and Simeon and Cleophas at Hierusalem, and (by much consent of Antiquity) Titus in Creet, Tymothy at Ephesus, Marke at Alexandria: yea, to be short, was there not every where in all Ages, an al-D lowed Superiority of Church-Governors under this title? Look into the frequent Subscriptions of all Councels, and their Canons: Looke into the Registers of all times, and finde your selfe answered; Let Reverend * Calvin be our Advocate: I would desire no other words to confute you, but his: He shall tell you that even in the primitive Church, the Presbyters chose one out of their number in every City, whom they titled their Bishop, lest dissention should arise from equality. Let Hemingius teach you that this was the practice of the purest Church: Thus it was ever; and if Princes have pleased to annex either large maintenances, or stiles of higher dignitie, and respect unto these, doe their additions annihilate them? Hath their double honour made voide their callings? Why, more than extreme needinesse? If E Aristotle would not allow a Priest to be a Tradesman, yet Paul could yeeld to homely Tent-making: if your Elders grow rich or noble, doe they cease to be, or begin to be unlawfull? But in how many Volumes hath this point beene fully discussed? I list not to gleane after their full carts.

And so doe all the Reformed Churches in the World (of whose testimony you boast so loud) renounce the Prelacy of England, as part of that Pseudo-Clergie, and Antichristian Hierarchie derived from Rome.

The judgement and practice of other reformed Churches.

Section XXXI.

FRom your own verdict you descend to the testimonies of all Reformed Churches: I blush to see so wilfull a slander fall from the pen of a Christian. That all Reformed Churches renounce our Prelacy as Antichristian; what one hath done it? Yea, what one forraine Divine of note, hath not given to our Clergie the right hand of Fellowship? so far is it from this, that J. Alasco was the allowed Bishop of our first Reformed strangers in this land; so far, that when your Doctor found himselfe urged (by M. Spr.) with a cloud of witnesses for our Church & Ministry, as Bucer Martyr, Fagius, Alasco, Calvin, Beza, Bullinger, Gualter, Simler, Zanchius, Junius, Rollocus and others, he had nothing to say for himself, but, Though you come against us with Horse-men and Chariots, yet we will remember the name of the Lord our God; and turns it off with the accusation of a Popish plea & reference to the practice of the Reformed: And if therfore they have so renounced it, because their practice receives it not; Why, like a true Make-bate do you not say, that our Churches have so renounced their Government? These sisters have learned to differ, and yet to love and reverence each other: and in these cases to enjoy their own forms, without prescription of necessity or censure. Let Reverend Beza be the Trumpet of all the rest, who tels you that the Reformed English Churches continue, upheld by the authority of Bishops, and Archbishops, that they have had men of that Rank, both famous Martyrs, and worthy Pastors and Doctors: and lastly, congratulates this blessing to our Church: or let Hemingius tell you the judgement of the Danish Church: judicat ceteros, Ministros, &c. It judgeth, saith he, that other Ministers should obey their Bishops in all things, which make to the edification of the Church, &c. But what do I oppose any to his nameless All? his own silence confutes him enough in my silence.

It seems, the sacred (so called) Synod assumeth little lesse unto her selfe in her determinations: otherwise, how durst she decree so absolutely, as she doth, touching things reputed indifferent, viz. that all men, in all places must submit unto them without exception, or limitation? Except she could infallibly determine, that these her Ceremonies thus absolutely imposed, should edifie all men at all times, how durst she thus impose them? To exact obedience in and unto them, whether they offend or offend not, whether they edifie or destroy, were intolerable presumption.

Section XXXIX.

THere was never a more idle and beggerly cavill than your next: your Christian Reader must needs thinke you hard driven for quarrels, when you are faine to fetch the Popes infallibility, out of our Synod, whose flat Decree it was of old; That even Generall Councels may erre, and have erred. But wherein doth our sacred Synod assume this infallibility, in her determinations? Wherefore is a Synod, if not to determine? But of things reputed indifferent? What else are subject to the constitutions of men? Good and evill are either directly, or by necessary sequell ordred by God; these are above humane power: What have men to doe, if not with things indifferent? All necessary things are determined by God, indifferent by men from God, which are as so many particulars, extracts from the generals of God: These things (saith learned Calvin) are indifferent, and in the power of the Church: Either you must allow the Church this, or nothing. But these decrees are absolute, what laws can be without a command? The law that ties not is no law: No more than that (saith Austin) which ties us to evill. But for all men, and all times? How for all? For none (I hope) but our own. And why not for them? but without exception and limitation: Doe not thus wrong our Church: our late Archbishop (if it were not piacular for you to read ought of his) could have taught you in his publike writings, these five limitations of enjoyned ceremonies: First, that they be not against the word of God; Secondly, that Justification or Remission of sins be not attributed to them; Thirdly, that the Church be not troubled with their multitude; Fourthly, that they be not decreed as necessary, and not to be changed, And lastly, that men be not so tied to them but that by occasion they may be omitted, so it be without offence & contempt; you see

That they ſhould feed their Flocks with Word & Doctrine, we require more than you: That Patrons present, Bishops institute, Arch-Deacons induct some, which are unable, we grant and bewaile. But that our Church-Laws justifie them, we deny, and you slander: For our Law (if you know not) requires, that every one to be admitted to the Ministery should understand the Articles of Religion, not onely as they are compendiously set downe in the Creed, but as they are at large in our booke of Articles, neither understand them onely, but be able to prove them sufficiently out of the Scripture, and that not in English onely, but in Latine also: This competency would prove him (for knowledge διδακτικον: If this be not performed, blame the persons) cleer the Law. Profound M. Hooker tels you, that both Arguments from light of Nature; Laws, and Statutes of Scripture, the Canons that are taken out of ancient Synods, the Decrees and Constitutions of sincereſt times, the sentences of all antiquity, and in a word, every mans full consent & conscience, is against ignorance in them that have charge and cure of soules. And in the same booke; Did any thing more aggravate the crime of Jeroboams Apostasie, than that he chose to have his Clergie the scumme and refuse of his whole Land? Let no man spare to tell it them, they are not faithfull towards God, that burden wilfully his Church with such swarms of unworthy Creatures. Neither is it long, since a zealous and learned Sermon dedicated to our present Lord Archbishop by his own Chaplaine, hath no lesse taxed this abuse, whether of insufficiency, or negligence (though with more discretion) than can bee expected from your malicious Pen. Learne henceforth not to diffuse crimes to the innocent.

For the rest: your Baal, in our Dispensations of Pluralities, would thus plead for himselfe: First, he would bid you learn of your Doctor to distinguish of sinnes: Sins (saith he) are either controvertible, or manifest: if controvertible or doubtfull, men ought to beare one with anothers different judgment; if they doe not, &c. they sin: such is this: if some be resolved, others doubt; and in whole Volumes plead, whether convenience, or necessity: how could your charity compare these with sinnes evicted? Secondly, he would tell you that these Dispensations are intended and directed, not against the offence of God, but the danger of Humane Laws: not securing from sinne, but from losse: But, for both these points of Non-residence and sufficiencie, if you sought not rather strife than satisfaction; his Majesties Speech in the Conference at Hampton Court, might have staied the course of your quarrellous pen: No reasonable mind, but would rest in that Gratious and royall determination. Lastly, Why looke you not to your own Elders at home? even your handfull hath not avoided this crime of Non-residency: What wonder is it, if our world of men have not escaped?

For Excommunication it is clear enough: While you fully hold that every private man hath as much power in his censure, as the Pastor; and that Princes must be equally subject with them to these their censures. Let any man now devise if the Brownists could have

A a King, how that King could ſtand one day unexcommunicated? Or if this cenſure meddle only with his ſoule, not with his Scepter: How more than credible is it, that ſome of your Aſſemblies in Queen Elizabeths daies concluded, that ſhe was not (even in our ſence) Supreme Head of the Church, neither had authority to make Laws Eccleſiaſticall in the Church? It is well if you will diſclame it: But you know your received poſition; That no one Church is Superiour to other: No authority therefore can reverſe this Decree; your will may do it: yea, what better than Rebellion appears in your next clauſe? While you accuſe our Loyalty to an earthly King as treaſonable to the King of the Church, Chriſt Jeſus; If our Loyalty be a ſin, where is yours? If we be Traytors in our obedience, what do you make of him that commands it? Whether you would have us each man to play the Rex, and erect a new Government, or whether you would have accuſe us as Rebels to Chriſt in obeying the old: God bleſſe King James from ſuch ſubjects. But whoſe is that ſo unſavory weed; No Biſhop, no King? Know you whom you accuſe? let me ſhew you your Adverſary; it is King James him-ſelf in is Hampton Conference: is there not now ſuſpition in the word? ſurely you had cauſe to feare that the King would prove no good ſubject: Belike, not to Chriſt: What doe you elſe in the next but proclaim his oppoſition to the King of Kings? or ours in not oppoſing his? As if we might ſay with the Iſraelites, O Lord our God, other Lords beſides thee have ruled us: If we would admit each of your Elders to be ſo many Kings in the Church, we ſhould ſtoope under Chriſts Ordinances: Shew us your commiſſion, and let it appeare whether we be Enemies, or you Uſurpers; Alas, you both refuſe the rule of this true Deputy, and ſet up falſe; Let this fearefull doome of Chriſt light where it is moſt due: Even ſo let thine enemies periſh O Lord.

Where (ſay you) are thoſe rotten heapes of Tranſubſtantiating of bread? and where (ſay I) learned you your devout kneeling to, or before the bread, but from the error of tranſubſtãtiation? Yea, what let can it inſinuate, than either that, or ſome other the like idolatrous cõceit if there were not ſomething more in the Bread & Wine than in the water at Baptiſm, or in Word read or preached, why ſhould ſuch ſolemne kneeling be ſo ſeverely preſſed at that time, rather then upon the other occaſions? And well and truly have your owne men affirmed that it were far leſſe ſinne, and appearance of an Idolatry that is nothing ſo groſſe, to tie men in their prayers to kneele before a Crucifix, than before the Bread and Wine: and the reaſon followeth, for that Papiſts commit an Idolatry far more groſſe and odious in worſhipping the Bread, than in worſhipping any other of their Images or Idols whatſoever. Kneeling at the Sacrament of the Lords Supper.

De conſecr. d. 2. Ego Bereng. Apol.

OUr kneeling you derive (like a good Herald) from the errour of Tranſubſtantiation: but to ſet down the deſcent of this pedigree, will trouble you: wee doe utterly denie it, and challenge your proofe. How new a fiction Tranſubſtantiation is, appeares out of Berengaries Recantation to Pope Nicolas: The error was then ſo young, it had not learned to ſpeake; ſhew us the ſame noveltie in our kneeling. Till of late, men held not the bread to be God; of old, they have held it ſacred: This is the geſture of reverence in our Prayer at the receipt, as Maſter Burgeſſe well interpreted it, not of Idolatrous adoration of the bread. This was moſt-what in the elevation: the aboliſhing whereof cleers us of this imputation: you know wee hate this conceit, why doe you thus force wrongs upon the innocent? Neither are wee alone in this uſe: The Church of Bohemy allows and practiſes it: and why is this error leſſe palpable in the wafers of Geneva? If the King ſhould offer us his hand to kiſſe, we take it upon our knees: how much more when the King of Heaven gives us his Son in theſe pledges? But if there were not ſomething more than juſt reverence, why doe we ſolemnly kneel at the Communion, not at Baptiſme? Can you finde no difference? In this (beſides that there is both a more lively and feeling ſignification of the thing repreſented) we are the parties, but in the other witneſſes: This therefore I dare boldly ſay, that if your partner M. *Smith ſhould ever (which God forbid) perſwade you to rebaptize, your fitteſt geſture (or any others at full age) would be to receive that Sacramentall water, kneeling: How glad you are to take all ſcraps, that fall from any of ours for your advantage? would to God this obſervation of your malicious gathering, would make all our reverend Brethren wary of their cenſures: Surely, no idolatry can be worſe than that Popiſh ἀρτολατρεία. The Bread, and the Crucifix ſtrive for the higher place: if we therefore ſhould be ſo tied to kneele before the bread, as they are tied to kneele before the Crucifix, their ſentence were juſt: They adore the Crucifix, not we the Bread: they pray to the Crucifix, not wee to the Bread: they direct their devotions (at the beſt) by the Crucifix to their Saviour, wee doe not ſo by the Bread, we kneele no more to the Bread, than to the Pulpit when we joyne our prayers with the Miniſters: but our quarrell is not with them; you that can approve their judgements in diſlike, might learne to follow them in approbation, and peaceable Communion with the Church: if there be a galled place, you will be ſure to light upon that. Your charity is good; whatſoever your wiſdome be.

SEP.

To let paſſe your devout kneeling unto your Ordinary, when you take the Oath of Canonicall obedience, or receive abſolution at his hands, which (as the maine actions are religious) muſt needs be religious adoration: what is the adoring of your truly humane (though called Divine) Service booke, in and by which you worſhip God, as the Papiſts do by their Images? If the Lord Jeſus in his Teſtament have not commanded any ſuch Booke, it is accurſed and abominable: if you thinke he have, ſhew us the place where, that we may know it with you; or manifeſt unto us that ever the Apoſtles uſed themſelves, or commended to the churches after them any ſuch Service-book. Was not the Lord in the apoſtles time, and apoſtolike churches, purely and perfectly worſhipped, when the officers of the church in their miniſtration manifeſted the ſpirit of prayer which they had received according to the preſent neceſſities and occaſions of the church before the leaſt parcell of this patchery came into the world? And might not the Lord now be alſo purely & perfectly worſhipped, though this printed image, with the painted and carved images, were ſent back to Rome, yea, or caſt to hell,

from

A from whence both they and it came? Speake in your selfe, might not the Lord be intirely worshipped with pure and holy worship, though none other Booke but the holy Scriptures were brought into the Church? If yea (as who can deny it that knows what the worship of God meaneth) what then doth your Service-booke there? the Word of God is perfect, and admitteth of none addition. Cursed be he that addeth to the Word of the Lord, and cursed be that which is added, and so be your great Idoll the Communion-book, though like Nabuchadnezzars Image some part of the matter be Gold and Silver, which is also so much the more detestable, by how much it is the more highly advanced amongst you.

Section XXXVII.

YEt more Idolatry? And which is more, New, and strange; such (I dare say) as will never be found in the two first Commandements. Behold, here two
B new Idols, Our Ordinary, and our Service-book, a speaking Idoll, and a written Idoll. Calecute hath one strange Deitie the Devill, Siberia many, whose people worship every day what they see first. Rome hath many merry Saints: but Saint Ordinary, and Saint Service-book were never heard of till your Canonization. In earnest, doe you think we make our Ordinary an Idoll? What else? you kneele devoutly to him when you receive either the Oath or Absolution. This must needs be religious adoration: is there no remedy? You have twice kneeled to our Vice-Chancellor, when you were admitted to your degree; you have oft kneeled to your Parents, and God-fathers, to receive a blessing; did you make Idols of them? the party to be ordained, kneels under the hand of the Presbyterie: doth he religiously adore them? of old
C they were wont to kisse the hands of their Bishops, so they did to Baal: God and our Superiours have had ever one and the same outward gesture: Though here, not the Agent is so much regarded, as the action: if your Ordinary would have suffered you to have done this peece of Idolatry, you had never separated.

Whether our Ordinary and Service-booke be made Idols by us.

Paulus in vita Ambros.

But the true God Bel, and Dragon of England is the humane-Divine-Service-book: Let us see what ashes or lumps of pitch this Daniel brings: We worship God in, and by it, as Papists doe by their Images: Indeed, we worship God in, and by praier contained in it: Why should we not? Tell me, why is it more Idolatry for a man to worship God in, and by a prayer read, or got by heart, than by a praier conceived? I utter both, they are both mine: if the heart speak them both, feelingly and devoutly, where lies the Idoll? In a conceived praier, is it not possible for a mans thought to stray
D from his tongue? in a praier learned by heart, or read, is it not possible for the heart to joine with the tongue? if I pray therefore in spirit, and heartily utter my desires to God, whether in mine own words, or borrowed (and so made mine) what is the offence? But (say you) if the Lord Jesus in his Testament have not commanded any such Book, it is accursed and abominable: But say I, if the Lord Jesus hath not any where forbidden such a Booke, it is not accursed nor abominable: Shew us the place where, that we may know it with you: Nay but I must shew you where the Apostles used any such Service-book: shew you me, where the Apostles baptized in a Basin: or where they received women to the Lords table: (for your ἀνάπαυσον, 1 Cor. 11. will not serve) shew me that the Bible was distinguished into Chapters and Verses in the Apostles time: shew me that they ever celebrated the Sacrament of the Supper at any other time than evening, as your Anabaptists now doe: shew me that they used one
E prayer before their Sermons alwaies, another after; that they preached ever upon a Text: where they preached over a Table: or lastly, shew me where the Apostles used that prayer which you made before your last prophecy; and a thousand such circumstances. What an idle plea is this from the Apostolike times? And if I should tell you that Saint Peter celebrated with the Lords Prayer, you will not beleeve it: yet you know the Historie. But let the Reader know that your quarrell is not against the matter, but against the booke; not as they are prayers, but stinted, or prescribed: Wherein all the world besides your selves are Idolaters: Behold, all Churches that were, or are, are partners with us in this crime. and certaine, from which it ſhould not be lawfull for Paſtors in their function to depart. Judge now of the ſpirit of theſe bold Controllers, that dare thus condemne all Gods Churches through the world, as idolatrous. But ſince you call for Apoſtolike examples, did not the Apoſtle Paul uſe one ſet form of apprecations, of benedictions? What were theſe but leſſer Prayers? the quantity varies not the kinde: Will you have yet ancienter precedents? The Prieſt was appointed of old to uſe a ſet forme under the Law, *Num.*6.23. ſo the people, *Deu.*26.3.4.5. *&c.*15. Both of them a ſtinted Pſalme for the Sabbath, Pſal. 92. What ſaith your Doctor to theſe? Becauſe the Lord (ſaith he) gave formes of Prayers and Pſalmes, therefore the Prelates may? Can we thinke that Ieroboam had ſo ſlender a reaſon for his calves? Marke (good Reader) the ſhifts of theſe men: This Anſwerer cals for examples, and will abide no ſtinting of Prayers, becauſe we ſhew no patterns from Scripture. We doe ſhew patterns from Scripture, and now their Doctor ſaith, God appointed it to them of old, muſt wee therefore doe it? So, whether we bring examples or none, we are condemned: but Maſter Doctor, whom, I beſeech you, ſhould we follow, but God in his owne ſervices? If God have not appointed it, you cry out upon inventions: if God have appointed it, you cry, we may not follow it: ſhew then where God ever enjoyned an ordinary ſervice to himſelf, that was not ceremoniall (as this plainly is not:) which ſhould not be a direction for us? But if ſtinting our prayers be a fault (for as yet you meddle not with our blaſphemous Collects) it is well that the Lords Prayer it ſelfe beareth us company, and is no ſmall part of our Idolatry: Which, though it were given principally as a rule to our prayers, yet ſince the matter is ſo heavenly, and moſt wiſely framed to the neceſſity of all Chriſtian hearts; to deny that it may be uſed intirely in our Saviours words, is no better then a fanaticall curiouſneſſe: yeeld one and all, for if the matter be more divine, yet this ſtint is no leſſe faulty: This is not the leaſt part of our patchery: except you unrip this, the reſt you cannot. But might not God be purely and perfectly worſhipped without it? Tell me, might not God be purely and perfectly worſhipped without Churches, without houſes, without garments, yea, without hands or feet? In a word, could not God be purely worſhipped, if you were not? Yet would you not ſeeme a ſuperfluous creature: ſpeak in your ſelfe: Might not God be entirely worſhipped with pure and holy worſhip, though there were no other Bookes in the world, but the Scripture? If yea, as who can denie it, that knowes what the worſhip of God meaneth? What then doe the Fathers and Doctors, and learned Interpreters? To the fire with all thoſe curious Arts and Volumes, as your Predeceſſors called them: Yea, let me put you in minde, that God was purely and perfectly worſhipped by the Apoſtolike Church, before ever the New Teſtament was written. See therefore the idleneſſe of your proofes; God may be ſerved without a preſcription of Prayer: but (if all reformed Churches in Chriſtendome erre not) better with it: The Word of God is perfect, and admits no addition: curſed were we, if we ſhould adde ought to it: curſed were that which ſhould be added: But curſed be they that take ought from it, & dare ſay, Ye ſhal not pray thus, Our Father, &c. Doe wee offer to make our Prayers Canonicall? doe we obtrude them as part of Gods Word? why cavill you thus? why doth the ſame Prayer written adde to the Word, which ſpoken addeth not? Becauſe conceived Prayer is commanded, not the other: But firſt, not your particular Prayer: Secondly, without mention either of conception, or memorie, God commands us to pray in ſpirit, and with the heart: Theſe circumſtances, only as they are deduced from his Generalls, ſo are ours. But whence ſoever it pleaſe you to fetch our Booke of publike Prayer, from Rome or Hell; or to what image ſoever you pleaſe to reſemble it; Let moderate ſpirits heare what the precious Jewell of England ſaith of it: We have come as neere as we could to the Church of the Apoſtles, &c. neither only have wee framed our Doctrine, but alſo our Sacramens, and the forme of publike Prayers, according to their Rites and inſtitutions. Let no Jew now object Swines fleſh to us: He is no judicious man (that I may omit the mention of Cranmer, Bucer, Ridley, Taylor, &c. ſome of whoſe hands were in it, all whoſe voyces were for it) with whom one Jewel will not over-weigh ten thouſand Separatiſts.

The number of Sacraments ſeemes greater amongſt you by one at the leaſt, than Chriſt hath left in his Teſtament, and that is Mariage; which howſoever you doe not in expreſſe termes call a Sacrament (no more did Chriſt and the Apoſtles call Baptiſme and the Supper Sacraments,) yet doe you in truth create it a Sacrament, in the adminiſtration and uſe of it. There are the parties to be married and their marriage repreſenting Chriſt and his Church, and their ſpirituall union: to which myſtery, ſaith the Oracle of your Service-booke, expreſly, God hath conſecrated them: there is the Ring hallowed by the ſaid Service Booke, (whereon it muſt be laid) for the Element; there is the words of conſecration; In the Name of the Father, and of the Sonne, and of the holy Ghoſt: there is the place, the

B Church; the time uſually, the Lords day; the Miniſter, the Pariſh-Prieſt. And being made as it is a part of Gods worſhip, and of the Miniſters office, what is it if it be not a Sacrament? It is no part of Prayer, or preaching, and with a Sacrament it hath the greateſt conſimilitude: but an Idoll I am ſure it is in the celebration of it, being made a Miniſteriall duty and part of Gods Worſhip, without warrant, call it by what name you will.

SECTION XXXVIII.

HOw did Confirmation eſcape this numbber? how did Ordination? it was your over-ſight, I feare, not your charity: ſome things ſeem, and are not: ſuch is this your number of our Sacraments: you will needs have us take in mar-

C riage into this ranke: why ſo? we doe not (you confeſſe) call it a Sacrament as the vulgar miſinterpreting Pauls Myſterium, Eph. 5. why ſhould we not if we ſo eſteemed it? wherefore ſerve names, but to denotate the nature of things? if we were not aſhamed of the opinion, we could not be aſhamed of the word: No more (ſay you) did Chriſt and his Apoſtles call Baptiſme and the Supper, Sacraments; but we doe, and you with us: See now whether this clauſe doe not confute your laſt: where hath Chriſt ever ſaid, There are two Sacraments? Yet you dare ſay ſo: what is this but in your ſenſe an addition to the word? yea, we ſay flatly, there are but two: yet we doe (ſay you) in truth create it a Sacrament: how oft, and how reſolutely hath our Church maintained againſt Rome, that none but Chriſt immediately can create Sacraments? If they had this advantage againſt us, how could we ſtand? How wrongfull is this force, to faſten an opinion upon our Church which ſhe hath condemned?

D But wherein ſtands this our creation? It is true, the parties to be married, and their marriage repreſent Chriſt, and his Church, and their ſpirituall union: Beware, leſt you ſtrike God through our ſides: what hath Gods Spirit ſaid, either leſſe, or other than this? Eph. 5. 25, 26, 27, & 32. Doth he not make Chriſt the huſband, the Church his Spouſe? Doth he not from that ſweet conjunction, and the effects of it, argue the deare reſpects that ſhould be in mariage? Or what doth the Apoſtle allude elſewhere unto, when he ſayes (as Moſes of Eve) we are the fleſh of Chriſts fleſh, and bone of his bone? And how famous amongſt the ancient is that reſemblance of Eve taken out of Adams ſide ſleeping, to the Church taken out of Chriſts ſide ſleeping on the Croſſe; Since marriage therefore ſo clearely repreſents this myſterie, and this uſe is holy and ſacred: what error is it, to ſay that marriage is conſecrated to this myſ-

E terie? But what is the Element? the Ring; Theſe things agree not; you had before made the two parties to be the matter of this ſacrament: What is the matter of the Sacrament, but Element? If they be the matter, they are the Element, and ſo not the Ring; both cannot be: if you will make the two parties to be but the receivers; how doth all the myſtery lie in their repreſentation? Or if the Ring be the Element, then all the myſterie muſt be in the Ring, not in the parties: Labour to be more perfect, ere you make any more new Sacraments: but this Ring is laid upon the Servicebook: why not? For readineſſe, not for holineſſe: Nay but it is hallowed (you ſay) by the booke: If it be a Sacramentall Element, it rather hallowes the book, than the booke it; you are not mindfull enough for this trade: But what exorciſmes are uſed in this hallowing? Or who ever held it any other than a civill pledge of fidelity? Then follow the words of Conſecration: I pray you what difference is there betwixt hallowing, and

Mariage not made a Sacrament by the Church of England and conſecration? The Ring was hallowed before the booke, now it muſt be conſecrated: How idly? By what words? In the name of the Father, &c. Theſe words you know are ſpoken after the Ring is put on: was it ever heard of, that a Sacramentall Element was conſecrated after it was applied? See how ill your ſlanders are digeſted by you: The place is the Church, the time is the Lords day, the Miniſter is the actor; and is it not thus in all other reformed Churches as well as ours? Behold we are not alone: all Churches in the world (if this will doe it) are guilty of three Sacraments: Tell me, would you not have marriage ſolemnized publikely? You cannot miſſlike: though your founder ſeems to require nothing here but notice given to witneſſes, and then to bed: Well, if publike, you account it withall, a grave and weighty buſineſſe: therefore ſuch, as muſt be ſanctified by publike praier: What place is fitter for publike praier than the Church? Who is fitter to offer up the publike praier, than the Miniſter? who ſhould rather joyn the parties in Marriage, than the publike deputie of that God who ſolemnly joyned the firſt couple? who rather than he which in the name of God may bleſſe them? The prayers which accompany this ſolemnity, are parts of God worſhip, not the contract it ſelfe: This is a mixt action, therefore, compounded of Eccleſiaſtiall and civill: impoſed on the Miniſter, not upon neceſſity, but expedience: neither eſſentiall to him, but accidentally annexed, for greater convenience. Theſe two frivolous grounds have made your cavill either very ſimple, or very wilfull.

common Lawes of this Land? But with all you might learn, that no Enquiry Ex officio may be thus made but upon good grounds, as Fame, Scandall, vehement preſumption, &c. going before, & giving juſt cauſe of ſuſpicion: Secondly, that this proceeding is not allowed in any caſe of crime, whereby the life, or lims of the examined party, may be indangered: nor yet where there is a juſt ſuſpition of future perjury upon ſuch enforcement. Thus is the ſuſpected wife urged to cleare her honeſty by oath: Thus the Maſter of the houſe muſt clear his truth, Exod. 22.8. Thus Achan and Jonathan were urged to be their own accuſers, though not by oath: But if perhaps any ſiniſter courſe be taken by any corrupt Juſticer in their proceedings; muſt this be imputed to the Church? Looke you to your petty-Courts at home: which ſome of your own have compared to theſe courſes, not onely to the Commiſſion-Court of England, but to the inquiſition of Spaine: See there your Paſtor defending himſelfe to be both an accuſer and Judge in the ſame cauſe: See their proceedings Ex officio without commiſſion: and if your priſons cannot witneſſe it, your excommunications may.

SECTION XLI.

WEe have not loſt, but caſt away the Idolatrous ſhrines of Saints: their dayes we retaine; theirs, not for worſhip of them, which our Church condemneth, but partly for commemoration of their high deſerts, and excellent examples: partly for diſtinction: indeed therefore Gods daies, and not theirs: their praiſes redound to him: ſhew us where we implore them, where we conſecrate daies to their ſervice: The maine end of Holy-dayes is for the ſervice of God, and ſome, as Socrates ſets down of old, (quo ſe à laborũ contentione relaxent) for relaxation from labor: and if ſuch dayes may be appointed by the Church (as were the Holy-daies of Purim, of the dedication of the wall of Jeruſalem, the dedication of the Temple) whoſe names ſhould they rather bear (though but for meere diſtinction) than the bleſſed Apoſtles of Chriſt? But this is a colour onely: for you equally condemn thoſe daies of Chriſts Birth, Aſcenſion, Circumciſion, Reſurrection, Anunciation, which the Church hath beyond all memory celebrated: what then is our fault? We keep theſe holy as the Lords day, in the ſame manner, though not in the ſame degree: Indeed we come to the Church, and worſhip the God of the Martyrs and Saints: is this yet our offence? No, but we abſtaine from our moſt lawfull labour in them; True, yet not in conſcience of the day, but in obedience to the Church: If the Church ſhall indict a ſolemn Faſt, do you not hold it contemptuous to ſpend that day in lawfull labor; notwithſtanding that liberty of the ſix dayes which God hath given? Why ſhall that be lawfull in a caſe of dejection, which may not in praiſe and exultation? If you had not loved to cavill, you would rather have accepted the Apology, or excuſe of our Siſter Churches in this behalf, than aggravated theſe uncharitable pleas of your own: yet even in this, your own Synagogue at Amſterdam (if we may beleeve your own) is not altogether guiltleſſe: your hands are ſtill, and your ſhops ſhut upon feſtivall daies; But we accuſe you not: would God this were your worſt. SECTION XLII.

Our approbation of an unlearned Miniſtery diſproved

YOur want of quarrels makes you ſtill run over the ſame complaints: which if you redouble a thouſand times, will not become juſt, may become tedious: God knows how far we are from approving an unlearned Miniſtery: the proteſtations of our gracious King, our Biſhops, our greateſt Patrons of conformity in their publike writings, might make you aſhamed of this bold aſſertion: we doe not allow that it ſhould be, we bewaile that it will be: our number of Pariſhes compared with our number of Divines, will ſoone ſhew, that either many pariſhes muſt have none, or ſome Divines muſt have many Congregations, or too many Congregations muſt have ſcarce Divine-Incumbents. Our deare Soveraigne hath promiſed a medicine for this diſeaſe; But withall tels you that Jeruſalem was not built all on a day. The violence you ſpeake of is commonly in caſe of wilfull contempt, not of honeſt and peaceable deſire of further inſtruction, or in ſuppoſall of ſome tolerable ability in the Miniſtery forſaken; we doe heartily pray for labourers into this harveſt: we doe wiſh that all Iſrael could propheſie: we publiſh the Scriptures, we Preach, Catechiſe, Write, and (Lord thou knoweſt) how many of us would doe more, if we knew what more could be done, for the information of thy people, and remedy of this ignorance which this adverſary reproves us to approve.

We doubt not but the ſervice ſaid in our Pariſh-Churches, is as good a ſervice to God, as the extemporary devotions in your Parlours: But, it is an unknown devotion, you ſay: Through whoſe fault? The Readers, or the Hearers, or the Matter? Diſtinct reading you cannot deny to the moſt Pariſhes: the matter is eaſie Prayers, and Engliſh Scriptures: if the hearers be regardleſſe, or in ſome things dull of conceit, lay the fault from the ſervice to the men: All yours are free from ignorance, free from wandering conceits: we envy you not, ſome knowledge is no better than ſome ignorance, and careleſneſſe is no worſe than miſ-regard.

Hence they were appointed (as Tertullian ſpeaketh) in ſack-cloth and aſhes, to crave the prayers of the Church, to beſmeare their body with filthineſſe, to throw themſelves downe before Gods Miniſter and Altar; not to mention other more hard, and perhaps no leſſe ancient Rites; and hence was thoſe five ſtations of the Penitent, whereby he was at laſt received into the body of his wonted Communion: the other a pecuniary mulct impoſed upon ſome (not all, you foulely ſlander us) leſſe hainous offences; as a penalty, not as a penance: I hope you deny not; Sodomy, Murder, Robbery, &c. (which you would not) Theft it ſelfe is more deeply avenged: But did ever any of ours urge either ſheet or purſe as the remedy of Purgatory, or enjoyne them to avoyd thoſe infernall paines? unleſſe we doe ſo, our Penances are not Popiſh, and our Anſwerer is idle.

Touching Purgatory, though you deny the doctrine of it, and teach the contrary, yet how well your practice suits with it, let it be considered in these particulars: Your absolving of men dying excommunicate after they be dead, and before they may have Christian buriall. Your Christian buriall in holy gound (if the party will be at the charges;) your ringing of hallowed bels for the soule; your singing the Corps to the grave from the Church stile; your praying over, or for the dead, especially in these words, That God would hasten his kingdome, that we with this our Brother (though his life were never so wretched, and death desperate) and other departed in the true faith of thy holy Name, may have our perfect consummation, both in body and soule. Your generall doctrines and your particular practices agree in this as in the most other things, like Harpe and Harrow. In word you professe many truths, B which in deed you deny.

These and many moe Popish devices (by others at large discovered to the world) both for pomp and profit, are not only not razed and buried in the dust, but are advanced amongst you above all that is called God.

SECTION XLIV.

YOur next accusation is more ingenuously malicious; our Doctrine you grant contrary to purgatory: but you will fetch it out of our practice, that we may build that which we destroy: Let us therfore purge our selves from your Purgatory: We absolve men dying excommunicate, a rare practice, and which yet I have not lived to see: but if Law-makers contemn rare occurrents, surely accusers do not: C Once is too much of an evill: Marke then; Doe we absolve his soule after the departure? No: what hath the Body to doe with Purgatory? Yet for the body: doe we by any absolution seeke to quit it of sinne? Nothing lesse: reason it selfe gives us, that it is uncapable either of sin or pardon; To lie unburied, or to be buried unseemly, is so much a punishment, that the Heathens objected it (though upon the havock and fury of Warre) to the Christians, as an argument of Gods neglect. All that authority can do to the dead Rebell, is to put his carkasse to shame, & deny him the honour of seemly sepulture: Thus doth the Church to those that will dye in wilfull contempt. Those Grecian Virgins that feared not death, were yet restrained with the feare of shame after death: it was a reall, not imaginary curse of Jezabel; The dogs shall eat Jezabel. Now the absolution (as you call it, by an unproper, but malicious name) is no D thing else but a liberty given by the Church (upon repentance signified of the fault of the late offender) of all those externall rites of decent Funerall: Death it selfe is capable of inequality, and unseemlinesse: Suppose a just Excommunication: What reason is it, that he which in his life and death would be as a Pagan, should be as a Christian in his buriall? What is any, or all this to Purgatory?

The next intimation of our Purgatory is our Christian Buriall, in the place, in the manner: The place, holy gound, the Church, Churchyard, &c. The manner, Ringing, Singing, Praying over the Corps. Thus therefore you argue; We bury the body in the Church, or Churchyard, &c. therefore we hold a Purgatory of the Soule; a proofe not lesse strange than the opinion: We doe neither scorn the carcasses of our friends, as old Troglodites: nor with the old Ægyptians respect them more, than when they were enformed with a living soule: but we keep a meane course betwixt both, using them E as the remainders of dead men, yet as dead Christians: & as those which we hope one day to see glorious. We have learned to call no place holy in it self (since the Temple) but some more holy in their use, than others. The old (κοιμητηρια) of the Christians, wherin their bodies slept in peace, were not lesse esteemed of them, than they are scorned of you. Gallienus thought he did them a great favor (and so they took it) when he gave them the liberty not only of their Churhes, but of their former burying places. In the same book Eusebius commends Astirius a noble Senator, for his care, and cost of Marinus his buriall. Of all these rites of funerall, & choise of place, we professe to hold with Augustine, that they are only the comforts of the living, not helpes of the dead; yet as Origen also teacheth us, we have learned to honour a reasonable (much more a Christian) soule; and to commit the instrument or case of it honorably to the grave.

All this might have taught our Anſwerer, that we make account of an heaven, of a reſurrection, not of a Purgatory. But we ring hallowed bels for the Soule: Do not thoſe bels hang in hallowed ſteeples too? and doe we not ring them with hallowed ropes? What fancy is this? If Papiſts were ſo fond of old: their folly and their bels (for the moſt part) are both out of date; we call them ſoule-bels, for that they ſignifie the departure of the ſoule, not for that they helpe the paſſage of the ſoule. This is meer Boyes-play. But we pray over or for the dead; Doe we not ſing to him alſo? Pardon me, I muſt needs tell you, here is much ſpite, and little wit. To pray for the conſummation of the glory of all Gods elect: What is it, but Thy Kingdome come? How vainly doe you ſeek a knot in a ruſh, while you cavill at ſo holy a Petition? Goe and learne how much better it is, to call them our brothers, which are not, in harmleſſe overweening and over-hoping of charity, than to call them no brothers, which are, in a proud and cenſorious uncharitableneſſe: you cannot be content to tell an untruth, but you muſt face it out. Let any Reader judge, how farre our practice in this diſſented from our doctrine; would to God in nothing more: Yes (ſaith this good friend) in the moſt other things; our words profeſſe, our deeds deny: at once you make us hypocrites, and your ſelves Phariſes. Let all the world know, that the Engliſh Church at Amſterdam, profeſſeth nothing which it practiſeth not: we may not be ſo holy, or ſo happy.

Generality is a notable ſhelter of untruth: Many moe, you ſay, Popiſh devices, yet name none; No, you cannot. Advanced above all that is called God? ſurely this is a paradox of ſlanders: you meant at once to ſhame us with falſhood, and to appoſe us with Riddles: we ſay to the higheſt, whom have we in heaven but thee? and for earth, your ſelfe have granted we give too much to Princes, (which are earthen Gods) and may come under Pauls (vae oßaqua.) Either name our Deity, or crave mercy for your wrong: certainly, though you have not remorſe, yet you ſhall have ſhame.

SECTION XLV.

THe Majeſty of Romiſh Petty-gods (I truly told you) was long agone, with Mithra and Serapis, expoſed to the laughter of the vulgar: you ſtrain the compariſon too farre; yet we follow you: Their Prieſts were expelled: for (as your Doctor yeeldeth) other actors came upon the ſame ſtage: others in religion, elſe it had been no change: Their Miniſtery & Monuments expoſed to utter ſcorn: Their Maſſes, their oblations, their adorations, their invocations, their anoylings, their exorcizings, their ſhrift, their abſolutions, their Images, Rood-lofts, and whatſoever elſe of this kind: But the Temples of thoſe old Heathens were demoliſhed & razed: Here is the quarrell: ours ſtand ſtill in their proud Majeſty: Can you ſee no difference betwixt our Churches and their Temples? The very name it ſelfe (if at leaſt you have underſtood it) Kirk or Church (which is nothing but an abbreviation of (κυριακον, the Lords houſe) might have taught you, that ours were dedicated to God, and theirs to the Devill, in their falſe gods: Auguſtine anſwers you, as directly, as if he were in my roome: The Gentiles (ſaith he) to their gods erected Temples, we not Temples unto our Martyrs, as unto Gods, but memorials as unto dead men, whoſe ſpirits with God are ſtill living: Theſe then if they were abuſed by Popiſh Idolatry, is there no way, but Down with them, down with them to the ground? Well fare the Donatiſts yet your old friends: they but waſhed the walls that were polluted by the Orthodox; by the ſame token, that Optatus aſkes them, why they did not waſh the books which ours toucht, and the Heavens which they looked upon: What, are the very ſtones ſinfull? what can be done with them? The very earth where they ſhould lye on heaps would be uncleane: But not their pollution angers you more, than their proud Majeſty: What houſe can be too good for the Maker of all things? A State, ſo is he not delighted in baſeneſſe. If the pompe of the Temple were ceremoniall, yet it leaves this morality behind, that Gods houſe ſhould be decent: and what if goodly? If we did put holineſſe in the ſtones, as you doe uncleanneſſe, it might be ſinne to be coſtly: Let me tell you, there may be as much pride in a clay wall, as in a carved: Proud Majeſty is better than proud baſeneſſe; the ſtone or clay will offend in neither, we may in both; If you love cottages, the ancient Chriſtians with us, loved to have Gods houſe ſtately, as appeares by the example of that worthy Biſhop of Alexandria, and that gracious Conſtantine, in whoſe daies theſe ſacred piles began to lift up their heads unto this envied height: Take you your own choice, give us ours; let us neither repine, nor ſcorn at each other.

The founders and Furnitures of our Churches.

ALL this while I feared you had been in Popiſh Idolatrie: now I find you in Heatheniſh: Theſe our Churches are ſtill poſſeſſed by their Flamins, and Arch-Flamins: I had thought none of our Temples had been ſo ancient: certainly I find but one poore ruinous building, reported to have worn out this long tyrannie of time: For the moſt, you might have read their age, and their Founders in open records: But theſe were derived from thoſe: ſurely the Churches as much as the men. It is true, the Flamins, and what ever other Heathen Prieſts, were put down, Chriſtian Biſhops were ſet up; Are theſe therefore derived from thoſe? Chriſtianity came in the roome of Judaiſme: was it therfore derived from it? Before you told us, that our Prelacy came from that Antichriſt of Rome, now from the Flamins of the Heathen: Both no leſſe, than either: If you cannot be true, yet learne to be conſtant. But what meane you to charge our Churches with carved and painted Images? It is well you write to thoſe that know them; Why did not you ſay we bow our knees to them, and offer incenſe? Perhaps you have eſpied ſome old duſty Statue in an obſcure corner, covered over with Cob-webs, with halfe a face, and that miſerably blemiſht, or perhaps halfe a Crucifix inverted in a Church-window, and theſe you ſurely noted for Engliſh Idols: no leſſe dangerous glaſſe you might have ſeen at Geneva, a Church that hates Idolatry, as much as you doe us: What more? Maſſing Copes, and Surplices: ſome Copes (if you will) more Surplices, no Maſſing: E Search your bookes againe, you ſhall finde Albes in the Maſſe, no Surplices. As for Organ-muſick, you ſhould not have fetcht it from Rome, but from Jeruſalem: In the Reformed Church at Middleburgh, you might have found this ſkirt of the harlot: which yet you grant at leaſt crept out of Babylon; Judge now (Chriſtian Reader) of the weight of theſe grand exceptions; and ſee whether ten thouſand ſuch were able to make us no Church, and argue us not only in Babylon, but to be Babylon it ſelfe: Thus babyloniſh we are to you, and thus Sion-like to God: Every true Church is Gods Sion: every Church that holds the Foundation, is true, according to that golden rule, Epheſ. 2.21. But for that not the ſeparation, but the cauſe makes the Schiſmatike; and leſt you ſhould ſeem to ſpeak evill of the thing you know not, and to condemn a cauſe unheard, you lay down in the next place the ſuppoſed cauſe of our ſeparation, againſt which you deale as inſufficiently. And that you pretend to be, none other than your conſorting with the Papiſts in certaine Ceremonies: touching which, and our ſeparation in regard of them thus you write.

M H. If you have taken but the leaſt knowledge of the ground of our judgement and practice, how dare you thus abuſe both us and the Reader, as if the only or chiefe ground of our ſeparation were your Popiſh Ceremonies? But if you goe only by gheſſe, having never ſo much as read over one Treatiſe publiſhed in our defence, and yet ſtick not to paſſe this your cenſorious doome both upon us and it, I leave it to the Reader to judge whether you have been more laviſh of your cenſure or credit. Moſt unjuſt is the cenſure of a cauſe unknown, though in it ſelfe never ſo blame worthy, which nevertheleſſe may be praiſe-worthy, for ought he knowes that cenſures it. B

SECTION XLVII.

On what ground Separation or Ceremonies were objected.

HE that leaves the whole Church in a groſſe and wilfull error, is an Heretike; he that leaves a particular Church for appendances, is a Schiſmatick: ſuch are you, both in the Action and cauſe: The act is yeelded, the cauſe hath been in part ſcanned, ſhall be more: This I vainly pretended to be our conſorting in Ceremonies with the Papiſts: Behold here the ground of your loud challenge of my ignorance: Ignorance of your judgement and practice: Here is my abuſe of you, of my Reader: and, how durſt I? Good words (M.R.) What I have erred, I will confeſſe: I have wronged you indeed; but in my charity: I knew the cauſe of Browniſme, but I knew not you: For (to ſay ingenuouſly) I had heard and hoped, that your cauſe had been leſſe deſperate; My intelligence was, that in diſlike of theſe Ceremonies obtruded, and an hopeleſneſſe of future liberty, you and your fellows had made a ſeceſſion rather than a ſeparation from our Church, to a place where you might have ſcope to profeſſe, and opportunitie to enjoy your owne conceits: whence it was that I termed you Ring-leaders of the late ſeparations, not followers of the firſt, and made your plea againſt our Church, imperfection, not falſhood: I hoped you, as not ours, ſo not theirs: not ours in place, ſo not quite theirs in peeviſh opinion: I knew it to be no new thing for men inclining to theſe fancies, to begin new Churches at Amſterdam ſeverall from the reſt: witneſſe the letters of ſome (ſometimes yours) cited by your own Paſtor: I knew the former ſeparation, and hated it; I hoped better of the latter ſeparation, and pitied it: My knowledge both of *M. Smith whom you followed, and your ſelfe, would not let me thinke of you, as you deſerved: How durſt I charge you with that, which perhaps you might diſavow? It was my charity therefore, that made my accuſations eaſie; it is your uncharitableneſſe that accuſes them of ignorance. I knew why a Browniſt is a true Schiſmatick; I knew not you were ſo true a Browniſt. But why then did I write? Taking your ſeparation at beſt; I knew how juſtly I might take occaſion by it to diſſwade from ſeparation; to others good, though not to yours: Now I know you better, or worſe rather, I think you heare more: Forgive me my charity, and make the worſt of my ignorance. I knew that this ſeparation (which now I know yours) ſtands upon foure grounds, as ſome beaſts upon foure feet. Firſt, God worſhipped after a falſe manner; Secondly, Prophane multitude received; Thirdly, Antichriſtian Miniſtery impoſed; Fourthly, Subjection to Antichriſtian Government: The Ceremonies are but as ſome one paw in every foot: yet if we extend the word to the largeſt uſe, dividing all Religion into Ceremony, and Subſtance; I may yet, and doe averre, that your ſeparation is meerly grounded upon Ceremonies. As touching the Ceremonies here ſpoken of, howſoever we have formerly refuſed them, ſubmitting (as all others did and doe) to the Prelates ſpirituall juriſdiction (herein through ignorance ſtraining at Gnats, and ſwallowing Camels) yet are we verily perſwaded of them and ſo were before we ſeparated, that they are but as leaves of that tree, and as badges of that man of ſin, whereof the Pope is head, and the Prelates ſhoulders. And ſo we for our parts ſee no reaſon why any of the Biſhops ſworn ſervants (as all the Miniſters in the Church of England are Canonically) ſhould make nice to wear their Lords Liveries. Which Ceremonies notwithſtanding we know well enough, howſoever you for advantage extenuate & debaſe them unto us to be advanced & preferred in your Church, before the preaching of the Goſpel.

B It is much that they being not ſo much as Reed, nor any part of the building (as you pretend) ſhould overturn the beſt builders amongſt you as they doe, The proportion betwixt Zoar and them holds well: Zoar was a neighbour unto Sodome, both in place and ſin, and obnoxius to the ſame deſtruction with it: and it was Lots error to deſire to have it ſpared, Gen. 19.15,18,19,20. and ſo he never found reſt nor peace in it, but for ſooke it for feare of the ſame juſt judgement, which had overtaken the reſt of the Cities, verſe 30. The application of this to your Ceremonies, I leave to your ſelfe, and them to that deſtruction, to which they are devoted by the Lord.

SECTION XLVIII.

C AND touching Ceremonies, you refuſed them formerly, but not long: and when you did refuſe them, you knew not wherefore; for immediately before your ſuſpenſion, you acknowledged them to be things indifferent, and for matter of ſcandall by them, you had not informed your ſelfe (by your own confeſſion) of a whole quarter of a yeere after: Why refuſed you then, but as the Poet made his Plaies to pleaſe the people, or as Simon Magus was baptized for company? But refuſing them, you ſubmitted to the Prelates ſpirituall juriſdiction: there was your crime; this was your Camell, the other your Gnats; Did ever any Prelate challenge ſpirituall rule over your conſcience?

Eſtimation of Ceremonies, and ſubjection to the Prelates.

This they all appropriate to the great Biſhop of our ſouls: and if other, grant them as your malice faineth: what ſinne is it to be the ſubject of a Tyrant? now upon more
D grace, refuſing the Prelacy, you have branded the ceremonies; So you did before your ſeparation; Tell us, how long was it after your ſuſpenſion, and before your departure, that you could have been content (upon condition) to have worn this linnen badge of your Man of ſin? Was not this your reſolution, when you went from Norwich to Lincolnſhire, after your ſuſpenſion? Deny it not; my witneſſes are too ſtrong. But let us take you as you are: theſe Ceremonies, though too vile for you, yet are good enough for our Miniſters of England: As if you ſaid, Lord, I thank thee, I am not as this Publican: Why for our Miniſters? Becauſe, thoſe are the Liveries, and theſe the ſworn ſervants of the Antichriſtian Biſhops: We have indeed ſworn obedience to our Ordinary in honeſt and lawfull Commandements, but ſervice to Chriſt: But doth all obedience imply ſervitude? this obedience is, as to ſpirituall Fathers, not to Maſters; yet ſo are we the ſervants of Chriſt, that we are ready to give our ſervice to the leaſt of his Saints; Thus vile will we be for God; how much more to
E thoſe whom God hath made (as Hierome ſayes) Principes Eccleſiæ: whiles they command for God: what doe we herein, but that which Epiphanius urged of old againſt Ærius; What but the ſame which Ignatius (that holy and old Martyr) requires (not once) of all Preſbyters, and offers the ingagement of his owne ſoule for us in this act?

As for our Ceremonies, aggravate them how you can for your advantage, they are but Ceremonies to us: and ſuch, as wherein we put no holineſſe, but order, decency, convenience: but they are preferred (you ſay) in our Church, before the preaching of the Goſpell: a moſt wrongfull untruth; We hold preaching an eſſentiall part of Gods ſervice, Ceremonies none at all: the Goſpell preached we hold the life and ſoule of the Church, Ceremonies either the garment, or the lace of the garment: The Goſpell preached we hold the Foundation and Walls; Ceremonies hardly ſo much as Reed, or Tile: But how then (ſay you) have they overturned our beſt builders? This is a word of rare favour: I had thought you had held us all ruiners, not builders: Or if builders; of Babel, not of Jeruſalem: in which work the beſt builders are the worſt. Thoſe whoſe hand hath been in this act, would tell you, that not ſo much the Ceremonies are ſtood upon, as obedience: If God pleaſe to try Adam but with an Apple, it is enough: What doe we quarrell at the value of the fruit, when we have a prohibition? Shimei is ſlain: what, meerly for going out of the City? the act was little, the bond was great: what is commanded, matters not ſo much, as by whom; inſult not, we may thanke your outrage for this loſſe.

For your retortion of my Zoar and Sodom: I can give you leave to be witty, you uſe it ſo ſeldom: but when you have plaied with the alluſion what you liſt, I muſt tell you that he which will needs urge a compariſon to go on foure feet, is not worthy to goe upon two: Zoar was neer to Sodom, not part of it; Zoar was reſerved when Sodom was deſtroyed: Zoars neerneſſe to the place where Sodome ſtood, needed not have given Lot cauſe of removall. Zoar might ſafely have been the harbour of Lot: his feare was, for want of faith: God promiſed him and the place ſecurity: the far-fetcht application therefore of the wickednes of Zoar, to our Ceremonies, might well have been forborne, and kept to your ſelfe: much leſſe needed you (like ſome Anti-Lot) to call for fire and brimſtone from heaven upon your Zoar.

How we would have behaved our ſelves in the Temple, where the money-changers were, and they that ſold Doves, we ſhall anſwer you, when you prove your Church to be the Temple of God, compiled and built of ſpiritually hewn and lively ſtones, 1 King. 5. 17, 18. and 6, 7. 1 Pet. 2. 5. and of the Cedars, Firres, and Thyne trees of Lebanon, 2 Chron. 2. 8. framed and ſet together in that comely order, which a greater than Salomon *hath preſcribed: unto which God hath promiſed his preſence. SECTION XLIX.

The ſtate of the Temple, and of our Church in reſemblance.

HOw you would have behaved your ſelfe in the Temple to the Money-changers, you will anſwer when we prove our Church to be Gods Temple, built of that matter, and in that form which God hath preſcribed: and here you ſend us to 1 King. 5. 17. and 2 Chron. 2. 8. Ignorantly; as if Salomons Temple had ſtood till Chriſts time: when neither the firſt, nor ſecond (though called Beth Gnolam) outlaſted more than foure hundred yeeres: Or as if the Market had been under the very roofe of that Temple. Whether Herods were built of the ſame matter with Salomons, & in full correſpondence to it, I diſpute not: it was certainly dedicated to Gods ſervice, and that (which you would hardly diſgeſt) in a ſolemn anniverſary Holy day: though not erected upon the word of any Prophet. But to let paſſe Alligories: we muſt prove our ſelves the true Church of God; Thus we doe it: We are true Chriſtians, for we were baptized into the Name of Chriſt; we truly profeſſe our continuance in the ſame faith into which we were baptized; we joyn together in the publike Services of God; we maintaine every point of the moſt ancient Creeds; we overthrow not the foundation by any conſequence. Therfore what ever is wanting to us, what ever is ſuperfluous, in ſpight of all the gates of Hell, we are the true Church of God. Let me aſke you: Were not the people of the Jews in the Prophets, and in Chriſts time, a confuſed heape of dead and defiled, and (for I will uſe your Tautologies) polluted ſtones, and of all rubbiſh, of bryers and brambles of the Wilderneſſe, for the moſt part fitter for burning than building? Can we be worſe than they? If wickedneſſe can defile a Church, they ſhall juſtifie us: did either thoſe Prophets, or our Saviour, rather ſhew their obedience to God in departing from it, than their valour in purging it?

A it? you have well imitated these heavenly patterns. But what; can your charity find nothing but rubbish? Not one square stone, not one living? You will be judging till God judge you: if you take not heed of these courses, you will so run with the Hee-goats that you will stand with the Goats on the left hand. That God, whose place you have usurped give you more wisdome, and love.

SEP.

And what (I pray you) is the valour which the best hearted, and most zealous Reformers amongst you have manifested, in driving out the money-changers? doth it not appeare in this, that they suffer themselves to be driven out with the two stringed whip of Ceremonies B and subscription, by the money-changers, the Chancellors and Officials, which sell sins like Doves: and by the chiefe Priests, the Bishops which set them on worke? so farre are the most zealous amongst you from driving out the money-changers, as they themselves are driven out by them, because they will not change with them to the utmost farthing.

SECTION L.

THe valour of our most zealous Reformers hath truly shewed it selfe in yeeldance: As in Duels; so here, he is the most valiant that can so master himself as not to fight: you according to the common opinion of Swaggerers, blame the peaceable of cowardise, and accuse them of suffering. Behold a new crime; That they suffer themselves to be driven out: What should they have done? Should they have taken armes, and cry, The sword of God, and Gedeon? You that will not allow a C Prince to compell Subjects, will you allow Subjects to compell Princes? God forbid; This were high Treason against Gods Anointed: what then? Should they approve the Ceremonies by subscription, by practice? This you exclame upon, as high treason against the Highest: What yet more? Should they have preached with their mouthes stopt? This is it, which you have learned of your Founder, and through not many hands received, and required with no lesse violence: Clamour and tumults is that you desire still: let our sinne be peaceable obedience, yours fury and opposition. Your head-strong conceit is, that it is a sinne to be silenced: Men must preach even when they may not: all times before you, would have wondred at this Paradox: For however the Apostles, which had not their calling from men, would not be silenced by men, yet we find that all their successors held, that those hands which were laid upon D their heads, might be laid upon their mouthes: look into all Histories: Those constitutions (which though not Apostolik, yet were ancient) in the seventh Canon punish a Bishop, or Presbyter, that upon pretence of Religion separates from his wife, with deposition: and if any Presbyter shall shift his charge without licence (τῦ τὸν χλαυσάμενον ἀπαλλάττεσθαι) & lastly, inflicts the same penalty upon Fornication, Adultery, Perjury.

The great Nicene Counsell takes the same order with some misliked Bishops, and Presbyters in divers Canons: Gaudentius in the Counsell of Sardy, takes it for granted, that a Bishop may by Bishops be deposed: so the second Councell of Carthage, Can. 13 so the fourth Councell of Carthage, more than once imposes degradation: so Leo the 1 threats to put some offending persons from the office of the Ministery: so (that I may E not be endles) blessed Cyprian advises Rogatianus, a good old Bishop, which was abused by a malapart Deacon, by the authority of his Chaire to right himself, and either to depose, or suspend the offender. Leontius in Socrates, is deprived of his Priesthood: yea, what Counsell or Father gives not both rules and instances of this practice? See how far the ancient Church was from these tumultuous fancies: No, no, (M. R.) we well find, it is doing that undoes the Church, not suffering: If your fellows could have suffered more and done lesse, the Church had been happy: As for our Church-Officers, you may raile upon them with a lawlesse safety: there is a great Ditch betwixt you and them: else you might pay deare for this sinne of slandering them with their cheap peny-worths: How idly do you insult over those, whom your mony-changers have driven out of their Pulpits; When you confesse (after all your valour) that they have driven you both out of Church & Country: who can pitty a miserable insulter?

Power of Reforming abuſes given to the Church: and the iſſue of the neglect of it.

YOu that can grant there will be corruptions in all other Churches, will endure none in ours: If England ſhould have either unleavened Wafers, or drunken Love-feaſts (though no other blemiſhes) ſhe could not but be Babylon: We envy not your favors: Theſe, or whatſoever like enormities, Chriſt hath given power unto his Church to reform: but what if the Church neglect to uſe it? What if thoſe evils, which are brought in by humane frailty, will not by divine authority be purged out? Now the error (by your doctrine) is grown fundamentall; ſo Chriſt is loſt, and the foundation razed: if we ſhall then aſſume (againſt our friends, to convince our enemies) the Church of Geneva hath been ſeriouſly dealt with, in this corruption, and diſſwaded by vehement importunity, yet ſtill perſiſteth: How can you free them, and charge us? ſee how we love to be miſerable, with companie. This power to purge out all corruptions Chriſt hath not given us: if he hath given it you; you muſt firſt begin to purge out your ſelves: you have done it; but ſtill there remain ſome: would God we had as much execution as power; Our Church ſhould be as clean as yours is Siſmaticall. If you ſhould meaſure faculties by their exerciſe; Naturall reſt ſhould be the greateſt enemy to vertue: and the ſolitary Chriſtian ſhould be miſerable: This power of ours is not dead, but ſleepeth: When it awaketh unto more frequent uſe, (which we earneſtly pray for) look you for the firſt handſell of it: None can be more worthy: as it is, we offend not more in defect than you in exceſſe: Of whom that your Lazarello of Amſterdam, G. J. could ſay, that you have Excommunication as ready as a Prelate hath a Priſon: Chriſt is in many that feele him not; but we want not the power only, but the preſence of Chriſt: How ſo? he was with us while you were here: Did he depart with you; will the Separatiſts ingroſſe our Savior to themſelves, and (as Cyprian ſaid of Pupianus) go to Heaven alone? yea, confine the God of Heaven to Amſterdam? What inſolence is this? we have him in his Word: we have him in his Sacraments: we have him in our hearts: we have him in our profeſſion; yet this enemy dare ſay, we want him; Wherein? I ſuppoſe in our cenſures: We have Peters keyes (as his true ſucceſſors both in office and doctrine) our fault is, that we uſe them not as you would: What Church doth ſo? your firſt Martyr doth as zealouſly inveigh againſt the practice of Geneva, and all other Reformed Congregations in this point, as againſt us: both for the wooden Dagger (as he termes it) of ſuſpenſion, and for their Conſiſtoriall Excommunication. Woe were to all the World, if Chriſt ſhould limit his preſence only to your faſhions: Here you found him, and here you left him: Would to God we did no more grieve him with our ſins, than you pleaſe him in your preſumptuous cenſures: in the reſt, you raile againſt our Prelates and us: Can any man think that Chriſt hath left peaceable ſpirits, to go dwell with railers? Indeed yours is free-hold; ſo you would have it free from ſubjection, free from obedience: This is looſeneſſe, more than libertie; You have broken the bonds, and caſt the cords from you; but you miſ-call our tenure: We hate villenage no leſſe than you hate peace, and hold (in capite) of him that is the head of his body, the Church; under whoſe eaſie yoke we doe willingly ſtoope in a ſweet Chriſtian freedome? abhorring and reproving, and therefore (notwithſtanding our perſonall Communion) avoiding all abominations: In theſe two reſpects reſpects therefore of our confuſion, and bondage, we have well ſeene in this diſcourſe, how juſtly your Sion accounts us Babylon: ſince it is apparent for the one, that here is neither confuſion, nor Babyloniſh, nor without ſeparation: For the other, no bondage, no ſervility: Our Prelates being our Fathers, not our Maſters: and if Lords for their externall dignity, yet not Lords of our Faith: and if both theſe your reſpects were ſo, yet ſo long as we do inviolably hold the foundation, both directly, and by neceſſary ſequell; any Railer may terme us, but no Separatiſt ſhall prove us Babylon: you may flie whether you liſt; would God yet further, unleſſe you had more love.

I Need no better Analyſer than your ſelfe, ſave that you doe not only reſolve my parts, but adde more: whereas every motion hath a double terme, from whence and whither: both theſe could not but fall into our diſcourſe. Having therefore formerly expoſtulated with you for your (ſince you will ſo terme it) impietie, in forſaking a ceremonious Babylon of your own making in England; I thought it not unfit to compare your choice with your refuſall; England with Amſterdam, which it pleaſeth you to intitle a ſubſtantiall Babylon: impiety and Madneſſe are titles of your own choice; let your guiltineſſe be your owne accuſer: The truth is, my charity and your uncharitableneſſe have cauſed us to miſtake each other. My charity thus: Hearing both at Middleburgh, and here, that certaine companies from the parts of Nottingham and Lincolne (which Harbinger had been newly in Zeland before me) meant to retire themſelves to Amſterdam, for their full liberty, not for the full approbation of your Church: not favouring your maine opinions, but emulating your freedome in too much hate of our ceremonies, and too much accordance to ſome grounds of your hatred: I hoped you had beene one of their Guides; both becauſe Lincolnſhire was your Country, and Maſter Smith your Oracle, and Generall. Not daring therefore to charge you with perfect Browniſme, what could I thinke might be a greater motive to this your ſuppoſed change, than the view of our (ſo oft proclaimed) wickedneſſe, and the hope of leſſe cauſe of offence in thoſe forraine parts? This I urged, fearing to goe deeper than I might be ſure to warrant. Now comes my charitable Anſwerer, and imputes this eaſineſſe of my challenge to my ignorance; and therefore will needs perſwade his Chriſtian Reader, that I knew nothing of the firſt ſeparation, becauſe I objected ſo little to the ſecond.

It were ſtrange if I ſhould thinke, you gather Churches there by Town-rows (as we in England) who know that ſome one Priſon might hold all your refined Flock you gathered here by Hedge-rows; but there it is eaſier to tell how you divide, than how you gather: let your Church be an intire body, enjoying her own ſpirituall Communion, yet if it be not a corroſive to your heart to converſe in the ſame ſtreets and to be ranged in the ſame Town-rowes with Jewes, Arrians, Anabaptiſts, &c. you are no whit of kin to him, that vexed his righteous ſoule with the uncleanneſſes of foule Sodome. That good man had nothing but civill ſociety with thoſe impure Neigh-

Neighbours: he differed from them in Religion, in practice: yet could he not ſo careleſly turne off this torment; His houſe was Gods Church; wherein they had the ſpirituall Communion of the Saints: yet whiles the City was ſo uncleane, his heart was unquiet: We may (you grant) have civill ſociety with ill men, ſpirituall Communion only with Saints: Thoſe muſt be accounted the world, theſe onely the Church; your own allegations ſhall condemn you. They are not of the World (ſaith Chriſt) as I am not of the World: Both Chriſt and they were parts of the Jewiſh Church: The Jewiſh Church was not ſo ſanctified, but the moſt were extreamely uncleane: therefore we may be parts of a Viſible unſanctified Church, and yet be ſeparate from the World. Saint Paul writes to his Corinthians, ſanctified in Chriſt, Saints by calling: True; but not long after, he can ſay, Ye are yet carnall. In his ſecond Epiſtle: Come out (ſaith he) from among them: But from whom? From Infidels by profeſſion, not corrupted Chriſtians.

SECTION LIII.

The neerneſſe of the State & Church, & the great errors found by the Separatiſts in the French & Dutch Churches.

THe Church and State, if they be two, yet they are twins; and that ſo, as either's evill proves mutuall: the ſins of the City not reformed, blemiſh the Church: where the Church hath power and in a ſort comprehends the State, ſhe cannot waſh her hands of tolerated diſorders in the Common-wealth; hence is my compariſon of the Church (if you could have ſeen it, not the Kingdome) of England, with that of Amſterdam: I doubt not, but you could be content to ſing the old ſong of us, Bona terra, mala gens: Our Land you could like well, if you might be Lords alone. Thanks be to God it likes not you, and juſtly thinks the meaneſt corner too good for ſo mutinous a generation: when it is weary of Peace, it will recall you: you that neither in Priſon, nor on the Seas, nor in the Coaſts of Virginia, nor in your way, nor in Netherland could live in Peace. What ſhal we hope of your eaſe at home? Where ye are, all you thankfull Tenants cannot in a powerfull Chriſtian ſtate move God to diſtinguiſh betwixt the known ſins of the City & the Church: How oft hath our Gracious Soveraigne, and how importunately, been ſolicited for a Toleration of Religions? It is pity that the Papiſts hired not your Advocation: who in this point are thoſe true Caſſanders, which Reverend Calvin long ſince confuted: Their wiſhes herein are yours: To our ſhame and their excuſe: his Chriſtian heart held that toleration unchriſtian and intolerable, which you either neglect or magnifie: Good Conſtantine winkt at it in his beginning, but as David at the houſe of Zerviah: Succeeding times found theſe Canaanites to be pricks and thorns, and therefore both by Mulcts and baniſhments ſought either their yeeldance or avoydance. If your Magiſtrates having once given their names to the Church, endevour not to purge this Augean Stable; how can you preferre their Communion to ours?

But howſoever now, leſt we ſhould think your Land-lords have too juſt cauſe to packe you away for Wranglers, you turn over all the blame from the Church to the City; yet your Paſtor and Church have ſo found the City in the Church and branded it with ſo blacke markes, as that all your ſmooth extenuations cannot make it a leſſe

A leſſe Babylon than the Church of England: Behold now, by your own Confeſſions, either Amſterdam ſhall be, or England ſhall not be Babylon: Theſe eleven crimes you have found and proclaimed in thoſe Dutch and French Churches.

Firſt, That the Aſſemblies are ſo contrived, that the whole Church comes not together in one: So that the Miniſters cannot together with the Flock ſanctify the Lords day; the preſence of the members of the Church cannot be known, and finally, no publike action, whether Excommunication, or any other, can rightly be performed. Could you ſay worſe of us? Where neither Sabbath can be rightly ſanctified, nor preſence or abſence kown, nor any holy action rightly performed, what can there be but meer confuſion? Fr. Johnſ. Artic. againſt the French and Dutch Churches.

B Secondly, That they baptize the ſeed of them who are no members of any Viſible Church; of whom moreover they have not care as of members, neither admit their Parents to the Lords Supper: Meer Babyloniſme, and ſin in conſtitution, yea the ſame that makes us no Church: for what ſeparation can there be in ſuch admittance? what other but a ſinfull commixture? How is the Church of Amſterdam now gathered from the World?

Thirdly, That in the publike worſhip of God they have deviſed and uſed another forme of Prayer, beſides that which Chriſt our Lord hath preſcribed, Matth. 6. reading out of a booke certaine Prayers invented and impoſed by man. Behold here our fellow-Idolaters: and (asfollows) a dayly Sacrifice of a ſet Service-booke, which inſtead of the ſweet incenſe of ſpirituall praiers is offered to God; very Swines-fleſh, a new Portuiſe, and an equall participation with us of the Curſe of addition to the Word. Bastr. againſt Gyff.

C Fourthly, That rule and commandement of Chriſt, Matth. 18.15. they neither obſerve, nor ſuffer rightly to be obſerved among them. How oft have you ſaid that there can be no ſound Church without this courſe, becauſe no ſeparation? Behold the maine blemiſh of England in the face of Amſterdam!

Fifthly, That they worſhip God in the Idol Temples of Antichriſt: ſo the Wine is marr'd with the Veſſell; their ſervice, abomination with ours: neither do theſe Antichriſtian ſtones want all glorious ornaments of the Romiſh Harlot: yet more.

Sixtly, That their Miniſters have their ſet maintenance in another manner than Chriſt hath ordained, 1 Chron. 14. and that alſo ſuch, as by which any Miniſtery at all, whether Popiſh or other, might be maintained: Either Tythes, or as ill: Behold, one

D of the maine Arguments whereby our Miniſtery is condemned as falſe and Antichriſtian, falling heavy upon our Neighbours.

Seventhly, That their Elders change yeerely, and doe not continue in their Office, according to the Doctrine of the Apoſtles and practice of the Primitive Church: What can our Church have worſe than falſe Governours? Both annuall and perpetuall they cannot be: What is (if not this) a wrong in Conſtitution?

Eightly, That they celebrate marriage in the Church, as if it were a part of the Eccleſiaſticall Adminiſtration: a foule ſhame and ſinne: and what better than our third Sacrament?

Ninthly, That they uſe a new cenſure of ſuſpenſion, which Chriſt hath not appointed: no leſſe than Engliſh preſumption.

E Tenthly, That they obſerve dayes and times, conſecrating certaine dayes in the yeere to the Nativity, Reſurrection, Aſcenſion of Chriſt: Behold their Callender as truly poſſeſſed: Two Commandements ſolemnly broken at once; and we not Idolaters alone.

Eleventhly, which is laſt and worſt, that they receive unrepentant Excommunicates to be members of their Church, which by this meanes becomes one body with ſuch as be delivered unto Sathan; therefore none of Chriſts body: England can be but a miſcelline rabble of prophane men; The Dutch and French Churches are belike no better: who can be worſe than an unrepentant Excommunicate? Go now, and ſay, It is the Apoſtaſie of Antichriſt to have communion with the World in the holy things of God, which are the peculiars of the Church, and cannot without Sacrilege be ſo proſtituted and prophaned; Goe ſay that the plaguy-ſpirituall-leproſie H. Ainſworth in his Counter poyſon.

of sin rising up in the foreheads of many in that Church, unshut up, uncovered, (yea, wilfully let loose) infects all both persons and things amongst them: Goe now and fly out of this Babylon also, as the He-Goats before the flocke, or return to ours: But how-ever these errors be grosse, perhaps they are tractable; Not the sin undoes the Church, but obstinacy: here is no evasion. For behold, you doe more accuse those Chuches of corruption, than of wilfulnesse: for divers times have you dealt with them about these fearefull enormities: yea you have often desired, that knowledge thereof might be by themselves given to the whole body of their Church, or that (at least) they would take order it might be done by you: They have refused both. What remaines, but they be our fellow Heathens and Publicans? And not they alone, but all Reformed Churches beside in Christendome, which do jointly partake in all these (Except one or two personall) abominations: will you never leave, till you have wrangled your selves out of the world? A B

But now I fear I have drawn you to say, that the hellish impieties both in the City and Church of Amsterdam, are but Frogs, Lice, Flies, Murraine, and other Ægyptian plagues, not prejudicing your Goshen: Say so if you dare; I feare they would soon make the Ocean your Red Sea, and Virginia your Wildernesse.

The Church is Noahs Arke, which gave safety to her Guests, whereof yee are part; but remember that it had unclean beasts also, and some savage: If the waves drown you not, yet (me thinks) you should complain of noisome society. Sathan throne could not prejudice the Church of Pergamus: but did not the Balaamites (the Nicolaitans) Yet their heavenly Communion stood, and the Angell is sent away with but threats.

SEP. C

It is the Will of God and of Christ, that his Church should abide in the world, and converse with it in the affaires thereof, which are common to both: But it is the Apostasie of Antichrist to have Communion with the World in the holy things of God, which are the peculiars of the Church, and cannot without great sacrilege be so prostituted and prophaned.

SECTION XLVI.

Conversation with the world.

AS it were madnesse to deny that the Church should converse with the World in the affaires thereof: So to deny her Communion in Gods Holy things, with any of those of the World, which professe Christianity (as yet uncensured) is a point of Anabatisticall Apostasie: such of the World are still of the Church. As my censure cannot eject them, so their sinne (after my private endevour of redresse) cannot defile me: I speak of private Communicants: If any unbidden Guest come with a ragged garment, and unwashen hands, shall I forbear Gods heavenly dainties? The Master of the Feast can say, Friend, how camest thou in hither? not, Friends, why came you hither with such a guest? God bids me come: He hath imposed this necessity, never allowed this excuse: My teeth shall not be set on edge with the sowre Grapes of others: If the Church cast not out the known unworthy, the sin is hers: If a man will come unworthy, the sin is his: But if I come not, because he comes, the sinne is mine: I shall not answer for that others sinne: I shall answer for mine own neglect: Another mans fault cannot dispense with my duty. D

Duobus modis non te maculat malum, videlicet si non consentis, & si redarguis. d. 23. q. 4. a malis.

SEP. E

The aire of the Gospell which you draw in, is nothing so free and clear as you make show: it is only because you are used to it, that makes you so judge. The thick smoak of your canons, especially of such as are planted against the Kingdome of Christ the visible Church, and the administration of it, doe obscure and poison the aire, which you all draw in, and wherein you breath. The plagny-spirituall leprosie of sin rising up in the foreheads of so many thousands in the Church, unshut up, uncovered, infects all, both persons and things amongst you. Lev. 13. 45, 45, 46, 47. 2 Cor. 6. 17. The blasting Hierarchy suffers no good thing to grow, or prosper, but withers all, both bud and branch. The dayly sacrifice of the service-book, which in stead of spirituall Prayer, sweet as incense, you offer up Morning & Evening smels so strong of the Popes Portuise, as it makes many hundred amongst your selves, stop their noses at it, and yet you boast of the free and cleer aire of the Gospell, wherein you breath

SECTION LV.

AS there is no Element which is not through many mixtures departed from the firſt ſimplicity: So no Church ever breathed in ſo pure an aire, as that it might not juſtly complaine of ſome thicke and unwholſome evaporations of errour and ſin. If you challenge an immunity you are herein the true brood of the ancient Puritanes: But if too many ſinnes in practiſe have thickned the aire of our Church, yet not one Hereſie: that ſmoke of the bottomleſſe pit hath never corrupted it: and therefore juſtly may I averre, that here you might draw in the cleere aire of the Goſpell: No where upon earth more freely. And if this be but the opinion of cuſtome, you whom abſence hath helped with a more nice and dainty ſcent, ſpeak your worſt: Shew us our Hereſies, and ſhame us: you have done it, and behold foure main infections of our Engliſh aire: The firſt, the ſmoke of our Canons: Wittily: I feare, the great Ordinances of the Church have troubled you more with the blow, than the ſmoke: For you tell us of their Plantation againſt the Kingdome of Chriſt: What Kingdome? The viſible Church: Which is that? Not the reformedſt peece of ours, whoſe beſt are but Goats and Swine: Not the cloſe Nicodemians of your owne Sect amongſt us, which would be loth to be viſible: Not forrainers; to them they extend not: None therefore in all the world, but the Engliſh Parlour-full at Amſterdam: Can there be any truer Donatiſme? Cry you ſtill out of their poyſoning the aire: We hold it the beſt cleanſed by the batteries of your idle fancies, by ridding you from our aire, and by making this your Church inviſible to us: ſmart you thus till we complaine.

The impure mixtures of the Church of England.

1. Canons.

The ſecond is the plague or leproſie of ſinne, unſhut up and uncovered. We know that ſin is as ill as the Devill can make it; a moſt loathſome thing in the eies of God, and his Angels, and Saints: and we grant to our griefe, that among ſo many millions of men, there may be found ſome thouſands of Lepers: good Lawes and cenſures meet with ſome, others eſcape: It is not ſo much our fault as our griefe. But that this Leproſie infects all perſons, and things, is ſhamefully over-reacht: Plague and Leproſie have their limits, beyond which is no contagion: If a man come not neer them, if he take the winde in an open aire, they infect not: Such is ſin; it can infect none but the guilty: Thoſe which act, or aſſent to, or beare with it, or deteſt it not, are in this pollution: But thoſe which can mourn for it, and cannot redreſſe it, are free from infection: How many foule Lepers ſpiritually did our Saviour ſee in the publick aire of the Jewiſh Church? wherewith yet he joyned, and his, not fearing infection ſo much, as gracing the remnants of their ruinous Church: Were thoſe ſeven thouſand Iſraelites, whoſe knees bowed not to Baal, infected with the Idolatry of their neighbours? yet continued they ſtill parts of the ſame Church.

2. ſinne uncenſured.

Certè nullius crimen maculat neſcientem. Aug. Epiſt. 48.

1. Reg. 19. 18.

But this yet exceeds: Not onely all perſons, but all things: What? Our Goſpell? Our Heaven, Earth, Sea? Our Bookes, Coyne, Commodities? Behold, you ſee the ſame Heaven with us, you have no Bibles but ours: our aire in his circular motion comes to be yours: the water that waſheth our Iland, perhaps waſheth your hands: Our uncleane Silver (I feare) maintaines you: Our Commodities (in part) inrich your Land-Lords: and yet all things amongſt us infected? you are content to take ſome evill from your Neighbours.

3. Hierarchy.

The third is our blaſting Hierarchie, which ſuffers no good thing (that is, no Brownist, no ſingular fancy, for what good things have we but yours?) to grow or proſper amongſt us, but withers all, both bud and branch, would to God the roote alſo.

4. Service-booke.

The laſt is a daily ſacrifice of a Service-booke: an Incenſe, however unſavory to you, yet ſuch as all Churches in Chriſtendome hold ſweet, and offer up as fit for the noſtrils of the Almighty: we are not alone thus tainted; all Chriſtian Churches that are or have been, preſent the ſame Cenſures unto God. But ours ſmels ſtrong of the Popes Portuiſe: See whether this be any better than triviall cavilling? If either an ill man, or a Devill ſhall ſpeak that which is good, may not a good man uſe it? If a good Angell or man ſhall ſpeake that which is evill, is it ever the better for the Deliverer?

If Satan himſelfe ſhall ſay of Chriſt; Thou art the Son of the living God, ſhall I feare to repeat it? Not the Author, but the matter in theſe things is worthy of regard: As Jerome ſpeakes of the poyſoned Workes of Origen, and other dangerous Treatiſors, Good things may be received from ill hands. If the matter of any Prayer be Popiſh, fault it for what it containes, not for whence it came: what ſay you againſt us in this, more than Maſter Smith (your ſtout Anabaptiſt) ſaith of our baptizing of Infants? Both of them equally condemned for Antichriſtian. Still, therfore we boaſt of the free and cleare ayre of the Goſpell: if it be annoyed with ſome practicall evils, we may be foule, the Goſpell is it ſelfe, and our profeſſion holy, neither can we complaine of all evills while we want you.

Patres noſtrinon ſolum ante Cyprianum vel Agrippinum, ſed poſtea ſalubertimam conſuetudinem tenuerũt, ut quicquid divinum atque legitimum in aliqua hæreſi vel ſchiſmate integrum reperirent approbent potiùs quàm negarent. Auguſt.

That all Chriſtendome ſhould ſo magnifie your happines (as you ſay) ſo much; and yet your ſelves, and the beſt amongſt you, complaine ſo much both in word and writing, of your miſerable condition under the imperious and ſuperſtitious impoſitions of the Prelates, yea, and ſuffer ſo much alſo under them, as at this day you doe, for ſeeking the ſame Church-government and Miniſtery which is in uſe in all other Churches, ſave your owne. The truth is, you are beſt liked where you are worſt knowne. Your next neighbours of Scotland know your Biſhops government ſo well, as they rather chuſe to undergoe all the miſeries of bonds and baniſhment, than to partake with you in your happineſſe this way; ſo highly doe they magnifie and applaud the ſame. Which choice, I doubt not, other Churches alſo would make, if the ſame neceſſity were laid upon them. And for your graces, we deſpiſe them not, nor any good thing amongſt you, no more than you doe ſuch graces and good things as are to be found in the Church of Rome, from which you ſeparate notwithſtanding. We have, by Gods mercy, the pure and right uſe of the good gifts and graces of God, in Chriſts Ordinance, which you want. Neither the Lords people, nor the holy Veſſels could make Babylon Sion, though both the one and the other were captived for a time.

Section LVI.

The judgment of our owne and our neighbours of our Church.

Socrat lib 1. c. 4. Conſtant. Alex. & Ario. As tamen ſi vos inter vos viciſſim de re quapiam minimi momenti diſſentitis (ſiquidem neque omnes de omnibus rebus idem ſentimus) nihil omnino tamen fieri poterit, ut eximia concordia ſincerè inter vos, integrequè ſervetur, & una inter omnes communio & conſociatio cuſtodiatur.

That which followeth is but words, a ſhort anſwer is too much: That all Chriſtendome magnifies the worthineſſe of our Church, in ſo cleare evidences of their own voices, you cannot deny: and now when you ſee ſuch Teſtimonies abroad (leſt you ſhould ſay nothing) you fetch cavills from home: Thoſe men which (you ſay) complaine ſo much of their miſerable condition under the Prelates impoſitions, have notwithſtanding with the ſame pens and tongues not only juſtified our Church, but extold it: you have found no ſharper adverſaries in this very accuſation, for which you maliciouſly cite them: How freely, how fully have they evinced the truth? yea, the happineſſe of the Church of England againſt your falſe challenges: and yet your fore-head dare challenge them for Authors. So hath their moderation oppoſed ſome appendances, that they have both acknowledged and defended the ſubſtance with equall vehemency to your oppoſition: neither doe they ſuffer (as you traduce them) for ſeeking another Church-government: Looke into the Millinaries petition (the common voice of that part) I am deceived, if ought of their complaints ſound that way, much leſſe of their ſufferings: deformity in practice is objected to them, not indeavour of innovation; That quarrell hath been long ſilent; your motion cannot revive it: would God you could as much follow thoſe men in moderate and charitable carriage, as yau have out-run them in complaint.

It pleaſeth you to deviſe us, like pictures upon courſe canvaſſe, which ſhew faireſt at fartheſt; attributing forraine approbation (which you cannot deny) to diſtance more than to deſert. How is it then, that (beſide ſtrange witneſſes) we which looke upon this face without prejudice, commend it (God knowes) without flattery? we can at once acknowledge her infirmities, and bleſſe God for her graces: Our neighbours (yea, our ſelves) of Scotland know our Church ſo well, that they doe with one conſent

A conſent praiſe her for one of Gods beſt daughters; neither doe the moſt rigorous amongſt them, more diſlike our Epiſcopall Government, than imbrace our Church: what fraud is this; to fly from the Church in common, to one circumſtance? we can honour that noble Church in Scotland, may wee not diſlike their alienations of Church-livings? If one thing offend, doe all diſpleaſe? Yet even this government, which you would have them reſiſt to bonds and baniſhment (who knows not?) begins to find both favour and place: what choiſe other Churches would make, as you doubt not, ſo you care not. If you regard their ſentence, how durſt you revile her as a falſe Harlot, whom they honour as a deare Siſter? If you were more theirs than we, you might upbraid us: Now you tell us what perhaps they would doe; we tell you what they doe, and will doe: Even with one voice, bleſſe God for England, as the B moſt famous and flouriſhing Church in Chriſtendome: your handfull onely makes faces, and envies this true glory. Who yet (you ſay) deſpiſe not our graces, no more than we thoſe of Rome: See how you diſpiſe us while you ſay, you are free from deſpite: How malicious is this compariſon? as if we were to you, as Rome to us: and yet you deſpiſe us more: Wee grant Rome a true Baptiſme, true Viſibility of a Church, though monſtrouſly corrupted: you give us not ſo much: Thanks be tó God, we care leſſe for your cenſure, than you doe for our Church: We have by Gods mercy the true and right uſe of the Word and Sacraments, and all other eſſentiall gifts and graces of God; if there might be ſome further helpes in execution, to make theſe more effectuall, we reſiſt not: But thoſe your other imaginary ordinances, as we have not, C ſo we want not: Neither the Caldeans, nor any Idolatrous enemies could make Sion Babylon, nor the holy veſſels prophane; ſo as they ſhould ceaſe to be fit for Gods uſe: but they were brought back at the return of the captivity, to Jeruſalem: Such were our Worſhip, Miniſtery, Sacraments, and thoſe manifold ſubjects of your cavils, which whilſt you diſgrace for their former abuſe, you call our good evill, and willingly deſpiſe our graces.

Where the truth is a gainer, the Lord (which is truth) cannot be a loſer. Neither is the thanks of ancient favours loſt amongſt them, which ſtill preſſe on towards new mercies: Unthankfull are they unto the bleſſed Majeſty of God, and unfaithfull alſo, which knowing the will of their Maſter doe it not, but go on preſumptuouſly in diſobedience to many the holy ordinances of the Lord and of his Chriſt, which they know, and in word alſo acknowledge, he hath given to his Church to be obſerved, and not for idle ſpeculation, and diſputation without obedience.

D It is not by our ſequeſtration, but by our confuſion, that Rome and Hell gaines. Your odiut commixture of all ſorts of people in the body of your Church, in whoſe lap the vileſt miſcreants are dandled, ſucking her breſts as her naturall children, and are be-bleſt by her (as having right thereunto) with all her holy things, as Prayer, Sacraments, and other Ceremonies, is that which advantageth hell, in the finall obduration and perdition of the wicked, whom by theſe meanes you flatter and deceive.

The Romiſh Prelacy and Prieſthood amongſt you, with the appurtenances for their maintenance and miniſtrations, are Romes advantage. Which therefore ſhe challengeth as her own, and by which ſhe alſo ſtill holds poſſeſſion amongſt you, under the hope of regaining her full inheritance at one time or other. And if the Papiſts take advantage at our condemnation of you, and ſeparation from you: it concernes you, well to ſee where the blame is, and there to lay it: leſt through light and inconſiderate judgement, you juſtifie the wicked, and condemn the righteous.

SECTION LVII.

ALL the ſequell of my Anſwerer is meerly ſententious: it is fitter for us to learn than reply: Where the truth gaines (ſay you) God loſeth not: I tell you againe, where God loſeth, the truth gaineth not, and where the Church loſeth, God (which indowed her) cannot but loſe: Alas, what can the truth either get or ſave by ſuch unkind quarrels? Surely ſuſpition on ſome hands, on others rejection: for (as Optatus of his Donatiſts) betwixt our Licet, and your Non licet, many poore ſoules waver and doubt: neither will ſettle, becauſe we agree not: Thanks are not

The iſſue of Separation.

Inter licet veſtrum, & non licet noſtrum, nitant ac remigant animæ Chriſtianorum. Optat. contr. Parm.

loſt, where new favours are called for, but where old are denied. While your Poeſie is: Such as the mother, ſuch is the daughter; where are our old, our any mercies? They are unthankfull, which know what God hath done, and confeſſe it not: They are unthankfull to God and his Deputy, which knowing themſelves made to obey, preſume to over-rule, and upon their private authority, obtrude to the Church thoſe ordinances to be obſerved, which never had being but in their own idle ſpeculation.

Your Sequeſtration and our confuſion, are both of them beneficiall, where they ſhould not: and as you pretend our confuſion for the cauſe of your Separation; So is your Separation the true cauſe of too much trouble, and confuſion in the Church: Your odious tale of commixture hath cloyed and ſurfeted your Reader already, and received anſwer to ſatiety: this one diſh ſo oft brought forth, argues your poverty: The viſible Church is Gods Drag-net, and Field, and Floore, and Arke; here will be ever at her beſt, Sedge, Tares, Chaffe, uncleane Creatures: yet is this no pretence for her neglect: the notoriouſly evill ſhe caſts from her breſt, and knee, denying them the uſe of her Prayers, and (which your Leaders miſlike) of her Sacrament. If divers through corruption of unfaithfull Officers, eſcape cenſure; yet let not the tranſgreſſions of ſome, redound to the condemnation of the whole Church. In Gods judgement it ſhall not; we care little, if in yours. We tell wicked men they may goe to hell with the water of Baptiſme in their faces, with the Church in their mouthes, we denounce Gods judgements unpartially againſt their ſinnes, and them. Thus we flatter, thus we deceive. If yet they will needs run to perdition; Perditio tua ex te Iſrael.

Non enim propter malos boni deſerendi, ſed propter bonos mali tolerandi ſunt, &c. Sicut toleraverunt Prophetæ, &c. Aug. Ep 48. Barr. againſt Gyff.

Our Clergy is ſo Romiſh as our Baptiſme: If therefore Romiſh becauſe they came thence, we have diſproved it; If therefore Romiſh, becauſe they have been uſed there, we grant and juſtifie it; That ancient confeſſion of their faith which was famous through the world, we receive with them: If they hold one God, one Baptiſme one Heaven, one Chriſt, ſhall we renounce it? Why ſhould we not caſt off our Chriſtendome and humanity: becauſe the Romans had both? How much Rome can either challenge, or hope to gaine in our Clergy and Miniſtration, is well witneſſed by the blood of thoſe Martyrs, eminent in the Prelacy, which in the freſh memories of many was ſhed for God, againſt that Harlot: and by the excellent labours of others both Biſhops and Doctors: whoſe learned pens have pulled downe more of the wals of Rome, than all the corner-creeping Browniſts in the world ſhall ever be able to doe, while Amſterdam ſtandeth. It is you that furniſh theſe adverſaries with advantages, through your wilfull diviſions: Take Scilurus his arrowes, ſingle out of the ſheafe, the leaſt finger breaks them, while the whole bundle feares no ſtreſſe: we know well where the blame is, our deſervings can be no protection to you: you went from us, not we from you. Plead not our conſtraint, you ſhould not have been compelled to forſake us, while Chriſt is with us: But who compels you not to call us brethren? to deny us Chriſtians? Your zeale is ſo farre from juſtifying the wicked that it condemns the righteous.

SEP.

And for the ſuſpition of the rude multitude, you need not much feare it. They will ſuſpect nothing that comes under the Kings broad ſeale: they are ignorant of this fault. Though it were the Maſſe that came with authority of the Magiſtrate, they (for the moſt part) would be without ſuſpition of it: ſo ignorant and profane are they in the moſt places, 1 Sam. 10. 10. It is the wiſe-hearted amongſt you, that ſuſpect your dealings, who will alſo ſuſpect you yet more, at your unſound dealing ſhall be further diſcovered.

SECTION LVIII.

The Browniſts ſcornfull opinion of our people.

HOw ſcornfully doe you turn over our poore rude multitude, as if they were beaſts, not men; or if men, not rude but ſavage! This contempt needed not: Theſe ſonnes of the earth may goe before you to Heaven: Indeed it was of old ſaid, that all Ægyptians were Phyſitians: So may it now of you; All Browniſts are Divines, no Separatiſt cannot propheſie: No ſooner can they look at the ſkirts of this hill, but they are rapt from the ordinary pitch of men: Either this change is perhaps haps by ſome ſtrange illumination, or elſe your learned paucity got their ſkill amongſt our prophane and rude multitude: we have ſtill many in our rude multitude, whom we dare compare with your Teachers: neither is there any ſo lewd and profane, that cannot pretend a ſcandall from your ſeparation: Even theſe ſoules muſt be regarded (though not by you.) Such were ſome of you, but ye are waſhed, &c.

The wiſe-hearted amongſt us doe more than ſuſpect, finde out our weakneſſes, and bewaile them; yet doe they not more diſcover our imperfections than acknowledge our truth: If they be truly wiſe, we cannot ſuſpect them, they cannot forſake us: Their charity will cover more than their wiſdome can diſcover.

SEP.

Laſtly, the terrible threat you utter againſt us, that even whoredomes and murders ſhall abide an eaſier anſwer than ſeparation, would certainly fall heavy upon us, if this anſwer were to be made in your Conſiſtory Courts, or before any of your Eccleſiaſticall Judges; but becauſe we know, that not Antichriſt, but Chriſt ſhall be our Judge, we are bold upon the warrant of his Word and Teſtament, (which being ſealed with his bloud may not be altered) to proclaime to all the world, Separation from whatſoever riſeth up rebelliouſly againſt the Scepter of his Kingdome, as we are undoubtedly perſwaded, the Communion, Government, Miniſtery, and worſhip of the Church of England doe.

SECTION XLVI.

MY laſt threat, of the eaſier anſwers of whordomes, and adulteries, than ſeparation, you think to ſcoffe out of countenance. I feare your conſcience will not alwaies allow this mirth; Our Conſiſtories have ſpared you enough: let thoſe which have tried, ſay whether your corrupt Elderſhip be more ſafe Judges: If ours impriſon juſtly, yours excommunicate unjuſtly; to be in cuſtody is leſſe grievous than out of the Church: at leaſt if your cenſures were worth any thing, but contempt: As Jerom ſaid of the like; it is well that malice hath not ſo great power as will: you ſhall one day (I fear) finde the Conſiſtory of Heaven more rigorous, if you waſh not this wrong with your tears; That tribunall ſhall finde your confidence, preſumption; your zeale, fury. You are bold (ſurely more than wiſe) to proclaime: we have no need of ſuch cries: doubtleſſe your head hath made Proclamations long, now your hands begins. What proclaim you? Separation from the Communion, Government, Miniſtery, and worſhip of the Church of England: what need it? Your act might have ſaved your voice: what ſhould our eyes and eares be troubled with one bad object?

But why ſeparate you from theſe? Becauſe they riſe up rebelliouſly againſt the Scepter of Chriſt: The Scepter of Chriſt is his Word: he holds it out, we touch and kiſſe it: What one ſentence of it do we wilfully oppoſe? Away with theſe fooliſh impieties; you thruſt a Reed into our Saviours hand, and ſay, Haile, King of the Jewes, and will needs perſwade us, none but this is his rod of iron. Laſtly, upon what warrant? Of his Will and Teſtament. You may wrong us; But how dare you faſten your lies upon your Redeemer and Judge? What clauſe of his hath bid you ſeparate? We have the true Copies: As we hope or deſire to be ſaved, we can finde no ſentence that ſoundeth toward the favour of this your act: Muſt God be accuſed of your wilfulneſſe? Before that God and his bleſſed Angels and Saints, we feare not to proteſt that we are undoubtedly perſwaded that whoſoever wilfully forſakes the Communion, Government, Miniſtery, or worſhip of the Church of England, are enemies to the Scepter of Chriſt, and Rebels againſt his Church and Annointed; neither doubt we to ſay, that the Maſterſhip of the Hoſpitall at Norwich, or a leaſe from that City (ſued for with repulſe) might have procured that this ſeparation from the Communion, Government, and worſhip of the Church of England ſhould not have been made by John Robinſon.

A SERIOUS DISSWASION FROM Poperie.

To W. D. Revolted, &c.

YOU challenged me for my bold aſſertion of your manifold diviſions: I doe here make it good with uſury. Thoſe mouths that ſay they teach you the truth, ſay alſo (and you have beleeved them) that they all teach the ſame. As you finde them true in this, ſo truſt them in the other: For me, I cannot without indignation ſee, that in this light of the Goſpell, God and his truth ſhould thus be looſers by you; and that a miſerable ſoule ſhould ſuffer it ſelfe to be thus groſſely cozened of it ſelfe, and glory: Many can write to you with more profoundneſſe, none with more ſincere fervency, and deſire to ſave you.

I call heaven and earth to record againſt you this day, that if you relent or anſwer not, your periſhing is wilfull. Wee may pitty your weakneſſe, but God ſhall plague your Apoſtaſie: if you had bin bred in blindnes, your ignorance had been but lamentable, now your choice and love of darknes is fearfull and deſperate. Alas! you cannot be condemned without our ſorrow and ſhame. What ſhould we doe? We can but intreat, perſwade, proteſt, mourn, and gage our ſoules for yours; if theſe availe not, who can remedy that which will periſh? Heare this yet (you weak Revolter) if there be any care left in you of that ſoul which you have thus proſtituted to error; if you have any regard to that God, whoſe ſimple truth you have contemned & forſaken: what is this that hath driven you from us, allured you to them? For Gods ſake, let me but expoſtulate a little ere my ſilence: Either be convicted or inexcuſable. Our bad lives have ſet you off; Woe is me that they are no holier; I bewail our wickedneſſe, I defend it not; Only aſk how they live in Italy; If they be not (for the moſt part) filths to the worſt of ours, goe with them and proſper. Let all indifferent tongues ſay, whether that very See whereon your faith depends, even within the ſmoke of his holines, be not (for viciouſnes) the ſink of the world; we may condemn our ſelves, their lives ſhall juſtifie us; But you liſt not to look ſo far; you ſee their lives at home, you ſee ours: The compariſon is not equall; They take this for the time of their perſecution: we of our proſperity. The ſtubborneſt Iſraelite and the moſt godleſſe Mariner, could call upon God in his trouble: we are all worſe with liberty: Look back and ſee how they lived in former times while they proſpered; No Turks (ſaith Eraſmus) more abominably: though now at the worſt, how many holy profeſſors might you finde, which would ſcorn that the moſt ſtrict Hermit, or auſtere Cappucine, ſhould goe before them in a gratious life, and in true mortification? even amongſt twelve, there wil be one Devil: I wiſh they were ſo good, that we might emulate them: but for my part, I never yet could could know that Papiſt, which made conſcience of all Gods ten morall laws: Shortly whatſoever is upbraided to us; the truth is pure, though men be unholy; and God is where he was, whatſoever becomes of men: For you, if you had not falne to coole affections, and a looſe life, you had been ſtill ours: It is juſt with God to puniſh your ſecure negligence with error & deluſion; and to ſuffer you thus to loſe the truth, who had loſt your care of obedience and firſt love. And now you doe well to ſhift off this blame to others ſins, which have moſt cauſe to accuſe your own.

From manners to look towards our doctrine; the novelty of our Religion (you ſay) hath diſcouraged you: theirs hath drawn you with reverence of her age. It is a free challenge betwixt us, let the elder have us both: if there be any point of our Religion yonger than the Patriarchs, and Prophets, Chriſt and his Apoſtles, the Fathers & Doctors of the Primitive Church, let it be accurſed, and condemned for an upſtart: ſhew us evidence of more credit and age, and carry it. The Church of Rome hath been ancient, not the errors; neither do we in ought differ from it, wherein it is not departed from it ſelf. I did not more feare your wearineſſe than my own; forgetting the meaſure of a Preface, I would paſſe through every point of difference betwixt us; and let you ſee in all particulars, which is the old; and make you know, that your Popiſh Religion doth put on a borrowed viſour of gravity upon this Stage, to out-face true antiquity. Yet leſt you ſhould complain of words, let me without your tediouſneſſe have leave but to inſtance in the firſt of all Controverſies betwixt us; offering the ſame proofe in all, which you ſhall ſee performed in one, I compare the judgement of the ancient Church with yours, ſee therefore and be aſhamed of your novelty.

First, our queſtion is, whether all thoſe books which in our Bibles are ſtiled, Apocryphal, & are put after the reſt by themſelves, are to be received as the true ſcriptures of God? Heare firſt the voice of the old Church: to let paſſe that clear & pregnant teſtimony of Melito Sardenſis in his Epiſtle to Oneſimus cited by Euſebius. Let Cyprian or Ruffinus rather ſpeak in the name of all: Of the old teſtament (ſaith he) firſt were written the five books of Moſes, Geneſis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, Deuteronomy; after theſe the book of Joſhuah the Son of Nun, and that of the Judges, together of Ruth; after which were the foure books of the Kings, which the Hebrewes reckon but two: of the Chronicles which is called the book of Dayes; and of Ezra, are two books, which of them are accounted but ſingle, and the book of Eſter. Of the Prophets there is Eſay, Hieromy, Ezekiel, and Daniel, and beſides, one book which contains the twelve ſmaller Prophets. Alſo Job, and the Pſalmes of David are ſingle books: of Solomon there are three books delivered to the Church, the Proverbs, Eccleſiaſtes, Song of Songs. In theſe they have ſhut up the numbers of the bookes of the old Teſtament. Of the new, there are foure Goſpels, of Matthew, Marke, Luke, and John; the Acts of the Apoſtles, written by Luke; of Paul the Apoſtle foureteen Epiſtles; of the Apoſtle Peter two Epiſtles, of James the Lords brother and Apoſtle, one; of Jude one: of John three; Laſtly, the Revellation of John. Theſe are they which the Fathers have accounted within the Canon, by which they would have the aſſertions of our faith made good. But we muſt know there are other books, which are called of the Ancients not Canonicall but Eccleſiaſticall, as the Wiſdome of Solomon, and another book of Wiſdome, which is called of Jeſus the ſonne of Sirach; which book of the Latines is termed by a generall name Eccleſiaſticus: of the ſame ranke is the book of Toby and Judeth, and the books of the Maccabees: Thus farre that Father; ſo Hierome after that he hath reckoned up the ſame number of bookes with us in their order, hath theſe words: This Prologue of mine (ſaith he) may ſerve as a well defenced entrance to all the books which I have turned out of Hebrew into Latine; that we may know that whatſoever is beſides theſe, is Apocryphal: therefore that booke which is intituled Salomons Wiſdome, and the book of Jeſus the ſonne of Sirach, and Judith, and Tobias, and Paſtor, are not Canonicall: the firſt booke of the Maccabees I have found in Hebrew, the ſecond in Greeke: which book (ſaith he) indeed the Church readeth, but receiveth not as Canonicall. The ſame reckoning is made by Origen in Euſebius, word for word. The ſame by Epiphanius, by Cyril, by Athanaſius, Gregory, Nazianzen, Damaſcen: yea by Lyranus, both Hugoes, Cajetan, Carthuſian, and Montanus himſelfe, &c

All of them with full conſent rejecting theſe ſame Apocryphall bookes with us. Now heare the preſent Church of Rome in her owne words, thus: The holy Synode of Trent hath thought good to ſet down with this Decree a juſt Catalogue of books of holy Scripture, leſt any man ſhould make doubt which they be which are received by the Synode: and they are theſe under-written; Of the Old Teſtament, five books of Moſes, then Joſhuah, the Judges, Ruth, foure bookes of the Kings, two of the Chronicles, two of Eſdras, the firſt and the ſecond, which is called Nehemias, Tobias, Judeth, Eſter, Job; the Pſalter of David, containing one hundred and fifty Pſalms, The Proverbs of Salomon, Eccleſiaſtes, the Song of Songs, the booke of Wiſdome, Eccleſiaſticus, Eſay, Hieremie, &c. two bookes of the Maccabees, the firſt and the ſecond.

And if any man ſhall not receive theſe whole bookes with all the parts of them, as they are wont to be read in the Catholike Church, and as they are had in the old vulgar Latine Edition, for holy and Canonicall, let him be accurſed. Thus ſhe: Judge you now of our age, and ſay, whether the opinion of the ancient Church (that is ours) be not a direct enemy to Popery, and flatly accurſed by the Romiſh.
